PUBLIC BUSINESS.

ON Monday Mr. GLADSTONE announced the course which the Government was prepared to take with regard to the despatch of the immense amount of public business standing for the consideration of Parliament. Seven Bills were, as he said, standing like a row of criminals ready for execution, and he forthwith executed them. Two Irish Bills and a Scotch Bill of purely local interest disappeared without any one to bemoan their fate, and much the same may be said of the Metropolitan Police Superannuation Bill. The Juries Bill introduced such sweeping changes, made with so little forethought, that its execution was a matter of certainty. The Master and Servants' Wages Bill, founded on the Report of a Commission conducted with great ability and zeal, deserved a better fate; but it would have provoked long and eager discussion, and certainly it cannot be said that the present is a moment when servants are especially conspicuous as a downtrodden and oppressed class. The abandonment of the Contagious Diseases Bill stood on a different footing, and the announcement that the Government was going to throw it over was received with much gratification. This was not a case of the Government finding itself obliged to abandon a useful measure introduced on its merits. It was the offspring of an unworthy panic, into which the Government had been frightened by the ignorant clamour and noisy misrepresentations of a fanatical and repulsive clique, and it is now allowed to drop simply because the Government has found that the howling which it thought so dreadful may be safely disregarded. Even, however, after those sacrifices had been made, the business remaining to be dealt with was extremely heavy, and another race of criminals with ropes round their necks will soon be seen, and will be as certain to be executed as their predecessors. The Corrupt Practices Bill is to be brought forward with a long list of amendments proposed by the Government. If the House likes to swallow all these amendments without discussion, then, Mr. GLADSTONE says, the Bill may pass; but if any discussion is raised, the Bill will be immediately withdrawn. There cannot be much hope that a criminal with such a tight rope round his neck will be reprieved. With regard to the Local Government of Ireland Bill, the Enclosure Bill, the Thames Embankment Bill, and the Education Act Amendment Bill, Mr. GLADSTONE stated that the Government intended to pass them, but he significantly hinted that they would need little discussion. If members choose to talk much about them, they are at liberty to do so, but they will get their holidays so much later. Even if they talk very little, or not at all, there is so much to do that it is doubtful whether all the business can be got through by the end of the first week in August. A night is to be devoted to the consideration of the very important subject of the Galway election and the attacks on Mr. Justice KILGILL, and the Indian Budget is to have an afternoon all to its life. Much work has still to be done in Committee of Supply, and several of the Bills that are ultimately passed will first come back with amendments made in them by the Lords, and some time must be consumed in deciding how far these amendments are to be accepted. Altogether, Parliament has a hard three weeks' work before it.

The Bills of private members are of course swept to destruction in a mass. Mr. NEWDEGATE was a little indignant at their wholesale extinction, but Mr. GLADSTONE pointed out that no private member could at this period of the Session have any chance of carrying a Bill. Such Bills, as he remarked, were beyond either fear or hope. If private members insisted, the Government would be obliged to allow them time, but it would be time purely wasted. A feeble remnant of the House of Commons would go on sitting a little longer in the dog days, and Mr. GLADSTONE expected that private members would save themselves, not only with readiness, but with enthusiasm, from such a fate. The same thing happens year after year. Members find interest, and hope to find fame or notoriety, in mastering the details of a subject and linking their names with it. They bring in Bills to carry out the conclusions at which they have arrived, and then find that they are utterly powerless to press these Bills forward. They have no force at their command adequate to the task of getting a Bill through three readings and a Committee. Exceptions occur, and Mr. HENRY JAMES has just been lucky enough to secure the third reading of a Bill for extending the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act to municipal elections, and if the Peers make no objection, his Bill will become law. But, as a general rule, private members have no chance, and know that they have no chance, of passing their Bills. This is not much to be regretted, and, in point of fact, does not in the least discourage private members. What are the Bills of private members? They are, in nine cases out of ten, merely a means of calling the attention of Parliament and the country to a subject on which legislation is supposed to be required. They are instruments for ventilating the theories of men with special knowledge or special interests. At first sight it might appear that the mechanism was unnecessarily elaborate and minute. But it is really in the highest degree desirable that a member who wants to attract attention to a subject should put his views into the shape of a Bill. It forces him to think how they would work if put into practical operation, and many absurdities which, in the minds of the member and his friends, might otherwise be covered with a haze of pleasant obscurity, are at once exposed when clauses are drawn up to embody them. When the proposals of a member will stand the test of being expressed in a Bill, they are often of great value and have an effect on legislation and on the conduct of the Government, although they are unaccompanied with hundreds of other innocents at the end of the Session. The Government even sometimes goes so far as to complain that it has not received this sort of accidental assistance, and Lord HARTINGTON on Wednesday seriously lamented that, although the subject of the purchase of the Irish railways had been agitating Ireland for seven years, no one until that day had brought the matter in a definite shape before Parliament; and yet immediately afterwards he asked that a Bill prepared by a private member for facilitating the purchase should be withdrawn, as it was wholly impracticable, and the subject was one with which no one except the Government could deal. Very often, too, the Bills of private members are exceedingly useful in disclosing the feebleness of the support really extended to measures supposed to be strongly supported. The Burials Bill, for example, has been crushed because after Session because the country is not prepared to face the danger of searing churchyards made the scene of rivalry and confusion; and Mr. FAWCETT's Dublin University Bill has fallen through, not only because the Government opposed it, but because impartial criticism showed that it was not in itself a satisfactory measure, although the University and the Conservative party and many advanced Liberals agreed in supporting it. Members whose Bills are sacrificed naturally feel annoyed at such statements as that of Mr. GLADSTONE, but the country can afford to look at these Bills as a whole, and can satisfy itself that Parliament has really done enough towards letting the authors of new theories and suggestions have a fair chance of explaining their views.

It is the unavoidable sacrifice of Government measures of secondary importance that is to be lamented. The Session has been by no means a fruitless one. The Ballot Bill is now law, and the Government will, it is almost certain, succeed in passing the Scotch Education Bill, the Mines Regulation Bill, the Licensing Bill, and the Public Health Bill. The last two are indeed very small measures. They are bits of Bills rather than Bills, but still they may fairly count for something, and may hereafter prove to be the foundation of more comprehensive measures. The amount of successful work done by the Government this Session is therefore fully up to the average. But it is lamentable to think how much is left undone that ought to have been done, even when the general performance of the Government may, according to the usual standard, be pronounced not unsatisfactory. A Bill, for example, like the Scotch Land Transfer Bill is knocked on the head without any one raising a voice in its favour. It is merely a Bill which has something to do with the oddities of Scotch real property law. No one understands or cares about its objects or its provisions; and yet it is to some people a matter of deep and legitimate interest. They have a grievance in the existence of certain old feudal claims on their land, which they are willing to buy up, which those who make the claims are willing to have bought up, and which the Government thinks ought to be purchasable on fair terms. It is a Bill which may be compared with the English Act for enfranchising copyholds, the value of which is a matter of daily experience in many counties. But the Government is obliged to throw it overboard in the middle of July, and the Scotch have to wait for another year until Parliament can find time to attend to them. The Scotch are a patient people, but they have neighbours who are not quite so patient. The experience of Lord HARTINGTON as Irish Secretary has evidently made him alive to the dangers to be apprehended from the continued difficulty of getting Parliament to attend to Irish business. If the neglect exhibited in the last two years is allowed to prevail next Session, the cry for Home Rule would, he warned his hearers, attain very inconvenient strength. But Parliament has, as its business is now conducted, not time enough to attend properly to half the matters with which it takes on itself to deal, and it will not listen to any proposal for a change in its manner of conducting its business. This state of things cannot last. A change must come sooner or later, and the danger is lest it should come in a very bad form, and be made under circumstances humiliating to England. The end of a cry for Home Rule in Ireland would not be the legislative independence of Ireland, but it would in all probability be the extension to Ireland of great facilities for getting Irish business done quickly and with attention to local needs, under the control of the Imperial Parliament. That such a change, proper in itself, should be wrung out of some English Government by the nuisance of a random and half-treasonable movement for Home Rule, as the disestablishment of the Irish Church was forced on an English Government by Fenianism, would be a matter of deep regret; and yet it is more than possible that this may be the course events will take unless Parliament will set itself in time to achieving the difficult but not hopeless task of constructing some machinery by which measures of a humble and unattractive kind needed by Ireland and Scotland may be passed with reasonable ease and promptitude.

THE AMERICAN PRESIDENCY.

THE nomination of Mr. GREELEY by the Democratic Convention at Baltimore for the first time renders his candidature serious. The determination to defeat GRANT at all hazards, if it seems scarcely consistent with sound political morality, at least indicates the profound dissatisfaction which has been provoked by the present Administration. The original movement was an honest attempt to interrupt the progress of misgovernment and corruption. The Liberal Republicans nearly succeeded in nominating the candidate who would have been most acceptable to the better and more intelligent section of both the great parties; but the election managers had determined to protect the interests of their craft, and they persuaded the majority of delegates that an imperfectly educated, prejudiced, and popular journalist would command a greater number of votes than a statesman who had also the disadvantage of being a gentleman. From that time some of the ablest of GRANT's original opponents either ceased to take any further interest in the struggle, or fell back into the ranks of the regular Republican party; but the great mass of the seceders, in accordance with the established rules of political discipline, pledged themselves to abide by the choice of the Cincinnati Convention. No fault can be found with a decision which strictly accords with precedent, and which recognizes the undeniable necessity of party organization; but it is unfortunate that the system of universal suffrage should by a necessary consequence have transferred the power of choosing a President from the constituency to clubs of professional politicians who know how to manipulate the machinery of elections. Personal fitness for all public offices, including the highest, has long been habitually disregarded by the managers of conventions. It is undoubtedly from a creditable feeling of loyalty that Mr. SCHURZ, who has from the first led the opposition to General GRANT, has undertaken the distasteful duty of supporting Mr. GREELEY. Mr. SUMNER, who is a still more implacable enemy of the PRESIDENT, declined to attend the Cincinnati Convention, and he still stands aloof from both the contending parties. As an advocate of the severe measures which have been enacted against the South, he can scarcely be expected to adopt the proposal of universal amnesty and of the termination of military government. The Cincinnati platform or declaration of principles includes scarcely any other definite proposition. Of the promise that the question of Free-trade shall be left to the decision of the constituencies or of Congress, it can only be said that it is less mischievous and not more utterly unprincipled than the pledge given against freedom of trade by the rival Convention at Philadelphia. It is highly probable that the nomination of Mr. GREELEY was effected by the Protectionists who had, perhaps for that purpose, joined the ranks of the Liberal Republicans. As a fanatical opponent of sound economic doctrines, Mr. GREELEY perhaps inspires monopolists with a confidence which is not to be shaken even by the use for election purposes of suspicious verbiage.

Mr. SUMNER has expounded in an elaborate oration, delivered shortly before the adjournment of the Senate, the grounds of his hostility to General GRANT; but, as he professes to appeal to the Philadelphia Convention, it may be inferred that he will not actively oppose the regular Republican nominee. On an unenlightened foreigner the speech produces the impression of an enlarged copy of a schoolboy's theme. In pompous phrases, interspersed with real and imaginary examples from history, General GRANT is accused of nepotism, of pecuniary corruption, and of disregard for the letter and spirit of the Constitution. By employing military officers in civil appointments, and by ordering certain reports to be made to the Commander-in-Chief instead of to the Secretary at War, the PRESIDENT has, it seems, attempted to establish despotism, or, in Mr. SUMNER's barbarous language, "the One-Man Power." Mr. BUCKLE and the late Lord DUNHAM are quoted as authorities for the proposition that soldiers are unfit for political functions; and Mr. SUMNER complacently asserts that MARLBOROUGH, WELLINGTON, and FREDERICK the GREAT were conspicuously deficient in civil ability. He further records how JEFFERSON blamed his rival, President JOHN ADAMS, for promoting his son who afterwards succeeded to the office of President to a higher diplomatic post. WASHINGTON refused a present from the Virginia Assembly of certain canal shares; and BROUGHAM only consented to receive a trifling ornament from his admirers at Glasgow. From "an able historical work in two volumes, entitled Il Nipotismo di Roma," Mr. SUMNER extracts a summary of family jobs perpetrated by the Popes in the course of two hundred years. Having shown that General GRANT strongly resembles ALEXANDER VI. and GREGORY XIII., the orator "leaves for the time this enormous 'unrepublican pretension' to discuss the PRESIDENT's other demerits. Unlike St. LOUIS, who, 'leaving on a crusade,' charged his Queen-Regent not to accept presents for herself 'or her children,' General GRANT has not only received numerous gifts, but he has in two or three instances promoted the donors to high offices of State. The obstinate and abortive efforts of the PRESIDENT to procure the assent of Congress to the annexation of San Domingo are not unjustly censured; but to strangers it would scarcely seem that a mere proposal or suggestion could be treasonable or even criminal, although it was contained in an 'Annual Message where undignified insult to the Senate vies with absurdity in declaring prospective profits, and with geographical ignorance.' But 'all this will be one of the riddles of American history; it will be explained only by the extent to which the One-Man Power had succeeded in subjugating the Government.'

When Mr. SUMNER's tumid twaddle is reduced within moderate dimensions, it may be admitted that General GRANT's conduct has not been consistent with scrupulous delicacy, nor even with perfect political integrity. No Pope of the seventeenth century was more lavish than the actual

PRESIDENT of patronage to his relations and connexions, nearly all of whom unluckily happen to be persons of questionable reputation. One of the number, Mr. CASEY, Collector at New Orleans, has exceeded the ordinary licenses of American functionaries in his interference with local elections. Mr. THOMAS MURPHY, a favourite but not a kinsman, lately Collector at New York, created so much scandal that the PRESIDENT was at last compelled to accept his resignation; and it is well understood that numerous appointments have been made for the express purpose of promoting the re-election of General GRANT. No comparison with FABRICIUS and CINCINNATUS, or even with WASHINGTON and JEFFERSON, is required to prove that the candidate unanimously nominated at Philadelphia is not selected as the representative of political and official purity; but, on the other hand, no direct act of personal dishonesty has been traced to the PRESIDENT himself. After his first election General GRANT found that the unfamiliar machinery of government could be most easily worked by the accustomed methods of patronage; and where it was generally assumed that personal qualifications were to be disregarded, he not unnaturally thought that his own family and friends might as well profit by a share in the distribution of office. His gratitude to those from whom he had received personal benefits was not unamiable in itself; and the Senate, when it approved his nominations, was fully aware of all the circumstances of each separate case. The early Presidents of the Republic were surrounded by a purer political atmosphere, and they occupied a different social position. The opponents of General GRANT think it a recommendation to their candidate that he has lived by manual labour; and no President since Mr. BUCHANAN has enjoyed the advantage of an early liberal education, though General GRANT himself passed through the West Point Academy. His best title to the honours which he has received, and to those which may hereafter be conferred, is derived from his services in the war. As in the case of other generals, his military qualities may be variously estimated, but there can be no dispute as to his success. The occupation of Fort Donelson turned the tide of victory; the capture of Vicksburg was fatal to the fortunes of the Confederates in the West; and the bloody campaign of Virginia was so conducted as to secure to the Northern army the decisive advantage which belongs to an irresistible preponderance of numbers. It is a greater achievement to have caused the surrender of LEE and the termination of the war than to have acquired large circulation and influence for a wrong-headed newspaper.

Mr. GREELEY's success, which is now considered not to be improbable, would indicate an imminent dissolution and reconstruction of parties. The Baltimore Convention virtually confessed that the Democrats have no longer any distinct principles to advocate; but those who must contribute the largest share to the victory of the Coalition will claim a proportionate share of the spoils. Mr. GREELEY will be expected and compelled to admit a certain number of Democrats into his Cabinet; nor will the Liberal Republicans be entitled to a monopoly of postmasterships and to all the lucrative collectorships. In the conduct of affairs it will be impossible to adhere to the safe and unmeaning generalities of the Cincinnati platform. It will be necessary to favour either the white inhabitants of the South or the coloured race; and the Democratic party will not fail to insist on an amnesty and on the termination of military government. To the reform of the civil service GRANT and GREELEY are equally disinclined, though it is possible that in a second term of office, with nothing further to hope from political allies, General GRANT may at last be disposed to check the prevailing corruption. If the contending parties are to be judged by the statements of opinion which were respectively published at Cincinnati and at Philadelphia, they are divided by no perceptible difference of political principle. A majority of the Liberal Republicans and of the Democrats are probably opposed to commercial protection; and it is possible that, notwithstanding Mr. GREELEY's prejudices and predilections, his supporters may eventually constitute themselves into a Free-trade party. For the present, the contest is scarcely more interesting than the competition of the red and blue factions in the Circus at Constantinople; and it appears that hitherto the canvass on both sides has been conducted with little interest or excitement. In the four months which still remain before the election innumerable speeches will be delivered; but the constituency fully understands that there is no political issue involved in the struggle. A bystander who even forms a wish for the success of either candidate must be unusually excitable.

FRENCH FINANCE

THE agitation in the French Assembly during the financial debates of the last week has been extreme, and scenes of disorder and passion have followed each other in rapid succession. The President, M. GAÉVY, has complained in the most bitter manner of the continued anarchy into which he vainly strives to introduce something like order, and on one occasion business was for a time wholly suspended because the Assembly broke up into groups of talkers, who were absorbed in the occupation of bawling at each other. Finance has, in fact, been once more merged in politics, and M. THIERS has been playing off the Left against the majority, and checking the Left in turn, so as to make them regard him as their ally, and not their instrument. He has been eminently successful, and there is little doubt now that he will get his beloved taxes on raw materials adopted by the Assembly. He has of course attained his triumph by political, and not financial, arguments and devices; but still the history of the past week is full of significance for the financial as well as the political future of France. The first great point of contest has been as to the amount really necessary to balance the Budget of 1873. M. THIERS says that he must have at least 200,000 millions of francs from new taxes. M. MAGNE, one of the greatest of French financial authorities, asserted on Saturday of last week that 135 millions would be enough; and as M. THIERS immediately replied, an issue was raised in the clearest possible manner for the consideration of the Assembly and of the country. Whether the 65 millions forming the difference between the two estimates was or was not really wanted was a point of capital importance to determine before the amount and the mode of new taxation was further discussed. M. MAGNE admitted that the following amounts must be provided for:—58 millions to replace sums borrowed from what is termed the Budget of Liquidation, or, in other words, to make up a current deficit; 25 millions for increased charges on the existing public debt, 2 millions for increased cost of collection of taxes, and 48 millions for the interest and expenses of the new loan. The 65 millions which the Government said it was necessary, and M. MAGNE said it was not necessary, to raise were for the following purposes:—25 millions for the wants of different departments of State, 8 millions to aid in balancing the Budget of 1872, 10 millions for carrying out the new scheme of army organization, and 22 millions as a margin to provide against the taxes voted falling short of the Estimates. Conceding that 135 millions must be provided, M. MAGNE stated that the taxes already voted on mortgages and securities would yield 30 millions; taxes on metals and sundry articles of consumption as to which there was no difference of opinion would yield 15 millions; and 20 millions would, according to the statement of the Government, be gained by the suppression of frauds in the manufacture of alcohol; or in all 65 millions, leaving 70 millions to be found. This was the exact sum which M. GASLONDE's amendment, then under the consideration of the Assembly, purported to provide—namely, 40 millions from an increase of the trade licences, and 30 millions from an increase of the taxes on doors and windows and on furniture. The Budget Committee had previously come to the conclusion that what may be very roughly termed the commercial interest as opposed to the agricultural interest ought to bear an increase of taxation to the amount of 70 millions, and M. GASLONDE's proposal might be taken as a rude way of attaining the object of imposing this amount of new taxation on the classes destined to bear it.

The two propositions on which the only serious financial opponents of the Government relied were, accordingly, that only 70 millions more were wanted, and that these 70 millions might be safely and properly levied by some form of direct taxation on the trading classes. M. THIERS disputed vehemently both assumptions. He asserted that not 70 millions more, but 135 millions, were wanted, and that 70 millions could not be fairly levied by any form of direct taxation on the trading classes. A distinct issue being thus raised, the Assembly proceeded to vote. The 40 millions to be obtained by the increase of the trade licences were voted without a division, but the proposal to raise the 30 millions by an increase of the duties on doors and windows and on furniture was rejected by a majority of twenty-seven, M. THIERS voting in the minority. The opponents of the Government in the beginning of the week made a further effort to carry out their views. They proposed that not 40 millions, but the whole 70 millions, should be obtained by an increase of the trade licences. This proposal was rejected on Tuesday by a very decisive majority. On Wednesday it appeared that the opponents of the Government had come to the end of their resources. They had no taxes to propose by which the 30 millions which they owned were necessary might be found, and they were reduced to suggesting that a reduction of expenditure should be made, so that these 30 millions might not be needed. This provoked M. THIERS to extreme anger. He alleged that the Government had made every possible reduction already except in the expenditure on the army. This had been largely increased, in compliance with the necessities of the case and the wishes of the country. If a reduction was made, it must be in the expenditure of the army, and if this expenditure was reduced, the army could not be maintained in a position worthy of the country. This frightened his adversaries, as they knew that they could not come to a rupture with M. THIERS on a point as to which the country would be sure to be against them. They were thus played out. They acknowledged that taxes to produce 30 millions must be invented, that they could not invent any, and that the expenditure could not be so reduced as to make the raising of these 30 millions unnecessary. M. THIERS had beaten them, and he had only to throw a sop to them by saying that during the recess the Government would not countenance any agitation for the dissolution of the Assembly, and they began to take their beating with something like good-humour. But it was not only in the final result that M. THIERS had the advantage. He had previously had the best of the argument while details were being discussed. It was not true that only 135 millions were wanted, and it was not true that 70 millions could be fairly and properly levied on the trading classes by direct taxation. M. MAGNE treated the notion of providing a margin as ridiculous; but he evidently spoke without thinking it necessary to consider the actual facts as to the produce of the new taxes. It is stated that the Customs Revenues for the first five months of the present year, in spite of augmentations by which it was estimated that their produce would be half as much again, have actually yielded less than they did in the corresponding months of the two years before the war; and 22 millions is a very small margin in the face of such figures. Then, again, as M. THIERS showed, to double the licence duties would be simply to crush many of the small shopkeepers. The number of persons who take out licences in the third or lowest class is one million and a half, and it would be at once cruel and impolitic to double the burden borne by such a vast number of poor people. He was answered by saying that the proposal to double the duty was also accompanied by a proposal that the incidence of the tax should be revised, so as to spare the poor. But he pointed out that the great bulk of the revenue from licences was made up of the sums which these humble people paid, and that if they were relieved, nothing like the anticipated 70 millions could be obtained from this source. To this no reply worthy of notice was or could be made.

No proposal except that to tax raw materials remains, and this probably may now be looked on as adopted. But nothing can be more strange than the language of M. THIERS as to his favourite taxes. It is not at all surprising that he should advocate them on principle. They embody Protection, and he is an ardent Protectionist. But what is wonderful is the persistent manner in which, in spite of repeated and crushing criticism, he goes on asserting that these taxes will produce any sum he thinks proper to name. Not long ago he put a speculative question to the Committee of Tariffs, which was this—Supposing France were not bound by the Commercial Treaties by which she is bound, what would these taxes produce? The Committee answered 93 millions, but that, as matters really stood, the yield would probably not exceed 5 millions. Nevertheless, M. THIERS throughout the recent debates has constantly urged on the Assembly that they have only to vote as he bids them, and that, on the showing of the Committee, they will get in 93 millions at once. It was vain that members of the Committee tried to explain that what they said was that, if a set of circumstances existed, which did not and could not be made to exist, the taxes would produce 93 millions. M. THIERS accepted the explanation for the moment, and then immediately went back to his 93 millions as an admitted sum. He himself, when he was enunciating his views a few days ago, admitted that these taxes would only produce 40 millions during the present year when the treaties with England and Belgium will remain in force, and it is the Budget of the present year that is under discussion. There are, therefore, two things to be carefully noted in estimating the present position of French finance. In the first place, whereas 135 millions have to be found to balance the Budget, M. THIERS proposes to levy new taxes, which, according to him, will this year produce 40 millions, and, according to other calculators, men of considerable ability and experience, will only produce 5 millions, leaving thus a deficit according to him of 95 millions, and according to his opponents of 130 millions. In the second place, all modes of taxation which will not excite vehement opposition and discontent have now been exhausted. If there is a deficit, as on the showing of M. THIERS himself is almost certain to be the case, this deficit, if met by new taxes, can only be met by taxes that will cause a violent political struggle; and it is probable that, in preference to provoking such a struggle, it will be thought better to have recourse to new loans, in order to give France breathing time until the growing wealth of the country makes the existing taxes productive enough to balance the Budget. France is so industrious, so thriving, and so saving a country that it is safe to calculate on an increasing power in the country to pay taxes. But, on the other hand, it may be observed that France is now going to embark on a system of Protection, and either the doctrines of political economy are all wrong, or the recourse to Protection will impede the progress of the nation in wealth; and, secondly, it is already evident that the taxes are high enough to make smuggling on a large scale very profitable, and smuggling under a system of heavy taxation can only be encountered by greatly increasing the expenses of the collection of the revenue. Political disturbances would of course largely increase the deficit in the Budget of the year when they occurred; but, even if all goes on smoothly, there is every prospect of a deficit in the French Budget for many years to come. Subscribers to the new loan should take this into account. Even if there is a deficit or a succession of deficits, French stock may be well worth taking at a price; but what this price is must be determined with reference to the consideration that France has not now a balanced Budget, and has no apparent chance of showing one at an early date.

THE PRICE OF COAL.

THE extraordinary advance in the price of coal threatens to interrupt or terminate the prosperous condition of trade, and it already causes great hardship to the mass of consumers. No other element of production is at the same time so indispensable as a domestic article of use; and it is not a little remarkable that the different kinds of coal which are respectively required for consumption and for manufacturing purposes have become simultaneously dearer. Steam coal, smelting coal, and household coal have been equally affected by causes which must therefore, as it would seem, relate to the conditions of supply rather than to the increase of demand. The unprecedented activity of the iron trade would account for the rise of price in furnace coal; and the gradual substitution of steamers for sailing-vessels, coinciding with the great extension of the English mercantile marine, provides larger and larger outlets for the produce of Welsh and Northern coalpits. It might have been supposed that household coal, which is in Yorkshire and in other districts intermixed in the beds with steam coal, being necessarily and incidentally worked, would have tended to glut the market; and the returns prove that the importation into London and the Southern counties, of which the greater part is intended for domestic use, has within the last year been enormously large. It may be expected that during the next winter compulsory economy in consumption will, by reducing the demand, either diminish the price, or at least prevent the further progress of the rise. The inevitable check to manufacturing industry, and especially to the production of iron, may perhaps be deferred to a later period. At the present moment ironmasters and other manufacturers are clamorous for an unlimited supply of coal, and all the resources of the railway Companies are barely adequate to provide carriage for the produce, in which the coalowners are in many instances unable to keep pace with the demands of their customers. Many of the longer contracts must have involved heavy loss to the producers, though it is difficult to accept Mr. FOTHERGILL'S assertion that collieries have in a series of years given a smaller return than three per cent. on the capital invested. Within the last year thousands of acres have been taken on mineral leases, and enormous sums have been spent by the lessees in sinking new pits and in providing the necessary plant.

The coalowners have probably taken care to retain for themselves a reasonable proportion of the largely increased sums which have been paid by the consumer; and perhaps their profits may for the present console them for the vexation and embarrassment to which they are exposed in the conduct of their business. The working colliers were justified in asking to share in the prosperity of their employers; but it is unfortunate that they should have preferred to take out their premiums in inefficiency rather than in money. The advances in wages and the reduction of the hours of labour necessarily increased the cost of production; but it might have been hoped that the loss to coalowners and consumers would be confined within calculable limits. It is found by experience that the miners will only work three or four days in the week since the rise in wages has enabled them to secure with a smaller amount of labour the necessaries and luxuries to which they are accustomed. The masters are also compelled to humour their caprices, and to include in the terms of every contract with customers an estimated percentage for the uncertainty of their relations with the workmen. In another and similar branch of industry the temper and proceedings of skilled labourers have produced the curious result of increasing the comparative value of ironstone near the outcrop, as compared with the deeper seams. Mere quarrying from the surface of the ground can be done by ordinary labourers; and their competition to a certain extent holds in check the skilled miners who have a monopoly of subterranean industry. The superficial coal has unluckily long since disappeared; but only a minute part of the rise of price is to be attributed to the exhaustion of the upper seams. North Staffordshire indeed is reduced to the necessity of importing furnace coal for certain purposes; but even in that county there is still a great abundance of coal in Cannock Chase and elsewhere; and in Derbyshire, Yorkshire, Lancashire, South Wales, Lanarkshire, and Fife the production is only regulated by the difficulty of obtaining sufficient supplies of labour. It is not a subject for unqualified satisfaction that a reservoir which can never be replenished should be more and more rapidly drained; and happily it is not probable that the recent rate of increase in production and consumption will be maintained for an indefinite time. At some point the vast coal-fields of North America will begin to compete effectually with English mines; and Pennsylvania itself will no longer find it worth while to procure from Congress the imposition of protective duties.

The iron trade will probably be the first to feel the pressure of dearness of coal; and all fabrics in which iron is employed have risen rapidly in price. Branches of industry in which both coal and iron are largely used are subject to a new and heavy tax. Railway Companies will be compelled to make a large deduction from their gross receipts to cover the increased cost of rails, of steam fuel, and of engines and other machinery. It may also be expected that shipbuilders will be compelled to contract their operations by the large percentage which they must necessarily add to their prices; and for a time it is possible that wooden vessels may again come into fashion. The supply of ironstone within the United Kingdom is practically inexhaustible; and new fields are every day discovered and surveyed. For some years past large quantities of Northamptonshire ore have been sent into Wales and into Staffordshire; and perhaps the Kent and Sussex districts which were, in the days when ore was smelted with wood, the seat of a great iron trade, may once more become workable. The quantity of coal within reach has been approximately ascertained; nor are the borings in the South-Eastern counties which have been projected for scientific objects expected to produce any commercial result. It is less easy to calculate the probable supply and cost of labour, or the tendency of moral and social causes to diminish production. The value of coal and iron, as of all other commodities, is calculated in gold; and the supply of bullion is constantly augmented. The most careful calculator would for the present find it impossible to assign to the depreciation of gold its just share in the rise of the price of coal. It is on many grounds likely that prices will not again fall to their former level, but it may be hoped that last year's advance will not be repeated.

An abundance of coal has been so naturally taken for granted that the influence of comparatively cheap fuel on all the habits of English life can only be understood by an effort of attention. Forty years ago a large part of the inferior coal in Durham and Northumberland was wilfully consumed in great fires which were kept continually burning at the mouths of the pits. An Act of Parliament prohibited the practice, which was still more effectually suppressed by the introduction of railways; yet many years passed before London ceased to depend on sea carriage for the greater part of its supply. The domestic life of which Englishmen are generally proud depends entirely on the possibility of making rooms warm in winter. Some years ago an Italian long settled in England published an interesting account of his unsuccessful attempt to transplant his acquired habits to his native country. He found that in a Piedmontese winter all but the richest class were driven to theatres and to the society of the cafés in consequence of the chill discomfort of houses which consequently could scarcely be regarded as homes. The anomalous preservation of the race of wolves in France and other parts of the Continent results from the necessity of surrendering vast tracts of country to the growth of firewood. It may be hoped that a long time may elapse before the arable fields and pastures of England are converted into stunted forests; but the use of contrivances for economizing fuel will become more and more indispensable, though stoves of all descriptions offer a melancholy contrast to a blazing fire. There are private houses in England which require an expenditure on coal, even when prices are moderate, of more than 1,000*l.* a year. Up to the present time wood, which is at the best a miserable substitute for coal, has also been considerably dearer. Every winter visitor to Paris knows that the cost of fuel often amounts to a fourth or a third part of his hotel expenses. It is difficult to determine whether household or industrial coal is more essential to the general welfare. The exportation has not increased so rapidly as the domestic consumption; and probably it will be greatly interrupted by the rise of prices. Shipowners and packet companies will have a fresh inducement to discover or to use the coal which is to be found in almost every part of the world; and the Chinese Government will be urged with fresh earnestness to permit foreigners to extract the supplies of fuel which are rendered useless by native jealousy and habits of obstruction. In various ways the process of exhaustion of English coal mines will be delayed; but the effect of dearth on the public prosperity may be serious. The inference which Mr. GLADSTONE deduced from the alarming forebodings of statistical inquirers has not yet been practically adopted. The cheapness of gold is a better reason for allowing the National Debt to remain than the dearness of coal for paying it off. There is perhaps little use in commenting on facts which can neither be disturbed nor corrected. When Nature produces an untoward result, it only remains for the community to submit, or, in official language to govern itself accordingly.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

THE curtailment which the Public Health Bill has undergone has supplied the Opposition with an argument of some plausibility against proceeding with it. Would it not be better, it has been asked, to deal comprehensively with the subject next Session rather than to take up a mere fraction of it this Session? As the Bill was originally drawn it aimed at two things—the creation of local sanitary authorities, and the investment of these authorities with enlarged powers. Now the clauses conferring new powers have been dropped, while the clauses creating the authorities who were to exercise them have been retained. What is the good of calling a new machinery into existence for the mere purpose of keeping it idle for twelve months? The fact that new powers were given in the first draft of the Bill is evidence that the Government thought that new powers were wanted. If it has been found impossible to pass the Bill conferring them during the fraction of the Session that still remains, it would be more honest to leave the question alone than to keep the promise of legislation to the ear while breaking it in the spirit.

The fault of this reasoning is that it ignores the fact that very large sanitary powers are already in being, and that the additions to them originally contained in the Public Health Bill, though extremely valuable in themselves, are yet of small importance as compared with those which are already at the disposal of a competent sanitary authority. No one who has not studied the Sanitary Acts now in force knows how large a field they cover. It is true that they have the disadvantage of being both numerous and puzzling. But their complications are complications of form rather than of substance. A layman attempting to answer a particular question by reference to them would find himself in a statutory labyrinth, and might come out of it with a firm conviction that the law on the subject was uncertain or contradictory. But a lawyer would have no difficulty in determining the scope and object of each provision, and the Acts require nothing but careful editing and judicious arrangement to tell their own tale, even for those who are not lawyers. This editing and arrangement Mr. STANFELD has already promised shall be forthcoming as soon as the authorities for whose benefit it is designed shall have been created. We shall not be surprised if, when this work has been done, the new authorities, instead of lamenting that they can do so little, are rather frightened at being empowered to do so much. It is true again that the working of the Sanitary Acts has shown that, though many valuable powers are given by the existing laws, others not less valuable have been withheld. But this is only what must be discovered in a year or two with regard to any Bill that could now be passed. Nothing but experience can adequately show what is needed in this way, and as yet our experience is very limited. Here and there there have been energetic Town Councils or Boards of Health, and these have found that, though they can do a great deal in the way of sanitary improvement, there are some things which they are unable to do. In proportion as the number of energetic sanitary authorities increases there will be fresh revelations of defects which must be supplied before the Sanitary code can be called complete. It would be highly undesirable that any measure which could have been passed this Session, or which may be passed next Session, should be regarded as closing the legislative canon. As soon as any fairly efficient organization is extended over the country, new wants will disclose themselves in all directions. At present almost all our available data have been drawn from towns. When the country districts are made self-governing in sanitary matters they will probably furnish us with new facts, and with facts that may lead to considerable modifications in the best established sanitary theories. The position, therefore, in which the question is left by the withdrawal of a large part of the Public Health Bill is one in which it is likely to be left at frequently recurring intervals. No doubt if the curtailed Bill becomes law this Session certain admitted defects will be left over to be remedied next Session. But supposing that the Bill had been passed this year in its original form, before twelve months had passed a new set of admitted defects would have risen up. There is no immediate prospect of arriving at finality in sanitary legislation. For years to come Parliament must submit to be a learner. Nor is it accurate to say that the Bill in its present form confers no new powers. It converts permissive powers into compulsory powers, and by this means it does in a large number of places confer new powers. Hitherto the most important Sanitary Acts have only become operative at the pleasure of the ratepayers of the district, and as a rule the districts in which sanitary reforms have been most needed have been precisely those in which they have been most hotly opposed. If the Public Health Bill passes, the option of being filthy will no longer be given to any portion of the country, however small or however isolated. In every town there will be an appropriate body of sanitary regulations in force. In every country Union there will be an appropriate body of sanitary regulations in force. Alike in town and country there will be a staff of officers charged with putting these regulations in force. Alike in town and country there will be a staff of inspectors appointed by the Central Authority to see that these officers do their work properly. It cannot be said with any justice that a Bill of this character is a worthless piece of legislation.

It follows from all this that the portion of the Public Health Bill which the Government are now pushing forward deals with the part of the subject which it is most essential to deal with at this moment. The law as it stands gives very large powers to Sanitary authorities—powers not so large indeed as even with our present knowledge we see that they ought to have, but still very much larger than have ever been exercised except in a few isolated instances, and sufficient, if exercised, to make the sanitary condition of the country incalculably better than it now is. The primary defect in the existing law is the want of a single sanitary authority in every district, exercising all the powers recognized by law, and known and accessible to all those living within its jurisdiction. Until this want is supplied, even willing districts cannot always suppress their own nuisances, and unwilling districts cannot be forced to suppress them. When this want is supplied we shall know with a degree of accuracy to which at present we cannot pretend what is the direction that future legislation can most beneficially take. There was no reason, therefore, for refusing to consider this part of the subject by itself. It has no necessary connexion with the proposed increase of powers. Even if the new authorities should never be invested with any additional powers, they might use those which the law already gives them to very good purpose; and nothing will show so clearly what additional powers are wanted as the universal creation of authorities competent to work those already in being. It will be a step of the utmost importance in the direction of a real sanitary reformation if this creation is effected in the present Session.

Upon the only point of much importance which has been discussed in Committee we have more than once stated our opinion. An intermediate authority between the Central Government and the local Sanitary authority is objectionable because it would weaken the power of the former, and give rise to needless delays. In fact the ultimate control would really be vested in the intermediate authority, inasmuch as the Central Government would never be strong enough to overcome local and intermediate resistance combined. Unless, therefore, we are prepared to hand over the whole sanitary administration of the country to bodies not responsible to Parliament, there must be nothing interposed between the Local Government Board and the authorities primarily charged with the management of sanitary matters in each district. But the substitution of County Boards for Boards of Guardians, as proposed by Mr. GOLDNEY, would be equivalent to the creation of an intermediate authority, since the work would have to be done by local Committees, and the action of the aggregate Board would ultimately resolve itself into the supervision of what had been done by those Committees. It is a further and most damaging objection to the creation of County Boards, except for certain special purposes, that it would multiply local authorities, and thus increase the difficulty, already so serious, of getting competent persons to serve on them. If in country places the relief of the poor and the care of the public health were entrusted to different bodies, one of the two objects would certainly suffer, and in all probability both would. If they are entrusted to one and the same body, there is a fair chance that good men will come forward as candidates for seats on the Board, and this fact alone will go far to ensure the successful working of the new Sanitary administration.

MR. BRIGHT'S APOLOGIA.

THE satisfaction with which Mr. BRIGHT's voice has again been heard in public—for though he spoke in private he was in reality addressing the public—has unfortunately been qualified by some feelings of disappointment and alarm; disappointment at the tone of his remarks, and alarm at an announcement which has concurrently been made, or rather repeated, that Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. GLADSTONE intend to stump Ireland together during the ensuing autumn. We cannot help thinking, or at least hoping, that there must be some mistake about this report. It is true that Mr. GLADSTONE not long ago promised a deputation from Belfast that he would try to find time to attend a "banquet" there in the recess, adding that a visit to Belfast would necessarily involve a tour through the country; and Mr. GLADSTONE is known to be rash, and at times reckless, enough for almost anything. He has had, however, an opportunity for reflection since he submitted to the blandishments of the deputation; the dangers which then threatened his Government have for the present been evaded or overcome; and we can hardly bring ourselves to believe that, even under the temptations of Opposition, still less under the responsibilities of office, he would be guilty of such wanton and wicked incendiarism as a tour of speech-making in Ireland. All reasonable people of whatever party are agreed that if Ireland wants one thing more than another, it is to be let alone. She is very much in the position of a patient who has for years been sounded, and diagnosed, and pulled about, and lectured upon by rival practitioners, and who never has a moment's rest from consultations and examinations to see how the last new treatment is getting on. The doctors are her worst complaint, and if she could only get rid of them for a time, and could think about something else than her real or fancied disorders, she would soon pick up again. It is hardly worth while for Mr. GLADSTONE to go to Ireland to tell the people that he can do nothing for them except prevent them from breaking each other's heads; and whatever he says is certain to be construed into an adhesion to one party or the other. Mr. GLADSTONE has an unfortunate habit of looking out very large principles for very small measures; and it cannot be said that his language is usually remarkable for its cautious perspicuity. It would perhaps be inexpedient that the Irish should be formally assured by the Prime Minister that he will think twice and thrice before making Home Rule a Government measure. Sailors talk of whistling for a wind, and Mr. GLADSTONE's smallest of small talk would, we fear, be a dangerous encouragement to storms in such a country as Ireland. It is said that in glacier countries a sneeze will sometimes start an avalanche. Mr. BRIGHT is generally clear enough, it is true, but it may be doubted whether in his present mood he is the best physician that Ireland could have. It was hoped by sanguine people that his experience of official life, of the arguments, disputes, and compromises which are to be found even in a compact, harmonious Cabinet, and still more the seclusion and meditation of the last two years, might possibly have had some effect in softening the harshness of his judgments on political opponents, and in leading him to make those allowances for persons who did not always look at things from the same point of view, or arrive at the same conclusions as himself, which justice as well as charity demands. He has broken the silence of two years only to show us that he has learned nothing, forgotten nothing, and forgiven nobody. If such a speech were delivered in Ireland, the simple people would at once conclude that "relentless and wicked" landlords deserved no mercy.

It must be admitted that Mr. BRIGHT's Apologia, or rather non-Apologia, pro sua vita, is a highly characteristic production, and that, grotesque and distorted as the history is in some respects, it is not without an historical, or perhaps we should say biographical, value. Mr. BRIGHT played a prominent part in the various controversies which he enumerated, and he is apparently determined that the rising generation and posterity shall be under no misapprehension as to the spirit which has always animated and given character to his political career. Anybody who accepted Mr. BRIGHT's review of the last thirty years as genuine history would be grievously misled; but it is no doubt a true history of Mr. BRIGHT's own impressions, and those impressions governed his conduct. During these thirty years parties have been a good deal shuffled; old parties have gone out and new ones have come in; Whigs have given place to Liberals, Tories to Conservatives, and there are radicals far ahead of Mr. BRIGHT, whose Radicalism always kept clear of the rights of employers and the sanctity of personal property, and never went beyond the mere spoliation of landlords. We now learn that during the whole of this period one man has invariably been in the right and everybody else in the wrong, and that those who differed with him were not only "ignorant and incapable," but "relentless and wicked." "I have always felt," he says, "that there were 'good men in all parts of the country who sympathized with me'; that they sympathized with him proved their goodness, and the moral depravity of those who did not sympathize with him is an equally irresistible deduction. If we might venture on a conjecture, we should say that Mr. DISRAELI's recent progress through Lancashire had something to do with the temper of this speech. It is naturally a trial to a good man to see wickedness triumphant, sleek with prosperity, and smiling back the applause of men. That the friend of Lord GEORGE BENTINCK, and leader of the forlorn hope of the Protectionists, should be feted in the Free-trade Hall of Manchester, was perhaps more than the surviving apostle of the League could be expected to endure with patience and equanimity.

If Mr. BRIGHT's object was to show that he could travesty the history of his time as boldly and thoroughly as Mr. DISRAELI, he has been successful; but his performance is less amusing, perhaps because it was meant in earnest. Nobody can doubt that Mr. BRIGHT implicitly believes that the Protectionists with whom he did battle for the abolition of the Corn Laws were not only stupid and ignorant, but perversely wicked. Yet, if this view were true, it would be an indictment against the nation. The Free-traders were long a small minority, and it happened that those who were quickest to appreciate the righteousness of Free-trade were those to whom it would bring an immediate pecuniary advantage. The nation had been brought up in the Protectionist faith; the great body of the Liberals as well as of the Conservatives were on the same side, and Lord JOHN RUSSELL's conversion only just preceded that of Sir ROBERT PEEL. The Corn Laws, as Mr. BRIGHT said, were only one of a series of similar monopolies, and those who had no direct personal interest in any of them, and who were disposed to admit the theoretical soundness of Free-trade, were alarmed lest the sudden overthrow of an ancient policy, upon which the welfare of important classes was supposed to depend, should be injurious to the whole community. Sir R. PEEL himself was in advance of the country in his intellectual perception of the economical fallacies of Protection, and he would probably have yielded before the Irish famine if he had thought that he could carry the country with him. There is no reason to suppose that even at the moment of surrender the people who were afraid of Free-trade were not a majority in the land; and at this moment the greater part of the civilized world falls under Mr. BRIGHT's denunciations as "relentless and wicked" Protectionists. We have some recollection that Mr. BRIGHT once confessed that he made a mistake in opposing—why not say in "relentlessly and wickedly" opposing—the Ten Hours' Bill, but he does not refer to the subject in this speech. He appears to be under the impression that the Reform Bill of 1867 was peculiarly one of his personal triumphs, and he has perhaps forgotten some remarks about the "residuum" which are attributed to him in Hansard. On the question of the Crimean War Mr. BRIGHT, as was proved to him at the time in a conclusive manner, was at variance with the great body of his countrymen; and it does not follow, because certain securities which were deemed important in 1856 were last year (wisely or unwisely) surrendered to Russia, that the war was therefore wicked and fruitless. In Mr. BRIGHT's opinion it is "one of the unaccountable things in history" that we should during the American war have taken sides with "a rebellion the sole object and purpose of which was to perpetuate slavery for ever," instead of pursuing a "generous neutrality." It will be observed that there is a gross and obvious misstatement in almost every word of this short sentence. The American war was not a rebellion, but a civil war, and this country did not take sides with either belligerent, although it would have done so if it had pursued that "generous neutrality" to the North which Mr. BRIGHT recommended. Mr. BRIGHT's personal infallibility is so far superior to that of the Pope, that he produces it from his own moral consciousness without the aid of a Council.

The deputation from the Potteries, with perhaps inconsiderate confidence, observed that they could not imagine any higher gratification which Mr. BRIGHT could desire than to see "the fruition of his patriotic policy in the unexampled 'prosperity of the country.'" It appears, however, that it is only by a severe exercise of Christian resignation that Mr. BRIGHT can bring himself to be content with this moderate result, and that he rather resents the impartiality with which the sun shines on the just and on the unjust alike. Under a more discriminating dispensation, the laws of political economy would certainly be suspended, so that Free-traders alone should profit by Free-trade, while the Protectionists were being ruined according to their own malevolent predictions. In his speech at Rochdale we beheld the just man made perfect, looking down from his moral eminence upon an erring world, but not in pity—in wrath rather than the wicked should not be utterly burned up and consumed. There has always been a strong dash of theology in Mr. BRIGHT's politics as in Mr. GLADSTONE's, and this is perhaps in a large measure the source of their strength in agitation. It is a great thing in dealing with the multitude to be able to make them think that the policy you recommend is dictated by religious duty rather than by mere political expediency, and that the inspiration from which it has been derived is beyond the range of purely human argument; and the most effectual way of doing so is to begin by thinking so yourself. When Mr. GLADSTONE is defending a measure, it is always with the air of one who has just come down from the mountain, and has the tables of the law in his despatch-box for private reference. Mr. BRIGHT's political opinions are presented as equally binding on all good men, and when the prophets differ there is no alternative but to assume that one of them has misconstrued his message. It is probably due to Mr. GLADSTONE's wider culture and more delicate sympathies that his animosities rarely survive the heat of conflict, but Mr. BRIGHT is a perfect embodiment of stern Puritan vindictiveness. He has the temper of an agitator rather than of a statesman; and the confident infallibility, hard intolerance and scrupulous pugnacity which make him so formidable in the one case destroy his pretensions to the higher rank.

M. THIERS AND THE RIGHT.

EVENTS are moving with unusual speed at Versailles. A section of the Conservatives appear to be thoroughly aroused to the progress which Republican ideas are making in the country, and they are no longer willing to allow M. THIERS's interpretation of the Bordeaux compact to pass unchallenged. In the debate of yesterday week they succeeded in extracting from the PRESIDENT a more pronounced declaration of his views than he had yet given, as well as a promise of a still more explicit statement before the Assembly separates for the holidays. The particular phrase which led them to insist on coming to an understanding was an incidental reference by M. THIERS to the fact that the Assembly had entrusted to his care a form of government called the Republic. The indignation of the Right at hearing the action of the Assembly described in these terms led them to disregard altogether the official and personal dignity of the speaker. If it had been M. ROCHER or M. GAMBETTA who stood in the Tribune he could not have received harder measure than the PRESIDENT of the Republic. The drift of such contradictions as could be heard through the clamour seems to have been that at present there was no recognized form of government in France, that M. THIERS had passed his word at Bordeaux that nothing should be done to prejudge the constitutional question, that the Assembly had never accepted the Republic, and consequently could not have committed it to the care of anybody. M. THIERS's retort took the shape of an invitation to be thankful that Providence had managed better for Frenchmen than they could possibly have managed for themselves. It has, in fact, settled the constitutional difficulty without consulting them. A country cannot go on month after month without some fixed institutions, and such institutions as France possesses are undoubtedly Republican. As to what the future form of government was likely to be, M. THIERS professed himself ignorant, but so far as his powers extended they would all be devoted to the perpetuation of the existing order of things. To the adjuration of a Deputy of the Right to repeat the words which he used at Bordeaux, and thereby satisfy all the world, M. THIERS replied that before the close of the Session there must, he foresaw, be a full explanation between him and the Assembly. So far was he from wishing to avoid such an explanation, that he was absolutely eager to give it. To a Government which needs all the strength it can command to do its duty towards France, obscurity of any kind is odious. He would only wait until the passions of the Assembly had been laid to rest, to lay before it a calm, tranquil, and accurate interpretation of what they were accustomed to call the Bordeaux programme. With this agreeable prospect the Right were forced to be content, and to all appearance they will have the satisfaction before they go home of driving M. THIERS one step further in the direction in which his face has for some time been turned.

It is not safe to pin orators down to particular phrases, but there may perhaps be something significant about M. THIERS's substitution of "programme" for "compact" as the term to describe what took place at Bordeaux. It looks a little as though his object was to emphasize the absence of any definite agreement between him and the majority of the Assembly, and to recall to his hearers the fact that the best devised and best understood schemes have often to be modified to suit a change of circumstances. There is no need, however, for M. THIERS to lay much stress upon any alleged want of definiteness in the Bordeaux compact. It will be enough for him to refer to a later act of the Assembly which the Right have found it convenient to forget. There was a time, it is true, when M. THIERS was only the Chief of the Executive power. But to serve their own purpose the majority of the Assembly took up the proposal to make him President of the Republic instead of the first officer of an anonymous Government. To that extent the Bordeaux compact, even if it is taken in the sense which the Right desire to affix to it, was annulled by both the parties to it. In saluting M. THIERS as President of the Republic, the Deputies recognized that the actual Government of France was best described by that name. The Right swallowed their annoyance at having to make such a concession, because they hoped to lessen M. THIERS's real power while giving him a higher titular rank. As it turns out, they were mistaken in their calculations; but it shows a childish disregard of facts to deny that the name which a Government gives to itself in every official act is the name by which it is rightly called. If the Right had been satisfied with denying that the Republican Government is anything more than a provisional arrangement, the principles of which may fairly be discussed at some future time, their position would have been much stronger. The existing Republic does not enjoy that immunity from discussion which ordinarily belongs to settled Governments. But this in no way affects the question at issue between the Right and M. THIERS. They are disputing, not so much upon what shall be hereafter as upon what is now, and upon this point M. THIERS has plainly the best of it. He at least knows of what it is that he is President—an item of political information of which the Right seem to be wholly destitute.

If their persistent unwillingness to see facts as they are and to act by their right names has any serious effect upon the future of France, it will probably be of an exactly opposite kind to that which they would themselves wish. M. THIERS is anxious to establish the Republic, but he is not less anxious to ensure that this Republic shall be Conservative in character. To achieve this latter object he needs all the aid that he can get from any quarter. The whole tradition of French Republicanism is anti-Conservative, and the reason why it is so is that the Conservatives have never seriously endeavoured to guide or influence the development and working of Republican institutions. As soon as they have been set up in France the Conservatives have either held sullenly aloof from public affairs, or have only taken part in them in the character of conspirators against the existing order of things. If Republican and Revolutionary have become almost identical epithets, it is to this abstention of the non-revolutionary elements in the country that the result is mainly to be attributed. M. THIERS has seen the folly of this procedure, and has steadily set himself to turn over a new leaf. This is the real meaning of the hatred which many of the Conservatives bear him at this moment. They act as men who would rather have their forebodings justified than not. They seem to love to have their names associated in the minds of Frenchmen with reactionary enterprises of all kinds, and they have no right to feel surprised if in the end they are taken at their own valuation. Happily for themselves and for France, the Right are more disposed to listen to their fears than to their reason, and in this instance it is their fears that give them the better advice. If they dared they would get rid of M. THIERS to-morrow, and commit their cause to the doubtful chances of civil war. Their obstinate preference for a nominal Monarchy blinds them to the imminent danger of losing the substance while grasping at the form. They do not see that, except in the eyes of a few Legitimist fanatics, government by a King is mainly valuable as embodying and securing certain traditions of order and tranquillity. For the most part Monarchy does ensure these advantages, but the anniversary which was kept last Sunday might have served to remind the Right that it is possible to have a Monarchy which is powerless in these respects. During the period between the fall of the Bastille and the execution of Louis XVI. the King was an obstacle to the maintenance of order rather than a guarantee of it. If, under certain circumstances, the heir of an unbroken monarchical tradition may hold this melancholy position, much more may it be held by new-made Kings who have neither custom nor institutions on which to rely, and whose only title is the will of a bare majority of a nation in which the minority is passionately Republican. Amidst all the exaggerations of M. GAMBETTA's speech at Ferté-sous-Jourarre, it was clear that in proportion as the establishment of the Republic is assured the Conservative tendencies of the reasonable members of the Republican party will become more pronounced. There will be a redistribution of political forces, and when this has been effected the latent strength of Conservatism in France will be disclosed, and those who have clung to a Restoration as to the one conceivable hope for the country will be surprised at their own immunity from confiscation and bloodshed. The Right might prevent this happy consummation if they had the courage to follow out their convictions, but the hold which M. THIERS has over them is more than they seem able to shake off, and it is hardly too much to hope that it will last until even they have been made wiser by events.

PERSIA, INDIA, AND THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

IT is fortunate that, in spite of Reform Bills, Indian knowledge and experience are still not wholly excluded from the House of Commons. The late debate on the diplomatic service in Persia, or rather the speech of the mover, was highly instructive. The qualifications of Indian officers for employment in Persia probably bear the same relation to the competence of their Foreign Office rivals as the generalities enounced by Lord ENFIELD and Mr. GLADSTONE when compared with the special knowledge of Mr. EASTWICK. On the separate question whether the responsibility of administrative decision ought to rest with the Government or with the House of Commons, Mr. GLADSTONE was right in declining to consider as conclusive the recommendations of a Select Committee; but the weight both of argument and of authority preponderates against the system which was re-established by Lord CLARENDON. Several Foreign Ministers, including Lord PALMERSTON, have not unnaturally objected to the withdrawal of the Persian Mission from their patronage and control; but none of them possessed any special acquaintance with Persian affairs; and Lord PALMERSTON's strong prejudice against the East India Company probably extended to its Civil Service.

LORD MALMESBURY, though far inferior in ability and experience to Lord PALMERSTON, arrived, perhaps through confidence in his own ignorance of Asiatic politics, at a sound conclusion; and the present Lord DEAR, who had himself been Minister for India, concurred in the transfer of the Mission to the India Office. Sir H. RAWLINSON, who is by universal assent allowed to be the ablest English Envoy who has in modern times served in Persia, resigned his office as soon as he found that he was to be placed under the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. It is highly probable that the Duke of ARGYLL, though of course he cannot publicly differ from his colleagues, shares the opinion of his predecessor, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, on the propriety of transferring Persian diplomacy to the India Office. Lord ENFIELD's suggestion that the proposed change would be equally applicable to the Embassies in China and Japan was apparently prompted by the difficulty of finding a more cogent argument against the motion. The relations of both Empires, being purely commercial, are much closer with England than with India; nor is there the smallest similarity of language or of customs between either country and any part of the Indian population. It is probable that an Indian officer would be in many cases well qualified for diplomatic employment in China, because India affords by far the best school for the art of governing alien races. If equal capacity can be found in the ranks of the diplomatic service, there is no reason for resorting to India. Persia, on the other hand, is connected with India not only by 1,900 miles of common frontier, but by innumerable ties of custom, of blood, and of religion. The intrigues which disturb and occupy the Court of Teheran are of exactly the same kind with which Indian Residents and Political Agents are thoroughly familiar in dealing with Indian princes; and the more important schemes and combinations have a direct bearing upon Indian interests. The chronic hostility between Persia and Afghanistan directly affects the security of North-Western India, and it is utterly anomalous that when a contest arises for the possession of Herat or of any other border stronghold, one of the competitors should appeal to the Viceroy and the other to the organ of the Foreign Office.

The hackneyed assertion that the Shah of Persia would regard as an indignity the necessity of communicating with the Secretary of State for India is probably a fallacy. Eastern potentates are skilful in using the ceremonies to which they ostensibly attach importance for the attainment of substantial objects. It is possible that they may have preferred the presence of a comparative stranger unacquainted with their motives and objects to the vigilant astuteness of a trained Indian statesman; yet Sir H. RAWLINSON seems to have been highly acceptable at the Court of Teheran, where, unlike his predecessors and successors, he was admitted to frequent audience by the SHAH himself. Whatever may be the merits of Mr. TURNOUR THOMSON, who has been appointed to succeed Mr. AKIN, it is unfortunate that he should have made himself, with or without fault of his own, personally distasteful to the Sovereign to whom he is accredited. The Persian Minister in England would certainly not have protested against the nomination if he had not believed that it would be objectionable to his Government, and the formal assent of the Court to the appointment is compatible with deep resentment, and with the future interposition of many impediments in the way of easy diplomatic intercourse. It is to be presumed that the charges against Mr. THOMSON were unfounded, but it is inconvenient to bring the victim of calumny and his accusers into confidential relations; and there must certainly be other possible candidates for the office who have never been charged with violations of Persian etiquette. The Secretary of State for India would have been too well informed to fall into a similar error, for the experienced Indian officers by whom he is officially surrounded make themselves acquainted even with the gossip of Eastern Courts, as far as it has a political bearing. It was justly remarked in the recent debate that the Indian Secretary is of equal rank with his colleague at the Foreign Office, and that both represent the QUEEN. If the question had been confined to the management of business in England, it might perhaps matter comparatively little whether diplomatic despatches were addressed to Lord GRANVILLE or to the Duke of ARGYLL; but the acts of the Envoy are almost exempt from practical control, and it is important that he should possess peculiar competence for his office. The chief purpose of Mr. RUSSELL's motion would be attained if it were understood that as a general rule Indian officers should receive a preference, and that they should habitually correspond with the Viceroy, as well as with the English department to which they may be subordinate. It is, under the present arrangement, nearly certain that neither the successive occupants of the Foreign Office nor their permanent Under-Secretary will allow one of the prizes of the diplomatic profession to be given to a member of a different service. It is much more likely that a Secretary for India who is himself a Parliamentary politician would recognise any special fitness for the mission in the person of a regular diplomatist.

There is little meaning in the official phrases about the expediency of including Persia within the circle of European influence. The country, happening to be in Asia, has nothing to do with any European Powers except England and Russia; and in both cases only with reference to their Eastern possessions. The advance of Russian conquest in Central Asia is only formidable as far as it may involve a menace to India; and the time has passed in which it could have been plausibly alleged that the designs of Russia were liable to be thwarted by English diplomacy. Indian statesmen are less timid, if not less pacific, than English Ministers; and they are more capable both of discerning danger at a distance and of making deliberate preparations to repel it. The alliance with Afghanistan which was prepared by Lord LAURENCE and effected by Lord MAYO was formed as a precaution against possible aggression on the part of Persia, which might be made at the instigation of Russia. It seems reasonable that English diplomacy at Teheran should conform itself to the policy of the Indian Government rather than to the opinions of a gentleman who, however able, has vegetated for fourteen years in a petty South American capital. To the heads of the diplomatic profession, even if they were qualified for employment in unaccustomed regions, the Persian Mission offers few attractions. The post has been coveted by the Foreign Office on a Secretary of Legation in Turkey, on a Consul-General in Egypt whose Persian career proved singularly disastrous, and now on a Minister at Valparaiso. The DUMFRIES, the LYNCHES, and the BOWENS propose to themselves more attractive objects of ambition. On the other hand, Indian civilians and soldiers of the highest rank would appreciate the importance of establishing English influence at the Persian Court, or of watching and baffling the designs of crafty natives and of intriguing foreigners. The Duke of ARGYLL may not be personally more capable than Lord GRANVILLE of making a judicious choice; but he would have a far ampler field for selection. It is absurd to compare a third-rate diplomatist, who has perhaps never conducted a serious negotiation, with statesmen who have governed provinces as populous as European kingdoms, and who have spent their lives in controlling and directing ambitious Eastern princes. If there is any mysterious necessity for preserving the connexion of the Persian Mission with the Foreign Office, the official English mind is prolific of fictions which are seldom as useful as a tacit understanding by which one of the ostensible functions of the Foreign Secretary should be practically discharged by his Indian colleague. The Residents in the Persian Gulf, who are frequently engaged in political and diplomatic transactions, are invariably Indian servants who hold their appointments under the Viceroy. It must often happen that they understand difficult questions incomparably better than the Minister at Teheran. The functions of the Consuls, who, in Sir H. RAWLINSON's opinion, ought still to depend on the Foreign Office, are comparatively unimportant, and there is much force in the reason which he assigned for his recommendation that there is no Consular service in India. He might have added that, while India is concerned with Eastern politics, consulships are established for the benefit of traders who have their home and the centre of their operations in England.

THE IRISH RAILWAYS.

IT is said that railways in Ireland have not stimulated trade or induced a spirit of change and progress in the people in anything like the proportion which is seen in other countries. If this assertion be true, it almost necessarily follows that some step ought to be taken to improve, if possible, a system of railway management which is found to be defective. In support of this statement details are brought forward which, if accepted, go far to show that the Directors of these railways neglect obvious and important duties. It is alleged that sufficient efforts are not made to accommodate passenger traffic, to promote trade, to develop mining industry, or to facilitate the sale of the agricultural produce of the country. Some of the evidence on this subject, given before the Royal Commission of which the Duke of Devonshire was Chairman, would seem to show that the art of "how not to do it" has been brought to considerable per-section by the managers of Irish railways. It was stated that less accommodation was given by railways between the North and South of Ireland than existed formerly when there were coaches by night and day. This statement might perhaps be explained by considering that Irishmen may have travelled by coach for the fun of the thing, which they are hardly likely to do by railway. Then, again, it was stated that scarcely one-seventh of the cattle, sheep, and horses which were moved from one part of Ireland to another were conveyed by rail. It is, however, proper to remember that the animals may have preferred fresh air and healthy exercise, and meeting their friends, and their wishes may have been consulted by the owners. The pigs are not particularly mentioned, but it is evident that a pig when once shut up in a railway truck loses his independence, so perhaps they withheld that consent without which their drivers would be manifestly powerless. We may seem to be trifling with a serious subject, but really this explanation of the refusal to allow the Irish railways to benefit the country is as rational as any other that occurs to us. The pigs, at any rate, would please themselves, whereas the Directors, so far as we can discover, please nobody. We believe that if Mr. GLADSTONE were to cut down the upas-tree, he would be charged such a price for carrying that he would be forced to leave the trunk and limbs behind him in the country which they had afflicted. To send goods from Liverpool to Castlebar costs 7s. 6d. per ton less than the charge from Dublin to the same place. There may possibly be a satisfaction to the mind of an insane Director in perpetrating an extravagant caprice like this. It resembles the conduct of those Eastern despots who extract taxes in utter disregard of the effect upon the producing power of their subjects. The purpose of Government is taken to be the splendid maintenance of the King, his wives, and children, and the officers of his Court. So the purpose of railway management in Ireland is assumed to be the provision of comfortable places for directors, solicitors, secretaries, and engineers. There is besides no central authority such as appears necessary to remove many of the absurd impediments to traffic which are now stated to exist. Probably if the Irish railways could be purchased by the State at a moderate cost, there would be little difference of opinion in Parliament as to the expediency of purchasing them. But history and fiction unite their warnings of the propensity of Irish affairs to evolve gigantic jobs. The Marquis of HARTINGTON complains that Parliament has not in the last two Sessions allotted adequate time to the discussion of Irish questions, among which he thinks that this of railway management is one of the most important. It might be remarked that Parliament and the country had enough to last them for some time of Irish questions in the two preceding Sessions; and it is possible that, as regards the railways, a sensible conclusion might be reached by some other process than that of Parliamentary palaver. Is the State prepared to buy the property of Irish railway shareholders at whatever price they may choose to put upon it? Clearly not. But if it is necessary to the prosperity of Ireland that these railways should be acquired by the State, they must be acquired upon equitable terms to be fixed by the State itself, upon fair consideration of all circumstances. If, says Lord HARTINGTON, Government had been prepared to announce a policy, Parliament would not have had time to discuss it. We venture, however, to think that whenever Government has anything to say Parliament will contrive to listen. But talking until one has discovered one's own meaning is perhaps likely to fatigue the listener. Sir ROBERT PEELE would have ascertained by careful examination of the problem that there were or were not "three courses" open for its solution, and he would have lucidly explained to an attentive House of Commons the course upon which he had determined. But in his day Government had not quite lost the art of governing.

It is no sufficient answer to this proposal that it will involve considerable difficulties in execution. It is apprehended that low fares will become a husting cry, and that branch lines will be demanded as the price of political support. Some speakers go the length of asserting that the possession of all the main roads of a country by private companies is an arrangement which political wisdom would seek to produce, if it did not happen to exist in England and Ireland. There would of course be difficulty in avoiding jobbery in the selection of administrators of railways, as well as of other departments of State; nor would this difficulty be satisfactorily removed by the well-known readiness of certain professors of various branches of knowledge to select administrators by the method of competitive examination. But we come back after all to the question whether the statements of the Royal Commission as to the management of Irish railways are true, and, if so, whether such abuses are to be suffered to continue? In order to effect any considerable change either Government must buy the railways, or, without buying them, it must assume over them large powers of inspection and control, which would appear to involve a temporary guarantee to shareholders against loss. This latter method would at any rate have the advantage of being an experiment which might be relinquished if unsuccessful. It is stated that the entire business of all the Railway Boards of Ireland would not in its aggregate amount exceed that which devolves upon a single Board in England. If, however, we suggest that useless Directors might be shunted like German princes, we shall probably be thought to have committed a greater enormity than if we had proposed to abolish Church and Queen as superfluities. Withdrawing then this revolutionary suggestion, we return to the question whether the railways can be bought, and this must depend on whether the Companies are willing to sell on reasonable terms. The Royal Commissioners examined carefully into the circumstances of the lines, and it resulted from their Report that 21,000,000*l.* would be a fair price for the whole of them. But we observe that the author of the Bill now before the House of Commons stated that "the whole thing could be done for 30,000,000*l.*" This advance is probably due to a belief in the Irish mind that Parliament desires to buy. Lord HARTINGTON, when he spoke of the inattention of Parliament to Irish affairs, may perhaps have intended to convey indirectly to the Irish mind that Government did not intend to pay any such price as 30,000,000*l.* for Irish railways. "This Irish business will be put off until all the business of England is done, and then we will have a great talk about it." This probably means that, if the Irish mean to sell their railways, they must agree to a moderate price. So we have heard a dealer persistently discuss the weather and the TICHMONNE case, when his object was to buy a horse of the gentleman to whom he talked. We cannot doubt that central administration, with reduced fares and frequent trains, would produce benefits to Ireland which neither clerical nor lay agitators could dissemble or deny. If Parliament is ready to deal liberally with shareholders in order to secure these benefits, shareholders on their part ought to deal liberally with Parliament. Let them at any rate remember that there is such a thing as being too clever. If they hinder the prosperity of Ireland by demanding exorbitant terms, the blame must rest with them.

It will depend, says Lord HARTINGTON, on the terms asked by the Companies, whether any definite proposal shall be made to Parliament. If the terms are moderate it will doubtless be discovered that Parliament has leisure to consider them. Experience ought to teach the Irish that although they may not get all they ask they are very likely to get part of it. Parliament will yield something, as it has often yielded before, to Irish importunity. Thus it may be hoped that a promising experiment will be tried. The Commissioners recommended reductions varying from thirty to forty-five per cent. in passenger fares, and from thirty to seventy-eight per cent. in the cattle and goods tariff. The immediate loss of revenue from such a bold measure must necessarily be great, but after a few years the balance would begin to turn, and a few years more would show considerable profit. If this calculation is accurate, and if Irishmen desire to obtain for their country the advantages which are implied in the assumption of its accuracy, they will not allow their Companies to insist upon extravagant terms. When they are willing to sell Parliament will find time to instruct Lord HARTINGTON or his successor to buy.

MENTAL SCALES AND MEASURES.

THERE is a peculiar propensity in certain people which may be called a habit of measurement. They contemplate no person or thing without subjecting it to a process of classification, appraising it, placing it, determining its qualities and proportions by a scale present and ready for immediate reference in their own minds. Nothing can be new, strange, unexampled enough to escape this subjugation to a standard, to elude the prompt decisions of an innate faculty for setting everything in its exact place and relations to everything else. Nothing takes the owners of this faculty by surprise; they have rule and scale for all things which the eye can measure or the mind compare. Even a prodigy does not find them wholly without precedent. Like Noodle in the play, they are provided with a maximum, even though they must one day outreach it—

— A huge red cow, larger than the largest size, just now I the open street
Before my eyes devour'd the great Tom Thack.

When the touters of Doctors' Commons set upon Sam Weller's

father to persuade him to buy a licence, he pleaded that he was too fat. They are prompt with an answer—they have known applicants "many sizes larger." It is this possession of an inner marked scale, to be referred to at a moment's warning whatever the question or the subject, which we note as a peculiar feature of some minds. When they see one fat man they see a dozen, five above and six below him, in gradual ascent and descent. When an object meets and even oppresses the sight, it is a sign of real power, of a sort, not to be overwhelmed by it, but for the memory to produce at bidding all similar objects that have ever filled the eye, and so to give the thing in presence no more than its just importance; yet this faculty should not be obtruded on slight occasions, or with too glib and prompt a reference, nor should it interfere in matters that touch men's finer sensibilities. It is not only the eye of the body that affects this exactness of appreciation. The people we speak of carry an intellectual inch measure. They know all about us. Our minds, as well as our bodies, are reduced to a scale. Our circumstances and social position are submitted to a cut and dried test. These are the people who talk of circles, spheres, lines, ranks, grades, and all the subdivisions and exclusions of society; who can tell you to a turn who is above and who is below this man or that; who can measure an aspirant's pretensions to a hair's breadth, assign him his place, and pronounce circularly whose company he ought to be content with. Now our personal experience of this practice is distasteful. Human nature, jealous of its individuality, is intolerant of such classification as arguing obtuseness towards the immeasurable qualities on which it chiefly values itself. The habit, as such, is at war with sympathy; but its most irritating and intolerable manifestation is when the classifier tells off our character and idiosyncrasy with a stroke of his pen—dismisses it at a word to one of his groups. No mind of culture and true discernment finds humanity easy reading. "In proportion to a man's intelligence," says I'acal, "does he detect originality in other men. Common people think all men alike." Now our measurer stands midway between the man of real thought and the people who do not think at all. He has found a short road to the knowledge of men, and docket and labels the characters he comes across as individuals of the various species into which he has distributed the race. The operations of his judgment precede his encounter with ourselves; he has only to place and name us, certain that he shall find nothing for which he is not already prepared.

If it ever happens to us to hear ourselves described in a word by these officious character-meters the effect is a disagreeable surprise. We are not supposing anything the reverse of friendly in the epithet. The expression of dislike we are all prepared to find unpleasant. It is that some accident, something not akin to our manner as we assume it to be, or to our tone of thought as we know it, seems to have been accepted and fixed on as the most prominent indication of our inner self. And, as persons of this habit have naturally rather a rough and ready way of speaking, and deal in terms wide enough to embrace whole classes, we find words applied to us by our well-meaning, patronising delineator which it is something of a shock to find deemed appropriate by anybody. Any ebullition of spirits before people of this sort is apt to be seized on as indicating the whole character, and we have known the epithets cheery, merry, laughter-loving, jovial, and the like, to imprint lasting wounds on self-love. They are indeed naturally disgusting to the sensitive man, who, believing himself a thinker, not seldom occupied by the great problems which vex humanity, would suffer less from some grave charge than from the stigma of careless jollity inflicted by his unconscious detractor. Men of wit are especially sore when they are talked of as nothing else but witty, or perhaps as good company; and with reason, for the wit never laughs in his solitude. What other men know him by strikes himself as but a transient, accidental part of the day's intellectual effort. It pleased Sydney Smith to be liked best in his graver moments. Not, of course, that he was not best defined by a single epithet; but the people whose habit is to measure and define everything rarely hit upon the best epithet, and still more rarely on the pleasantest. Even friends, and gifted friends, had better beware of what they are about in their dispensation of styles and titles. Coleridge, in one of his poems, calls Charles Lamb "gentle-hearted Charles." The man thus apostrophised could not see himself under the smooth, sleek, nanby-pamby—as he felt it—phrase. His sensitiveness resented it as an injury. He rejects the maudlin patronage, proposes a dozen substitutes for the sickly, sugary offence, and insists that, in the next edition, for "gentle-hearted" shall be substituted "drunken dog," as more accurately descriptive if he is to be painted by a single stroke of the brush.

But the same of indignity is when the epithet is applied to us ad hoc, and our character is summed up by some new chance acquaintance who professes to see all round us, to take us in, to give us our place, to fit us with a definition, without knowing more of us than a few casual meetings give opportunity for. People of this sort are so satisfied when they have condensed a character into a word that they cannot keep it to themselves, but must, as it were, appeal to the person most concerned for acknowledgment of the happy hit. So Mrs. Elton, in Miss Austen's Emma, tells Mr. Knightley he is a humourist. Quite insensible to the dignity of his manner, she simply accounts for his repressive mode of concealing her impertinence in the way most convenient to her own self-love and pretensions. He is "quite a humourist and may say what he likes." "Indeed, I do you justice, my good friend; under that peculiar sort of dry blunt manner, you have the warmest heart. As I tell Mr. E. you are a 'thorough humourist.'" In the same easy spirit of characterization she expresses her abhorrence of puppies and upstarts, arrogating to herself a peculiar aptitude at discerning and detecting these offenders. There is this difference between the observers of this class and the observed, between the definer and the defined, that the one abhors complexity of character as a defying, perplexing quality; while the other arrogates to himself, as one of his most cherished characteristics, a many-sided nature. This difference is in a degree universal. Wherever we are closely connected with another person, we resent his being described by an epithet, or understood at a glance. It happens not seldom that in the asperities of uncongenial family intercourse such provocation arises that the sufferer is driven to take an outsider into his confidence. We are startled by a picture of some failing or vice so predominant that the man sounds all tyrant, miser, rogue, or hypocrite. But, however shocking the revelation, it will never do to treat the character under consideration as simply the thing he is depicted to us. When we take our friend at his word and reflect back the image he has raised, we are stopped with the assurance that we don't know the man whom we characterize with such harshness. He is the strangest compound, the fullest of contradictions, the most startling anomaly! It takes a life to understand him. And even then something happens to surprise you and confound all previous conclusions. The propensity which offends us in certain people is of course disagreeable as showing some form of shallow conceit. Their comprehensive survey implies a position of intellectual eminence and superiority, and rather than conceive themselves at fault they will ignore whatever contradicts their conclusion. We feel ourselves to be intricate, complex, self-contradictory; we do not understand ourselves; but here is somebody who professes to read us through and to reconcile all our inconsistencies. According to him, we are a laughing animal, or a reading animal, or we are all plain matter-of-fact common sense, or all whim and caprice; all gaiety and fashion, or all domesticity and homely management. Nor is it only a personal annoyance—the tone we speak of is an indignity to humanity as such. Men are not easy reading; the more far-seeing and deep-searching the scrutiny, the more baffling are the intricacies of motive, the contrast and war of influences, the contending inclinations of even the externally commonplace. Common minds—common in the sense of vulgar—cannot discuss mental qualities without a touch of materialism. It is awkward, fumbling, irreverent familiarity which imparts this tone, all unconsciously, and without intention—this confident seeing, knowing, and placing. Persons much engaged in working the machinery of benevolence, if they allow their own delicacy of taste to rust, or their humility to get out of order, are extremely apt to discuss souls as if they could see them; while they count them up with the quaintest confidence in their arithmetic. Dissenting literature indulges freely in scales and computations of this nature; as where we find it asserted as a general truth that, "while the proportion of teachers and scholars is as one to six, the proportion of teachers converted during their connexion with the Sunday school is as five to six." The whole intercourse of each man with his Maker is as a printed book before these reckoners, they do not even recognize it as difficult reading.

Calculations of this exactitude are not founded on even a pretended study of human nature, yet the calculator's confidence in his judgment is the same. He has a standard, and pronounces with absolute certainty that it has been reached in a given number of instances. But often the arbitrary standard by which one man measures another may imply no conceit in his own judgment, it simply indicates the bent of his own mind and the habitual turn of his thoughts. We have known a hungry curate whose estimate of his brother clergymen was determined by the worth of their benefices. He knew the value of every living in England, and when an incumbent of any one of them was spoken of for praise or blame, he always cut in with the amount of pounds, shillings, and pence which made his annual income—as if this had been a relevant, if not conclusive, summary of the man's merits. Dr. Johnson complains that the writers of biography fall into the similar error of judging of others solely on the points that interest themselves, adducing Tickell, who distinguished Addison from the rest of mankind by the irregularity of his pulse. A sporting groom, recognizing a form of rustic merit with which he scarcely knew how to sympathize, pronounced the subject of his approbation the "dearestest man he ever knew in his life." The inclination of this class to determine upon what they see is often far in advance of the exercise of judgment. Whether it be a question of height, or weight, or distance, or value, or a summary of character, they are equally ready at a moment's notice with their six foot and a-half, their seventeen stone ten, their voucher for all the qualities that make a good fellow. There is in some minds an intolerance of indecision, a scorn of doubt, along with a necessity for having an opinion, which compels to this short comprehensive formula. To have an opinion is of course to be right in that opinion.

It is the parade of the faculty, as though it implied judgment in the abstract, which offends. There are people, however, with a speciality of this kind which we only find out by degrees as our need attracts us to them; who tell us exactly what we want to know in points of appraisement and measure when we ask them, and not sooner. They have an inexhaustible acquaintance with the use, quality, and market value of the necessities, luxuries, and eccentric wants of material life. They have equally distinct estimates of character from the same habit of vigilant observation. Their eyes are always busy; a process of comparison and computation and arrangement is unconsciously at work wherever their busy eyes rest. But their conclusions are held in check by sympathy. They wait to be asked, or rather, when they are asked, they find that they know. Such people are among the benefactors of society; a reputation of this sort once acquired constitutes a very popular character.

GELNHAUSEN.

WE hope that we have, by dint of repeated efforts, made some select minds among our readers fully take in the fact that, to the true student of universal history, Rome is everywhere. The great fact of the Roman power was the destruction of the exclusive pre-eminence of the Roman city, the extension of her citizenship to the whole civilized world—the state of things when the chief of the Roman commonwealth was as much at home at Milan or at Ravenna, at York or at Antioch, as if he had still stayed on the Seven Hills. And the strange revolution which transferred the name, if not the power, of Rome to the rulers of lands of which the elder Cæsars had never heard, has, as it were, carried Rome with it wherever the successor of Augustus marked his house or his tomb with the eagle of Caius Marius. Drusus and Varns strove in vain to carry Rome over the wide lands between the Rhine and the Elbe, but what was beyond the power of the Roman invaders of Germany was done in another sort by the German lords of Rome. As long as the connexion between Italy and the Empire remained more than a name, we may fairly say that, wherever Cæsar dwelled, Rome went with him. Sometimes she contributed her very stones, as when the marbles of Rome as well as of Ravenna were carried off for the adornment of Ingelheim and Aachen. And elsewhere too, in the chosen seats of early German royalty, we are ever lighting on some touch, some architectural form, some exotic freak of taste, which tells us that we are looking on the works, not only of a German King, but of a Roman Emperor. We enter the vast minster of Speier, we pass along the vast arcades of its nave, and we see in its huge piers and round arches the impress of one, and that the most characteristic, form of Roman workmanship. They suggest such memories of Roman art as might have lived on from the relics which the Roman himself had left on German soil. The square piers and unadorned arches of a great German church breathe rather of the aqueduct and the amphitheatre than of the pillared hall of the basilica. But turn aside from the main body of the building, and we find ourselves among forms which suggest the presence of craftsmen brought thither not by a Roman lord of Germany, but by a German lord of Rome. There is the famous Affa Capella, a name which certain old associations make it hard to utter without a smile, but which, as the hardly-won resting-place of Henry the Fourth, is the spot, of all spots within that gigantic building, which calls up the longest and deepest train of thought. And on the building itself the fact is legibly written that it was not a mere Frankish King, but a Roman Cæsar, who raised it. No contrast can be greater than that which strikes us between the huge masses of wall which act as pillars in the nave and the delicate monolith columns, with their graceful Ionic capitals, carved out, some of them, into forms of more varied foliage than the elder Ionic deemed lawful, which stand free, row by row, in front of the walls of the Imperial chapel. We feel at once that these are the work of hands brought from a more Southern land; that they rose at the bidding of a ruler who bore sway on both sides of the Alps, of a King who did penance at Canosa, of a Cæsar who wore his crown in Rome.

But let us go beyond the bounds within which the elder Roman ever reigned. Let us pass the stream, and the bulwark beyond the stream, which parted the free Germany over which the Roman city never ruled from the conquered Germany which Rome counted as part of its Gaulish province. The Rhine is fed by the Main, the Main is fed by the Kinzig, and we pass along by the meadows through which it flows, as the herons stalk unheeding by its banks, till we reach an island in the stream, lying near the foot of a bold height. The slopes are covered by the buildings of a small town, which a stately group of towers, both ecclesiastical and military, proclaim to have held in former times an importance which has now passed away from it. That is the free Imperial city of Gelnhausen, and in the island at its foot are the remains of the Imperial palace, a spot famous alike in history and in legend. There was the favourite dwelling-place of the Cæsars of Hohenstaufen, the house which rose at the bidding of the first Frederick, and for which his sterner son, Henry the conqueror of Sicily, professed a special love. Moved by that special love ("singulâri ipsius loci amore inducti"), he confirmed the rights of its citizens, and ages after, in 1154, they were again confirmed by the last Frederick as they had been granted by the first. Within those now ruined walls were held some of the most important assemblies in the history of the German kingdom. There it was that its founder Frederick gathered the great meeting of his realm in which Henry the Lion was put under the ban of the Empire, and was presently driven to seek shelter at the Court of his namesake and father-in-law in England. The great Saxon Duchy was divided, and the Archbishopric of Köln, by the receipt of a large share of the spoil, was raised to its high place among the temporal principalities of the Empire. Fifteen years later, in 1195, Henry the Sixth held there another great assembly, in which a crowd of princes and others took the cross for the deliverance of the holy places, in his second march to whose help his renowned father had been cut off. In short, during the days of its founder and the days which immediately followed his, the palace in the island of the Kinzig, sheltered by its hill and surrounded by its meadows, was a special seat of the royal power of Germany and the Imperial power of Rome. The spot is one of such attraction in itself that it hardly needs the enrichment of legend. Yet a tale did not fail to arise how Gelnhausen derived its name and its being from the fair Gela, and how she turned aside from her royal lover, lest she should stand in the way of the great career of government and warfare to which he was called.

The remains of the palace are still considerable, though a good deal has been lost during the last forty years. A set of views of that date shows the chapel over the gateway, one of the most elegant portions of the building, perfect and roofed in, while it is now a roofless and broken-down ruin. But the gateway itself remains, the whole circuit of the outer walls is nearly perfect, and large portions of the most exquisite detail of which the Romanesque style is capable remain within. The building, lying low, without the town walls, and with no tower or other part of commanding height, does not enter at all into the general view of Gelnhausen. Its position and its whole air clearly mark the difference between a palace in whose neighbourhood a town has arisen, or at least has grown through its neighbourhood into increased importance, and a castle raised to overawe a town which already existed. The gateway towers of the town itself still form a striking feature in the general view, but the home of Cæsar lies hidden in its island. It has to be sought for by threading the winding paths of the little village or suburb which has risen within its precincts, and its whole air is that of a building where peaceful habitation is the primary object, and defence something wholly secondary. No contrast can be greater than that between the royal house in the island of the Kinzig and a robber castle on a peak by the Rhine. The palace had no predatory, or even military, purpose whatever. Its founder, at Gelnhausen at least, had no mind to do harm to any man save by sentence of law pronounced within its courts; he had simply to put his house into such a degree of defence as was needful in an age when somebody might be both willing and able to do harm even to a Roman Emperor. And one thing at least is plain; it is written on the walls of Gelnhausen, in characters which cannot be mistaken, that it was a Roman Emperor who raised them. They are built of massive stones, so thoroughly Roman in their masonry that it needs something of an effort to believe that it was in the twelfth century that they were hewn, and not a thousand years sooner. The gateway, though the chapel over it is broken down, still remains; and while the pillars which bear up its vault have a more massive and Teutonic air, its inner face is adorned with the same graceful monoliths as Henry's chapel at Speier, finished too with capitals one of which distinctly carries us back to St. Michael at Pavia and to St. Ambrose at Milan. At each corner of the capital the Imperial bird bows his head and folds his wings so that the Ionic volute is made out of himself without the help of any strictly architectural form. A row of open arches on coupled columns, carved and enriched with the most delicate art of the time, shows us the cloisters of Arles and Zurich, both alike cities of Frederick's Empire, wrought into the lighter and more graceful forms which befitted the courtyard of an Imperial palace. A yet more lavish display of carving and surface ornament marks the fireplace of the great hall, beside which our own at Coningsburgh seems a small matter. The whole shows how high a degree, not only of richness, but even of elegance, could be gained while the Romanesque form of arch and the Romanesque form of ornament were still in use. The graceful and airy palace of Frederick Barbarossa seems removed by far more than a hundred years from the stern and gloomy fortress of our own Conqueror.

But the palace is not all that Gelnhausen has to show. The steep streets of the little town climb up to one of the noblest churches of its own order in Germany, a church which in the general view dwarfs not only the island palace but the encircling towers of the town wall, and which in variety and, to English eyes, strangeness of outline, is surpassed by few churches anywhere. A parish church with four towers would be unique in England; it would hardly have arisen in Germany except in a place which enjoyed an unusual measure of Imperial favour. And even here one would rather have expected to find Imperial favour taking the form of some great foundation, monastic or secular. Gelnhausen church is one of the most picturesque of buildings. An earlier Romanesque church has been transformed into the present stately pile of the thirteenth century. The western tower, of the earlier date, is assigned by tradition to Charles the Great. Such a tradition proves hardly more than what the tower itself proves—namely, that Gelnhausen existed, though perhaps as a mere village with its church, before it became an object of the special love of the Swabian Kings. There is a contrast indeed between the graceful form of the palace and the massive and unadorned Romanesque of the church. Yet the latter can hardly be earlier than the later days of the eleventh century, and it may well belong to the earlier days of the twelfth. It should be noticed that it opens to the church, not by an arch, but by a doorway, reminding us somewhat of St. Woollos at Newport, though hardly rivaling our almost unique example of utilized monoliths in Britain. The cruciform shape of the church gives the opportunity—not always made the most of—for a central octagon, and two little apsidal chapels east of the transepts have been more ingeniously seized on and carried up into tall octagonal eastern towers. Nowhere does the German love of gables, spires, conical finishes of every kind, come out more strongly. All the towers, square and octagonal, have each of their faces gabled, and the eastern triad are carried up into lofty spires of wood, one of which has been for forty years as grievously twisted as those of Lübeck or Chesterfield. The chief apse too has all its faces gabled, and its roof carried up high like a chapter-house. So many points and angles brought together in this way produce a whole unsurpassed for variety and picturesque effect. The interior also, especially the treatment of the choir and octagon, is as well worth studying as the general outline. But the nave is bare; the pillars are square, massive, with a single attached shaft, and a vast space crying for pictures.

But not the least attractive feature of Gelnhausen is that which it shares with most churches which have what, for antiquarian purposes, is the good luck of falling into Lutheran hands. We said something about this seven years back, when dealing with the churches of the great Hanseatic towns. It is in a Lutheran, not in a Roman or an Anglican, building that we learn what a mediæval church really looked like. A Lutheran church often looks squalid and uncared for, it is often choked up by pews and galleries, but it has not been sacked. So at Gelnhausen the altars keep their splendid triptychs—so incomparably grander than the tinsel frippery of most Roman Catholic altars; and it keeps—at the expense, to be sure, of leaving the choir seemingly useless—one of the stateliest of roodlofts, still crowned by the crucifix. The rood-loft is of stone, and projects westward like an apse, with pillars and vaulting and rich carving, representing in stone the subject which so often occupies an analogous place in painting, the awful scene of the Last Judgment. Altogether the church of Gelnhausen is a worthy companion to the palace. Spots like Gelnhausen, spots which do not, like the greater cities of history, leave their mark for ever on the world, are not the less worth studying, are not the less fertile in suggestive instructive lines of thought. The greatness of Gelnhausen belongs to a single age, to a single family, but for that very reason it brings us more fully face to face with that age and that family. And it is something to see the destroyer of Milan, the defender of Legnano, the legislator of Constance, the twice pilgrim of Jerusalem, far away in his world tomb, and to see that even there everything still brings home to our minds that the German King was also "Cæsar noster" and "Mundi dominus."

THE EXHIBITION MANIA.

OUR great original English Exhibition of Industry was undoubtedly a success in every sense. It was an idea and achievement of which a great industrial nation had reason to be proud. Yet the distinguished promoters might well have hesitated in their design had they forecast the possible consequences of their triumph. Only some twenty years have elapsed since the rise of the fragile fabric that was to "inaugurate a new era" in the annals of international brotherhood, and already the idea of the founders has been ridden to exhaustion. Already the Industrial Exhibition threatens to become a standing social nuisance, while we are painfully conscious that as yet we only dimly realize the range of its development in the future. It may perhaps be regarded as matter for encouragement that most men of thought and intelligence, and among them some of the sponsors of the original idea, admit that the thing is being overdone. But, on the other hand, it is discouraging to remember that there is always a good deal that is plausible to be urged in favour of any particular show; that there is always a stock of cut-and-dried argument at call, warranted to satisfy the local mind. There are always patriotic and public-spirited busybodies who are content to hazard the offer of a material guarantee, and to repay themselves for the risk with the prospect of notoriety. There are always strong local interests that see unmixed gain in any influx of holiday-making strangers, be the influx greater or less. There are always hosts of tradesmen, chiefly tradesmen of ambition and enterprise with reputations to make, who hail every opportunity of being advertised economically and officially, and who would send any distance to secure a stall in a fancy fair held under Government auspices. The general local public is either absolutely indifferent, or languidly welcomes any excitement however faint, or any Exhibition however stale. Accordingly, when once a coterie of capitalists delighting in notoriety at any price resolve that there shall be an Exhibition, and make up their mind to find the money by way of guarantee, the thing is decided beforehand. The Exhibition brokers have prepared themselves with a reply to the preliminary pecuniary objection, the only objection which any statesman of enlightenment can persistently urge. They decline to discuss ulterior ones, appealing to triumphant precedent, and relying upon national or local vanity. The success of the Exhibitions of London and Paris vindicated the principle to all time, and redounded greatly to the fame and glory of these fortunate capitals. Why should not Teheran or Timbuctoo follow so admirable an example? It is not a subject of the Shah or a woolly-haired follower of the great Central African potentate who will dare to suggest that the cases are not precisely analogous. So the Exhibition mania is clearly destined to run its course, or rather to go on revolving in ever widening circles. Centralization was of the very essence of the original conception, and as the original conception decentralizes itself, it will entirely change its character. Our first Exhibitions were necessarily both exciting and more or less instructive, and eager anticipation was sharpened by anxious rivalry and the keenest personal interest. They were great international matches, in which the producers and the workmen of different nations submitted their wares to competitive examination. Merits and prices were subjected to searching scrutiny. Results were reached which were often sufficiently startling, and medals and certificates of commendation were the visible signs of the fame and profit in the gift of Government Commissioners. Manchester might be guided by the opinion of dispassionate experts as to how far the fineness and fibre of Sea-island cotton justified the superior prices it fetched. Brazil, India, and Egypt had substantial grounds to go upon in raising loans to foster the increased production of the staple. Liège met Birmingham in a trial of arms of precision, and economical Governments might learn whether it would pay in the end to buy their guns and ammunition in the cheaper markets of Belgium. The display of machinery enlightened intelligent foreigners as to the latest discoveries of English and American inventors, and often revolutionized conservative ideas which had docked the profits of many a quiet-going foreign manufactory. In like manner the decisions of impartial committees deservedly made the fortunes of many meritorious houses in different lines of business. For a medal in those days was like the Victoria Cross, and was accepted everywhere as an unmistakable badge of merit. We should be sorry, for instance, to have to estimate the increased gains of that happy member of the Rhenish house of Farina who was singled out for approval from the rest of his prolific clan. He had deserved the palm and he carried it away, and when he displayed it proudly in his window in the Julich's Platz the hosts of pilgrims on the Rhine were caught at once by an advertisement which they knew to be genuine. But now all that sort of thing is at an end. Nations have been "placed," and individual producers also, and nothing short of industrial convulsions potent to all the world can produce further changes on any large scale. This steady succession of Exhibitions supplies a register which we may constantly consult. As to the medals bestowed by the later and more insignificant ones, already they go for little or nothing. Many of the houses whose reputation is made decline to exhibit any longer. It can never be worth their while to give themselves so much trouble, to put themselves to so much cost, to send such long distances, only to assert an assured position. For what is an Exhibition medal nowadays? We can no longer compare it to the Victoria Cross; it rather resembles the decoration of what is literally the Legion of Honour. Every one has it who lays himself out to possess it, and its absence only proves that it was not an object of vehement desire. Thus Exhibitions are sinking towards the level of ordinary shows, ranking at the highest with fairs like Leipzig or Nijni Novgorod. Things may be occasionally sent to them from great distances. You may see much that is good, ingenious, and artistic. But, being convinced beforehand of their incompleteness, you feel that internationally they are worthless. You may admire individual objects, but you have no reason to believe that they are the best of their kind. You may see an adaptation of machinery that is wonderfully clever, and that must evidently effect a great economy of labour. But, for aught you know, the principle may have been exploded by one still more original and ingenious; and, exhibited as it is in this hole-and-corner fashion, you have no assurance whatever that the exhibitor has not spoiled it in the pirating. To a certain extent local Exhibitions must always have an interest in showing more or less completely the various resources of their districts. But you have no security that the display is locally exhaustive. If the best men of the neighbourhood chance to be public-spirited, they will probably exhibit on public grounds. If they happen to be actuated by merely personal considerations, they are much more likely to abstain.

In short, as it seems that we are to have Exhibitions multiplied infinitely, we believe their promoters would act more wisely if they frankly recognized the growing change in their character, and proceeded to plan them in accordance with it. They should call them the fairs which they really are, and offer every facility to vendors, though of course they would have to renounce whatever privileges they now claim on the pretence of being "great national undertakings." They should let stall-keepers sell from their stalls at pleasure, and not insist too rigidly on the rule which compels exhibitors to leave every article in its place to the close of the Exhibition. So would the show "draw" and pay, which are the primary objects nowadays. So would the little-known productions of the country or district be disseminated over the world, to make their way everywhere if they have any real value or beauty. As matters stand, people will soon not care to go out of their way to visit these frequent fairs; under a wiser arrangement, they might become a special object of travel. International intercourse would develop rapidly when Governments and Chambers of Commerce traded on the ruling passion of feminine nature. What were the fascinations that made Paris the most wealthy of non-commercial capitals? Not its situation, for it has no extraordinary natural advantages, although its more distant environs are charming. Not the art treasures of the Louvre and Luxembourg, nor the architectural glories of the Sainte-Chapelle and Notre Dame. Not the turf and flowers of its Bois, the evaporating esprit of its salons, the purity of its atmosphere, nor the general gaiety and brightness of its aspect. Its attraction lay in its shops. Ladies who never walked in London, save in Kensington Gardens on a Sunday, who would as soon have been detected lifting from shop counters as looking into shop windows in London, lounged shamelessly along the broad pavements of the Parisian thoroughfares, staring and gazing as if they had been fresh caught in the country. They carried their portemonnaies in their delicately gloved hands with the glee of charity children who have had some coppers given them to spend as they please. They were deliciously distracted among the variety of windows that had been decked for their seduction with a diabolical art and instinct. Bewildered at last among surrounding temptations, they saw the very hairs and pûtes in Potel's and Chabot's through the general halo of enchantment, and the sweet sensations of those summer days of shopping ranked among the happiest and brightest of their recollections. Ladies, as a rule, do not care for mountaineering or for vintages, and must take their pleasure soberly when abroad. What a zeal of anticipation and retrospect it would add to the autumn tour if some one great industrial fair were comprehended in the course of the journey! How easily the Exhibition might be made to utilize travellers to the profit of the people they travelled among! At this moment one has been opened at Lyons, in spite of the ravages of the war and the rumours of a Republican rising among the dangerous classes of La Croix Rousse. The sinister memories of recent horrors and the slight suspicion of imminent danger would give but a pleasant spice of adventure to the bargaining for ribbons and silks in the great headquarters of the silk and ribbon manufacture. Russia has come lumbering along in the wake of the fashion, and another Exhibition is in full swing in the old capital of the Czars. Few English ladies, and indeed not many Englishmen, have hitherto ventured themselves on the vast plain that stretches southwards from the Neva. The historic splendours of the Kremlin might not suffice to tempt them to a dull journey among seas of rude speech and most unprepossessing habits, recently emancipated, and half reclaimed. But the idea of cheapening priceless furs, freshly imported in lavish profusion from Siberian steppes and Arctic icebergs, would prove irresistible. The spirit of enterprise would be piqued in cases where money was no object, and, animated by the prospect of returning as lionesses to the circles of their friends, they would grudge neither lordship nor money. The responsible head of the party might start and shy at first, but would eventually avert his head and pool-pooling the wildness of the nation. But the firm hands that know so well how to manage him would turn him steadily, bearing him gently northwards by Dresden and Berlin, until at last he was led up to the Russian frontier and over it. Woman, having her way in the end, would stand proudly among the Arctic trophies, and, trading in the skins of the ermine and the marten, of the black and the silver fox, would find a grander pleasure than in the purchase of lace, jewellery, and bonnets at home. Russia would be enriched by the streams of English gold that flowed from the pockets of the English tourists. Orientals, too, would be ready enough to fall into the fashion when they found that it paid, and would run up airy palaces in the palm groves by the banks of the Nile, or among the cool cypresses on the shores of the Bosphorus. The bazaar system of the East would chime in happily with the tastes of the fair Western visitors. No longer need they be puzzled about killing time in Cairo or Tunis. Day after day, such hours as could be spared from the siesta might be devoted to the long negotiation over golden embroidery or burnouses, amber or attar of roses. Western cups of tea might be substituted for the Oriental coffee, and the dull afternoon become a kettledrum with an object. The delights of shopping would be voluptuously dallied with; but the bargain would be closed in the end to the satisfaction of both parties. The merchant would net his 200 per cent. of profit, the purchaser would buy at a reduction of 200 per cent. below the first extravagant demand, and nothing would tend more decidedly to promote excellent international feeling. So, although Exhibitions of Industry are at present unsatisfactory things, we do not doubt that a great future may be in store for them. Only it will be necessary for their promoters to begin with clearing their minds of cant, to drop their tall talk about philanthropy, perpetual peace, and the millennium, and to go in honestly for what they really mean.

LAW AT OXFORD.

THE problem of legal education has hitherto baffled the wisdom both of the Inns of Court and of the societies of solicitors. The Association presided over by Sir Roundell Palmer, satisfied for the present with having converted the joint Committee of the Inns to the principle of compulsory examination, seems to be waiting for those learned bodies to make the next move; which they are supposed to be about to do by promulgating a list of subjects in which proficiency will have to be shown by the barrister of the future. There is as yet no indication that any improvement is contemplated in the instruction given by the six Readers to the Inns of Court, though how much an increase of teaching power is needed among them may be inferred from the fact that one of these Readers is expected to cope single-handed with three such subjects as Civil Law, International Law, and Jurisprudence. In the meantime the Inner Temple, adopting a somewhat minute line of policy, has recently appointed from its own body five gentlemen, with the style of "Tutors," to assist the studies of its own members exclusively; and the Incorporated Law Society is pursuing the even tenor of its way, providing short but occasionally admirable courses of lectures for its articulated clerks, and securing one branch of the profession against any wholesale incursion of incompetence by a system of examinations which leaves much to be desired. In the strictly professional centres of legal study there is as yet therefore no agreement of opinion as to the subjects in which candidates for either branch of the profession ought to be examined, or in which oral instruction ought to be provided for them. Upon both points, however, tolerably definite ideas have been arrived at elsewhere, and have been, or are on the point of being, realized.

The great value of the legal curriculum of the University of London has long been recognized, and considerable improvements have been made in the Cambridge course; but we wish on the present occasion to call attention especially to what is being done in this direction at Oxford. Twenty years ago the study was there at its lowest ebb. No proficiency in it was of the slightest avail towards a degree in Arts, and the exercises for the Faculty degrees were almost illusory. Neither of the two Law Professors gave regular courses of instruction. The first impulse towards a better state of things was given by the reconstitution of the Arts examinations in 1853, when Law in combination with History was recognized as a separate School, in which a modicum of Roman or international law and a portion of Stephen's Commentaries have ever since maintained a creditable struggle against the more popular attractions of Modern History. It soon became clear that the studies were unequally yoked. Proficiency in one could with difficulty be measured against proficiency in the other in the same class list, and the gradually increasing interest in law demanded freer scope than could be given to it in the combined School. The result has been the formation of an independent School of Law by the side of the Schools of Litteræ humaniores, Mathematics, Physics, History, and Theology, in any one of which the final examination in Arts can now be passed. The first examination in the new School of Law will take place after the Long Vacation, when, as we learn from a notice which appears in the University Calendar, candidates will have to show an acquaintance with general jurisprudence, with the history of the English Constitution and of the law of real property, with the Institutes of Gaius and Justinian, and with the history of international law generally prior to the year 1750, and the law relating to ships and rivers in time of peace. In all these subjects text-books are recommended, but the examination will be in the subjects and not in the books, though an accurate knowledge will be required of certain charters, statutes, and other original authorities.

It will be observed that all these subjects are such as admit of being treated more or less as instruments of general culture; in other words, they are such as are admissible in an Arts course. But it has been determined not to stop here. The graduate in Arts who has familiarized himself with the general groundwork of legal science is invited to continue his studies, and to give them a more definitely professional direction in the Faculty of Law; and the examination for the Bachelor of Civil Law degree has been accordingly remodelled. The first examination under the new system will, it seems, take place in Trinity term, 1873, and a notice has been issued that candidates must present themselves for examination in:—(1) Either jurisprudence, or a department of a foreign code, to be compared and contrasted with the English law bearing on the same subject. (2) Any one of five large departments of Roman law, with especial reference to Gaius and to the Digest. (3) A general knowledge of the English law of property, family relations, contracts, and torts; and any two out of a list of eleven special topics of English law. (4) Either the general principles of private international law or the law of prize.

The changes thus briefly enumerated have been doubtless demanded by the tendency of the day towards some such systematic study of law as has long existed in almost every civilized country except our own. That they have been accelerated, and have assumed so satisfactory a shape, is however due to the exceptionally distinguished set of men who constitute the present legal professoriate of Oxford, and especially to the ability and zeal of the Regius Professor of Civil Law. Most of the Law chairs now so worthily filled are of quite recent foundation. The Regius Professorship, indeed, dates from the time of Henry VIII., and the first Vinerian Professor was Sir W. Blackstone; but it was not till 1859 that the chair of International Law was founded at All Souls. In 1868 a Reader was appointed to share the duties of the Vinerian Professor of Common Law, and in the following year the Professorship of Jurisprudence was founded by Corpus. Since 1861 a teacher in Hindoo and Mahomedan law and history has been provided, with a view to the requirements of the Indian Civil Service. The University has, we think, acted wisely in not insisting upon the residence at Oxford of the whole legal professoriate. Men may occasionally be found whose devotion to their subject may lead them to exchange the chances of an exciting and splendidly rewarded profession for the comparatively obscure career of a teacher, and the scanty stipend which the Universities seem disposed to offer them; but, as a general rule, if Oxford wishes to obtain the services of the sort of men who now adorn her legal Faculty, she must be content with such residence as is sufficient for a conscientious discharge of their duties. Nor will they be worse instructors in the theory of law for coming direct from its actual practice in the Courts. We must not omit to mention that the professors, together with the examiners in the School of Law and others, have been recently constituted into a Board of Legal Studies. Oxford thus possesses a singularly able and numerically adequate staff of Professors of Law; she allows the student to turn his attention to the subject at an early period, and gives him opportunities of obtaining degrees testifying to his proficiency on passing a judiciously arranged series of examinations. The results which may be hoped for from the experiment which is about to be tried depend partly on the recognition which the Oxford degrees may obtain from the governing bodies of the profession in London, and partly on the relation which the Oxford authorities may succeed in establishing between the generally humanizing course of study in Arts, and the special study of law which they are now endeavouring to engraft upon it.

It is hardly to be expected that young men will prolong their stay at the University in order to attend courses of lectures and to pass examinations in law, unless the degree which they may thus obtain is recognized among the qualifications for entrance into the profession. Other qualifications should doubtless be insisted on. Before a call to the Bar some practical familiarity with the routine of chambers and the business of the Courts is indispensable, and the honourable esprit de corps of the profession is doubtless much promoted by membership of an Inn of Court; but a knowledge of principles, and even of details so far as it is advisable to study them from books and lectures alone, may be obtained even better at a University town than in London. The besetting temptation of a young man who comes to London to study law is to plunge at once into the driest and minutest details of the work that goes on in a barrister's chambers. This is in fact the traditional method with us of qualifying for practice; the result being that, after spending laborious years among precedents and cases for opinion, our lawyers, while they acquire a certain dexterity in avoiding difficult questions, very seldom attain to a mastery of those principles with which they ought to have been familiar at starting. The student, on the other hand, who gets at the University, from competent teachers, an acquaintance with the general outlines of the department of knowledge to which he is about to devote himself, who has grasped the scientific ideas which underlie it, who has mastered the elements of Roman law, and has a fair acquaintance with the distribution and the broad principles of the law of his own country, when he enters the chambers of a conveyancer or special pleader will soon find that the time spent in preparatory study has not been lost. His horizon will not be bounded by the mortgages or pleadings upon which he is engaged, nor will he waste time in the haphazard reading of elementary treatises, but will see in all he is called upon to do the experimental application of the general principles with which his mind is already stored. We are convinced that by far the shortest way to learn law, or anything else, is to begin at the beginning; to learn the rule before attempting to apply it to particular instances.

The proper relation of the revived study of law at Oxford to the general culture of the place presents more difficulty than its proper relation to entrance upon the legal profession. The principle of the middle ages, that the University is founded in Arts, has been loyally maintained by Oxford. Except in Music, the graduates in which lack many of the privileges of other graduates, no faculty degree can be taken without previously passing all the examinations necessary for a degree in Arts. In other words, no one is admitted to show that he has studied the subject of his profession till he has shown that he has received the general culture which befits all the alumni of a place of liberal education. This it is which has given so high a value to the medical degrees of Oxford; and to this principle we trust the University will always adhere in any improvements which she may introduce into the Faculty of Law. "Fili facultatis artium," it has been truly said, "aptiores sunt ad quævis studia altiora." An Oxford theologian, lawyer, or physician should be a cultivated man as well as an expert in his profession.

There are doubtless many subjects which lie on the borderland of the Arts course and of the professional faculties. They are at once capable of being regarded in connexion with the other subjects of a liberal education, and are propædæutic to some special line of study. These subjects Oxford has done wisely in admitting into her general curriculum, or Faculty of Arts; but she has also done wisely in reserving her degrees in the other faculties for proficiency in the more specifically professional attainments which are appropriate to each. This venerable distinction between Arts and the superior faculties we believe to be most valuable. When graduates in divinity and law are as specially qualified as graduates in medicine now are, the faculties, to which one for the physical sciences ought to be added, as in most of the Continental Universities, might not unfitly be entrusted with certain powers of self-government, and with the election of some of their own professors. In the meantime we would religiously preserve every trace of their independent existence, even such as is afforded by their possession of separate "bedells"; and we see with regret that Cambridge has confused the boundaries of Arts and Law by giving a law degree to candidates who pass one of the Arts Triposes. Oxford has as yet made only one step, and that one which can easily be retraced, in the direction of confusion. "The Board of Studies for the School of Law" have issued a notice with reference to what they call "the examination in that school for the degree of B.C.L." It is to be hoped that, when they have occasion to issue another notice upon the subject, they will manage to avoid using expressions which might create an impression that the degree in question, and the examination upon which it is conferred, belong not to the Faculty of Law, but to the School of Jurisprudence in the Faculty of Arts. The wording of a notice is, however, a small matter. The Board of Studies may be congratulated on having organised a law course which is at once scientifically satisfactory and thoroughly practical. No slight praise is also due to the University for having passed almost without discussion statutes drawn for this purpose by those in whose knowledge of their subject she reposes deserved confidence. It is to be hoped that the authorities in London will make themselves acquainted with what has been done, and will at once confer a benefit on the profession, and give a stimulus to the systematic study of law by recognising the Oxford degree as a qualification for entrance into the profession.

THE EMBANKMENT STRUGGLE.

IT is to be regretted that Shakespeare could not have survived till our days to re-write the disenchantment of the Merchant of Venice, for he might have gleaned some important hints for its improvement from the conduct of Mr. Lowe regarding the Thames Embankment land. According to the ruder conception of the dramatist, Shylock began by standing out doggedly for his pound of flesh, but after Portia had proved to him that he could not make good his claim without serious risk to his natural, not to mention his official, life, the stupid Jew threw up the game and went away, neither claiming nor getting any compensation at all. Under Mr. Lowe's enlightened guidance, and in compliance with the precedent which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has set in his dealing with the reclaimed land on the Embankment, Shylock might have condescendingly accepted Portia's ruling as to the blood-letting, and then offered to compromise his demand for merely an ounce or two of flesh with the incidental blood thrown in.

After many shifts and turns, involving the delay of nearly two Sessions, the Embankment controversy is at length ripe for a Parliamentary settlement, and as the fight will come off on Monday in the Committee of the whole House on the amended Bill of the Government, we shall, as briefly as the story allows, lay before our readers the present state of the question. They will hardly have forgotten that the Select Committee of last year, comprising a majority of Liberals, to which the matter had been referred, and upon which the Government had the advantage of the acute advocacy both of Mr. Lowe and of Sir R. Collier, made a Report which, while it recognized the legal ownership of the Crown in the disputed ground under the hard terms of the Act of 1862, expressed itself very decidedly against the policy of sumum jus; and recommended a lease of the land, which had been reclaimed by the London ratepayers' money, to the Metropolitan Board for public gardens at an almost nominal rent, following the precedent of the additional ground conceded to the houses in Whitehall Gardens and to Montagu House. The conclusion drawn by the public from this Report was spontaneous, instinctive, and all but universal—namely, that Mr. Lowe would thankfully accept a fall which had been so skilfully broken for him. The general surprise was therefore extremely when early in this Session the Government brought in a Bill which, in total disregard of the recommendations of their own Committee, provided for the sale of the future garden ground to the Metropolitan Board for the full price of 40,000*l*. Circumstances and inclination again made Mr. W. H. Smith the champion of the opposition, and a fight upon the second reading was inevitable. The Government had, however, the luck on its side, and the conflict was postponed till a later stage. The Bill was what is called a "hybrid" one—not quite private nor quite public—and it had, therefore, in its private character to go before a Select Committee upstairs before it could as a public Bill be discussed by a Committee of the whole House. The Treasury, conscious from the tone of the House that it would be hazardous to adhere to its original purpose, but yet unwilling to make a frank surrender, has availed itself of this Select Committee (which was exceptionally constituted of seven members) to excooperate a proposed compromise over which the battle of Monday is to be fought. They were at an advantage in the Committee of 1872 compared with that of 1871, because the latter was appointed to consider the whole question in its broader aspects of public policy, and was therefore composed of members supposed to possess various and special qualifications, while the Committee which has just reported had only to deal with the clauses of an existing Bill, and was therefore named upon a more restricted principle to handle the matter in its business aspects. Counsel appeared both for the Crown and for the Metropolitan Board, and eight witnesses were called, all on behalf of the Crown—the Solicitor to the Woods and Forests, a surveyor, a land agent, the Duke of Northumberland's solicitor on an incidental point, and four architects. The conclusion was that the Committee reported the Bill back to the House in an amended form, materially at variance both with the recommendations of the Committee of 1871 and with the Bill itself in its original shape. In 1871 the Government demand—the "pound of flesh"—was to usurp the whole disputed land, and either sell it at the full value of building ground, or build a row of private houses up to a certain arbitrary line marked by some very historical "white posts," and then let the remainder as far as the Embankment road, along with those houses, as the private garden of the lessee. The Committee threw over the white posts, settled its own building line on a balance of considerations, and recommended the lease of the remaining ground at an almost nominal rent to the Metropolitan Board for public gardens. The original Bill of 1872 accepted the mapping out of the Committee of 1871, but for a nominal rent substituted a substantial price. The Committee of 1872 contrived within these narrow limits to strike out a scheme which was unlike all the others, and advised the readoption of the white posts line for the new houses; the retention by the Government of another strip, thirty feet wide, for private gardens to those houses, to be raised upon a terrace of not more than three feet high, and to be parted from the public garden by an open railing; and the sale of the remaining scrap to the Metropolitan Board for 3,000*l*. Mr. Smith's tactics have changed with those of his adversary, and he will on Monday propose, in the Committee on the Bill, to amend the Government offer by claiming for the public an additional width of 30 feet, throwing the line of the private gardens back to the white posts, and the new houses 30 feet back behind that, while still retaining the sum of 3,000*l*. as the consideration. Such is the simple issue to which the controversy has been narrowed; for we can hardly regard as serious the proposal of Mr. Anderson, the economical member for Glasgow, who has again (to borrow the expression used in regard to him by a brother, though metropolitan, Radical) come forward to trouble the water "like a cuttle-fish," by proposing to substitute 25,000*l*. for 3,000*l*.

The difference between Mr. Smith's ultimatum of this year and the recommendation of the Committee of last year, when reduced to the same terms, implies the sacrifice of between a third and a quarter of the ground which would have been secured by the latter. The line of 30 feet short of the white posts runs nearer to the river, and therefore gives more ground to the Government than it would have obtained in 1871, while money paid down is pleasant to the Treasury than a small rent. The public garden of the 1871 Committee would have had a breadth varying from 248 feet nearest the Charing Cross Station to 161 feet at the southern or narrowest end, and would have covered an area of 90,000 square feet. Mr. Smith's line of this year secures a public garden with a uniform breadth of 145 feet and an area of 66,156 square feet, while the Government offer only leaves the contemptible breadth of 115 feet and an area of 58,156 feet. But we still think that Mr. Smith has done wisely in simplifying matters and adhering as nearly as he can to the outline of the Government Bill. His counter proposal takes the shape of amendments in Committee, and if he carries a majority of the House with him, the Bill which is to ratify the compromise may proceed without further delay. On the moral aspects of the question we need hardly repeat the opinion which we have already had so often to enforce. As to the two proposals in their character of London improvements we can have no hesitation in expressing our preference for Mr. Smith's building line. A block of houses thrust up to the white posts would shoulder forward in awkward advance of the whole line of Whitehall Gardens, Montagu House, and Richmond Terrace, and would simply give a precedent to some future Minister for a still further invasion of the riverside open, whenever it might be profitable to build a row of houses upon the enclosed gardens.

It must never be forgotten that the constructions which the Government insists upon raising are not any public building, in which the breadth has some correspondence to the length, and in which all sides will be architectural compositions. Such a building, as every tiro knows, may often be thrust forward on a terrace or in a public garden with enhanced effect. We have in the present case to deal with a row of houses all length and no breadth, like Euclid's definition of a line, with a river front and a land front, and the ends as it may be. We are the more anxious to insist on this consideration because Mr. P. C. Hardwick, who was the first of the four architects examined on behalf of the Government, began by jumping through a parenthesis into a very wide conclusion in his expression "a large public building or a range of buildings (which comes to the same thing)," and then proceeded to argue as if the edifice in contemplation was such a public building, and as if, when Whitehall Gardens come to be rebuilt, the new houses would have to be advanced to the river. Mr. Hardwick no doubt produced the best scrap of argument which he could find when he pleaded that Mr. Lowe should be gratified in order that the horrible ugliness of the Charing Cross Station might be masked. We are as anxious to mask it as any people can be, but we think it rather hard that this result should be reached by a process which involves the transference of a large lump of money's worth from the Metropolitan ratepayers to the Treasury. Besides we may venture to suggest that there is such a thing as looking from and not towards the Station, and that to the man who does so the consciousness that some corner of that monstrosity may be hidden from somebody else will be but scant consolation for the dis-sight of his own immediate prospect. Mr. E. M. Barry, Mr. Waterhouse, and Mr. Wyatt judiciously followed Mr. Hardwick's lead, while a good deal of time was wasted in an exposition of the merits of the terrace on which, as it equally forms a part of Mr. Smith's proposal, we need not enter. We have ever been foremost in vindicating the liberty and dignity of the architectural profession against the aggressions both of public and private clients, and we have therefore less scruple in pointing out to our leading architects that if they mean to second the exertions of their friends, they had better be careful how far they give in to that modern system of professional evidence which the unlearned have some difficulty in distinguishing from the legal custom of holding briefs.

In the meanwhile the Metropolitan Board, full of the triumph which, thanks to Mr. Smith's tact and firmness, it is likely to win, is discounting the alterations which it expects to carry out in the portions of London lying between the Strand and the river, and has revived the agitation to which the House of Commons summarily put a stop a few years since for the demolition of Northumberland House. We may venture to call their attention to the principles on which they have been acting in regard to the reclaimed ground on the Embankment. It was reclaimed, they say, by the ratepayers' money, and therefore the ratepayers have a claim to it. Let them not forget that Northumberland House was created by the money of its owner's predecessors. It is architecturally and historically a public monument of high interest, as the last of the riverside mansions of our great families, and is in itself a building of much grandeur, while the Metropolitan Board has never succeeded in showing that it cannot, with a little ingenuity, find means of reaching the Thames without interfering with Northumberland House. We are therefore quite unable to join in the gushing desire, in which some people are indulging, to see this historical palace replaced by a newfangled street of cafés and hotels.

COLONEL CHESNEY ON AUTUMN MANŒUVRES.

THE caution which was given by Colonel Chesney in his able and interesting lecture at the United Service Institution against forming exaggerated estimates of the value of autumnal manœuvres comes at an opportune moment. Last year a marked disposition was shown by some newspaper Correspondents to write about what went on as if these manœuvres resembled actual warfare in everything except bloodshed, while one ardent young tactician published an octavo volume in which the operations of each day's Aldershot campaign were recounted and described with the gravity of a Napier composing the history of the Peninsular war. Unless this sort of thing had been checked, we should probably this season have been deluged with inflated nonsense put forward as military criticism, and it is to be hoped that Colonel Chesney's lecture will have a good effect in this respect. Colonel Chesney began by reminding his hearers of Napoleon's apophthegm about the superiority of moral to physical qualities in war, which nowadays would seem to have been lost sight of. To hear some people talk, they appear to imagine that one army is just as good as another, and that victory is a mere question of manœuvring and organization; but in reality the highest generalship consists, as it always has done, in bringing the troops into the proper state of mind for fighting, and courage is still the first quality needed in a soldier. Generals with force of character to infuse spirit into the troops they lead will, it is true, be usually men of power in other respects, and so the leading qualities for command are often found united. Further, as Colonel Chesney pointed out, there is a variety of other points in which the resemblance must fail between mimic and actual warfare. The conditions under which the former can be carried out must necessarily be restricted. When people propose, as they sometimes wildly do, that the two opposing forces should be cast loose at one another and allowed to fight it out without any definite instructions, they lose all sight of the inordinate expense, to take only one of many objections, which such a scheme would involve. For the two sides to fight without restriction as to time and ground, assumes that one side would drive the other from its base, according to the decision of the umpire, and therefore each party would need to be furnished not only with supplies of food on the line of its proper base, but with spare stocks of all necessaries on each flank, to be used according as it might be driven back in one direction or the other; for of course the notion that the British soldier and his cattle should be left without food for twenty-four hours is not to be seriously entertained. And, after all, what would be gained by this great additional expense? To follow up this imitation of actual warfare we ought to suppose that one army gets altogether the better of the other, in which case the former would pursue its beaten adversary, and the latter would inevitably become more and more disorganized. Is this a thing to be imitated? and is it a healthy training to accustom British troops to disorganized retreat? But in fact these fanciful notions about making the manœuvres a complete imitation of real war fall to pieces as soon as seriously examined. For another thing, the idea that umpires can decide upon the effect of artillery is quite delusive; for, as Colonel Chesney pointed out, mere distance affords no criterion on this head; artillery fire may be destructive at two thousand yards, and it may be comparatively harmless at half that distance; it all depends on the lay of the ground and the amount of cover it affords, points which cannot be ascertained by a person looking from a distance. Last, but not least, the small number of the forces brought into the field necessarily gives an artificial character to the mimic warfare. It is quite inconceivable that the fate of England should ever depend on its power to resist an invasion of fifteen thousand men, and therefore the mode of campaigning adopted by tactical units of that strength must be quite different in its nature from what would take place if the country were really invaded. In that case the victory would not be won by the successful manœuvring of a couple of divisions, or by turning the flank of a little body of men posted on a hill.

Yet, on the other hand, the limited nature of the conditions practicable in mimic warfare need not dishearten us, for, after all, as the lecturer observed, there is an abundance of matter for experiment in these manœuvres, if we only employ them properly. The composition of the staff; whether our plan of organizing the divisional staffs ser à champ is effective; whether there should be separate staff officers for the different departments of the General's work all communicating directly with him, or whether he should be aided by a chief of the staff to collect all departmental business; whether the Control officers should communicate directly with the General or through his staff—that is, which of the two plans is found practically most convenient; the best technical composition of a brigade—that is, the number of battalions most suitable, and whether there should be demi-brigades; the best mode of organising the transport and supply and camp equipments—all these things can be tested almost as well by manoeuvres as in actual campaigns. The manoeuvres should also help to solve the most important problem of all, What training do our auxiliary forces require, and what is the particular help we must look for from them in case of war? Another use of the manoeuvres is, that they will serve to familiarize the country with the army; for as the soldiers come more before their countrymen, the sad and discreditable ignorance with regard to them which exists in many of our rural districts will vanish as this means of advertising the army is made use of. Last but not least, in camps of this sort men and officers, roughing it together, come to know more of each other than they would ever do in barrack life, and with that knowledge will come that perfect confidence between the best regimental officers and the best soldiers in the world which should be the sure and certain harbinger of victory.

It strikes us, too, that autumn manoeuvres are especially valuable for people who are not blessed with imaginations, to which category must certainly belong the compiler of the old drill-book. If you had asked these people whether they supposed that armies when campaigning would always move over level gravel plains, from which the smallest irregularity had been carefully removed beforehand, they would no doubt have replied in the negative; yet their rules and regulations all assumed such conditions as the aim and object of military training. Anybody who entered the army in ante-Crimean days may recollect the fatuous performances which used to do duty for manoeuvres, where a column would advance over a parade with a thin file of men walking on each side, supposed by a flight of fancy to represent light troops feeling the flanks, or the preposterous evolutions which went by the name of skirmishing. Had you asked the worthies who indulged in these absurdities whether they really thought that what they were doing represented in even the remotest degree any conceivable operations of actual war, they might perhaps have been puzzled to give a reply; but certainly it never appeared to occur to them that troops on a campaign did not always advance in long lines carefully dressed, with the artillery on either flank, and that in actual movements such things as walls, hedges, and rivers might possibly be met with. But take these men out for a fortnight's manoeuvring on Chobham or Salisbury Plain, and then the facts are presented to their minds, and they perceive that the most perfect dressing of the ranks will not fill men's stomachs if the baggage is in the rear; that the breaking down of a cart may stop a column, and that troops cannot always march in step. All this comes to some men almost like a revelation, and what happens in these extreme cases happens in a lesser degree to all. These manoeuvres set officers thinking, and give a practical turn to their thoughts, and if made proper use of in this way, British officers, already the most active and conscientious, may be made also the most intelligent and professionally accomplished of any army in the world.

THE FISK MURDER.

CONTRARY to expectation, the jury in the case of Stokes, who was charged with the murder of Colonel Fisk at New York, have been unable to agree on a verdict, and have consequently been discharged. It seems to have been generally anticipated that the jury would unanimously acquit the prisoner. That Stokes deliberately shot at and killed Fisk was beyond question, and was in fact admitted by the counsel for the defence. The evidence on this point was distinct and conclusive. On the afternoon of the 6th of January Fisk drove up to the Grand Central Hotel in Broadway; he got out of his carriage and went up the ladies' staircase. The hall-boy, following him, saw him suddenly stagger, turn round, and come down several steps, and at the same time heard the report of a pistol. Looking up, the lad saw Stokes at the top of the stairs, leaning over the balustrade and watching Fisk. Immediately another shot was fired, and Fisk fell. Stokes was seized as he was running out of the hotel, was identified by the hall-boy and by Fisk himself, and was proved to have been in the hotel a few minutes before Fisk arrived, and to have been waiting on the staircase as if anxiously expecting some one. He knew no one in the hotel, and had no business there. Fisk died several hours afterwards. Stokes admitted through his counsel that he shot Fisk, but pleaded that he believed Fisk to be armed, and that he apprehended an attack, and fired in self-defence. It is possible that Fisk carried arms, as many of his class do in New York, but it does not seem to have been proved that he did, and it was not even alleged that he actually drew a pistol or made any show of firing on Stokes. It was part of the case for the defence that Fisk did not die of his wounds, but of maltreatment by the doctors; but there was nothing to warrant this supposition. One at least of Fisk's wounds was mortal, and all that the doctors could do for him was to relieve his sufferings and prolong life for a few hours. It is difficult to imagine a clearer case of deliberate and wilful murder than the assassination of Fisk, and if the jury had looked only to the question of fact which they had to decide, it is impossible that they could have hesitated for a moment to return a verdict of guilty. The District Attorney, who conducted the prosecution, pointed out that it did not matter in the least whether Fisk was a good or a bad man, and that the law was that no one should be allowed to take into his own hands the power to execute judgment on his fellow-man. The Judge refused to allow questions to be put to the witnesses with the view of proving the dissolute and desperate character of the murdered man; but the counsel for the defence took every opportunity of bringing this side of the subject before the jury, and of suggesting that, as Stokes was helpless in the courts of law where he was being pursued by Fisk, and as the latter had at command other violent and illegal means of injuring him which he was quite capable of employing, Stokes had a right to protect himself in the best way he could, and that in any case the killing of such a scoundrel as Fisk was rather a gain than a loss to society. And there can be no doubt that this was the question on which the jury found themselves at the last unable to make up their minds. "There was," says one of the Reporters, "an intense silence in the Court-room when John M'Keon (Stokes's leading counsel) threw back his coat, looked round on Judges, jury, and spectators," and "arraigned the deceased man before the bar of public opinion." In glowing language, we are told, he depicted Fisk's disregard of public morality, his defiance of all laws, both human and divine, and, what in New York is perhaps accounted still worse, his contempt for public opinion. He denounced Fisk as the greatest curse America had ever known, likening him to Cagliostro and Casanova, names apparently chosen at random to impress the jury, who found themselves trying Fisk, who was dead, and not represented by counsel, instead of the prisoner at the bar.

It may be true that Fisk, as Mr. M'Keon said in his "glowing" language, had debauched the sentiment of the people, polluted the fountains of public justice, and made the grand old words "American honour and fair play" bywords of contempt and scorn in all civilized countries; but we are afraid that the result of this trial, and the recognition of the right of free shooting from personal motives and for private ends, will hardly serve to reinstate New York in the good opinion of the world. The counsel quoted some of Fisk's sayings, but without offering any proof of them, or attempting to show that Fisk ever carried his precepts into practice. It was said that when he found a troublesome person in his way, he would remark, "Let no man interfere with us, for if he does our touch is cold and clammy"; and on another occasion he observed, "We have private graveyards for our enemies." Fisk and Stokes were rivals in love, and they were also mixed up together in business transactions, and it was alleged that Fisk used his power over Stokes in the latter to revenge himself for having been supplanted in the affections of "Josie," the vulgar Helen of a low intrigue. Mr. M'Keon stated that Stokes had suffered very much from his arrest and imprisonment; he was a changed man; and it would be for the jury to say how far his mind had been disturbed by the treatment he had received at the hands of Fisk. When he had concluded, the jury were possibly under the impression that the question was whether some means could not be devised of punishing the murdered man for his atrocious conduct to the murderer, and whether out of the fortune of the deceased or out of the public purse some handsome compensation should not be awarded to the hero in the dock. Mr. M'Keon's address was garnished with passages of personal invective directed against the counsel for the prosecution, which are described by the newspapers under such suggestive headings as "Rough on the District Attorney," and "Another Snarl." "It is worth something," we are assured, "in this age of cynicism, unbelief, and cant, to see this little man jumping up and pitching in right and left." Before the trial properly began a week had been spent in making up a jury. No fewer than seven hundred and fifty persons had been summoned to attend, and of these a considerable number were examined and rejected, on the ground that they were prejudiced either for or against the prisoner. Naturally jurymen who desired to escape attendance were quite sure that they could not form an impartial opinion on the case. One declared that he was constitutionally inclined to violent prejudices; another thought it a hard thing that such an enterprising man as Fisk should have been killed; another never believed anything he did not see; while a fourth proclaimed that he abominated "Stock operators, fancy men, and all persons who did not earn an honest living." Some had doubts about capital punishment; others had seen a play based on the murder of Fisk, called "Black Friday," and found themselves prejudiced by it, or by articles in the papers. One man said he read the papers, but "murders made no impression on him," and was accepted as a juror. Possibly the reluctance to serve in this capacity was increased by the prospect of having one's personal appearance described in the papers by a graphic reporter. It is not every one who would relish being sketched in this style for the amusement of the public:—

Mr. Whittle is not a tall man, measuring in his stockings about five feet six; he has a fine expressive countenance, with mild brown eyes, and a bald pate, with side tufts of brown hair, with side whiskers and under beard of a ginger hue. He was dressed in a neat-fitting suit of black, with tie to match, and a spotless white shirt.

To complete the picture of the Court we should perhaps mention that Stokes, "neatly dressed in a thin grey coat and white duck trousers," is said to have been the "coolest man in Court," the thermometer being at 95°, and laughed gaily at some of the observations of counsel and witnesses. Some friends of Stokes, "young men dressed in the height of fashion," sat near him. His father, mother, and brother were also present. One day Mrs. Fisk also came into Court, and sat immediately opposite the murderer of her husband.

The result of this case would seem to show that public opinion in New York is divided as to the expediency of allowing persons of bad character to be shot down, without notice or trial, in the streets. To which side the majority leans does not appear, but it may perhaps be regarded as progress that any doubts should be entertained on the subject at all. We have some recollection of other cases of a similar character in which juries found no difficulty in returning a verdict of acquittal. When the people of New York have had time to think out the problem, they will possibly arrive at the conclusion that when a man has done anything for which he deserves to be put to death, it is more convenient to try him first and kill him afterwards, and that it is not desirable that private persons should be at liberty to discharge the functions of judge, jury, and executioner at their own discretion. Fisk's death in itself is no loss to society, but society is certain to suffer if the Fisks are to be treated in this summary manner. There is an old saying that there are as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, and there is no reason to suppose that New York cannot produce other scoundrels quite as reckless and unscrupulous as Fisk. It is impossible to suppose that a villain of this stamp could have flourished as he did unless there had been in the community from which he sprang, and on which he afterwards preyed, something congenial to the development of his villany. It is not improbable that Stokes's violence had its origin in Fisk's lawlessness. Fisk had the Courts at his command, and one can conceive the desperation of his victim as he became daily more hopelessly entangled in the coils of the law. But if the community had in the first instance done its duty, Stokes and other persons more deserving of sympathy and protection would have been preserved from the machinations of Fisk and his confederates. It is scandalous that such a scoundrel should have had such innings, but the proper remedy for the evil is certainly not the bullet of an amateur executioner. The right of capital punishment is one which society had better keep in its own hands. In the first place, if it does not, mistakes are apt to occur; and in the next place, the Fisks, being fairly warned what they have to expect, will probably not neglect to take the precaution of having the first shot. The whole affair is a conspicuous example of that moral cowardice which appears to be the besetting sin of the educated and respectable portion of democratic communities. There must have been a large body of people in New York who abominated the profligate rogueries of Fisk and his gang, but they had not the courage to attack them, and were content to shrug their shoulders, pay through the nose, and thank Heaven they did not meet Fisk or his "ladies" at dinners or dances. It is impossible that Fisk's lawlessness could be reproduced in this country; but the disinclination of the jury to punish his murderer is, we are sorry to say, not without its parallel among ourselves. If free scope is to be allowed to murder as part of the ordinary discipline of private life, there could hardly be a subject more worthy of this kind of summary treatment than Fisk. We are not aware, however, that the Americans have yet decided that it is a comparatively venial offence for a clergyman to kill his wife when she is troublesome on a Sunday, or for a cook to throttle her mistress for daring to enter the kitchen and criticize the arrangements for dinner.

THE CATHOLIC UNION AND THE JESUITS.

THE Pope's letter to Cardinal Antonelli, protesting against the suppression of religious Orders in Germany and Rome, is producing its fruits in England. Whether there is any very wide sympathy with the exiled Jesuits among the Catholic laity of the Continent we take leave to doubt. In Germany, to say the least, opinion is divided. The Silesian News, a paper published under the auspices of Prince-Bishop Förster, observes, in the course of an elaborate attack on the Ultramontane Germania, that the way in which the infallibilist dogma was carried has left a sting in the minds of many even of those who have submitted to it, and that "men should know from history that a sting in German minds works itself out differently from what it does elsewhere." And then, after politely comparing the conduct of the Ultramontanes to that of the blind King of Hanover, the author clenches his criticism with the remark that the worst result of their confident and overbearing tone is the complete illusion produced at Rome as to the real state of things. In this country, where the Roman Catholic press is entirely in Ultramontane hands, there is of course neither division nor moderation in its treatment of the question. Yet even here we doubt whether lay feeling about it is so strong or so unanimous as the noisier spokesmen of the party would have us believe. The meeting held last Tuesday at Willis's Rooms to protest against Prince Bismarck's recent legislation was somewhat ostentatiously announced and described as a spontaneous expression of lay sentiment. But the room was by no means full, and the fair sex predominated largely among its occupants, not to dwell on the circumstance of a very considerable sprinkling of clerical auditors, though the speakers, with the notable exceptions of the inevitable Mgr. Capel and Archbishop Manning, were laymen. But then there are laymen and laymen. The leading speakers were notoriously adherents of the most advanced Ultramontane school, and most of them were converts. We may add that the argument, such as it was, was left almost entirely to the two clerical orators. Dr. Manning's speech alone was fully three times as long as any of the rest. And certainly, though we are far from committing ourselves to a belief in "the great factory of go-carts and leading-strings" which he was rather suspiciously eager to disclaim, the general impression left on one's mind is not that "the Catholic laity are on fire quite as much as the clergy" about the expulsion of the German Jesuits.

We have already said more than once that we do not clearly understand Prince Bismarck's religious policy, and still less do we feel called upon to constitute ourselves his apologists. It is very unlikely that a statesman of his mental and moral calibre should have suddenly, in an incoherent fit of spleen or dismay, struck out an uncalled for and inoperative measure; and it is quite as improbable, begging Archbishop Manning's pardon, that the great Chancellor should have "taken counsel from the King of Bavaria and his councillors," and condescended to take his policy from the Cabinet of Munich. But the procedure does look at first sight too much like one of those petty and irritating persecutions which only enhance in the long run the influence of their victims. It is believed in Germany that the original draft of the law, as it came from its author's hand, was much more stringent than the Emperor could be induced to sanction. And if this is true, we may believe that Prince Bismarck intended to bite as well as to bark, and that he recognized a grave necessity for doing so, though the grounds of his opinion must still remain obscure. We quoted the other day Montalembert's testimony as to the attitude assumed by the Roman Jesuits during the last twenty-five years, and it would not be difficult to show that other distinguished Catholic authorities, such as Lacordaire, had formed a very similar estimate. No doubt, as Montalembert plainly intimated, a community possessing the power as well as the will to carry out the principles openly advocated in the Civiltà Cattolica and Stimmen aus Maria Laach would be justly regarded with suspicion by any Government. That the Jesuits possess this power we see no reason for believing, but it is difficult, in the face of their own implicit and reiterated assertions, to doubt their will. In saying this, we of course do not forget that even in so rigidly organized an army as that created by Ignatius Loyola, national and individual idiosyncrasies will be sure to assert themselves; and it is probable that many of the English and French, perhaps also of the German, Jesuits have little sympathy with the fervid and uncompromising absolutism, both civil and ecclesiastical, of their Roman brethren. But the solidarity of the great military Order—for such it is in fact as in the conception of its founder—has always been one of its proudest boasts; and if it is held responsible in one country for the action of its members in another, this is but taking them at their own word. It may readily be allowed that the highest triumph of toleration is to tolerate those who themselves repudiate the principle. But the persecutors in will can hardly complain if persecution in deed should come upon them through the vengeance or the dread of their intended victims.

None of these considerations, however, seem to have crossed the minds of any of the speakers at Willis's Rooms last Tuesday, whose eloquence was a faithful—and in one sense not a feeble—echo of the famous Papal allocution about the Colossus and the little stone. The Duke of Norfolk, who occupied the chair, confined himself to vague generalities about "a system of persecution which aimed at destroying religion throughout the world," and the debt owed by English Catholics to the Jesuits. And Lord Howard of Glossop, who followed him, seems to have chiefly dwelt on the duty and importance of providing a religious education for the children of the poor—a subject on which he has long since amply vindicated his right to be listened to, but which had no very direct bearing on the resolution he was engaged in moving. He was succeeded by Mr. Wegg-Prosser, a zealous convert, who considered the Jesuits "the ablest soldiers of the Church," and "vehemently denounced the policy of insult and spoliation pursued by the Italian Government towards the Holy See." So far the speeches were little more than a reproduction of the sort of mingled eulogiums and commonplace which may be read ad libitum any week in the columns of the Register or the Tribune. But the next speaker, Monsignor Capel, having a certain reputation for proselytizing successes, apparently felt himself called upon to argue. He accordingly made two points, which are the more unfortunate for his argument as nobody is likely to dispute them. In the first place, he thought that "to touch the mainspring of the centre of movement in the Church" was to threaten her interior life; and we are left to infer that this mainspring is the Jesuit Order, especially in its headquarters at Rome. But this is just what its Catholic opponents have been so strongly insisting upon. The Munich Congress of last September, for instance, protested against the deleterious influence of Jesuitism precisely because it was now the central and dominating influence in the Roman Catholic Church, and had thus supplied both the original impulse and the motive power for carrying through the Vatican decrees. If Prince Bismarck were asked why he selected that special Order for attack, he would probably reply that it inspired and sustained the hostile policy of the Holy See towards the German Empire. Monsignor Capel's second point, if less suicidal, was more conspicuously fraudulent.

Monasteries to a sister of the noble Chairman as having devoted her life and time and fortune to the service of the poor and miserable in London—in other words, as we understand him, having entered a convent—and then he dwelt on the strong claims which these religious Orders had on the affection and respect not only of Catholics but of mankind generally for their services to society. Sed quis vituperanti? The new law of the German Reichsrath does not touch any communities of women, of which there are a large number pursuing their way unmolested in Prussia alone; and the active Orders, at least of women—to which Monsignor Capel's argument applies exclusively—have all along been exempted, if we are not mistaken, from the general prohibition of religious communities in Italy. It may or may not be right to proscribe the Jesuits, but it can be no reason for supporting them that the Sisters of Charity lead exemplary lives and are public benefactors of society. Lord Denbigh, who moved the next resolution, came nearer the real issue when he said that the Jesuits had been misrepresented as intriguers; "whereas those who know them well knew that it was distinctly against the constitution of their Order to mix themselves up with any intrigue." We will not presume to claim a closer acquaintance with the Jesuits, or rather—for that appears to be what he meant—with their constitution, than Lord Denbigh; but we do happen to know something of their history. A very chequered history it is, and it would be absurd to deny that they have achieved great things in the way of education, theology, and missions to the heathen, though even here there is a considerable per contra account to be taken into the reckoning. But that, if their constitution forbids them to mix in any intrigue, it has been more honoured in the breach than in the observance, is so notorious that we rather marvel at Lord Denbigh's courageous simplicity in taking the bull by the horns so readily. It would be interesting to know how he explains the inveterate distrust, not of Protestants or sceptics, but of Catholic monarchs and States, and of many Popes, which has dogged their steps from the very first, which very nearly induced Sixtus V. to crush the Order in its infancy, and which did constrain Clement XIV. to suppress it, with the unanimous approval of every Catholic Government in Europe, after two centuries' experience of its practical interpretation of the rule of political neutrality. Lord Denbigh was followed by Sir Charles Clifford, the report of whose speech is comprised in three lines, but abundantly makes up in vigour what it lacks in length. He had evidently studied to some purpose the Papal application of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and indeed seems, to judge from his confident and confidential tone, to have been favoured with some kind of vision himself. He said that it might be some consolation to the Catholics of Germany to think that the fate of Julian the Apostate was not unlikely to befall Prince Bismarck. We should hardly have thought it likely a priori that the Imperial Chancellor would meet his death on the battle-field, but stranger things have happened, and if Sir Charles Clifford has received a supernatural intimation to that effect, there is clearly no more to be said.

The next two speakers bring us back to the region of mere vapoury platitudes, and then comes Archbishop Manning's closing discourse, which has already been referred to. We need not return to his lucubrations on "go-carts" and on the fiery zeal of the Catholic laity. The sting of his speech really lay in the tail, where he introduced a bitter and purely gratuitous attack on the Old Catholic movement in Bavaria, the origin of which he absurdly attributed to the machinations of different Governments, but with which Prince Bismarck has no connexion, and probably no particular sympathy; and this was followed by an alarming picture of the secret conspiracies of Freemasonry, which seem to occupy in the Archbishop's mind much the same place as the plots of the Jesuits in Mr. Whalley's. When he spoke of the Order having kept alive the Catholic faith in England in unbroken continuity through a long course of persecution, he touched a chord which was sure to vibrate in the hearts of many of his hearers. It is very natural that the old Catholic gentry of England should be sincerely attached to the Jesuits, with whose labours and sufferings their fathers were so intimately allied during the period of the penal laws, and from whom so many of them have, in later days, received their education at Stonyhurst. It is indeed pretty clear that they did much to draw the penal laws on themselves originally by their political intrigues and their pertinacious maintenance of the deposing power at a time when the doctrine had a very practical significance. But for a long while past the English Jesuits have been both respected and respectable, and nobody in this country worth counting would desire to enforce against them the proscription which still stands in the letter of the Statute Book. Nor have the extravagant doctrines of their Roman and Rhenish colleagues, so far as we are aware, found any echo in the literature of Stonyhurst and St. Beuno's. In some respects they are disposed to take a more liberal line than the majority of their Catholic fellow-countrymen, at least among the clergy. It is the tendency of toleration to beget tolerance, and perhaps the Italian and German Governments might do well to profit by the experience of England. Meanwhile, if the "Catholic Union of Great Britain" could persuade their "persecuted" clients on the Continent to behave more like the Jesuits who are not persecuted here, they would do more to secure the officers of their Church from "insult and spoliation" than all the frothy platitudes of Mr. Allies' and Monsignor Capel's oratory can be expected to accomplish.

POLO.

IT is satisfactory to know that the officers of our "crack" regiments are keeping up their spirits as well as can be expected under the abolition of purchase and the prospect of a scientific army. When it was rumoured a short time since that the Life Guards had taken to Polo, it was feared by the uninitiated that it might be perhaps some wild kind of dissipation to which the good fellows had been driven by the cutting reforms of Mr. Cardwell and his relentless Controller. Mammals grew anxious, and many a tender heart in Mayfair and Belgravia throbbed with terror or pity at the thought of the possible effects of Polo on dear Algernon or Sidney. The mystery is unveiled at last. Everybody knows now what Polo is, and nothing could be more innocent or satisfactory. Polo is simply a game at ball played on of horseback; it is, in fact, equestrian hockey; and a number of officers of the Blues and 9th Lancers have played it in Windsor Park in the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales and a distinguished company. Polo may be considered to be fairly launched as a fashionable sport under the most favourable auspices, and it remains to be seen whether it will succeed in establishing itself as a familiar and popular amusement. The ordinary hockey is a vulgar cross between cricket and football; but of course it is lifted out of the category of common games when played on horseback; and on Tuesday it was altogether a glorified affair, with a Princess looking on, a squadron of mail-clad troopers to keep the ground, and a trumpeter in cloth of gold to sound the charge. There were six champions on each side, attired in a uniform devised for the occasion—short cords, riding gaiters, jerseys, and caps. The two parties were distinguished by different colours. The combatants were armed with long hockey clubs with straight hooks, and were mounted on stout serviceable ponies, whose forelegs were swathed in bandages, after the fashion of champion cricketers, to save them from rude blows. The object of the game, as of hockey and football, is to keep the ball away from your opponent's base and to drive it towards your own, and it may easily be imagined that the encounter is full of excitement for the spectators as well as for those who take part in it. The charges of horsemen after the ball, now rushing together in a dense cluster, now breaking loose, wheeling, and scattering, the rattle of sticks and plunging of ponies, the racing, chasing, and collisions, the varying chances and stirring incidents of the sport, give it a highly picturesque and animated character. Those who have gone into the archæology of the game have thought it necessary to remind us that it is of ancient Persian extraction, and figures in the Arabian Nights, wherein we read of a bat devised by the great physician Dombai for the Sultan, with a hollow handle containing drugs, by which the Sultan was supposed to be benefited when he played on horseback at his favourite pastime. The Polo of the guardsmen is not, however, an antiquarian revival, but simply an imitation of the game still played in India. Eton was largely represented among the spectators at Windsor, and it is not improbable that paterfamilias will be overwhelmed with petitions for ponies for the new game. It is certainly excellent sport, but there are several reasons why it must necessarily be confined to a limited circle. It can be played properly only by expert horsemen, with horses or ponies more or less trained to their work; and it may not always be easy to find a piece of ground suitable for the exercise. One of the combatants the other day had his head broken, and it was observed that before the game was over several of the ponies had begun to limp. A rider who would willingly run the risk of a few hard knocks for himself might not be able to afford the luxury of having a good pony lamed or marked.

The exclusiveness of Polo will perhaps be one of its chief recommendations in the eyes of those who have just adopted it. Every one must be glad to hear that the upper classes have discovered something new to relieve the laborious tedium of existence, and, above all, something which they have every prospect of being able to keep to themselves. It is impossible to observe without profound compassion the ceaseless and tantalizing struggle of fashionable society to provide itself with amusements and occupations which shall not at once be appropriated by the aspiring lower orders. The Parks are becoming as common as the streets. The Row swarms with cheap hacks, and the Ride is blocked with spring-carts and broughams by the hour. Mr. Vernon Harcourt's Hansom looms in the future. The anybodies and everybodies are having it all their own way, and the poor somebodies do not know where to turn. The Sunday walk by the Serpentine has long been given up. The Zoo is mobbed. It is true there is a Sunday lounge for privileged persons at the Albert Hall, with sacred music on the organ, but there is no saying how long this will last. Everybody goes to Lord's when the schools play their match, and tries to fancy that he or she has a boy at Eton or Harrow, while somebody again is squeezed into a corner. Ascot is only another Derby, and even the select repose of Goodwood is threatened. Pigeon-shooting may touch the top of the tree at one end, but it sinks with rapid descent to the Junior Gun Club and the Claimant. Polo, however, promises to be a sport of high life; and Polo clubs may be expected to flourish. Once or twice a year perhaps there will be a great Polo tournament, at which the most distinguished cavaliers will contend for the championship. Tilting and the Quintain may come back again. If hockey can be ennobled by being mounted on horseback, the same process may be applied to other games.

Croquet is only hockey refined and elaborated, and croquet à cheval might be invented to match hockey on horseback. We can readily believe that our Polo players have not yet acquired the lightness, grace, and exquisite ease and precision of movement which characterize Eastern cavaliers; but it may be expected that they will improve by practice, and gracefulness would surely not be wanting if the ladies took up the game.

It is possible that when Mr. Disraeli writes his next novel he will have to describe as the fashionable pastime of the period another tournament of a more genuine and respectable kind than the tournament of doves. It may be true that pigeon-shooting makes a man a good shot, but it is at the best an effeminate and contemptible amusement. Polo has at least the recommendation of being a manly sport. It is a healthy and invigorating exercise; it requires skill, dash, and nerve, and it develops all the qualities of a thorough horseman. Apart from the fun of the thing, it is easy to imagine how a man might be better, morally as well as physically, for a game at Polo, which braces the muscles, trains the eye, the hand, the limbs, and has just that spice of personal risk, if not exactly of danger, which steadies the nerves and exercises those qualities which are supposed to be summed up in manliness. A man who is not on the alert at Polo may fetch a cropper, or get an awkward crack on the crown to warn him to have his wits about him next time; but at pigeon-shooting, if a man maims his bird, he only loses his money, and it is his poor victim that pays the penalty. Any sneak or poltroon might shine in pigeon-shooting, but sport like Polo tends to develop pluck and virile qualities. It is conceivable that when the intelligence of fox-hunters is more matured, they will have their eyes opened to the absurdity of gentlemen paying handsomely for a breed of vermin, and getting themselves up gorgeously in pink coats and top-boots, and mounting costly steeds in order to pursue a wretched little creature in a state of abject terror. The answer of course is that it is the excitement of the chase, and not the fox, which is the object of hunting; but it is conceivable that by a little exercise of the imagination the vermin might be dispensed with, and some more worthy object substituted. Polo is capable of modifications which would render it quite as exciting as the chase, and more exciting than the fantastic exhibition of stunted lads on skeleton steeds, with no stay or stamina in them, which is the chief feature of modern racing. In the present condition of the Turf it is not perhaps surprising that gentlemen jockeys should not be particularly admirable as a class; but gentlemen could have no hesitation in engaging in contests conducted in the same manner as Polo. It is tolerably apparent that the system of racing now in vogue does not supply the country with the kind of horses most required—good weight-carrying cobs, not only stout, but alert and speedy. Polo is perhaps only adapted for ponies, but some form of it might be devised suitable for horses, and there can be little doubt that this would tend to improve the breed, and to develop those substantial qualities of the want of which we hear such general complaints. We do not suppose that Polo, if it ever becomes popular, which is still doubtful, will regenerate the country, but some good results may possibly be hoped for from it, and we are at any rate glad to welcome anything as a change from the debasement of the Turf and the soppy butchery of Hurlingham.

THE HERTFORD COLLECTION AT BETHNAL GREEN.

WHAT the French school of painting is, as we stated in a former article, the strength of the Hertford Gallery will appear from the following enumeration of the chief masters present. Among the painters of last century Greuze is represented by 22 works, Watteau by 11, Boucher by 11, Lancret by 9, Fragonard by 5. The history of the school is brought down to the present day by numerous examples of the most renowned masters. Thus there are 36 works by Horace Vernet, 13 by Bellangé, 4 by Pils, 13 by Delaroche, 5 by Ary Scheffer, 2 by Delacroix, 2 by Robert-Fleury, 3 by Géricault, 6 by Prud'hon, 12 by Roqueplan, 31 by Decamps, 15 by Meissonier. Never before has there been seen in this country—not even in the International Exhibition of 1862—so rich and profuse a display of that school, which for talent, versatility, and training has been rightly considered the foremost in Europe. Within the limits at our command we can attempt only a rapid survey of the wide field thus abundantly stored.

How in France the arts change with the rise and fall of dynasties receives abundant illustration in the Hertford Collection. First come pictures by Watteau, Greuze, Boucher, and others, which reflect the corrupt Court manners of the time of Louis XIV. and his successors. The subjects which Watteau painted are about on a par with the themes on which contemporary poets of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries wrote. The following are fair specimens of Watteau's pleasing fancy:—"Music Party" (377), "Picnic Party" (398), "Sentimental Promenade" (422), "A Loving Conversation" (434). The painter's graceful forms, frivolous motives, and facile playful touch are too well known to need description. The eleven examples before us exhaust his limited resources; and it may especially be noted with how much taste costume figures are disposed in landscapes; he is famous for picnics and garden parties. "Gilles and his Family" (452) may serve to illustrate the oft-repeated remark that when art is at its lowest ebb, portraiture still retains its hold upon nature. Even among the twenty-two pictures by Greuze, some few taken direct from life are not wanting in simplicity and sincerity. Yet most of them, such as "Nymph Sacrificing to Cupid" (380), "Head of a Bacchant" (385), "Girl with Doves" (427), "A Magdalen" (423), and "Cupid" (451), exemplify the artist's refined, but affected, mannerism. These types show an insipid sameness; the faces have jewelled eyes, cherry mouths, rosy cheeks; the display of flesh is layish, while the intellect scarcely escapes idiocy. To redeem a reputation in danger of being lost, it may be well to call to mind pictures in the Louvre, such as the "Girl with the Broken Pitcher," and "Male-diction paternelle." Boucher, it will readily be understood, sins more flagrantly than Greuze; the eleven works now at Bethnal Green prove the degeneracy of French taste, the debauchery of talent. "The Shepherd's Pipe" (387) and "A Shepherdess's Toilet" (388) are about on a par with paperhangings found in French taverns. Yet Boucher was a man of extraordinary power and of exceptional fortune; he was the principal painter to Louis XV.; he was Director of the French Academy about the time when Reynolds was President of the newly-formed English Academy. The works of the two painters are hanging on the same wall. The principles inculcated by Reynolds are enduring; the practice of Boucher necessarily led to overthrow; and the reigning dynasty shared the fate of the art that it fostered.

The Hertford pictures have no historic links with the Revolution of 1789; the famous painter David, who at one moment was a creature of Robespierre, finds no place on the walls. Among the numerous pupils of David almost the only artist of note present is Baron Gros, a time-server and changeling, here seen in the poor and weak portrait of "Napoleon Bonaparte" (512). The school engendered by the Revolution bore seeds of rapid decay; the art of David and of his palsied, spasmodic disciples was overthrown when Géricault exhibited in 1819 "The Wreck of the Medusa," the grandest picture of the French school now in the Louvre. The examples now exhibited of this great painter are unimportant. "Sketch of a Horse" (528) is a faithful study, and "A Cavalry Skirmish" (535) has fire and action; the one shows the return to nature, the other is impelled by that life and passion which characterized the "romantic school." Leopold Robert, once a student under David, deserted to the opposite camp. "Death of the Brigand" (508) is a work to hurl defiance at the "classicists." This study, admirably painted, is terribly grand, tragic as the artist's own death. Robert threw himself ardently into Italian life; banditti were to him congenial themes as to Salvator Rosa; but the stress of work was more than his mind could bear, and he died by his own hand in front of his easel. French art now rushes into tragedy, and sometimes the painter shares the fate of his characters. Delaroche, here seen by thirteen works, has been called painter-extraordinary to the decapitated monarchs of Europe; and Decamps, whose matchless powers are attested by thirty-one drawings and pictures, may be said to have sealed his art with his blood; riding, as his pleasure was, in the Forest of Fontainebleau, he was dashed against a tree and killed.

The art of Ary Scheffer, as here seen by some characteristic examples, comes as a pale and placid moonlight when thunder-clouds hang about the horizon. Decamps was fantastic and passionate (see the "Witches' Cauldron," 527). Delaroche painted the dark side of the drama of history (see the "Last Sickness of Cardinal Mazarin," 483, and the "Two Princes in the Tower," 520). Delacroix rejoiced in riot and massacre, and his colour was hot as blood (see "The Death of Marino Faliero," 371). Horace Vernet, himself a soldier, was in his art the man of action and adventure; his eye was shrewd, his hand resolute and firm, his pencil keen as a sword-thrust (see "The Arab Tale-teller," 335; "Lion Hunting," 505; "Review by Bonaparte, First Consul," 348). While the world of art was in this hot turmoil, Ary Scheffer possessed his soul in quietude; his pictures hold themselves aloof from actual life—they are as thoughts, memories, unsubstantial shadows (see "Francesca da Rimini," 366, and "Margaret at the Fountain," 367). To the artists above named must be added M. Robert-Fleury, present in a master-work, "Charles V. at the Monastery of St. Just" (336). The fame long enjoyed by this painter here stands justified; the work is quiet, thoughtful, sustained in dignity throughout as an historic composition should be. We are sorry to say that not a single specimen can be found of either Ingres or Flandrin. On the whole, however, there are here abundant materials for the history of what may be termed the Orleans epoch in art, a period which had not been equalled during three centuries for talent in the artists, and for the nobility and brilliance of the works achieved.

This unrivalled collection will enable Englishmen to understand what our neighbours mean by the boast that French landscape-painting is the first in the world. At all events it will be seen that the aims of the French and of the English schools are widely different. M. Rousseau, who in the last Paris International Exhibition was the only landscape-painter deemed worthy of the grand medal, is here represented by the most brilliant work we remember to have seen from his easel. "Landscape, with Cattle Drinking" (353), is a more consummate product than the best English landscape of the year, Mr. Vicat Cole's "Noon," now in our Royal Academy; for it is bolder and broader in generalization, braver in surrender of detail to the governing thought, more absolute in its unity of line, light, and colour. Thus the picture comes upon the mind with the force of strong conception and conviction. Alike in persuasive power are landscapes by Decamps, Ziem, Marillat, and Corot. With the exception of M. Corot, who as usual shows himself shadowy and silvery in "Macbeth and Banquo meeting the Witches" (356), these four painters exemplify what may be termed the Orientalism of French art; a love of romance, a rapture of colour, not only enter into the painting of the period, but equally pervade decorative designs and art manufactures.

The Second Empire, which witnessed, and in some degree accelerated, the decline of French art, is represented by fifteen pictures of M. Meissonier and by two of M. Gérôme; but, strange to say, M. Cabanel, who may be considered in his pleasure-seeking art the impersonation of Parisian Imperialism, is nowhere present. M. Meissonier, who is supposed to have been engaged by Napoleon III. to paint the victories of the French in the German campaign, is not quite the man to succeed Horace Vernet, the great battle-painter of the Orleanists. Vernet took a telescopic view of war, and demanded a large acreage of canvas; Meissonier, on the contrary, injects a regiment with a microscope, and a few inches suffice him for military manoeuvres. Yet "Napoleon I. and Staff" (546) is a marvel in its way. The money value set upon the two screens whereon the exquisite gems of this master are concentrated is fabulous. Mr. Ruskin showed at the Royal Institution a diminutive portrait of Napoleon I. on horseback, for which he was said to have paid 1,000*l.* Several among the fifteen examples in the Hertford Collection must be worth much more. As to the art merits of Meissonier, measured by the highest standards, opinions may differ. To us it would seem that in this master is united for the first time the consummate technique of the Dutch masters with the esprit which exclusively belongs to the French school. Mr. Ruskin, on the other hand, speaks of Meissonier's work as "realistic art of the lower school, but consummate of its kind; showing the relation of the disturbed and dramatic manner of modern art to the disquietude of national character."

The miniatures, 182 in number, have, like the pictures, not only an art value but a political significance. Of Napoleon I. there are thirteen portraits from the time of the Consulate to the Empire; five are by J. B. Isabey, "peintre du cabinet de l'empereur," &c. Madame de Mirbel, who as Court miniature-painter to Louis XVIII. was pledged to the opposite dynasty, will be favourably judged by "The Duchess de Berri" (1689). The English miniatures are unimportant; "Oliver Cromwell" (1699) would seem to be a poor copy after Cooper; "Mrs. Fitzherbert" (1722) is a lovely example of Cosway, R.A. A large percentage of these miniatures, like the oil-paintings of the last century, owe their attraction not so much to their art merit as to the lavish display of female charms. More than fifty are of ladies without a name, some of whom, such as "A Lady as Cleopatra" (1652), are semi-nude, rejoicing, as one of the crowd observed, in a costume eminently suited to the sultry weather.

The snuffboxes, more than a hundred in number, might tell many pleasant personal anecdotes could they narrate their history. In this costly collection wood naturally gives place to more precious materials; gold, jewels, and enamels contribute to a fine fantasy of ornament. Once more snuffboxes here afford a pretty sphere for decorative play; the art employed is essentially an art of luxury, not severe in treatment, but free as a "capriccio."

The Bethnal Green Museum is not only hung with pictures as a Gallery, but furnished as a palace with bronzes, majolicas, Sèvres china, Boule tables, &c. On the ground-floor are conspicuous the bust of Charles IX. (1379), a French bronze of the sixteenth century; also the bust of Louis XIV., a century later (1393). It is strange that the authors of such fine bronzes should be unknown. The art of working in metal for which the French are famed is brought down to the last century by grand candelabra of Gouthiere (1061, 1062). Also to the same period belongs "Statuette, a female Satyr supporting a candelabrum" (1337), the work of Clodion. The names of these two famous artists at once vouch for art excellence. The Italian bronzes, like the French, range from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century; the subjects, as was the custom, are mostly taken from the antique. Works dating back to classic times are wanting in this as in other departments. But the products from the time of the Cinque Cento in Italy and from the period of Francis I. in France are sufficiently choice to serve as models for our English artists and art-workmen.

Furniture—restricting the term to chairs, tables, cabinets, and such like—corresponds in date and nationality with the bronzes. The collection is partly Italian, but principally French; the epoch extends from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century. Fine examples of Italian wood-carving from the sixteenth century are worthy of note; the practice of wood-carving survives in Italy to the present day, and it is always instructive to trace the origin of a national art. Special attention is directed to a "Bureau" (1163), a choice example of marquetry heightened by ormolu; this masterpiece was executed by Riesener for Stanislaus, King of Poland. The art student will not fail to observe with how much knowledge, taste, and skill the French have been accustomed over long periods to decorate furniture with tapestry, porcelain, metal, and tortoiseshell. Beauvais tapestry lends itself gracefully to the delicate woodwork of sofas and chairs (1137, 1136). Many are the examples of the decorative use of porcelain plaques in cabinet-work; one of the best for painting and for play of colour is "Cabinet, Amboyna Wood and Gilt Metal, with Plaques of Sèvres Porcelain, Eighteenth Century" (1113). Of "Old Boule" and "New Boule" the collection is almost unexampled. This compound of tortoiseshell and brass, if brilliant, is apt to be blatant; but though the French in domestic and decorative art may occasionally run into violence and vagaries, yet their special genius for furniture is undoubted. And the examples before us prove that the styles of Louis Quatorze and Louis Quinze, if lawless and capricious, admit of facile and pleasing adaptation to domestic uses. The workmanship too is little short of perfect.

"Porcelain," "majolica," and other earthenware are represented by nearly 400 specimens. The historic rise of majolica may be traced in two dishes, "South Spanish, Fifteenth Century" (1463, 1466). A century later a fine case of Gubbio ware shows how the Italians borrowed and adapted the lustre-glass from the Moors. In ceramics the strength of the collection is again on the side of the French; for instance, the number of specimens of Sèvres porcelain is little short of 500, and this does not include plaques inserted in furniture. The porcelain, like the bronzes and the furniture, stops short of the present day; it belongs to the eighteenth century, when the manufacture at Sèvres was at its prime; the colours include, almost as a matter of course, turquoise blue, bleu du roi, rose du Barry, &c. But an hour's examination of the objects themselves will tell more than a volume of description. In conclusion, we have only to say that any person who may wish to know what France has done in the way of art for nearly three hundred years must study the collections which Sir Richard Wallace has generously thrown open to the public.

REVIEWS.

MISS STRICKLAND'S LAST STUART PRINCESSES.*

WE conceive that Miss Strickland has at last come to an end. At any rate she must have come to an end in the matter of Princesses. We cannot conceive that she would stoop to write the Life of any Queen or Princess of the illustrious House of Hanover. Moreover, we have a dim notion that they have been done by somebody else. Was it not Dr. Doran, and did we not liken him to Publius Clodius for thrusting himself into a department of which Miss Strickland had so eminently made herself the Bona Dea? Or was it Mrs. Matthew Hall, who certainly did—and did for—the Queens (we should call them the Ladies) at the other end, before Miss Strickland began? Anyhow the present book has a kind of ring about it as if it were a wind-up. The subject of it is "the last Four Princesses," and the life—not a very long or important one—of the last of the four has, we are assured, never been written before. There would seem to be nothing left for Miss Strickland, unless her occasional strays out of the Queen and Princess line—dealings, for instance, with the Seven Bishops and the Bachelor Kings—are to go on. But the class represented by William III. was not large, and Miss Strickland cannot be expected to come down to Hanoverian Bishops any more than to Hanoverian Princesses. With the Bachelor Kings we are sorry to say that we have no acquaintance; we are really sorry, as we have always wished to know what Miss Strickland—or indeed any other lady—would make of the great pattern of the class. The Seven Bishops we remember very well, especially the fine subject for meriment supplied by Sir Jonathan Trelawney being at once a Baronet and a Bishop. When we think of the never-falling store of jokes which Miss Strickland drew out of a source seemingly so barren, we fear that her power of being brightly on small matters has forsaken her in the present volume. One of her heroines was wife and mother to two men who united dignities which were certainly much less in harmony than those of Bishop and Baronet. Surely for a man to be at once an hereditary sovereign and the elective magistrate of a commonwealth is more incongruous than for a baronet, if he has once taken holy orders, to obtain a bishopric. Yet this was the position of the husband and the son of Miss Strickland's first Princess. Each William, father and son, was Prince of Orange and Stadtholder of Holland. The second moreover, unpleasant as the fact may be to Miss Strickland, became King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland. Yet we do not think that Miss Strickland gets even one laugh out of this union of incongruous offices. But, if she does not laugh, she does something far more cruel. She turns the Deliverer into a Frenchman. The principality of Orange, the old Imperial fief, the surviving fragment of free Burgundy which lived on hemmed in between the Pope of Rome and the King of Paris, becomes in Miss Strickland's hands William's "French principality."

In fact, to speak the plain truth, Miss Strickland is getting a little dull. There used to be something, if not particularly wise, yet at any rate not a little amusing, in her eager partisanship, in the way in which the Stuart cause was everywhere taken for granted. None of its enemies—Roundhead, Orange, or Hanoverian—could be spoken of in the most casual way without a sneer or a rap of some kind. Miss Strickland has not yet quite left off this habit; but her blows have lost a good deal in vigour and liveliness. Even in the life of the last Stuart Princess there is much less of this than there used to be, and in the others there is much less still. We do not mean that Miss Strickland has changed her views or her feelings; we do not mean that she loves either Oliver Cromwell or King William any better than she used to do. All that we mean is that, though the leak falls, according to anybody else's reckoning, pretty often and pretty hard, it falls less often and less hard than it used to fall. Perhaps Miss Strickland is tired; at all events she fails to do herself justice. For we are far from looking on her lapse into comparative moderation as any improvement. The life of her books lay in their partiality; the more outrageous the partiality was the better, because it at least made the story lively and amusing. The whole thing was personal; we were not listening to things as they happened, but as, through the particular light of Miss Strickland's partiality, they seemed to have happened. If Miss Strickland should ever become impartial, really capable of weighing the two opposite sides of a story, we fear that the consequences would be very sad for her readers. The whole life of her fashion of writing would be gone; a good deal of the life of it is gone already. The small details of the life of a princess, the petty Court ceremonies, the petty female questions and jealousies, are not in themselves very interesting or instructive. To give them any life, they need to be turned to an object of some kind. They may be turned to an antiquarian object, and be made to take their part, such as it is, in the history of the time. Or they may be turned to a partisan object, and thereby made, if not instructive, at least amusing. This last standard Miss Strickland has hitherto reached with great success; she is now beginning to fall off. Two of the Lives in this volume are lives of women of some historical importance, those of Charles the First's daughters, Mary the mother of William the Third, and the better known Henrietta, Madame of France. Henrietta, as every one knows, played a prominent part in well known affairs. And Mary is of still more importance, because people do not commonly remember how near her son William was to the English Royal Family, and how very slight, even according to hereditary notions, was the breach which was actually made in the line of hereditary succession. Her position too, deprived both of her father and her husband, and her early death, leaving her renowned son still a child, all make her an object of real personal interest. But Miss Strickland does not succeed so well with these really historic women as when she comes to the ground which is all her own, the life which has never been written before, the life of a girl about whom there is absolutely nothing to say, the daughter of James the Second, born in his banishment. Louise Mary Stuart did nothing of the slightest importance, but her birth and circumstances almost oblige Miss Strickland to fall back upon something of her own vein, and this last life is several degrees more lively than the other three.

The other three lives are those of the three daughters of Charles the First. It is pleasing to learn that that prince, "whose pleasures were naturally of a domestic character, occasionally amused himself by measuring the height of his children." The practice is not uncommon among parents of lower degree, though it is not everybody who, like his Most Sacred Majesty, can "cause the progressive inches each child attains year by year to be registered in silver." This measuring business went on "till more important events interrupted these trivial records of paternal affection." We are not told whether they were carried on at a later time by conjugal affection, for a bride who was married at the age of ten most likely grew somewhat after her marriage. The contingency seems at least to have been fully provided for: for two years after her marriage, in one of her letters still kept in the Bodleian, she says that "her gown does very well; but her Pett"—spelling, capital, and italics are all from Miss Strickland, who kindly explains "Pett" to mean petticoat—is not, as we might have looked for, too short, but "a little too long." "The over ones," it is added, "does serve me well anoth"; but Miss Strickland is satisfied with writing "over" in italics, without telling us what it means. This was in 1643. The child had been married in 1641 to William, son of Frederick Henry, Prince of Orange, after a marriage between her and "the heir of Spain" had been "long deceptively negotiated." The young prince came over to England, and the "arrangements for the celebration of his marriage to his juvenile bride"—Miss Strickland is plainly of the sect which thinks that juventis means a little child—"were carrying on"—we are here thankful for a piece of real English—"at the melancholy period of the trial of the unfortunate Earl of Strafford." It was only a week after the marriage that "that tragedy was consummated," and we are told that "the King suffered intensely at having been compelled to act against the dictates of his conscience in signing the death-warrant of his faithful servant." If we rightly remember, we have had a good deal of trouble both with Mr. Froude and Mr. Hepworth Dixon as to the matter of Bills of Attainder, and now here is Miss Strickland. When will people understand that what Charles did was, not to "sign a death-warrant," but to sign a commission to certain lords to give the royal assent to an Act of Parliament?

The story of the birth of the Deliverer, the single child of his widowed mother, is in every way touching, if only it were told in some other language than that which speaks of "a premature accouchement in a donut bed." At three years old William had already become a political personage, and was greeted by what Miss Strickland calls "Loyal Riots of Dutch Boys"; that is to say, the boys broke the windows of De Witt and others of his side in politics. About the same time we hear a good deal about "Mrs. Hyde," afterwards Duchess of York, and mother of two Queens regnant, and it is something to hear from an eye-witness that "she looked very handsome as a shepherdess." We hear also of "a white parrot, with a red neck and tail, to which the Princess was much attached, and often gave up hunting parties because it could not accompany her." We are somewhat in the dark whether the parrot had been anyhow trained to perform the functions which were more commonly assigned to falcons. Her niece, Louise Mary, "in hot pursuit of a hare," was thrown from her horse and much bruised, but "as soon as she could get breath to speak, she cried out, 'Is the hare taken?'" At another time we read how "she enjoyed the chase with all her heart, and was in at the death of the stag." One cannot forget that this is the daughter of the prince who equally "enjoyed" being "in at" the booting or thumbcrewing of a Covenanter; and it is worth noting that her equerry was "a little surprised that her jubilee had not given her a diadem to the sport," and that her brother the Pretender "requested that she would never attempt to follow the chase on horseback again, saying it was not proper for ladies to do so."

There is not much more than this to say about Louise Mary, the "princess" whose life has never before been written; only Miss Strickland does not fail to compare, as it is doubtless quite fair in her to do, "the pure and unalloyed affection which united" her and her brother with "the jealousy and angry passions which inflamed the sisters, Mary and Anne, against each other." But we must demur when we hear that the time when this inflammation took place was "when they had succeeded in dethroning their father, and supplanting their brother, in the regal succession." We had always thought that it was the Convention of Lords and Commons, and not the sisters Mary and Anne, who succeeded in doing all this. Nor is there much to say about Louise's other aunt, Elizabeth, daughter of Charles the First. But her short life supplies some materials for sneering at the Parliament, and also for a characteristic bit of reasoning on Miss Strickland's part. Elizabeth and her brother Henry Duke of Gloucester were kept in Carisbrook Castle, where Elizabeth died. "It has been stated," Miss Strickland tells us, but without giving her authority, "that her death was caused by a cold, caught in consequence of a heavy shower of rain falling, while she and her young brother were out on the bowling-green, the Monday after their arrival at Carisbrook Castle." On this fact, or alleged fact, Miss Strickland comments in "the high priori" line.

It is possible they might have visited this spot in consequence of having been told that it was one of the accustomed haunts of their royal father, who was fond of the exercise of bowls; but that either of the sorrowful orphans should have engaged in that, or any other pastime, so immediately after their introduction into the ill-omened place of his woful incarceration, is to the last degree improbable. Indeed, the feeble and debilitated state of Elizabeth's health would have rendered her entering into a vigorous and active sport impossible, even if her profound melancholy would have permitted her to wish it.

Having thus got rid of the evidence, whatever may be its worth, for the alleged game at bowls, Miss Strickland argues that among the causes of Elizabeth's death was that "she had evidently suffered from want of air and exercise, the deprivation from the lively sports of childhood." It is certainly easy to write history, if we may first pick and choose our facts at pleasure, and then go on to infer fresh facts from those which we pick and choose.

We have no space left for Miss Strickland's fourth, or rather third, life, that of the best known of the ladies concerned, Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans. Miss Strickland takes the more favourable view of her character. The picture of her husband is certainly not amiable. At one time, to be sure, "he was exigant for her return," and at another her behaviour "mightily delicised his manners." But can we believe that Charles the Second told his sister that "she must, when her mission was accomplished, return to her connubial misery, and endeavour to make the best of her hard lot"? The words are put within inverted commas, but they have not to our ears at all the genuine ring of a real speech of the Merry Monarch.

PORTER ON THE HUMAN INTELLECT.*

OUR American cousins are making rapid advances upon us. They have taken to the study of philosophy with a will, and if we do not beware there will be some danger of their getting ahead of us. Hitherto, indeed, they have been appreciative and receptive rather than productive both in general literature and in metaphysics. They have not given to the world a second Jonathan Edwards. But of late they have been working assiduously in the higher walks of speculation as well as in the comparatively lower sphere of psychology. Their translations from the German have been voluminous and systematic. They have a speculative journal, published at St. Louis, which is almost wholly devoted to Kant, Fichte, Schelling, Hegel, and other later Germans. The elegance of the translations is not to be always admired, but there can be no doubt of the sympathy and the industry. Proclus and Plotinus interest them equally with Leibnitz and Cousin. Yet in all this America is merely receptive. It has not, either in philosophy or theology, done anything original to boast of. Its theology is represented by the Princeton divines, admirably solid and substantial thinkers, yet only plodders. Its highest speculation is exemplified in Emerson, of all men the most unsystematic, who pieces together various thoughts of other thinkers, but gives no connected explanation of anything. In logic and psychology, as in literature, America has been content to follow the lead of British and German writers. In the special circumstances and conditions of a young country which has a civilisation two thousand years old at its back, it is natural that the receptive phase should come first. It has not had to make a literature of its own in order to possess one. It has had everything ready to its hand. We need not therefore be surprised if it first of all seeks to assimilate the stores lying prepared before going on to gather fresh ones for itself.

In the history of American intellectual development, however, the productive phase was sure to come. We do not say that Dr. Porter has opened that epoch for his countrymen. Excellent as his new work in psychology is, it is mainly critical. But it is critical from an individual standpoint. As such, therefore, it stands midway, as it were, between the appreciative or receptive and the productive phases, partaking, to some degree of each. Yet the first impression of the book on the reader is not favourable. Much of the early introductory matter rather reminds him of the schoolboy's essay than betokens the accomplished psychologist. The book is divided into paragraphs printed in larger and smaller type, the former containing the more exoteric and the latter the more abstruse matter. But not a few of the "abstruse" paragraphs are rhetorical more than scientific or philosophical. As we proceed this failing grows less prominent. The author has brought great industry to his task. If genius be, as Mr. Carlyle defines it, the capacity for taking trouble, we should almost say Dr. Porter is a genius. He is intimately familiar with the ground over which he takes us. He has evidently investigated for himself, and not taken his opinions merely from books. The field he traverses is a wide one, and there are ample stores in it garnered by previous labourers which it is essential to any fresh inquirer to know. Dr. Porter has this qualification, and—what is more rare with metaphysicians—he is also able to express his thoughts in a clear and terse style. On the whole his work is well done, and whoever makes the contents of it his own will have attained a competent knowledge of what has been accomplished by the psychologists.

The first question that meets us in facing such inquiries is the preliminary one whether there is a science of psychology at all. In other sciences we are not tempted to put that question. They vindicate their value by their results. Their progress may be traced from generation to generation, and from century to century. The foundations once laid are laid for ever, and successive inquirers go on building upon them and extending the range of discovery. With psychology it has been different. There is no body of ascertained facts and laws universally admitted. Most of its "facts" have been and will still be more or less questioned or denied. Where then are the elements to compose a science of psychology? seeing that such studies have occupied the minds of men for thousands of years and there is hardly any appreciable progress made. This objection faces every student of mental philosophy, and every writer who deals with such subjects endeavours to meet it. Dr. Porter does so, and with considerable acuteness, if not with perfect success. He shows that there are the materials for a science of psychology in the phenomena of mind which may be observed and classified after the usual inductive method, that it is impossible to avoid dealing with its difficulties and problems, that the results are, indirectly at least, of great benefit and utility, and that the matters with which it deals are so wrapped up with other sciences that in rejecting the one we deprive ourselves of much that is requisite for the others. But suppose all this to be so, it does not meet the objection urged. The fact remains that psychology as a science of the soul or the mind has not been established. The readiest practical test whether it has or not is to inquire if Dr. Porter has succeeded in establishing it. Like he in the work before us given to the world a science of the human intellect? Has he fixed the conditions under which we have certain knowledge of mental phenomena? Has he exhibited the fundamental principles that must henceforth be accepted as valid?

We fear that the answers to these questions cannot be satisfactory. Dr. Porter is another of the multitudinous band of psychological inquirers and theorisers. He has indeed supplied a useful sketch of the leading opinions of previous thinkers in regard to psychology. To some degree this may be claimed as a department of science. The history of psychological investigations, and of the theories they have occasioned, is a branch of historical knowledge that is capable of certainty. But beyond that everything is indefinite as hitherto. Dr. Porter, like most of his predecessors, starts with a ready-made theory as to the relations of the soul to the body. The influence of that theory is traceable in all the lines of his varied inquiries. He conceives the soul as a distinct entity, growing to maturity within the body, and employing the latter as its instrument. His conclusions are more or less affected by this and by his theological theories. Hence his book seems as if written for a purpose—rather to back up certain other views than with the simple object of ascertaining the exact truth in regard to the phenomena under examination. The distinct existence of soul and body runs as a pre-supposition throughout, modifying even unconsciously to the author all his thoughts and inferences, and exact and impartial investigation is very difficult in such circumstances.

The value of Dr. Porter's book is therefore mainly historical and expository. It is the old business over again. First, we have the introduction about the human soul and the province of psychology. Then, when the author arrives at his subject proper, we have the division of the mental powers and faculties as the avenues by which knowledge is attained. This division is fourfold—into (1) Presentative Knowledge, or the means by which the elements or materials of knowledge are brought to us through the senses; (2) Representative Knowledge; (3) Thinking and Thought Knowledge; and (4) Intentional Knowledge. Under the first, we have ample discussions of the questions associated with and springing out of sensation and perception. In the second, the powers and functions of memory and imagination are handled with acuteness and intelligence. In the third, the modes of our thinking under notions or conceptions, going on to judgments and reasoning, as illustrated by the syllogism, are elucidated. And in the last, we have interesting discussions of the fundamental principles which, according to the anti-sensational school, are involved in the structure of our minds, and are accepted as the source of necessary and universal truths—such as the law of cause and effect, and the doctrine of substance as the ground of qualities and attributes. Finally, the work is concluded by an argument designed to demonstrate the existence of an intelligent Creator of the universe, and by some not altogether satisfactory reasoning in regard to man's knowledge of the Infinite or Absolute. All this, of course, is the old familiar ground. Dr. Porter's performance in traversing it is highly respectable, but somehow at the close one feels as if it had been only a performance. There is no scientific certainty left with us. What we have had has been historical pabulum rather than scientific results—a series of expositions of the opinions of successive inquirers regarding the various problems suggested by a consideration of mental facts and laws, together with the addition of some opinions of the author's own. But we are still far off from a science of psychology with fixed and settled laws determining and governing the relations and arrangements of the phenomena of mind.

It is hardly necessary after what has been stated to say that Dr. Porter is entirely opposed to the school of thinkers who reduce mental and spiritual phenomena to mere material conditions. In concluding we will only add that neither his own analyses nor his statements of other men's views—careful and generally accurate as they are—are to be always trusted. In exemplification of defects in the first we may refer to his treatment of the copula in judgment—a matter of primary logical and metaphysical moment, in the light especially of recent German speculation—which is unsatisfactory and inadequate. Dr. Porter hardly seems aware of the importance of this subject. Yet the meaning of the copula lies at the root and must determine the bearings and value of propositions, judgments, and therefore syllogisms. Again the statement of his theory of the law of association as facility of repetition is equally defective. Association is thus resolved into mere habit. Any attractive force in the ideas themselves is denied; but it is not explained why some classes of ideas much more readily associate together than others. In the treatment also of the Infinite and Absolute we find much looseness and vagueness throughout; and in the analysis of induction the author rather indicates the conditions under which induction operates than describes the process itself. When from the fact of induction again he infers the existence of a Personal Creator, he outstrips his premises very far. Induction, or our confidence in the validity of induction, involves the expectation or belief in design, purpose, adaptation of means to ends, and therefore may carry us to the conclusion of thoughts being represented in and manifested through things. But the source and modes of the thought, its applications, exercise, and operations are not thereby disclosed, and it is a long step to argue from the orderly relations of phenomena to a Personal God. With reference to the statements of historical theories we find also occasional deficiency. Several times, for example, Dr. Porter refers to Herbart and Bencke together; but Bencke remains only a name. We have no account, but only the vaguest suggestions, of what his theories and opinions were. Being almost unknown in America and Great Britain, Bencke ought not to have been mentioned without further elucidation. Certainly also no Hegelian will accept the statements of Hegel's views as accurate. There are other expositions to which a similar remark applies.

SIR JOHN BURGOYNE.*

A BRIEF sketch of the life of Sir John Burgoyne has been written by Sir Francis Head as one of the series called "Corps Papers" of the Royal Engineers. To this necessarily brief memoir have been appended a few of the most interesting of the military memoranda of the deceased officer, but even with this addition the book possesses the unusual defect of being too small. We are promised two volumes of "Journals and Correspondence," which are certain to be highly interesting and valuable, but perhaps rather too large. The life of one of the chief worthies of the British army should be written so as to be conveniently read by soldiers on distant stations where there is much leisure and few books. The example of Sir John Burgoyne or Lord Clyde may help a young officer to support not only danger and difficulty, but what is much more trying, disappointment and neglect. It ought never to be forgotten by those who pine in inactivity and obscurity that he who in his old age delivered India from the mutiny spent the prime of his manhood in collecting Irish tithes. Colin Campbell, however, managed, in spite of years spent in irksome and inglorious service, to produce an impression, which gradually permeated from his military superiors to the public, that he was one of the most trustworthy officers in the army, having that happy mixture of bravery and prudence which has gained for his Scottish countrymen in past ages a high reputation in all European armies. His character may be summed up by saying that Balaclava, on which our Crimean army depended for its miserable subsistence, was felt to be secure while he commanded its slender garrison. Burgoyne was a man of equal stability and force of mind, with the advantage of a scientific training. He was always usefully and often gloriously employed. Having lived laboriously and honourably to the age of seventy-two years, when the Crimean war began, it was open to hasty and ignorant critics to impute the difficulties and disasters of that war to the supposed feebleness of veterans; and as Sir John Burgoyne was the oldest officer in high command, this imputation was directed particularly at him, to whom it was perhaps least applicable. Nothing can be more clear than that from the first to the last day of his serving in the Crimea he gave the best advice for the conduct of the allied armies; and if Lord Raglan had had the entire disposal of those armies, it is tolerably certain that Burgoyne's advice would have been adopted more completely than it was. Both these officers had been trained in the same school, and they were equally sensible of the importance of either not doing a thing at all or doing it with all their strength. However, Burgoyne's advice was in one important point disregarded; Sebastopol remained untaken, and our Government, in order to convince the public of its vigour, recalled Burgoyne.

Thus ended in 1855 the active service of Burgoyne. It began in 1800, when, as a lad of eighteen, he embarked with the expedition for Egypt under Abercromby. He was detached at Malta, and employed in the blockade of Valetta. Considering the limits imposed upon the author of this sketch, it is a pity that he should introduce a description of the harbour of Valetta, which has nothing to do with Burgoyne's service, and is besides objectionable as a piece of turgid verbosity. It is strange that a late captain of Engineers, addressing a scientific corps, should write about "demulunes, ravellins, counterguards," as if he were a Special Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph endeavouring to conceal his technical ignorance by sounding words. We should judge from what we see of Burgoyne's character that he must have had a particular objection to fine writing, and it is rather hard upon him, as well as upon us, that his brief memoir should be stuffed with unnecessary padding. He was employed in Egypt in 1807, and wrote thence to a brother officer a series of letters of such ability and acuteness that, on their being shown to Sir John Moore, he was thereby induced to apply for Burgoyne to be attached to his command. He accompanied this general to Sweden and to Spain. He was employed in the retreat towards Corunna. The author states that he was not present at the burial of his chief; and he implies that he was, and then states that he was not, present at the battle in which that chief was killed. If it was necessary to introduce a well-worn quotation at this point, the author should not allow poetical inaccuracy to extend itself into his own prose. Nobody supposes that Moore's grave was actually dug with bayonets; and if Burgoyne was on march for Vigo, it is bold or careless to represent, or leave the reader to suppose, that he was holding the "post of honour" at Corunna, whereas he was really holding a post of duty and undistinguished utility at or near Vigo. The truth is that Burgoyne did not see Moore or the army which fought the battle for at least sixteen days before it occurred. The roads to Corunna and Vigo divide at Astorga, and Burgoyne marched with Brigadier Craufurd on Vigo with a detachment that was never overtaken by the French. We have heard of "constructive captors," but it has been reserved for this author to invent the notion of a post of constructive honour. Returning to England after this campaign, Burgoyne was sent again almost immediately to Spain, where he served until the conclusion of the war. He was either chief or principal assistant in all those engineering operations in which the valour of the British army was much more conspicuous than its scientific attainments. Burgoyne and his colleagues did the best with the means at their command, but they were often deficient in material and always grievously embarrassed by the want of skilled labour. At the second and successful siege of Badajoz he was "director" under Colonel Fletcher, the commanding engineer, and he guided the third (Picton's) division to the assault of the castle, which was carried, while the assault on the breaches made no impression. Burgoyne's memorandum on this siege, which is given in the appendix, is more interesting than the text, which unfortunately is by turns meagre and bombastic. "The attack on the castle was made rather earlier than was intended, in consequence of the garrison being accidentally alarmed. The ladders, upwards of thirty feet long, were carried up the steep, rugged heights with great spirit under a heavy fire of musketry; the troops followed, the ladders were well placed, and the 5th, 45th, and 83rd Regiments led them up in spite of stones, live shells, &c., thrown down upon them. Some of the ladders were thrown down by the enemy, and one they pulled up into the castle; several men were precipitated from top to bottom, but others followed, and at length gained a firm footing. The whole division was then introduced, about 3,000 men, and the castle taken complete possession of."

This is Burgoyne's own style in writing of his own work, and we propose both as models for imitation by officers of his corps. The British army lost in killed and wounded in this siege nearly as many men as were contained in the French garrison. Burgoyne thought that by breaching the castle the place might have been taken more expeditiously than it was. As Burgoyne was commanding engineer at the siege of Burgos, which failed, it might have been expected that the author would have found space to explain this failure. But he does not even give any indication in his text what the result of this siege was, except by calling it "desperate," whatever that word may mean. We believe that slovenly writers on battles and sieges use it in the sense of "obstinate." However, the siege of Burgos was desperate in the same sense that the attempt to dig a grave with a bayonet would be desperate. No workman, however skilful, can hope to succeed without tools, and Burgoyne before Burgos was destitute of almost every requisite for his enterprise, as is briefly explained in the appendix. There must surely be among Burgoyne's papers some accurate record of this arduous and disappointing work, which would be worth all the author's quotations from poets, for this, among other reasons, that we have met with the quotations before, but we have never seen any account by Burgoyne of his failure before Burgos. The author's style becomes more perplexing as we proceed, for he tells us that Burgoyne was present at the "desperate" battle of Vittoria, which the British not only won in the end, but looked remarkably like winning from the outset. At the siege of St. Sebastian Burgoyne was employed under Colonel Fletcher, who was killed. The appendix contains Burgoyne's business-like memorandum on this siege, which, however, has been published before. The most remarkable omission in the memoir appears in reference to Burgoyne's service in America in 1814-15. We should like to know how it happened that with Burgoyne as C.E. such a blunder as the assault on New Orleans was perpetrated. He has told us that the assault on St. Sebastian would have failed but for an accidental explosion; and it is difficult to believe that he could have expected success at New Orleans by such measures as were adopted at that place. But if Burgoyne made a serious mistake, this surely ought to have been explained to the corps of Engineers by his biographer. To the unscientific reader the proceedings before New Orleans appear to resemble the act of a man who should pick out the hardest place in a wall and knock his head against it. But if there was a scientific aspect of this operation, we should be glad to have it explained to us. The author does not even say that the attack on the American lines was "desperate."

An application was made by Sir Thomas Picton for the assistance of Burgoyne in the campaign of 1815, but it was not granted until after the battle of Waterloo, in which Picton was killed. The spirit of routine at the Horse Guards has always been as invincible as the spirit of the British soldier before the enemy, and this was a good example of its exercise. Burgoyne had proved his great capacity for war, and it seemed likely that no available talent would be too much to oppose the rush of Napoleon and his most able marshals upon the Allies. Yet Burgoyne was sent quietly to do duty at Hull, and it so happened that almost the only serious omission in the arrangement of the British line at Waterloo occurred exactly at the point where Burgoyne would have been posted, and was exactly of the kind which Burgoyne would have remedied. The farmhouse of La Haye Sainte might have been put into a better state of defence, and might have been more strongly occupied; and as Picton's division lay immediately behind this post, it is probable that Burgoyne, if he had been with his old comrade, would have contrived some means to get that done which to an engineer must have been so obviously desirable. Burgoyne joined the army after the battle, and was employed for the next three years in France. For many years afterwards he remained at home, and he gradually acquired a reputation in civil business equal to that which he had earned in war abroad. In 1831 he was appointed Chairman of Public Works in Ireland, and thenceforward, whenever any Government wanted a man of knowledge and judgment for a difficult inquiry, Burgoyne was apt to be selected. To him belongs the credit of rousing the country to a sense of its insecurity against invasion. When this country became involved in European hostilities in 1854, the Government locked, and not in vain, to this experienced soldier for advice. Being sent to the seat of war, he successively suggested the place of landing in the Crimea, the flank march to Balaclava, and the selection of the Malakoff as the point of attack upon Sebastopol. Having invariably given the best advice under existing circumstances, he was recalled, as if our Government was fearful of getting into Sebastopol too soon. Nobody, we suppose, would now pretend that the continued presence of Burgoyne with the army would have been otherwise than useful. Headquarters could hardly have too much head. However, his ability was still sufficiently recognized at home to keep him constantly employed. His bodily and mental health were wonderfully sustained until the terrible shock of his son's death by the upsetting of the Captain prostrated him. Yet his strength of constitution supported even this severe trial for upwards of a year. He died in October last, being then in the ninetieth year of his useful and honourable life. He was Constable of the Tower, and had received many marks of his Sovereign's favour, so that the country had not to feel with regard to him, as to some others, the bitter pang of regret that while he was with us we had not loved him more. The latter part of the memoir, where the author writes from his own knowledge and feeling of affectionate respect, forms a not unworthy record of the talents and virtues which made Burgoyne one of the best of soldiers and citizens. He well says that the motto of the corps for which he writes, Que fas et gloria decuit obitus, will henceforth be concentrated into the one word "Burgoyne."

SEPTIMIUS.*

SEPTIMIUS is the last story written by Mr. Hawthorne. It is published by his daughter just as it was found amongst his manuscripts. It will, as she anticipates and as we fully agree, possess a peculiar interest for his fellow-workers in the same art from the fact that it had not received his final touches. After studying the finished performances of a great painter it is very interesting to observe his work in its earlier stages. We may fancy that we gain more insight into his methods from the rough sketch than from the picture in its full dress. That this is frequently true in pictorial, and even in literary art, we are not at all disposed to deny. Whether it is true in the case of Hawthorne seems to us to be a little doubtful. We may learn, indeed, from the imperfections and the gaps in the present story, how carefully he worked out the effects which have so singular a charm for many readers. We may learn, if we did not know it before, that admirable ease of style is the result, even in men of the most unmistakable genius, not of immediate inspiration, but of great talent combined with conscientious and patient labour. When we are piling up epithets to express our admiration of a first-rate poem or romance, we are apt to intensify the wonder by pronouncing its felicitous harmonies to have been struck out at once by the incomprehensible insight of genius. This, however, is a childish method of criticism. It is, or ought to be, a truism that every perfect piece of execution has involved much previous labour, though it may be that in some cases the actual execution has been rapid and only the previous preparation long. Hawthorne's best writing, at any rate, was anything but an improvisation. Many preliminary studies and much careful consideration of effects went to all his most brilliant work. But having learnt thus much, we confess that we do not see any further lessons to be discovered. The secret of exquisite taste is incommunicable. We can see that Septimius might have been improved by subsequent elaboration; but we do not see how it came to be so good as it is, or by what principles the author was guided in feeling his way to its improvement. Certain notes are judiciously preserved in the text which show us at what points he thought that further illustration was required, that a character needed to be more plainly made out, or that a particular vein of sentiment was capable of fuller development. Half way through the story the lady with whom the hero has been in love becomes his half-sister. The change certainly simplifies the construction of the story, and renders the main situation more telling. We see, in short, the good effects of the change, but we are just as much in the dark as ever as to how and why it occurred to the author of the story.

Such at least is our state of mind; and curious as it is in a certain sense to watch the statue growing under the sculptor's hand, we still wish that it had received its last touches, and appeared before us as polished and complete as Transformation or the Scarlet Letter. Hawthorne may be pronounced with little hesitation to have been by far the finest literary artist whom America has yet produced. His books, popular as they are, scarcely enjoy, or are likely to enjoy, a popularity proportionate to their merits. The rare and exquisite charm which they possess is scarcely to be appreciated by the ordinary mass of mankind; and indeed it is chiefly for that reason that we should decline to place him amongst the greatest masters of his art. The very highest class of imaginative work is that which appeals to the vulgar at the same time that it is appreciated by connoisseurs. Hawthorne's delicate perceptions, his graceful style, and his singular power of blending the romantic with everyday life, are likely to be deeply felt only by those who have reached a certain level of cultivation. The atmosphere which he delighted to breathe is too thin for ordinary lungs; the profane are not at their ease when straying in that dim twilight between the real and the supernatural where his power was most conspicuously exhibited. Hawthorne was a born lover of romance in the most prosaic of all countries. "No author," he says in the preface to Transformation—

No author without a trial can conceive of the difficulty of writing a romance about a country where there is no shadow, no antiquity, no mystery, no picturesque and gloomy wrong, nor anything but a commonplace prosperity in broad and simple daylight, as is happily the case with my dear native land.

There is something characteristic of American patriotism in this effort to make out that the absence of the romantic element which he so dearly loved was somehow a desirable circumstance. Perhaps, indeed, it may be said that the difficulty in which it placed him was not altogether a disadvantage. An artist is often improved by having to work upon strictly limited materials. Hawthorne might conceivably have run to excessive luxuriance of style if his love of the romantic had been stimulated by living in one of the countries blessed, or cursed, with an ancient civilization. As it was, he was compelled to exercise a severe self-restraint, and perhaps gained additional power by the necessity of keeping his fancy upon a very meagre diet. In Septimius we have an example of the mode in which these conditions acted upon him.

Septimius, in spite of his classical name, is a young New England farmer in the days of the revolutionary war. Giving every credit which they may deserve to the heroes of Lexington and Bunker's Hill, we cannot say that they ever struck us as a specially poetical race of men. Granting that they possessed all the heroism which their national orators have claimed for them, we must still feel that the shrewd Yankee element was extremely conspicuous in their character. The problem, therefore, which Hawthorne undertook was, to show us the romantic side of a set of men who combined genuine patriotism with a singularly shrewd eye to the main chance. The apparent difficulty of the task was perhaps, as we have said, really favourable to a writer of real genius. If he had had to do with Italian peasants or Swiss mountaineers, with the followers of Garibaldi or the successors of William Tell, he would have found all manner of picturesque accessories ready made to his hands. He would have been tempted to give us the Walter Scott style of romance, and to have dealt in slouched hats, buff jenkins, and mediæval oaths. As, however, the most picturesque weapon of which he could avail himself was an old "King's arm" which had been fired at Louisburg, and the most picturesque garment a suit of Yankee homespun, he had to plunge deeper for his sources of interest. The best botanists, it has been said, come from barren countries where every flower is a rarity, and the best cooks from countries where good meat is scarce; and on the same principle, the best writers of romance may possibly flourish in regions where the outside is barren and commonplace, and we must be moved by discovering those hidden fountains of feeling which were certainly not extinct, though they were not superficially evident, in the bosoms of the descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers. With admirable skill, Hawthorne turns to account every means of investing his hero with a poetical colouring. Septimius is supposed to have the Red Indian blood in his veins, and inherits from his savage forefathers some touch of fierce passions which could not be entirely choked by his puritanical training. On another side he is descended from an ancient English family, to which there has clung a strange tradition of a mysterious secret handed down to successive generations, and of a crime committed by one of its possessors in the effort to turn it to account, who, as a providential punishment, left over afterwards the track of a bloody footstep wherever he travelled. The English and the Indian traditions are grotesquely blended, and they meet in the character of one of Septimius's ancestors, who was naturally burnt as a wizard at the time of the Salem persecutions. The dim traditions are embodied in a queer old aunt who shares the home of Septimius, and who is half-way between the old savage and the witch of popular fancy in England and America. She is in the habit of regretting her incapacity for attending diabolical sabbaths in the woods after the fashion of her ancestors; and the only power which remains to her is that of brewing a strange concoction of herbs and rum, which is intensely nauseous to the taste of all other people, but is regarded by her as not only delicious, but endowed with a mysterious efficacy in promoting long life. Under those strange surroundings Septimius grows up, and he is further perplexed by some of those metaphysical speculations which were congenial to the Puritan soil. He puzzles himself, like another Jonathan Edwards, over the origin of evil, and comes to the conclusion, not perhaps a very original one, that death is a great mistake. "I doubt," he says, "if it had been left to my choice, whether I should have taken existence on such terms; so much trouble of preparation to live, and then no life at all; a ponderous beginning, and nothing more." His soul is clouded by a vague scepticism and a general disposition to find fault with Providence. When the war breaks out, he is more disposed to bury himself in meditation than to take part in the struggle; but by a strange accident he is involved in the fight at Lexington, and kills a young English officer in spite of himself. He withdraws all the more decidedly into his own thoughts, and fails to sympathize with the vigorous young farmer—introduced for the sake of the contrast—who is raised into a hero by the excitement of the war.

Here, then, Hawthorne has succeeded in creating one of those situations of abnormal psychological interest in which he specially delights, and in which he finds a compensation for the external monotony and ugliness of American life. The story which follows is contrived with great skill, though, as we have noticed, the author had not fully worked it out, and some parts of it strike us as being in need of much toning down and explanation. There is, for example, a queer doctor with a fancy for breeding spiders and concocting strange medicines out of them, who is perhaps a little more gratuitously grotesque than he would have appeared when the work had received its final polish. The general motive of the story is supplied by the fancied discovery of Septimius, founded on his family traditions and the odd habits of his aunt, that he can brew an elixir of life which will confer upon him immortality. To attain that end, however, it is necessary that he should sever himself from the sympathies of his kind, and lead a kind of passionless existence, absorbed chiefly in philosophical inquiry. For a time we fancy that we are about to have a story like that of Godwin's St. Leon, where the moral will be the refutation of Septimius's aspirations, and the proof that immortality might be bought at too dear a price. It turns out, however, that the wondrous elixir is a delusion; and the supernatural element in the story is ingeniously explained away, or at least shrouded in a judicious mist of uncertainty. The interest therefore centres in the psychological problem presented by Septimius. After making allowance for the incomplete state of the story, we must confess that to our taste Hawthorne appears to have in this case ventured rather too far into the dim dreamland of the grotesque and unnatural. The story, however, is powerful and interesting as it stands. Septimius may be taken as in some sense an ideal representation of Hawthorne himself, and of the consequences of the revolt of a fine but ill-balanced nature against the prosaic realism of modern life. The art is admirable; but we can hardly call it healthy. It will commend itself however to the lover of the rarer literary essences, though it may probably remain caviare to the vulgar.

DE BEAUVOIR'S PEKIN, JEDDO, AND SAN FRANCISCO.*

IN the preface to the last instalment of the Marquis de Beauvoir's Voyage round the World a note of sadness is struck which seems borne on our ears throughout, and which insensibly mingles with our enjoyment of what is in itself to the full as deserving of our thanks and praise as the volumes which this young author gave us a year or so ago. It may be that in the course of transcription and preparation for the press, his freshly written and light-hearted notes have unconsciously been set to a minor key. Private griefs have within the interval mingled with the public sorrows which for nearly two years have crushed the spirit of a patriotic Frenchman. The return to his native shores was saddened by the death of one to whom he had looked up throughout the voyage as a guide and companion. From New York he brought home the coffin of Lieutenant Fauvel, a sailor worthy of the French navy in its best days, to whom the Prince of Joinville had entrusted his son, the young Duke of Penthièvre, a contemporary and confidential friend of M. de Beauvoir. The loss in May 1871 of a beloved father, to gratify whom the present record was undertaken, was all but absorbed in the abyss which had before that time opened for the glories of France. The call to arms, we infer, drew away the writer from his unfinished work. A prey alternately to "patriotic illusions and to tearful reality," what better plea can he urge for a "rough and sometimes incoherent simplicity" which he could in nowise efface from the work of this year of war and sorrow? The translation itself falls short of that of the previous volumes in ease, elasticity, and idiomatic point, putting the author at an increased disadvantage on appearing once more before the English public.

Apart from this lowered tone of enjoyment, there is no real abatement of perceptive or descriptive power. The writer is as happy as ever in seizing the salient point of whatever comes newly within his ken, whether in the works of nature or of man. The first glimpse inside Pekin, at which point he now takes up the tale of his journey round the globe, opens to his mind the mystery of that singular stage at which the civilization of the Chinese Empire at present stands, typified as it is by the exterior condition of its capital. "Whoever has not seen Pekin does not know what decay mœna." At a distance the picture is indeed such as to keep up the illusion with which the traveller approaches the theme of so many tales of wonder and romance. Passing in the full blaze of midday the magnificent bridge of Pa-li-kaio, the party rode through the imposing gateway, the finest thing they had seen in the Celestial Empire, which recalls the grandeur of Babylon and Nineveh. Once on the other side, it is seen to be no more than a stage decoration. Soon a second Babylonian wall is reached, battlemented and bastioned with fifty pagodas, fifty or sixty feet high, and some forty broad. This divides the Chinese city, which has entirely grown up since Polo's visit to Cambuluc, as he calls Pekin—a vast and straggling space, where woods, temples, and markets are intermixed with animated streets of shops and a populace teeming like ants—from the Tartar city, a great square, cutting the horizon with its embattled spires and Ninevite walls, like the first, having ten formidable gates and innumerable five-storied forts. Within this outer wall are three concentric towns, divided from each other by interior walls. First comes the Military city, with its barracks and great thoroughfares, next the Imperial city, with the palaces of the mandarins, each containing a hundred kiosks or so placed together, and finally in the centre the Sacred city, the residence of the Emperor, its thousands of roofs covered with the Imperial yellow. Here is the onerous Mu-chan, "mound of coal, or of ten thousand years," obviously an artificial work, the holy of holies of the Celestial Empire, which Colonel Yule, who has engraved it in his edition of the great Venetian's travels, is disinclined—we fail to see why—to identify with the "Green Mount" of Kublai, described by Polo. With his finger the attendant mandarin points out the tops of the walls, where for twenty-six miles four carriages can run abreast, the light green roofs of the mandarins' palaces, and the dark blue domes of the temples. Visions of hoary antiquity, of warlike prowess, of sage counsel and statesmanship, rise up before the imagination of the entranced spectator. He recalls the proud Mongols with their quaint artillery, as pictured by Marco Polo at the taking of Siangyang, mounting to the assault, "and Genghis Khan and Kublai Khan!" Alas! in a couple of hours, when the Sacred city is reached, the melancholy truth is forced upon the traveller's mind. The whole city is perishing by slow interior decay. "Thebes, Memphis, Carthage, Rome, contain ruins which tell of a fall; Pekin prays upon itself—it is a corpse, falling day by day into dust":—

When, from the height of the magnificent walls, still almost entire, which surround the Tartar city, I cast my eye over the Sacred and Imperial city enclosed within them; when I saw the splendid perspective of bastions, of gateways surmounted by pagodas, of fortifications at the angles of the walls, and looked at the conical shining roofs of the temples which rise up from the midst of an actual forest; when, turning to the other side, I glanced at the Chinese city, and pictured it all to myself full of life and verdant freshness, traversed by limpid streams, furnished with cannon, populous and noisy, I fancied that I could retrace in my imagination the Pekin of a thousand years ago, and I stood overpowered with admiration of this wonder of the extreme East. But, by degrees, I saw all near at hand. I traversed these streets, where the carriages have worn ruts twenty feet deep, in which the ancient open sewers seem to form a giant staircase to reach the narrow path which runs by the houses on either side of the precipice; I got out of my cart to look about me better, and found myself up to my knees in an abominable dust of the filth of centuries; I followed the line of the moats, canals, and rivers, dried up for ever, under bridges of red marble, ruined and useless now—these gardens, parks, and pools, which were formerly so wonderful, are turned into a desert. Beside triumphal arches of marble the crumbling buts of miserable shopkeepers raise above them a forest of poles, with paper advertisements which dance in the wind; and all this is made frightfully uniform under a thick coating, and through an incessant cloud of acrid suffocating dust. No, said I to myself at the sight of all this, this is no town, but rather a Tartar camp, devastated by the simoom in the midst of the desert.

Unlike Siam, nothing is sacrificed in the architecture of China to external ornament. To the increasing magnificence of the interior the national taste opposes even a decreasing amount of outside ornamentation. To this is due not a little of the poor and even squalid aspect presented by the mass of buildings, public and private. Yet nothing can well be more truly Oriental than the air of what is known as the "circular street," the unpronounceable Chinese name of which is too much for M. de Beauvoir. It seemed to him as if a flock of cockatoos had alighted on an oasis in the midst of a silent desert. It is the only lively place in Pekin. Thousands of scarlet boards with gilt inscriptions are suspended from sloping poles above the shop-fronts in this twisting street. Soldiers and merchants, palanquins, mules, camels, coolies cross and jostle one another, imperturbable civility being throughout the rule. Not only do myriads of children entangle themselves with the visitor's legs, but he is amused by the old men, the "grown-up children of China," proudly holding the string of an enormous and fantastic kite, or winged dragon, or eagle, eighteen or twenty feet in spread, which they guide deftly through the throng, enlivening the time with sallies of native wit. Attached to the kite is sometimes, we are told, an invisible Eolian apparatus, which imitates with the most infernal noise the song of birds or the human voice. The fall of a pigeon from contact with one of these strings explained to our author the mystery of the sonorous waves of harmony which he had for days heard soaring through the air and rising into the higher atmospheric regions. The pigeon carried across the feathers of his tail at their root a charming Eolian harp, light as a soap-bubble, and exquisitely made. The birds as they cleave the air give forth a harsh tremolo, or a plaintive note, according to the rapidity of their flight. Instead of this being, as he thought at first, one of the hundred thousand absurd fancies of the disciples of Confucius, our traveller learnt that the object of these harps is to preserve the hapless pigeons from the talons of the vultures which circle in flocks round the battlements. He concludes this odd story by telling us that he forthwith bought a whole stock of these pretty scarecrows for the dovescotes of friends in France. This was about the only article which he found it possible to purchase with limited means in Pekin. Enamels, jade, ivory and lacquer, particularly two charming little elephants in white cloisonné work carrying golden turrets, were only to be had by strangers at four times the price asked in the well-known shop in the Rue Drouot. Among the more serious triumphs of native art are the bronze instruments of the observatory on the terrace of Tung-Chi-Men, to be seen in Colonel Yule's engraving, constructed under the care of the Jesuit Father Verbiest, 270 years ago. They are admirably made, supported by fantastic winged dragons. Our traveller was most struck by a celestial globe, more than eight feet in diameter, on which are marked all the stars known in A.D. 1650 and visible from the latitude of Pekin, 39° 54' N. Tested in every way, these instruments were found as accurate and perfect as when first made, thanks to the dryness of the climate. The famous praying machine was also visited in the Temple of Confucius; it is described as a kind of cylinder, thirteen feet in diameter, filled with holy papers, and turned round like a top, a quantity of aerolites or supposed sacred stones being arranged around it. Under the charge and tuition of M. Lemaire, the interpreter to the French Legation, who at nightfall, disguised with false tail and slippers, is wont to sally forth through the gate of the Chinese town to mix in the lowest as well as the highest society of Pekin, our travellers were initiated into much of the mystery of the beliefs, manners, and usages of native life. If our author has not much to add upon the subject of religion or education to the full and graphic narrative of the Abbé Hue, or the Chronicles of Dr. Legge, he imparts liveliness and piquancy to his touches of what is, through all, most distinctive of Chinese culture. Zealots amongst ourselves for the interminable system of examination there in vogue, with its infinite gradation of rewards, will be interested to hear that for the first three laureates of the contest for the doctor's degree, which is held every five years, and to which twelve thousand candidates flock from the different provinces of the Empire, there is reserved, together with the Emperor alone, the special right of way through the central span of the great gateway of Tchien-Men, between the Chinese and the Tartar city. Of all memorials of the intellectual and æsthetic greatness of old times not even the Great Wall itself, daily visited at no little risk by our travellers, can excel the stupendous group of tombs of the Ming Emperors. An avenue of three miles leads from the entrance gate to the nearest tomb, formed first by white marble columns, then by two lines of sculptured monoliths fifteen feet high—camels, elephants, hippopotami, and lions, winged dragons, and finally, twelve emperors, wearing helmet and cuirass. The ruins of the Summer Palace, over which grief and shame choked the writer's utterance, speak of the intermediate glories of art and wealth and luxury, accumulated by the rulers of this wondrous race, sacrificed on the altar of native perfidy and of alien retribution. As the most cheering prospect for the future of China, we turn to the memorable State paper presented by Prince Kuang, in which, pointing to the example set by the insignificant State of Japan, he dwells upon the advantages and the necessity of Western science, art, and civilization.

It was among the Japanese, the "French of the East," that M. de Beauvoir found himself more especially at home, and entered with the keenest zest into the life and habits of the most lively and ingenious of Eastern races. Wherever he went, sunshine, smiles, flowers, and delicacies, with the unfailing "Ohaiho," the native "good day," beset his path. Strange, rich, and picturesque costumes, alternating with the opposite extreme which the unconscious innocence of the tubbing-house, or the street of baths, presents to the wondering and half-scandalized stranger, reveal canons of taste and ethics as wide as possible apart from those of Europe. Much as we have read of late of the scenery, the people, and the arts or institutions of Japan, we have seen nothing to vie in point of lifelike and enthusiastic description with the narrative of this young author. Well-bred, keen-sighted, and reflective, he carries us along with him in agreeable companionship. It is with a feeling of regret that, after a rapid survey of the Pacific and the American continent, noting heedfully all that is worthy of remark in nature or in man, we part company with the traveller upon his native shores—a regret enhanced by the circumstances of personal and national sorrow which dim the recollection of so delightful a Voyage round the World.

SERICICULTURE.*

THE mystery of the silkworm and its product has had a perennial attraction for the youth and age both of nations and of individuals, though perhaps, as the world grows older, the gaze of mere curiosity is being exchanged for the eager eye of speculation. An early perception by European nations of the value of the raw material whence the costly Median, Assyrian, and Coan garments were manufactured, seems to have clothed the secret of its origin with an air of marvel as profound as that which surrounded the philosopher's stone or the land of Prester John; and even when all was made clear, delays and hindrances to the utilization of the discovery lent a sort of interest and charm to the subject. Such ancient authorities as Aristotle and the author of the Periplus point more or less vaguely to the East as the source of the material of silk fabrics; but it is certain that Greece and her colonies understood the working of the substance long before they knew whence it came or how it was produced. Some Roman authors fancied it was the "hair" of trees, and Virgil (Georg. ii. 144) writes

Of Ethiop forests hear with fluttering fleece, whilst others identified it with the threads thrown out by a shell-fish wherewith to attach itself to its rock. The first mention of a spinning insect and the cloths formed therefrom is due to Pausanias, whose half-truthful, half-fabulous account, reminding us of the gossiping vein of Herodotus, seems to justify a doubt whether Serica was so called from the Seres or the silkworms; in short, whether the people were named from the product, or the product from the people. Apparently the Asiatics who had intercourse with China kept the secret to themselves for commercial purposes; for till the sixth century of our era, though silk was in use at Rome, it came thither from Tyre and Berytus, and was a Persian monopoly. Then, however, two Nestorian monks, who had been to China, induced Justinian to send them on a mission in quest of silkworms' eggs. These they brought back to Constantinople in a hollow reed or cane, hatched by the heat of a dunghill, and then fed with mulberry leaves. For six centuries more the Greeks of the Lower Empire monopolized the breeding, and it was not till the thirteenth century that it was extended through Sicily to Italy, and so, in due course, to Spain and France.
And downy forests cabled by Chimæe;

Not the least amusing chapter in the romance of the silkworm's history and migration is its first introduction into England. It is commonly known that in 1608 James I. issued circular letters to persons of influence among his subjects, recommending them to plant mulberry trees with a view to rearing silkworms, and introducing their produce as a national commodity. Old English mansions here and there still look out upon some of these memorials of the wisdom of the first English Stuart King. But it is not so commonly known that he was stimulated to this step by having to borrow a pair of silk stockings of the Earl of Mar, in which to appear before the English Ambassador previously to his accession to the English Crown. It does not appear that the experiments he set in motion produced any great result, and though from time to time "sericulture," as the process of rearing silkworms is called by a somewhat questionable word-coinage, has revived in England in a more serious shape than as the pastime of schoolboys, still it may be seen by a reference to the pamphlet before us that in the calculation of the value of silk grown in the whole world in 1870, England, though it has abundance of mulberry trees, and has no greater climatic drawbacks than many other countries, is simply nowhere. China earns by its silk seventeen millions annually; Italy eleven, and France and India above four millions each. Japan is computed to earn more than 3,000,000*l.*, and the other Asiatic States, exclusive of Persia, a little more than two. Persia now earns less than a million, as also does the remainder of Europe, when France and Italy are told off. In the other quarters of the globe the results of silkworm feeding are comparatively trifling, except in California, where public spirit and Government bounties and inducements are rapidly bringing sericulture into importance. With six million mulberry trees, three crops of silk a year, and a reputation for the excellence of the quality of their silk, the Californians look forward to realizing two million pounds of silk within two or three years.

It is under the stimulus of these encouraging details that "Arachne" has taken up her pen, and set down practically and intelligently the necessary information for successful sericulture. Other writers have preceded her and discoursed more fully and learnedly on the same topic, but apparently with little practical result. It seems an age since the publication by Mr. Murray of the translation of the French treatise by Count Dandolo, and it is nearly a quarter of a century since Mrs. Whitby of Lymington put forth her experimental manual for rearing silkworms in England. Perhaps the array of cautions in such volumes may have deterred not a few readers from following up the subject, and have bred a very natural doubt whether the game was worth the candle. The great merit of "Arachne's" little pamphlet is that it simplifies to a great extent the formidable details of the process, and minimizes the cautions and provisions which in the older treatises were so formidable. Even as it is, the nurture of the silkworm and the culture of mulberry trees for that purpose require so much care and method and supervision, that we have no hesitation in saying that any one who realizes by these means an income of 100*l.* per acre will have fully earned every farthing of the money.

"Arachne" contends that the feasibility of acclimatizing silkworms for practical purposes is demonstrated by our amateur rearing of silkworms, and she would have us do for profit that which hitherto we have been content to do for pastime. Putting ourselves in the place of tractable disciples, we shall endeavour to show from her pages the conditions of success in sericulture. Though such is not "Arachne's" order, prudence dictates that, as one should victual a house before going to live in it, so the mulberry trees which are to feed the silkworm should be the first consideration. It seems then that, given an acre covered with 400 trees of a year old, it is not till the third year that any adequate crop of leaves can be counted upon; but "in due time each tree, under proper cultivation, will yield from 100 to 200 lbs. of food, which, beginning at the low estimate of 3*l.* per acre, would increase till each acre would yield above 100*l.* worth of leaves." The trees require a sheltered situation, a rich, heavily-manured soil, to be well staked, and mulched with short litter and decayed leaves. At three years old they will bear the loss of leaves to the extent of 5 lb., but no more. After that their produce will increase at the rate of half as many leaves again year after year, until at fifty years the tree is superannuated. The tree is propagated by seed, layers, or cuttings, is sensitive of bleeding or other injury in getting the leaves or young branches, and demands manure thrice a year—in the winter, spring, and midsummer. It requires to be kept to a height of four feet, with six feet between each tree and nine between each row. The average yield of an established plantation is thirty pounds of leaves per tree, and the leaves should be worth five shillings per hundred-weight (p. 13). For silkworms, it is "Arachne's" opinion that the "Morus alba," or "common white mulberry," is the best, and this is borne out by most writers, though Mrs. Whitby has very high authority for maintaining that silkworms fed upon the "Morus multicaulis" spin a silk equal, or superior, to the best Italian. Mr. Mongredien, in his Trees and Shrubs, endorses this opinion, associating the Morus morettiana—another black-fruited and edible variety—with the Morus multicaulis. There are, as many readers are aware, other breeds of silkworms which prefer other food plants—the Bombyx Yama Mai, so lovely in its grub and butterfly stages alike, which feeds on the oak leaf or the apple leaf; the Bombyx Cynthia, said to have fed on the Ricinus communis, or Castor-oil plant, but now and recently most associated to our minds with the beautiful Ailanthus glandulosa, and two or three others more famous for their great beauty as caterpillar, or moth, or both, than for the superior excellence of the silk they spin. The speciality of the Bombyx Cynthia is the strength of its golden brown rather than its glossiness, in which * *Sericulture; or, How to Make 100*l.* per Acre of Ground.* By Arachne. London: Chapman & Hall. 1872.

It is inferior to others, must have led to the increased cultivation of the Ailanthus for silkworm food. Mr. Mongredien in 1870 pronounced its yield of leaves, except under very expensive culture and in very warm seasons, to be unequal to its grower's expectations and the silkworm's demands; and, though we observe that the cultivation of the Ailanthus is still advocated, and that the great purveyor of all the requisites for English sericulture, Mr. Teutschel of Colchester, is advertising plants of it for this purpose at a cheap figure per score and per hundred, it seems to us that sober sericulturists will do well to limit themselves to the Morus alba, or one of its varieties, for a food plant, and to the Bombyx mori, or mulberry silkworm, for a spinner.

The first step towards setting up an establishment of silkworms is to lay in a stock of eggs, which, to be good, should be of a dark grey colour, and which are now held to be no better for being Japanese than if European eggs; an ounce of eggs at a cost of from 15s. to 25s. will produce 100 ounces. These must be wintered in large-mouthed bottles, quite dry, corked without wholly excluding ventilation, and buried neck-deep in the shade of a north wall, or else in a perforated tin box, placed on the floor of a cellar. The object of thus keeping them cool is to retard the premature hatching of the eggs, which might otherwise occur before the mulberry was in full leaf. About the latter end of May the sound eggs are tested by their capacity of floating in water, placed on wooden trays in a warm room, and covered with flannel, for which on the fourth day a piece of white muslin is substituted. The flannel is used to warm, the muslin to protect, the eggs. Under a proper temperature the worms appear about the tenth day, the token of their coming being the change of the eggs to a darker colour. It is in the hatching that most care and pains are needed; for each day's hatch must be kept on a separate tray and labelled with its date, and, as soon as born, the worms require sprinkling with young tender leaves. On behalf of incipient sericulturists we cry Mrs. Whitby mercy when she says that the leaves must be chopped fine at first, and larger for each age, and actually prescribes a chaff-cutter for the operation. "Arachne," on the other hand, argues that what the worms do not get in their state of nature cannot be of vital consequence. Much nicety is required as to the feeding-trays of strong white paper, perforated at the base, and with slight pasteboard sides. They require to fit neatly into each other; and at each fresh demand for food a clean tray has to be placed within that which contains the worms, spread evenly over with fresh leaves, the underside next to the worms. To these they will creep through the holes, and, when they have done so, the tray with the withered leaves and refuse must be removed, clean paper being put under the tray which contains the worms and their fresh food. Till the worms sleep their first sleep at six days old, they must be fed regularly morning and evening, and any disturbance of their sleep endangers serious consequences. Silk-worms sleep four times, at stated intervals, according to their treatment; and under favourable circumstances they begin to spin at fifty-five days after birth, care being taken to feed them regularly, wholesomely, and liberally after each sleep. They need no artificial heat, but perfect cleanliness and ventilation, and the upper story of a house, dry and light, with the means of ensuring shade and seclusion at need, is as good as the best of laboratories. "Arachne" lays great stress upon gentleness, patience, and tender handling, and advises that when it is desirable to detach the worms from a tray or leaf, they should be enticed away by a fresh leaf. She does not believe in the injuriousness of wet or dewy leaves, though at the same time she does not recommend artificial saturation. Perfumes and disinfectants, which have been often recommended to ensure a wholesome atmosphere and the satisfaction of the olfactory organs of the silkworm, which are unusually sensitive, may, she thinks, have been the cause of those many failures which are commonly attributed to climate and other drawbacks.

What is more natural than that that which is death to the common caterpillar should be death also to the "cavalieri," as the Italian calls the silkworm? But at about the fifty-fifth day, under natural processes, spinning time comes on. The worms evince this by wandering from their food, with silk threads issuing from their mouths. They must be attracted to light wooden trays furnished with thin branching stalks, each worm being allowed six inches space. In four days the cocoons, or oblong cases of silken thread, will have been spun; in eight they will be fit to gather. The after process depends on whether the cocoon is devoted to reeling or to reproduction. In the latter case, the moths succeeding the chrysalis are paired on trays and covered with cloths; and in three days the females, having been placed on cards, each lay an average of 400 eggs, and then die. But when reeling is the destination of the cocoons, they are placed in an oven of such a temperature as to dry them without scorching the silk, an extra precaution against which is a thin board at the bottom of the oven. Another caution is not to press the cocoons together, which at this stage would destroy the silk. A test of proper drying is to press a cocoon betwixt finger and thumb. If the chrysalis inside crumbles at the pressure, the cocoon is dry; if it remains a lump in the centre, it should be remitted to the oven. When dried, the cocoons should be weighed, packed in boxes, and the weight of each box marked. Average cocoons are worth 5s. the pound, and a pound of cocoons is enough for a silk dress.

Not to weary our readers with more details, it must be briefly added that the vital cautions about silkworm rearing are to feed them regularly, carefully, and liberally upon one and the same sort of food; to exercise great strictness about cleanliness, ventilation, and temperature; to be tender-handed with them, and to avoid disturbing them, especially when asleep; and to guard them from cats and birds and insects. With these provisions they will probably escape the diseases to which silkworm flesh is heir. If otherwise, we are afraid that "Arachne's" learned diagnosis of the symptoms of disease will not do much to assist the chances of recovery. This is the weakest part of her pamphlet. "Silkworms," she writes, "are liable to four fatal diseases. (1) Paralysis—symptom: the worm becomes palsied. (2) Black fever—the worm turns black. (3) Red fever—the worm turns red, and its head swells. (4) Consumption—the worm wastes gradually away." We should suppose so, in each instance. In justice we must add that she would separate the sick from the whole.

Would-be silkworm feeders will find in this publication the information suited to the needs of a beginner, a list of sound directions and cautions unencumbered by surplusage, and a preponderating element of common sense. With "Arachne" for monitor, we should not despair of seeing a return for a plantation of mulberry trees and an investment in eggs, in the shape of

THE STORY OF THE PLÉBISCITE.*

MM. ERCKMANN-CHATRIAN have done good service to France by demolishing one superstition, but they are open to the charge of propagating another which is no less pernicious. The notion that Paris enjoys a monopoly of political enlightenment while the provinces are sunk in hopeless ignorance and stupidity has been much encouraged by their writings. More than any other writers, they have accentuated that opposition between the urban and rural element in French society which has ended by arraying town and country in two hostile camps. The clever people in their books almost always hail from the capital; the dults are always provincials. "If you had but spent a couple of years at Paris," says Cousin George in this story, "you would see things a little plainer." The thoughts of the peasantry never go beyond potatoes and cabbages. They are the dung of the Empire, the manure to fatten the dynasty. On the other hand, and in sharp contrast to this chronic obfuscation of the bucolic mind, the lowest Parisian workman dwells in an atmosphere of political sagacity. He is on a par with Bismarck in his knowledge of what is going on around him. He is incapable of becoming the dupe of pernicious scheming. He possesses the key to the riddles which perplex and mystify his provincial brothers. If this is merely an exaggerated form of saying that the level of political intelligence is higher in the great towns than in the villages, the proposition is undeniably true. It is true of England and Germany as well as of France. There is always more intellectual activity to be found in the great centres of population than in remote rural districts. But when our authors proceed to attribute the recent disasters of France to the ignorance of the peasantry in mistaking the drift of the plébiscite, one is tempted to ask whether this be not an assumption in accordance rather with their favourite theory of the two rival strongholds of political light and darkness than with the actual fact. The enlightened Parisians are the last people in the world to be acquitted of all share in the responsibility for the national disasters. Whose were the voices which clamoured for war, and rendered it impossible for the Emperor to recede from the false position in which he had placed himself in the Hohenzollern imbroglio? The ignorance of the peasantry contributed doubtless to the calamitous declaration of war, but the candid historian will not shut his eyes to the part which Paris played in the scenes which immediately preceded it. And what, too, of the convulsion which ensued upon the Prussian conquest, of which the benighted peasantry were passive and horror-stricken spectators? MM. Erckmann-Chatrian will find it a difficult task to vindicate the intelligence and patriotism of the enlightened ouvrier of the capital during that terrible period. If they care to trace the misfortunes of their country further, they ought in candour, as a pendant to the Plébiscite, in which the ignorance of the peasantry is represented as the main cause of the calamitous war, to write the "Commune," in order to show the equally fatal results of the crude political dreams of the Parisian rabble.

The story of the plébiscite is told by Christian Weber, the timid and simple-minded miller and mayor of Rothalp, a village in the valley of the Metting, between Lorraine and Alsace. Christian has a political instructor of dangerous frankness in the person of his cousin George, who had knocked about the world, and after setting up a manufactory of matches at Paris, and marrying a Parisian widow, had returned to his native province to keep a public house. Naturally cousin George saw further than his neighbours; but we doubt whether, in the spring of 1870, any Frenchman, however patriotic and opposed to the ruling powers, had so fully realized the hollowness and corruption of the Imperial régime. His strictures on the Imperial Government have the air of being ante-dated by some months; and even now, read by the light of the easy wisdom which follows the event, they seem to us hardly fair to the Emperor Napoleon:—

What [he exclaims] does the Emperor do for you? He plunders you—that is all. Your money, he shows it to you before each election, as they show a child a stick of sugar-candy to make it laugh; and when the election is over, he puts it back into his pocket. The trick is played. . . . It is not so difficult to present accounts to the Chambers. So many Chameleons, which have no existence. So much munition of war, of which no one knows anything. So much for retiring pensions; so much for the substitutes fund; so much for changes of uniform. The uniforms are changed every year—that is good for business. Do the Deputies enquire into these things? Who checks the Minister's budgets? And the deputies whom the Minister of the Interior has recommended to you, whom you have appointed like fools, and whom the Emperor would throw up at the very first election, if those gentlemen breathed a syllable about visiting the arsenals and examining into the accounts. What a farce it is! Why, yesterday, passing through Phalsbourg, I got upon the ramparts, and I saw three guns of the time of Herod, upon gun-carriages eaten up by worms and painted over to conceal the rottenness. These very guns, I do believe, are re-cast every third or fourth year—upon paper—with your money. Ah! my poor Christian, you are not very sharp, nor the other people in our village either. . . . What you want is education; you have asked for bells (Rothalp was to be rewarded for voting straight with a peal of bells); but all the school you have is a miserable shed, and your only schoolmaster is old Adam Fix, who can teach his children nothing by reason that he knows nothing himself. Well now, if you were to ask for a really good school, there would be no money in the public funds. There is money enough for bells, but for a good schoolmaster, for a large well-ventilated room, for deal benches and tables, for pictures, slates, maps, and books, there is nothing; for if you had good schools, your children could read, write, and keep accounts; they would soon be able to look into the Minister's budgets, and that is exactly what His Majesty wishes to avoid.

There is much truth, though not a little unfairness to the Emperor personally, in this and other invectives of which cousin George is made by the collaborators their mouthpiece. Clearly a sound system of education is a very real need of France, and figures very properly as a conspicuous article in the programme of regeneration. But we regret the tone of exaggeration which the authors of this book persistently adopt in dealing with this subject. It is not only not true but mischievous to say, as a Frenchman is made to say further on in the story, that if the people had been educated they would have known what was going on upon the other side of the Rhine; that they would have had national armies, able generals, a watchful commissariat, a sound organization; that they would not have placed the power of making war or peace in the hands of an imbecile; that they would not have attacked the Germans; and that the Germans, seeing that France was ready to receive them, would have been careful not to attack her. Education would still have left untouched the deeply seated vanity and irritable Chauvinism which have ended by plunging France into the abyss; and it is hardly candid of MM. Erckmann-Chatrian to omit this feature of the national character in their scathing diagnosis. A sound system of education may accomplish much, but it will not prove a panacea for the national disasters any more than the lack of it has proved the sole cause of them.

The fact is that the patriotic feeling and Republican sympathies of MM. Erckmann-Chatrian do not allow them to write upon the events of 1870 with anything like judicial calmness. There is no evidence, beyond their mere assertion, to show that the plébiscite was the organized hypocrisy described in their book, or that its object was to trick the nation into a declaration of war, although undoubtedly the disaffection which it revealed among a considerable section of the army tended to make war probable. Their account, both of the previous attitude of the Germans and of the incident which precipitated the crisis, is a flagrant misrepresentation of historical facts. Whatever may have been the schemes of Count Bismarck, it is not true that the German nation had for years nourished ill-will towards France, and had "waited like a set of sulky fellows for an opportunity to make her feel it." It is still less true that the Spaniards wanted Montpensier for their king, or that, being thwarted in this desire, they vindictively chose for their king a prince "whom a million of Germans would support if necessary." Montpensier was never more than the nominee of a faction, and the Hohenzollern candidature was definitely withdrawn before the outbreak of war. Of much more value, as a contribution to history, is the graphic description of the utter want of preparation on the part of the Imperial Government. Cousin George makes a journey to Belfort towards the end of August, and relates what he has seen by the way, "recruits, guns, horses, munitions of war, barrels of biscuit, all arriving at the railway in heaps." There were commissaries who did not know where to find their stores, colonels looking for their regiments, generals on the search for their divisions and brigades. "They are seeking," he exclaims, "for salt, sugar, coffee, bacon, saddles, and bridles, and they are getting charts of the Baltic for a campaign in the Vosges." This picture of the fatal confusion of the momentous fortnight preceding the commencement of hostilities is not at all exaggerated, and furnishes an astonishing commentary on the famous "ready, aye five times ready" of Marshal Leboeuf.

News of the disastrous defeat of Wörth is brought to Rothalp by a wounded cuirassier, whom the simple villagers would have lynched as a deserter. The straggler is speedily followed by the main body of the defeated army, presenting such a spectacle of desolation as was not easily to be forgotten. The Uhlans followed close upon their heels. In the first party of them Christian Weber recognizes an old acquaintance in the person of Otto Krell, one of those German photographers who had been travelling about the mountains a few months before, "taking the likenesses of all the village folk." The terrible Otto ironically inquires after the health of the poor Mayor's nice Swiss cows, and the twenty-five sheep he had last year. This is of course the prelude to a heavy requisition, to be succeeded by a series of heavy exactions, as the wave of Bavarians, Wurtem-bergers, and Badenens swept over the hapless country. Our authors have many details to relate of the wholesale pillage practised by the Germans, and of their insatiable appetites. They are the worst thieves in the world, and would take the very bread out of your mouth to swallow it. But these are miseries incidental to war. "A la guerre comme à la guerre," as the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen politely but cynically observes to poor M. Weber, in answer to his remonstrances. Happily the much-tried Mayor had been able to preserve a large sum of ready money by secretly sinking it in a box at the bottom of his mill-stream, much to the dismay of his daughter Grédel, who, like a true Alsatiennne, kept a sharp eye on the strong-box which was to furnish her dot. She is furious at the risk of her parents dying without being able to reveal the place of its concealment, which leads her father to remark on the unmanageableness of girls, and the disappointing results of the most excellent training. Grédel had had four times as many blows as Jacob, because she deserved it on account of her wanting to keep everything, putting it all into her own cupboard, and saying, "There, that's mine!" However, Grédel had some excuse for this anxiety about her marriage portion, for she was in love—much to her father's disgust—with Jean Baptiste Werner, clerk at a neighbouring stone-quarry, and ex-artillery sergeant—a poor match for the Mayor's daughter, but a clever and deserving fellow nevertheless. On the outbreak of war Jean Baptiste joins the garrison of Phalsbourg, where his brave conduct wins the admiration of Grédel's parents. Escaping after the capitulation, he succeeds in joining the ill-fated army of Bourbaki. The rumour that all who had escaped and again taken service against the Prussians would be shot throws the impetuous Grédel into a violent paroxysm of despair. She abuses her father for having supported the plébiscite, and cousin George for not going to fight the enemy, and ends by hurling a hatchet at a German soldier who happened to enter while her passion was at its height. Happily no untoward consequences followed from this rash act, after which M. Weber was glad to get rid of his daughter at any price. Accordingly, he no longer withholds his consent to her marriage with Jean Baptiste at the end of the war, with a view to which happy event her dowry is fished up from the bottom of the mill-stream. Grédel with her moods of tenderness and fury, her mingled generosity and selfishness, is just one of those bits of characterization in which MM. Erckmann-Chatrian excel. She must be added to that gallery of portraits of the French peasantry which they have traced with such masterly and lifelike accuracy.

As a work of art this story is inferior to its predecessors, for the simple reason that it is treated by our authors as a vent for the delivery of their minds on the misfortunes of their country, with a passionate fervour which is often intemperate and unjust. It is difficult to combine a novel and a philippic. We English come in for our share of reproach. England, we are told, is not what it once was. We have become too rich, and cling to our comforts overmuch. Our great statesmen are no longer Pitts and Chathams, who looked to the future greatness of their nation and took measures to secure it. Provided only that business prospers from day to day, future generations and the greatness of Britain give them no concern. And then we are threatened by MM. Erckmann-Chatrian with the stock bugbear of the development of North Germany into an enormous maritime power, a Prussian annexation of Holland, a Russian attack upon Constantinople, and what not. All this is rather weak and undignified, to say nothing of its irrelevancy. A maulier note, and one which carries with it more promise of regeneration for France, is struck in the concluding aspiration of Christian Weber. "Let us try to regain by labour, economy, and good conduct what Bonaparte lost for us by his plébiscite."

MABEL HERON.*

WE have no desire to see all men and all forms of society exactly alike. Uniformity becomes tiresome after a while; and if there is no discord in a monotone, neither is there variety; so that, on the whole, abnormal developments are rather good than otherwise, and unusual social arrangements pique our curiosity for the one part, and make us better satisfied with our own more humdrum condition for the other. But we cannot say that we should like to live among the people familiar to Mr. Peacock in his quality of author of Mabel Heron. Not that "darkest, strangest mystery of Gilgai" is equal to the queer secrets cherished among the folks who live in Hurnhope and Haverholme, with the parts adjacent; while the things they do, and the manner of men and women they are, totally upset all our calculations of social probabilities, and reduce us to a chronic state of wonder, tempered by incredulity. Taken singly, perhaps, both things and people might be accepted, one at a time, as barely possible; but mingled together they make a conglomerate of oddities unlike everything we have ever seen, and painfully trying to our faith.

No doubt a man may be found base enough to marry his well-endowed cousin solely for her fortune, and without even a pretence of love, and wicked enough to make her dead in Milwaukee, and his little daughter dead in Algeria, for a better chance of the estates between which and him stand these two lives. But, being so base and wicked, and a clever fellow into the bargain, he would scarcely have done his work by halves, consequently weakly and ineffectually. If he had determined on suppressing these two obstructive lives, he would have suppressed them in earnest. He would not have left the one, his wife, to wander about the world at her pleasure, cut adrift by an American divorce that would not stand good in any English Court, and at any moment able to return to her old home and make herself known to her former friends; nor would he have given up his child into the keeping of her own connexions, who would be sure to put in her claim when Sir Lionel died, and to make everything known when or if she married. We cannot but think this part of the framework very shaky, and, if ever probable at all, only probable some hundred years or more ago; now, when rapid communication has made the world so small and brought all people into so much closer contact with each other, it is close upon an impossibility. Granting, however, that General John Heron is barely possible, as one strange being acting in a wicked, mad, and silly way combined, his strangeness of circumstance, if not his wickedness of nature, is surpassed by that of Bill Foster the poacher, and the Reverend Mr. Chesham the vicar. We do not deny that possibly, somewhere about England, a village poacher and a well-to-do vicar may be brothers; but that these two men should be brought together in the same parish, though under different names, and both be brothers, on the wrong side, of that General John Heron who had made his wife dead in Milwaukee and his daughter in Algeria, though really leaving the latter in the care of his sister-in-law who lives where both vicar and poacher are to be found, is a little strong in the matter of coincidences. And when we add to the fact of this secret relationship, well known to both if unconfessed by either, the unrelenting persecution of Mabel by the vicar because she is a Heron, and the familiar friendliness, not to say patronage, of the poacher for the same reason, it is easy to understand how far removed from anything approaching to a picture of English country life is this odd, and yet not worthless, novel.

Mr. Peacock is kind to his readers in one respect; he leaves no doubt in their minds as to the moral status of his characters, and saves us the trouble of discriminating for ourselves by a free use of verbal signposts. The vicar, Mr. Chesham, is his villain par excellence; and a very proper and unmistakable villain he is; though things are so ordered that he does not commit much crime in fact, but only indulges in such exhibitions of temper and spite as we should have thought more natural in a woman than a man. He hates Mabel because she is a Heron, as we said; and from the first endeavours to dissuade her aunt from taking charge of her. And when the young lady is engaged to his nephew Edward Fulbeck, he preaches a sermon so directly attacking her that one or two of her friends get up and leave the church. He has not much evil to say of her, however, except that she wears false hair, which she does not; her beautiful hair being an hereditary gift, which she shares with her mother and all other female Herons. The funniest scene is that wherein his brother Bill Foster the poacher confronts Mr. Chesham in Mrs. Heron's drawing-room, and proclaims their fraternity by way of defending Mabel from the insinuation of illegitimacy which the parson has flung out. The intelligence produces, of course, an astounding effect. For Mabel and Mr. Chesham, and Mr. Fulbeck, the father of Mabel's young man, and Mrs. Heron, who has brought her up, are all related; Mr. Chesham, whose first wife had been a young woman called Chesham—hence his name—having taken for his second Keturah Fulbeck, Mrs. Heron's sister and Mr. Fulbeck's sister. Consequently he is brother-in-law to Mabel's aunt, as well as her own actual uncle by nature, if not by recognised relationship. It is a tangle, we admit, but we have made it rather clearer than our author has left it.

There seems to be a little confusion in the circumstances, if not in the character, of Mr. Chesham. He, like brother Bill the poacher, is the illegitimate son of a gentleman and "a young woman, a servant-girl from Lincolnshire. They called the eldest of 'em William, and the other Joseph," says brother Bill, in that famous scene of explanation and denunciation in Mrs. Heron's parlour; "and when he (the father) died, he left 'em a hundred pound a year apiece. Joseph took to schooling, got some education, and was made a hedge parson." Are there such things nowadays in England? Fifty or a hundred years ago they were to be found in plenty both in Wales and the North country, also in the extreme West; but we question their existence at the present day save as long-lived stagers, the last remains of the old system. But how Mr. Chesham, being originally a hedge parson with only a hundred a year, and no right to his name, could have come to be the vicar of a parish like Haverholme is beyond our power to make clear. Bishop and examining chaplain must both have been men of exceptional amiability or disastrous indolence; and the hedge parson's character does not seem to have been of a kind to make all else forgotten, nor were his acquirements greatly superior to his manners—which were, to say the least, bad. The fact is, Mr. Peacock's strength as an antiquary is his weakness as a novelist; and the old-world flavour he has given to his story, though invaluable in an essay or in a romance of foregone times, is ruinous to the interest and life-likeness of a modern novel. All the circumstances of present society are forgotten. The increased facilities of communication, the difficulty of disguise, of hiding, of social obliteration, the greater publicity in which we all live now compared with the closer and more stationary lives of our grandfathers and their grandfathers, the power of the police, and the network of telegraph wires carried everywhere—these things and the thousand modifications of manners growing out of them are ignored by Mr. Peacock in the formation of his plot; and the consequence is a certain sense of confusion and unreality. The style too is cold and hard, and the conversations are singularly stiff. When Edward Fulbeck offers his hand and heart to Mabel, there is no more life in what they say than if two mummies were set a-talking. He makes love as stiffly as Sir Charles Grandison in his new wig and best flowered waistcoat; and all her answers are in farthingales, though there is so much of nature in the interview that, as "she stood silent by his side, she looked upon him as the stars look upon the sin and sorrow of some never-sleeping city." Not that Edward is in any way sinful, nor specially sorrowful, save that he doubts his love when he says, "Mabel, I love you!" and clasps her hand to his heart:—

She gently withdrew it.

"Edward," she said, "you have long loved me as a friend, you do so now. Your life has been taken up with thoughts, not with seeing fresh faces. You do not know that you love me more than as a friend."

She arose to leave the river side, but his sad pleading face detained her.

"Edward, I am perplexed," she said. "You have always spoken truth itself to me, and I can trust your judgment, but what you say surprises me so much that I must think before I answer you."

"Think before you know whether you can love me, Mabel! And does it then require thought or calculation?" he said, inexpressible misery clouding his countenance.

"No, Edward, no—do not be unjust—I know my feelings now as well as I shall ever know them, but I may not have words at command to express them."

Their eyes again met. She could command the tones of her voice, but not the divine light of her features. He at once knew all.

"Forgive me, dearest, speak when you will;" he said, and he took her hand, and they walked together toward the house.

And yet Mabel Heron is not to be cast aside with contempt. It is the work of a learned man and a thoughtful one, and there are abundant traces in it of just observation and nice discrimination; but its method is so dry and hard, and its spirit is so far out of harmony with its chronology, that its good points fail to have their full value. There is, too, a perplexing inequality in the work throughout, especially as regards the naturalness and vividness of the characters, of which some are human enough, while others are more pasteboard dolls resembling the human figure more or less, but without depth or substance, even for the kind of things they are. Edward Fulbeck is one of these. Not the most friendly, and scarcely the most imaginative, critic could commend that young man as a tolerable likeness of a living being; and Mabel herself is nearly as shadowy. On the other hand, David Stotherd is strong and clear, and we fancy must have been drawn from life, not merely evolved out of the depths of that inexhaustible consciousness where novelists keep their patterns of men and women. The dreamy mysticism of the old Swedenborgian wood-carver is well shown and clearly rendered; but for all that, we question if Mabel Heron, the young lady of the place, would have been allowed to enter upon such terms of familiarity with him as are recorded by the biographer. We think that her aunt would have looked after her more closely, and have prevented both this innocent yet unconventional friendship, and also her familiarity with Bill the poacher. We question if Mr. Peacock's genius will ever lead him to become one of the successful story-tellers, and whether fiction is not labour in vain for a man whose whole bent is evidently antiquarian. He may of course come to more brightness and vitality than he has yet attained; but we think it doubtful; and we should imagine that his true path in literature lies elsewhere than among the subtle fancies of sentiment and romance.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE tendency to apologize for some of the worst Roman tyrants, which has for some time past been prominent in our historical literature, is creditable to the modern spirit in so far as as it proceeds from a disinclination to receive traditions upon trust, from a sentiment of equity and humanity, from a recognition of the extent to which every man is the creature of his age and circumstances. It is mischievous and unseemly in so far as it proceeds from a deliberate purpose of extenuating the offences of arbitrary power, or from a mere love of sophistical paradox. The memory of Tiberius is more indebted for such vindication as it has received to the former motive, that of Nero to the latter. Caesarism, and its involuntary but effective ally Courtism, cannot but look leniently on so typical an impersonation of the imperial system as Tiberius; Nero, we suspect, might have remained without an advocate if advocacy had not involved singularity. The matter would be of little importance but for the necessity imposed upon Nero's vindicators of casting a slur upon historical testimony itself in the persons of Tacitus and Suetonius, two writers of the highest moral repute among their contemporaries, awayed by no discoverable partiality, endowed by their social and official position with every opportunity of knowing the truth about occurrences too recent for oblivion and too remote for passion. If they have used all these advantages merely to deceive us, our confidence in the authenticity of any history must be impaired, and the accumulated stores of experience are rendered worthless. This would be rather too high a price to pay for a vindication of Nero, and we are glad to perceive that Dr. A. H. Raabe, a competent Dutch scholar, has addressed himself to the refutation of the matricidal Emperor's German and English apologists. The dulness of homely truth in comparison with ingenious paradox is so trite a topic that it is needless to apologise for Dr. Raabe's tameness of style,—a failing the more excusable, inasmuch as, from a laudable desire to be read out of Holland, he has submitted to the restraints attendant on composition in a foreign language. In point of argument he carries all before him; the only thing needful, in fact, is to establish the credibility of the ancient authorities, or rather, as the onus probandi lies on the other side, to show the insufficiency of the grounds on which it has been impeached. There is absolutely nothing against the veracity of Tacitus in this part of his work save the exceptional character of some of the incidents he relates, and the vague suspicion that he may have been misled by certain "Memoirs of Agrippina," respecting which some modern critics talk as confidently as if they had read every word of them. In fact we neither know that Tacitus used those Memoirs, nor that they were untrustworthy, nor that they existed at all. The most interesting chapter in the book, however, is that on the poisoning of Britannicus, which has been disputed on the ground of the unacquaintance of the ancients with any poison capable of producing the effects described. By the aid of a scientific friend, Dr. Raabe is enabled to demonstrate the fallacy of this assertion—a most hazardous one to have made under any circumstances. The book will be completed in another volume.

Otho IV.* was by no means the least able among the German Emperors, yet his reign was among the most unfortunate. It was his mischance to be brought into collision with France under the ablest of her mediæval sovereigns, and with the Papacy at the very acme of its development. Unequal to either contest, he has bequeathed a name memorable in connexion with a crushing defeat and a penance of unexampled humiliation. In his character there was much to respect, and the incidents of his varied career are among the most remarkable illustrations of the political and religious aspects of his time. Herr Langerfeldt's biography is composed with care and impartiality, and is highly interesting throughout.

Prince Magnus of Denmark, Duke of Livonia from 1560 to 1583 †, and successor (by purchase) of the last Grand Master of the Teutonic Order, is hardly a suitable subject for biography, on account of the almost entire absence of personal details respecting him. It is apparent that he bore an active part in the long series of conflicts by which his dominions were distracted during the whole period of his sovereignty; but, frequently as his name occurs, his personal influence upon the course of events seems to have been so slight that he gives one the idea of a mere shuttlecock tossed to and fro amid the Russians, Poles, Danes, Swedes, and Germans, who disputed the possession of his unfortunate duchy, which he nevertheless retained until his death. The late K. H. von Buse's so-called biography, therefore, is in fact a history of these complicated and at the present day not very interesting transactions. It is composed in a simple and lucid style, and is evidently founded on a thorough knowledge of the subject. Its highest interest perhaps consists in the illustrations which it supplies of the initial stages of Russian aggressiveness; its most dramatic episode is that of the five thousand Scottish auxiliaries who nearly all perished in a conflict with their own Livonian confederates, brought on by the arrogance and perfidum ingenium of both parties.

Lazarus, Baron von Schwendi ‡, was a general and counsellor of the Emperor Maximilian II., distinguished for his military services against the Turks, and still more honourably as an administrator and counsellor in domestic affairs. It is his highest honour to have been one of the few Catholic statesmen of his time who advocated toleration on the ground of principle. His views on the subject are embodied in a remarkable memoir addressed to the Emperor, a translation of which is the most interesting feature in Von Janko's biography.

Count Wartenleben's history of the operations of General Manteuffel's troops in the east of France during the last two months of the war § is mainly based on official despatches, many of which the Count has embodied in his narrative, and the arid precision of which he has invariably imitated with much felicity. The book, therefore, is entirely unattractive for non-military readers, but this very disdain of unprofessional suffrages affords some guarantee of its fitness for the technical circles for which it is probably designed.

E. Arnd's history of Europe from the beginning of 1867 to the termination of the late war ¶ is a continuation of a former work by the same author, and is distinguished by the same merits of impartiality, condensation, and perspicuity.

Dr. R. A. Lipsius, in his examination of the legends respecting the martyrdom of St. Peter at Rome*, divides the documents from which they are derived into three classes—the Edicta, in which St. Peter's visit to Rome is represented as undertaken for the sake of unmasking the magician Simon Magus, by whom St. Paul is evidently intended; the Catholic, in which the two apostles are introduced as jointly combating the impostor; and the Gnostic. These various versions, all framed for party purposes, and probably not containing a syllable of historical truth, afford a lively idea of the spirit of romantic mystification in the early Church. Dr. Lipsius's main position, the identity of St. Paul with the Simon Magus of the pseudo-Clementine "Recognitions," is very ably supported, but the fact is one of which the significance may be easily over-estimated. It by no means follows that the light in which St. Paul was regarded by an embittered and decreasing body of controversial opponents in the middle of the second century is a fair criterion of his relation to the Apostolic college in his own days.

Dr. Scholten's essay on the traditions respecting the Apostle John's residence in Asia Minor † scarcely displays the discriminating spirit of his earlier writings. He sets aside a considerable body of testimony in a cavalier manner, and seems to proceed throughout on the assumption that any insoluble difficulty in an ancient narrative offers a sufficient reason for rejecting it; as if perfect perspicuity in every detail, after a lapse of eighteen hundred years, were possible in the nature of things. He is far too dogmatic in his decision of such difficult questions as the authorship of the Apocalypse and the Fourth Gospel, and exhibits a strange insensibility to the internal evidence of style in failing to perceive that whoever wrote the Gospel ascribed to St. John must have written the Epistle also. Indeed his view of the latter is fatal to his own cardinal proposition that the former did not appear till about A.D. 150, since in that case the imitative supplement could not have been produced before A.D. 170 or 180—a palpable absurdity. His conception of the "beloved disciple" of the Gospel as a mere idealism, not intended to represent St. John or any other apostle, we can only characterize as ridiculous. On the whole, erudition and acuteness have rarely been exerted to less purpose.

Two able pamphlets on the existing disputes between the Imperial authorities in Germany and the Church of Rome show the real alarm of the German laity, and their resolution to render the members of religious corporations harmless at any sacrifice of the guarantees of personal liberty. Dr. Von Schulte's ‡ essay is chiefly concerned with the statistics and organization of the religious communities; Dr. Wasmerschleben's § with the general question of the relation of the State to ecclesiastical affairs. We regret to discover no symptoms in either of a disposition to consider the claims of the parochial Catholic clergy to the protection of the secular authorities.

The "Protestant lectures" ¶ in course of delivery at Berlin appear to represent in the main the theology of that party in the Prussian Church which regards Schleiermacher as its founder and its model. The process of its development since his period would seem to have favoured the critical rather than the mystical element of his teaching, while at the same time these discourses display no lack of religious fervour, and must indeed, whether eloquence, cogency, or perspicuity be regarded, be considered very remarkable compositions. The numbers before us relate for the most part to the subjects most usually controverted between supernaturalists and anti-supernaturalists. The frequent references to Dr. Keim attest the steady growth of the influence of this eminent Swiss theologian.

Dr. E. Doehler's lecture on Hellenic oracles ¶, in Virchow and Von Holtzendorff's series, is a clear and able historical conspectus of the subject. The author establishes a tripartite chronological classification of oracles—the Dodonian, when the primitive agricultural population was chiefly interested in forecasts of the weather; the Delphic, belonging to the era of free political activity; the mystic or theurgic, typified by the Cave of Trophonius, and flourishing when religion was becoming an affair of secret rites and magical incantations.

Dr. Post ** defends the doctrine of personal immortality by considerations derived from the assumed subjectivity of human knowledge, and the consequent want of evidence for the reality of the external world. The effect of this line of argument is to save the future life at the expense of the present, which is resolved into a mere illusion.

A meritorious work, Dr. Gideon Spieker's exposition of Shaftes-bury's philosophy*, would have been more meritorious still if the author had confined himself more strictly to his business, which we take to have been the elucidation of Shaftesbury's own views rather than the development of such speculations of his own as he conceives to be connected with them. These digressions are not amiss in matter, and display a laudable independence of metaphysical conventionalities, but the style is too vivacious and effervescent for the language of sober investigation, and their introduction impairs the symmetry of the monograph. Dr. Spicker's analysis of the "Characteristics," however, is very satisfactory, and very acceptable as tending to revive interest in a writer who is less read than he deserves.

An intellect of another order is investigated in another spirit by Dr. F. Jodl†, whose essay on the life and writings of Hume displays nothing of Dr. Spicker's excursive geniality, but is a model of impartial and accurate analysis. Dr. Jodl's attitude towards his author is simply that of a reporter, and the only point on which he feels bound to express an opinion of his own is the difficult question, Which of the three interlocutors in the Dialogues on Natural Religion is to be considered as most nearly expressing Hume's own sentiments? These, in Dr. Jodl's opinion, notwithstanding Hume's scruples against the demonstrability of causation, inclined to the teleological theism of Cleanthes.

The utility of J. W. Spengel's bibliography of works on the Darwinian theory‡ speaks for itself, and would be still further enhanced if it could be accompanied by a slight analysis of the books and essays quoted, showing their general tendency and line of argument, and the particular aspect of the question to which they principally refer.

Dr. Hagen's essays on insanity§ proceed from the pen of a circumspect and considerate physician, deeply impressed with the peculiar difficulties of his study. It is hard to determine whether physical phenomena stand to the malady in the relation of cause or of effect; moreover, they can only be adequately investigated after the death of the patient. Psychology may afford the required key, but must be cultivated in an empirical spirit. Such is the purport of the first and most important of Dr. Hagen's essays; what he understands by an empirical spirit appears from the accompanying minute, exhaustive, and inexpressibly painful study of one of the most irredeemably dismal cases of insanity ever made public, that of Count Chorinsky||, whose murder of his wife by poison was a cause célèbre about four years since.

The peculiar misery of Chorinsky's case is its exhibition of abject suffering without any element of tragedy; the ever deepening gloom of Lennau's life¶ mitigates the repulsiveness of the ultimate catastrophe by investing it with the semblance of austere necessity. In Chorinsky humanity is degraded, in Lennau it is in some measure ennobled. A sympathetic and not ill-written sketch of Lennau's hapless career, chiefly compiled, however, from Schurz's biography, forms the sole redeeming feature in the otherwise worthless book of a worthless author, Johannes Scherr. The rest of the volume is chiefly occupied by provocations to national rancour and prejudice, morally on a par with similar productions on the other side of the Rhine, but innocent of any pretensions to elegance or wit.

A collection of letters from Goethe to Eichstädt**, although introduced by the editor with much pomp and circumstance, contains little of interest. Eichstädt was the conductor of the Jena Allgemeine Literatur-Zeitung, and the correspondence relates principally to the concerns of that journal, to which Goethe contributed, and in which he took a cordial but patronizing interest. His letters are mostly brief and couched in a formal style. The most remarkable passage is one in which he expresses the conviction that all varieties of opinion should be represented in a literary journal, and that the functions of the editor should be analogous to those of the Speaker of the English House of Commons. Some of his strictures on his unsuspecting fellow-contributors are sufficiently amusing. The most interesting part of the correspondence extends from 1803 to 1815.

Moritz Jokai's reminiscences of the Hungarian Burns, Petöfi††, do not amount to a regular biography, but vividly depict that impulsive and erratic genius through the medium of anecdotes, some derived from personal acquaintance, and all, as it would seem, sufficiently authentic. Petöfi's character appears to have been of the accepted Magyar type, except that, with a full measure of his countrymen's fiery and contentious spirit, he was devoid of the practical intelligence which has made constitutional government possible in Hungary. He was a purely lyrical poet, whose strength consisted wholly in the utterance of impassioned emotion and in his quick sympathy with the distinctively national aspect of the manners and scenery of his country. His descriptions of these, though probably not the most valuable portions of his writings, are those to which he will be principally indebted for whatever celebrity he may acquire among foreigners. The evanescence of pure lyrical feeling when rendered into a strange tongue is generally in proportion to the charm of the original, and in Petöfi's case there is no depth of thought, no intellectual suggestiveness, to atone for the loss of the original magic and music. Although, however, the range of Petöfi's intellectual sympathies was narrow, he was by no means an unsophisticated peasant. He was acquainted with German, French, and English, and well read in the principal lyrical poets of all these countries. Goethe in characteristic could not endure.

L. Meinardus, the author of twelve letters on the present condition of music in Germany*, desires a unity in the Teutonic musical world corresponding to that now so happily established in the political order. His recipe is a very simple one everybody is to admire Johann Sebastian Bach as much as he himself does. Bach, it seems, has the practical advantage ascribed to the Republican form of government in France—he is the composer qui nous divise le monde. Until, however, the Wagnerites and the Schumannians and the Mendelssohnians consent to rally around his unifying banner, the field would seem to be practically in possession of another Bach—namely, Offenbach whose pieces, in the July of last year, had seventy-two representations against forty-six of those of all other composers put together.

Oscar Riecke† actually is a poet, whose spirit and melody contrast most favourably with the trivial commonplace of most contemporary German lyrists. He has unfortunately fallen too much under the spell of Heine, and the most important section of his volume, the cycle of poems entitled "Enamoured," can only be regarded as a creditable approximation to an inimitable model. He is more distinctively individual when more objective in style; some of his ballads are highly pathetic, and a series of little poems illustrative of popular proverbs expresses pithily wisdom with most felicitous effect.

MINISTERS AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

WHEN at the bag-end of a Session a Conservative Lord Mayor receives at dinner a Liberal Ministry, the talking on both sides is naturally of a tame and commonplace order. There are some things which are said as matters of course. Ministers can remark that the Corporation of London is a grand institution, and the Lord Mayor can reply that so are the Houses of Parliament. Ministers can point out that personally the Lord Mayor is an excellent man—all Lord Mayors are excellent men—and the Lord Mayor, although he is their political opponent, can acknowledge with handsome candour that Ministers at least work hard and mean well. When these commonplaces are over there is nothing more to be said. It is a political banquet from which politics are excluded. The toast may not ruffle the Liberal feelings of his guests, and the guests may not ruffle the Conservative feelings of their host. A certain length of time must however be consumed in speaking, and the ingenuity of the speakers is generally equal to the task of making as much as possible out of the tiny oratorical capital they have to trade upon. The CHANCELLOR, for example, was great on Wednesday upon the proper metaphor to be used in speaking of the House of Lords. It was not to be called a drag, but it might be called a fly-wheel. To hear it called a drag made the CHANCELLOR unhappy, because that seemed to imply that the coach of the Commons sometimes went too fast, which the CHANCELLOR could not admit. But to hear the House of Lords called a fly-wheel was calculated to please the CHANCELLOR and offend no one, for a fly-wheel only makes the working of other machinery more perfect; and this is exactly the function which, it may be hoped, the Lords are universally recognized as discharging with admirable success. Who could wish to refuse the CHANCELLOR the harmless pleasure of choosing his metaphor? And no doubt it would be delightful to him if he could but persuade himself and his friends that in his own immediate sphere of law reform he could be more properly compared to a fly-wheel than to a drag. Mr. BRUCE spoke for the House of Commons, and those who have so often criticized him adversely may admit with pleasure that he did his little bit of work very neatly, and gave a pretty turn to some of his remarks. In describing the work of the Session he had to choose his topics adroitly, for such matters as the Ballot Bill were necessarily excluded. Any reference to that flower of Liberal measures would have grated harshly on the ears of a Conservative Lord Mayor. Over that which had occupied so large a slice of the time and attention of the Commons it was incumbent on the HOME SECRETARY to throw a graceful veil. But there were subjects left on which he could safely and pleasantly touch. He could show how far-reaching is the vigilance and how wide the sympathy of the House of Commons, by referring to Bills the mention of which could give no one pain. "This Session," he said, "the House of Commons has distinguished itself by legislating for the protection of the toilers who ply their perilous trade in the deep mine, and it has at the same time also taken under its care the sparrow on the housetop and the robin on the bough." Nothing tastier in the amiable poetical line has been said by a Minister for years.

Mr. GLADSTONE, being Prime Minister and the great man of the occasion, could not simply say nothing. It was open to Mr. GLADSTONE to spend many long minutes in explaining to an astonished audience that the war ships of the present day differ both in build and cost from the war ships of the reign of Queen ELIZABETH. But Mr. GLADSTONE could not let himself off so easily, and he had to select topics not unworthy to be discussed by an eminent person, which should be of some interest to his hearers, and yet not provocative of party discord. The recent history of the Treaty of Washington supplied him with a fitting theme. It is most satisfactory that the negotiations did not all come to nothing, and men of all parties share in the satisfaction. No one dreads and deprecates a quarrel with the United States more than a wealthy citizen of London, and the LORD MAYOR might be trusted to rejoice, as much as if he had been a Liberal, that the effusions of delight at the Treaty, and anticipations of its bright consequences, to which General SCHENCK gave utterance at the Mansion House a year ago, have not been rendered futile and belied by the actual result. That the Ministry had been much distrusted and severely criticized during the time when it seemed as if the Treaty would fall through, Mr. GLADSTONE did not conceal. But most wisely, instead of defending the Ministry, which has got the best of defences, that of success, to rely on, he seized on the occasion of praising the Opposition. The Conservatives had, he acknowledged, shown great prudence and public spirit by refraining from attacks which might have led to a party triumph, but would have been perilous to the interests of the nation. This was perfectly true, and it was proper and pleasant to say that it was true in the presence of a Conservative Lord Mayor. The other topic on which Mr. GLADSTONE felt he might safely comment was the present state of English trade, which in some way or other concerned every man present. The industry of the country in the last few months, he said, has advanced not by steps but by strides, not by strides but by leaps and bounds. This has given rise to some complications, which are to be regretted, but Mr. GLADSTONE expressed himself as confident that the good sense and good feeling of the country, and the good understanding that prevails between the employers and the employed, will gradually smooth away all difficulties. This was quite the right line for Mr. GLADSTONE to adopt. He holds a position which makes his words fulfil themselves to some extent. When a Prime Minister, and more especially when a Prime Minister like Mr. GLADSTONE, who has won a great financial reputation, and has taken anxious thought for those whom he has considered to be unduly weighted in the race of life, admires his countrymen for not regarding strikes and temporary changes of price with too much disquiet, and when he appeals to the good understanding existing between classes as an admitted fact, he really does much to bring about or to preserve the state of things which he describes.

But a day will come, and possibly before very long, when some other Premier will go to the Mansion House, and Mr. GLADSTONE's reign will be over. The Ministry is, as Mr. GLADSTONE said, an old Ministry, and old Ministries like old men are apt to die, and the Ministry will die, and its epitaph will be written. Mr. GLADSTONE modestly expressed a hope that this epitaph when it is written will record that the Ministry in its lifetime diligently laboured in the service of its country. We may be sure that so much good will be said of it, and that this will be only a small part of the just praise that will be inscribed on its tombstone. Its blunders will in time be forgotten, and men will chiefly remember that it did great things in its day. What was chiefly observable in the sayings of Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. BRUCE on this head was the longing to be out of office that shone through their remarks. They seem to regard a decisive vote against them as the beginning of holidays which they have justly earned. The LORD MAYOR comforted them by saying that they have a good prospect of a happy release. In a seeming paradox he declared that while the present House of Commons adequately represented the country, the next House of Commons would exhibit a very different arrangement of party strength. It might seem as if the present Parliament must represent the country badly if the constituencies would send a very different set of representatives to Westminster were they called to select a new House of Commons. But the LORD MAYOR was quite right. The present House does represent the country fairly, and yet, if there were an election, the Conservatives would win a great many seats, and might perhaps feel themselves strong enough to take office. But if they did take office, they would do very much what the present Government would do if it continued to hold office. It would be a change of men, not of measures. The tired Ministers would be at liberty to play, and the fresh Ministers would take their turn at working; but that would be all. The great Liberal measures of the present Ministry would remain intact, and it makes little difference to what Ministry Licensing and Public Health Bills are confided. The foreign and the financial policy of the country would remain precisely the same, for it is the foreign and financial policy of the country, and not of any particular Ministry. As Mr. BRUCE said, a change of Government might prove nothing more than a merciful dispensation of Providence calculated to preserve the lives of hard-worked men. Mr. GATHORNE HARDY would have to pardon criminals while Mr. BRUCE went to sleep unabused, and to sleep and not to be abused are delights of the soul to which Mr. BRUCE has long been a stranger. The LORD MAYOR is a very amiable man, and he may have liked to know that Mr. BRUCE thought he had so much to gain by going out of office. But the zealots of the Conservative party must feel that the edge of their estimated success is already a little blunted for them by the knowledge that to no one will it be more welcome than to the leaders of their adversaries, and that the present Cabinet, perfectly secure against the contingency of any change of principle or practice which they would seriously regret, only see in a Conservative triumph a means by which, under the favour of a beneficent Providence, they will be enabled to recruit their health and strength.

SPAIN AND KING AMADEO.

IT is probable that the King of Spain may derive some temporary popularity from the abortive attempt to assassinate him. Even the populace of Madrid, long accustomed to deeds of treachery and violence, seems to have resented an outrage which would, if it had succeeded, have disgraced the Spanish nation. The Italian Prince, if he has the misfortune of being a foreigner, was not an intruder or a volunteer. He accepted the Crown on the invitation of the foremost statesmen in Spain, who acted with the full authority of the Cortes. The offer had previously been declined both by King FERDINAND and by King LUIS of Portugal; and the acceptance of Prince LEOPOLD of Hohenzollern was in a memorable crisis withdrawn. The country had deliberately rejected the project of a Republic, nor was there the smallest reason to believe that any considerable party desired a Bourbon restoration. Prince AMADEO was entitled to assume that he would be a welcome guest until by his public services he had earned a right to the gratitude and loyalty of his adopted country. He has since exerted himself to teach Spanish politicians the meaning of constitutional government; nor has he been alarmed by the discovery that he incurs the enmity of any faction which happens for the moment to be excluded from power. He did his best to maintain the coalition which was practically dissolved by the death of PRIM; and he was guided by the opinion of a Parliamentary majority in preferring SAGASTA to ZORRILLA. It was not until SERRANO demanded the suspension of constitutional liberty that the King had recourse to the aid of the Radical leader. It may be found hereafter that he has undertaken to solve an impossible problem in attempting to govern by the aid of a majority which has perhaps no existence; but honesty and courage are rare qualities in Spain, though they may not be adequately appreciated. If the King remains on the throne he will find it necessary to exercise personal power instead of submitting to alternate dependence on the caprice and intrigue of chiefs of contending factions. The Spanish people will gradually learn that the interests of the dynasty are identified with their own, while the SAGASTAS and ZORRILLAS are only bent on acquiring power and salary for themselves and their followers. The would-be assassins have done their utmost to prove that the person of the King affords the best security for peace and order. Their brutal attempt to murder the QUEEN will scarcely command itself to the approval of any but the most reckless.

Although it would be unjust to impute the crime to the assassin, it is highly probable that it was designed by some of the more unscrupulous adventurers of their faction. The partisans of Pretenders cannot but feel that the value of the prize which they seek to bestow on a favourite claimant is greatly diminished by a precedent of regicide. Don CARLOS or Don ALFONSO would reign but insecurely in the room of a murdered rival; and it may be added that their supporters, with the exception perhaps of a few Carlist priests, are rather political conspirators than blind enthusiasts. The right and the duty of putting kings to death by private violence have from BRUTUS to MAZZINI been habitually preached, and sometimes practised, by zealous Republicans. It is not indeed certain that a vacancy of the throne resulting from assassination would not be filled by a successor; but the Republicans are probably convinced that their party would be the first to profit by surprise and by the consequent anarchy. The FIESCHIS and ORSINIS who attempted the life of LOUIS PHILIPPE and of NAPOLEON III. were invariably Republicans; and the chiefs of the Paris Commune, who may be regarded as the political counterparts of the extreme Republicans of Spain, perpetrated the wholesale murders which have since been avowed and defended by the organs of the International League in England. The KING will derive a double advantage from the attack on his person and from its failure, if the popular indignation is aroused against his most dangerous adversaries. The ancient theory that treason is a far greater crime than simple murder is thoroughly sound, although in modern times it has been forgotten or disputed. In putting to death a ruler who has been accepted or tolerated by the community the assassin inflicts both injury and insult on the entire nation; and at the same time he renders the necessary task of government additionally difficult and dangerous. Nothing but evil has resulted from the crime which deprived Spain of the firm hand which had from the time of the September Revolution controlled the army and the people. The murder of King AMADEO would still further augment the confusion which followed the death of PRIM.

All the factions which are or have been in opposition since the commencement of the present reign have in a degree, and for the most part unconsciously, countenanced the erroneous theory which culminates in regicide. The Bourbonist grandees have held aloof from the society of the Court; and recently many persons of considerable rank have signed a document in favour of the young Pretender, while they at the same time profess to abstain from conspiracies against the present KING. The Liberal followers of ZORRILLA, with two or three exceptions, rudely absented themselves from the Palace, because the KING, in the exercise of his discretion, had allowed SAGASTA to try the chances of a dissolution. All factions agree in exhibiting disrespect to the representative of the national sovereignty whenever he refuses to be their instrument or their ally. Jacobins and Socialists think that they draw a logical inference from the commonly accepted doctrine when they assume that they are entitled to kill the obnoxious personage whom rival factions are content merely to annoy. Continental nations who think fit to maintain monarchical institutions will do much for the establishment of constitutional government when they adopt the English maxim that the King can do no wrong. The agents of the Crown may conveniently be held responsible for acts which cannot be accomplished without their concurrence. It is only by the enjoyment of immunities conceded for the public good that the sovereign can perform his proper function of mediation and superintendence. An hereditary GLADSTONE, or even an hereditary PERL, would provoke intolerable jealousies on the part of those who might conscientiously disapprove of his character and policy. King AMADEO understands better than any of his subjects the difference between a King and a leader of a political party. If the Republicans hereafter succeed in overthrowing the Monarchy, the difference between a President elected by the aid of numbers or force and an impartial King will perhaps be tardily appreciated. A country in the condition of Spain cannot afford to amuse itself by calculating the comparative chances of a GARRETT or a GRAM, who is not expected to do much good, and who would be incapable of causing serious harm; nor have the Spaniards learned from the Americans the invaluable lesson of acquiescing in the decision of a majority.

Little information can be gained from the promises which ZORRILLA makes on behalf of his new Progressive Ministry. General phrases about liberty and law, and constitution are in other parts of the world indefinite, and modern Spanish history has repeatedly proved that in that country political professions are absolutely without meaning. It was necessary that the Cortes, which constituted a large majority hostile to the Government, should be immediately dissolved; and it is thought that even without undue interference the Government will succeed in reversing the result of the last election. The scheme for reorganising the army which, according to report, has been devised by General CORDOBA as Minister of War, may have graver consequences than any appeal to the constituencies. It is said that the Government is about to effect large reductions in the regular army, and at the same time to imitate the modern fashion of providing an enormous reserve of militia. Unless General CORDOBA has been misrepresented, his scheme appears to be both dangerous and probably impracticable. The proposed reduction of the numbers of the army will create formidable discontent among the officers; and it is unreasonable at a time when the Government has the greatest difficulty in providing troops for the necessities of the public service. If the Government persists in arming a large portion of the population, it will cause unqualified mischief. The members of the respectable classes are seldom inclined to play at soldiers; and Socialist workmen will almost certainly use any military power which they may acquire for political purposes. There was some excuse for the fatal blunder of arming the disaffected populace of Paris against the foreign besieger, but an armed multitude in Spain would have no opportunity of using its weapons except for civil war. It is not pretended that Spain is exposed to even the remotest risk of invasion; and it has colonies to defend which require the services of regular troops. The reduction of the army at present would mean the abandonment of Cuba; and it is not impossible that the militia which is to take the place of a standing army might represent by a revolt the popular indignation which would be aroused by the loss of the colony. Of all countries on the Continent of Europe Spain is the least likely to require for any legitimate purpose a general levy of the population; but large non-professional armaments are favoured by extreme Liberals and by Republicans, and General CORDOBA probably desires to consult the popular taste.

MR. JUSTICE KEOGH.

THE question which has been raised by Mr. BUTT's motion for the dismissal and degradation of Mr. Justice KEOGH is in itself a very simple one, and although, in deference to the Irish members, there is to be a second night's debate, the subject may be regarded as practically exhausted. Mr. BUTT's own speech supplied, in fact, a sufficient and obvious answer to his motion, and no further argument was necessary to show that it was groundless and uncalled for. He proposed that the House of Commons should resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House to consider Mr. Justice KEOGH's judgment on the Galway Election Petition, and the complaints that had been made as to the partisan and political character of the Judge's observations. In the event of this motion being agreed to, Mr. BUTT was prepared to move in Committee that Mr. Justice KEOGH had "abused his position as a Judge of election petitions by delivering a violent personal and partisan address"; that he had thereby caused great scandal in Ireland, and shaken the confidence of the people in the administration of justice; and that, in consequence of this misconduct and its results, "his continuance on the Bench had become inconsistent with the interest of the public and the honour of the Crown." Mr. BUTT's speech altogether failed to support these allegations. He read passages from Mr. Justice KEOGH's address, and had no difficulty in showing that it contained a good many loose, irrelevant, and inconsequential remarks, as well as personal attacks of a violent and offensive character. There can be no doubt that, from a literary point of view, the judgment is very poor stuff, that it is marked both by bad taste and bad temper, and sinks in some parts into sheer buffoonery. The Judge begins by a series of extravagant compliments to the counsel engaged in the case, "the great man who leads for the petitioner," the junior, the sheriff, and the policeman on duty in Court. He had begun his career as a member of the Galway Circuit, and he seems to have thought that this would be an excellent opportunity to show that the old glories of Irish eloquence were not altogether at an end. He takes what he calls a rapid glance at the historical, geographical, moral, and political position of the county, interspersed with autobiographical recollections, local gossip, and elegant quotations to show what a clever fellow the Judge is, and how much he knows about everything and everybody. He has Brann and the Father at his fingers' ends, and at every other sentence he flies off a tangent from the question before him to discourse on the heroism of the majestic CROMWELL, the profligate abbes of the French Revolution, Mr. BURKE, or the Waldenses. The Irish have a very expressive, though vulgar, name for this kind of rambling, helter-skelter talk; and anybody who wants to know what "bletherumskye" is will find it to perfection in Mr. Justice KEOGH's address. Mr. Justice KEOGH, however, has been for some fifteen years on the Bench, and his style of oratory was pretty well formed, and sufficiently well known, before he was made a Judge. It is not to be supposed that this is the first time his utterances have been wanting in classic repose or judicial solemnity; but it does not appear that there have ever before been any complaints on this score. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that the judgment has proved unpalatable to the Irish clergy, not because it is deficient in the graces of style, but because the findings which it embodies happen to strike at the authority of their order. In one sense it is quite true that the judgment is of a personal and partisan character. It is personal because it singles out certain persons by name, and imputes criminal conduct to them; and it is partisan because the Judge certainly takes part against the priests, and condemns their conduct. But in this sense all judgments are partisan and personal; and the important distinction must not be lost sight of between a summing-up for the guidance of a jury and the definite decision of a Judge. Mr. Justice KEOGH had only to express his own conclusions, and he was entitled to pass over such matters as he deemed trivial and unimportant.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had no difficulty in showing how completely Mr. BUTT had failed to make out his case. The judgment might, or might not, be characterized by faults of taste and temper, and on that point Sir J. COLERIDGE gave no opinion, although, when he expressed his thankfulness that it was not necessary for him to do so, he perhaps left it to be inferred that he had personally no relish for Mr. Justice KEOGH's exuberant rhetoric. But faults of style in the language of a judgment are not an offence of sufficient gravity to be punished by degradation from the Bench. The important thing is, that the judgment shall be fair and just in its practical conclusions. Of course it is desirable that a Judge should uniformly express himself with judicial calmness and dignity, but Judges after all are only men, and in ascending the Bench they do not put off the frailties of humanity. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, speaking with twenty-five years' experience of English Courts, was constrained to admit that barristers in this country have occasionally to submit to the introduction of irrelevant topics, and intemperate expressions, and even to unmanly interruptions from the Bench. We suspect there are very few cases in which the counsel on the defeated side are entirely satisfied either with the law or manners of the Judge who summed up or gave a decision against them, and there can be no doubt that even the best Judges are not invariably devoid of prejudice, or infallible in their interpretation of the law. Judgments are frequently reversed; but it is unusual to propose that a Judge should be dismissed because he has given an erroneous decision, still less that he should be dismissed for giving a sound decision in language of perhaps unnecessary violence. In order to justify so serious a step as the degradation of a Judge, it must be shown that he has not only given a wrong decision, but that he has done so from corrupt motives; and this is where Mr. BUTT's indictment against Mr. Justice KEOGH altogether broke down. Mr. BUTT professed to believe, that the fact that the Government had resolved to prosecute only twenty out of the thirty-six persons reported by Mr. Justice KEOGH to have been guilty of undue influence, amounted to an admission that those who are to be let alone were unjustly accused. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained that while thirty-six persons in all had been reported as guilty of undue influence, twenty of them had been reported as guilty of a particular form of intimidation, namely, denunciations from the altar, and the law officers of the Crown had resolved to prosecute the latter simply because their misconduct was of a very flagrant character, and there appeared to be sufficient evidence to ensure a conviction. The others might be equally guilty, but the evidence against them was less decisive.

It is important to remember that the report of an election Judge in regard to persons whom he believes to have been guilty of improper practices does not amount to an absolute conviction. Nobody can be convicted without being brought to trial, and the persons who are to be prosecuted now have an opportunity of defending themselves. The report of the election Judge is, in a manner, analogous to that of a police magistrate committing a prisoner for trial, and the law officers of the Crown are the grand jury who decide whether a true bill has been found. The determination of the Government to prosecute the twenty priests and prelates enumerated by the Irish ATTORNEY-GENERAL is creditable to their courage and impartiality; but it would, perhaps, have been well that they should have taken upon themselves the responsibility of meeting Mr. BUTT's motion by a distinct resolution, instead of leaving the defence of the Judge to the enterprise of private members. Mr. PIM proposed that the House, while regretting that Mr. Justice KEOGH should have used intemperate language, should declare that there was no ground for removing him from the Bench; but an opinion which might be reasonably expressed in private conversation acquires a more serious import when expressed in a solemn manner by the House of Commons. It is neither desirable nor necessary that Parliament should bestow its attention on such a comparatively trifling matter as the oratorical flourishes of a judicial decision, or weaken the authority of a Judge by censuring him for an indiscretion which does not warrant his removal from the Bench. Mr. H. JAMES, in a vigorous speech, justified Mr. Justice KEOGH's outspoken condemnation of a formidable plot on the part of the priesthood to destroy freedom of election, and showed that by the admission of the Bishops the introduction of names or matters of political controversy into addresses from the altar was expressly forbidden by the Synod of Thurles. Mr. Justice LAWSON, it must be remembered, spoke quite as strongly of the misconduct of the priests as Mr. Justice KEOGH, and even the prelates and priests whom Cardinal CULLEN convoked at Dublin did not attempt to deny that "indiscretions" had been committed by their brethren in Galway. The truth would seem to be that the policy of the Roman Catholic Church at that moment required that the clergy should run the risk of violating the law. In a neighbouring county the priests had, in some degree, taken part against a Home Rule candidate who had succeeded in spite of them. It was necessary to prove that in Galway at least the Church was supreme. A Home Rule candidate was brought into visible and ostentatious subjection to the Archbishop. The tenants were apprised that, if they wanted to get the better of the landlords, they must go with the priests, who would enforce the precedent of the Port-a-Carron award, and compel the restoration of land to evicted tenants. On the other hand, the landlords were reminded that they too must submit, or it would be the worse for them. It was a pretty scheme, but unfortunately the priests, in their desire to advertise their power, brought themselves into collision with the law. It is unnecessary to assume that no jury will be found to convict them; but even if this apprehension should prove true—and experience of past trials is not encouraging—it is no reason why the prosecutions should not be carried out. It will at least be made apparent that the Government is determined to do its part in enforcing the law, and in time it may be hoped that, under the influence of a more healthy public opinion, the people will not refrain from lending their assistance.

THE AMERICAN ARGUMENT.

IN one of his despatches on the Indirect Claims Mr. FISH denounced the remarkable proposition that arbitration, so far from being a contrivance for the amicable settlement of international differences, was rather the commencement of a new quarrel, inasmuch as it furnished an occasion for the production of irritating statements and arguments. Philanthropists in both countries who had prematurely congratulated themselves on the adoption of their principles by the Governments which framed the Treaty of Washington probably took exception to Mr. FISH's cynical declaration; but the counsel for the United States have to the best of their ability justified the opinion of the SECRETARY OF STATE by the bitter and hostile spirit in which they have thought fit to conduct the litigation. It might well have been thought incredible that the eminent lawyers who represent the American Government should remark that "The British Government must be in desperate straits for defence when" it condescends to resuscitate the stale calumnies of an homme "and like JOHN LAIRD, and to put them into its Case." Ordinary good-breeding and courtesy are not inconsistent with forensic vigour. The "Argument of the United States," issued before the withdrawal of the Indirect Claims, and not afterwards modified, confirms the conjecture that the American Government would, if the Claims had been referred to the Arbitrators, have used its utmost efforts to urge the demands which it has in almost express terms admitted to be extortionate and unjust. The elaborate arguments which are adduced in support of the Indirect Claims have now become irrelevant; but they are probably retained because they are connected with the declamatory vituperation which occupies a large portion of the entire document. For their own purposes, indeed, even the United States' counsel are capable of being complimentary to an English jurist; and the present respectable Judge of the Court of Admiralty will perhaps be surprised to find that some ambiguous passages in his work on International Law have earned for him the assertion that, "apart from his eminence as a judge and a statesman, he is facile princeps among the authorities of his class in "Great Britain." Mr. CORDEN's exaggerated rhetoric is for the third or fourth time exhumed in proof that an eminent English politician admitted or anticipated the most extravagant charges which have been advanced against his country. It is apparently impossible for Americans to understand that the unlimited freedom of opinion which prevails in England sometimes finds expression in vehement attacks on the policy of the Government and of the majority. Unfortunately there is in this case no reciprocity, as American orators never, even for polemical purposes, deviate into justice or generosity to England. If Mr. CORDEN and Mr. BRIGHT had been American citizens, they could not have devoted themselves with more unquestioning zeal to the vindication of the Federal cause.

It would be both useless and improper to discuss the questions which are now under the consideration of the Arbitrators; but a great part of the American Argument is entirely outside the subject-matter of the reference, having apparently been introduced by the counsel to gratify their own ill-will, or that which they attribute to their countrymen. By the 7th Article of the Treaty the powers of the Arbitrators are limited to the inquiry whether Great Britain has or has not failed to fulfil the duties set forth in the new rules, or recognized by the principles of international law not inconsistent with such rules. A further restriction is contained in the provision that the Tribunal shall certify the results of such inquiry with reference to the Alabama and the other cruisers included in the same category; yet the Argument, like the original Case, digresses into the question of the Proclamation of Neutrality and into other issues still more irrelevant. The hand of Mr. CUSHING may be traced in a far-fetched attack on the English Government for the alleged enlistment during the Russian war of certain English subjects temporarily resident in the United States. At that time Mr. CUSHING, then Attorney-General, expressed a hope that the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the Court would "rebound against" the throne of Queen VICTORIA. He and his colleagues now found on the transaction an elaborate sneer at the difficulty which England has sometimes experienced in the enlistment of troops. "We understand," they say, "how the British Minister fell into the error of thus exposing to the gaze of the world on this occasion the difficulty of obtaining troops at home. In former wars, as we in the United States had sad experience, it had been the custom of Great Britain thus to act, at a period of time when the enlistment of foreign troops was a practice all but universal in Europe." Mr. CUSHING refers to GEORGE III.'s Hessian regiments which served against the Colonists during the Rebellion, while on the other side LAFAYETTE and ROCHAMBEAU could scarcely be considered indigenous Americans. It might have been thought that the grievance of nearly a hundred years ago had but little relation to the depredations of the Alabama. The alleged enlistments during the Russian war were not of Hessians but of Englishmen or Canadians. Assuredly Mr. FISH judged accurately when he foretold that arbitration would afford great facilities for the exhibition of rudeness and of spite. The perfect consistency of the substance of the Argument with its manner is proved by the avowed claim for vindictive and punitive damages. The liability arising from failure of duty as to all or any of the cruisers can scarcely be assessed by an examination of the motives of the English Government; and the counsel for the United States must be fully aware that no such claim was contemplated as possible by the English Government when it concluded the Treaty of Washington. If a failure of duty occurred, it is beyond the province of the Arbitrators to inquire whether Lord PALMERSTON and Mr. GLADSTONE wished for the success or failure of the Confederate secession.

It is well that the right of a sovereign Power to determine for itself the time of recognizing insurgents as belligerents was not submitted to arbitration, but the contention on the subject which is involuntarily and superfluously framed by the American counsel would in any case have refuted itself. "So long," they say, "as the rebellion in the United States remained unaccompanied with belligerent rights, all maritime warfare in its name would have borne the legal character of piratical violence and robbery." If the Confederates had been pirates at sea they would have been felons on land; yet the Government of the United States accorded them the rights of lawful belligerents, and the Supreme Court ruled that a regular state of war existed at the very time when the fact was recognized by the English Government, at the instance of one of the most earnest advocates of the United States. According to Mr. CUSHING and his colleagues, the officers and crew of any Confederate cruiser would, but for the QUEEN'S Proclamation, have been legally and justly liable to capital punishment in England. The proposition is in itself utterly untenable; for any competent Court would have been bound on the evidence of the President's declaration of blockade to adjudge that the Confederates were entitled to the rights of belligerents. The QUEEN'S Proclamation operated merely as a caution to her own subjects, and in no way enlarged the rights which had previously been conferred on the Confederates by the act of the American Government. It is strange that the counsel for the United States should fail to understand that the alternative of lawful belligerency or piracy is in itself conclusive as to the condition of the Confederate cruisers. That a league of eight or nine States, known to the American Constitution as sovereign, and exercising undisputed jurisdiction and authority within their own territories, should be described as a horde of rebels and pirates, is an outrage on common sense. The majority of American politicians and jurists, including both Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. LINCOLN, had up to the date of the secession held that, whether or not it was morally justifiable, the outgoing States could not be reclaimed by force. When the Proclamation of Neutrality was issued, nearly all Englishmen, and the great majority of Americans, believed in perfect good faith that the disruption would be permanent. The disabilities which were afterwards imposed on the defeated party proceeded from the will of the conqueror enforced by his own legislation. It is not known that the question whether secession was lawful has up to the present time been determined by any American tribunal. For foreign Powers it was enough to know that the Confederate Government exhibited all the characteristics of a self-governed and independent community. The insurgents of Cuba, whose relations to the American Government are noticed in the course of the Argument, have no definite territory, no Government, and no army.

On the necessary assumption of the capacity and integrity of the Geneva Tribunal there is no reason to regard the result of the inquiry with anxiety, although it may possibly involve pecuniary loss to England. If the Government and people of the United States, in accordance with their engagements, accept the decision of the Arbitrators as a termination not only of litigious proceedings but of the one-sided quarrel with England, the precedent of reference to arbitration may perhaps hereafter be followed. Verbal abuse is less injurious than warlike operations; and the representatives of England have with wisdom and dignity, during the course both of the previous negotiations and of the litigation, abstained from retaliation or reciprocal discourtesy. There is reason to believe that, in spite of the efforts of Mr. FISH and of the American agents and counsel, the award will be regarded in the United States as an amicable settlement of the dispute. Already Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS and his Government have with much ingenuity persuaded themselves that the Arbitrators have adjudicated on the Indirect Claims, which they in fact denounced by anticipation, and without claiming or exercising jurisdiction, as intrinsically monstrous. It is possible that the offensive language of the Case and Argument may not present to its authors the same pugnacious and irritating character which has caused surprise and disappointment in England. In the probable contingency of the refusal of the Arbitrators to discuss the motives or the past history of the English Government, the American counsel will perhaps be content to have liberated their own souls by adherence to the national tradition. The Arbitrators have, with sound judgment, resolved to conduct the inquiry in private; and even if they ask to hear the oral arguments of counsel, there is no pleasure in quarrelling without an audience. On the whole, there is now reason to hope for a satisfactory result.

THE FRENCH LOAN.

THE French Loan is the great event of the day, and over all Europe is exciting intense interest. It is a gigantic affair—140 millions sterling to be offered for subscription in a few hours, and a good prospect of its being three or four times covered. The thrifty French peasant will have its attractions submitted to him to-morrow, with everything done in the way of facility of subscription and exalted motives to induce him to draw upon his hoards; while, even for big capitalists, the operations it will involve are very big. The price of issue is to be 84½ per cent., and as the full interest is to begin to run at once, and allowances for prepayment in anticipation of instalments are to be made, the price is reduced to 80½ to those who are in a position to take full advantage of the offers of the Government. Is it at this price a good investment? It is, we are inclined to think, a good investment for those who intend to hold, but it is a doubtful investment for those who only subscribe to sell out at a premium; and if it were not for those who subscribe with the intention of making a profit quickly, the vast amount anticipated would never be subscribed. The French will have to find most of the money, and the wish to free the country from the foreigner, and the temptation of lending money to the State so as to produce more than six per cent. to the investor, will perhaps act powerfully enough to ensure a large portion of the French share of the subscriptions being filled up. But when French newspapers speak in high glee of the loan being covered three or four times, it is certain that if the event proves them right, as may not improbably be the case, the bulk of the subscriptions will be made by persons who think that they are going to clear something handsome by the transaction. The question for those who regard the loan in this light is whether it will command a high premium during the next few months. This, it must be repeated, is a totally different question from that which has reference to the intrinsic merit of the investment. French Five per Cent. Rentes are cheap at 80½, and if things go reasonably well with France for the next few years, if there is no civil war, no planning for revenge against Germany, no shrinking from the burdens of taxation, the loan will no doubt touch par, and investors will have made a benefit of five-and-twenty per cent. on their outlay. But there are many considerations which should make persons hesitate who do not mean to invest in the loan, but who think it worth while to subscribe for the chance of selling soon at a premium.

The magnitude of the operation is in itself somewhat against the notion of such a speculation being prudent. The amount of the loan will probably be 140 millions nominal, and as 14½ per cent. is to be paid on subscription, the deposits on application will reach 20 millions. If the loan was really covered four times, the deposits would reach the enormous sum of 80 millions. This would disorganize the whole system of French business, and would cause very considerable difficulty in most European financial centres. The French Government has therefore felt itself obliged to allow that subscriptions in France by large capitalists may be made, not in cash, but by lodging securities with the Government. This will undoubtedly ease the market, and make the operation practicable at the outset. But if the real nature of the subscription under these circumstances is attended to, it will be seen how very doubtful it is whether anything like the bulk of the persons who have thus locked up a vast amount of securities will be in a position to command a premium sufficient to compensate for the trouble they have taken. In order to take the full benefit of the Government offer, it will be necessary to pay up the whole at an early date, and not to pay by instalments. Where is the money to come from? It is always taken for granted that the bulk of the permanent holders of the loan will be Frenchmen; and how are Frenchmen to get enough to pay up the loan in full, and also to pay a premium on it? for unless genuine French buyers give a premium, there will be none to be got. It is said that the money will be forthcoming out of the hoards of gold stowed away in France. The notes of the Bank of France, being inconvertible, have driven the gold circulation out of the field; but the amount of gold known to be exported from France since the war is much less than the gold coinage thus driven out of circulation. The conclusion is that the difference is hoarded in the country, which would appear to be a reasonable conclusion; and it is also assumed that these hoards will all be brought out to pay up subscriptions for the loan, which is only a matter of guesswork. The real opinion of the French Government would seem to be the other way; for by the terms of the loan provision is made most carefully for the payment of the bulk of what is subscribed for by easy instalments, spread over nearly two years. The price of the loan will be largely determined for a long time to come by the amount that is left to be paid by instalments, and by the ease with which these instalments are paid. Let us suppose, which is not an extravagant supposition, that one half of the loan has to be paid up by instalments in France, and that a large proportion of these instalments are payable by comparatively poor people, by small traders, and shopkeepers, and peasants. In any case the pressure of finding the money as it became due would bear heavily on such people; but it must be remembered that it will now come upon them exactly at the time when the burden of their new taxation is being every day more felt. What, as a matter of fact, has happened with regard to the last loan of the city of Paris is worth attending to. It was covered three times, it commanded a tempting premium, it was a security particularly attractive to the small Parisian capitalist. Yet the 500 francs bond is now quoted at 27 francs discount below the nominal price at which it was issued; and the simple explanation is that speculation in it is over, and that poor people find themselves oppressed by instalments which they can only meet with difficulty, and sell at a sacrifice in order to escape the liability. The French loan of last year, again, which at one time touched 10 per cent. premium, now commands scarcely any premium at all. Those who a few months ago bought it so much above what they could get it for now are not likely to burn their fingers very quickly again. If, therefore, the very moderate premium, scarcely above one per cent., which the new loan now commands were to represent the average premium which the loan would command whilst the instalments were being paid up, the result would be as good as prudent Frenchmen, forecasting the future of their country, could reasonably anticipate.

The issue of the loan has exercised a very remarkable influence over the recent history of French politics. It has made M. THIERS the recognized master of France and the Assembly. He has got everything he wanted to get. He has shown the Right that they must bow to him, and the Left that they must look to him for guidance. No party could dare to do anything which impatient patriots might represent as likely to injure the success of the loan on which the freedom of French soil depends. No party dared to refuse any contribution to the success of the loan which the eminent person responsible for its issue represented as indispensable. A majority of 97 last Saturday sanctioned the taxes on raw materials by which M. THIERS says the Budget is to be balanced and the credit of France made secure. On the previous day the PRESIDENT made a great speech in which he demolished all the arguments against these taxes to his complete satisfaction. He was sure of victory, was in the highest good humour, and disported himself among statistics and arguments exactly as he pleased. He paid a graceful homage to his rivals by assuring them that the new taxes had nothing to do with Protection, and that they were merely imposed for fiscal purposes. He also offered himself as a man of extreme moderation, contented to render his country one half of the service he knew how to render it. He could put on taxes on raw materials that would bring in 8 millions sterling and never be felt by anybody. But ignorant people seemed inclined to quarrel with him if he proposed this; and therefore, for the sake of peace and goodwill, he would limit himself to getting nearly 4 millions out of his favourite taxes. Substantially all his arguments were reducible to one, and this was that, after the duties were put on, consumers would buy the manufactured articles as readily as before, so the State would gain and no one would lose. It was not to be supposed that a lady who wanted a new silk dress would suffer herself to be deprived of it because it cost half-a-sovereign more than she had been accustomed to give. M. THIERS evidently believes quite honestly in this golden rule of taxation, and, if it is true, he seems right in wondering why there should be any limit to taxation, and why any one should grumble at things being dearer when he or she will equally have them whatever the price may be. His hearers neither affected nor needed to be convinced. They were there to vote as he desired, that they might please him who could do them so much harm or good, and that the loan might be a success. A short time ago M. THIERS promised that before the recess he would give a general exposition of what he conceived to be the political situation of France. But there now seems to be a feeling growing up that such an exposition is unnecessary. This feeling seems amply justified. The politics of France are for the moment merged in obedience to M. THIERS and hoping for the success of the loan; and such a very simple state of things may well be left to describe itself to France and the world.

THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION AT NOTTINGHAM.

THE meeting of a score or two of obscure agitators at Nottingham as a Federal Council of the International Association scarcely deserved the compliment of a report in the Times; but perhaps it may sometimes be useful to study the opinions and designs of revolutionists who may possibly in some future condition of affairs become formidable. The assembled delegates resolved, as might be expected, that it was desirable to organize a party of labour which should be independent of existing political divisions. Every petty knot of zealots always holds that the exclusive assertion of its own doctrines is an object of immediate and paramount necessity. The Nottingham demagogues have, in default of foreign teaching, scarcely risen to the height of the Communist argument. One of their most thoroughgoing orators asserted that the employer, unless he took a personal share in production, was entitled only to five per cent. on his capital. As it would be found impossible to enforce the limitation as long as the right of property was recognized, English Internationalists will soon adopt from their foreign colleagues the simpler principle that no man has a right to any possession excepting the result of his own recent earnings. For the risk which coexists with large trade profits the genuine revolutionist makes no allowance; nor is he concerned with the difficulty of attracting capital into trade if profits are reduced to the level of interest. Several of the delegates protested loudly against the rules of political economy, and especially against the inevitable connexion of supply with demand. They are probably of opinion that in a well-governed social Republic the consumer would be compelled on pain of death to purchase the produce which required a market. The law of supply and demand is not so universally necessary as the law of gravitation, because it would perhaps be possible to govern the world like a regiment or a prison, by despotic power applied to the minutest details of life; but so long as property exists it is as difficult to escape from the rules of political economy as to float up without mechanical aid from the surface of the earth. The humble demagogues who assembled at Nottingham probably take for granted the continuance, in a modified form, of the existing fabric of society. They even like to have rank to envy, and wealth to threaten with confiscation, as their imagination has not yet realized a possible world of workmen. It is also pleasant to observe that they share the instinctive love of Englishmen for practical details relating to their own organization. Much of the time of the Congress was devoted to discussing the rules of the Association, and a resolution was passed that documents issued by the Council should be signed by all the members. They had probably not forgotten the approval of the Paris murders which was issued in the name of the International Council by one of their foreign leaders. English opinion is not yet sufficiently informed to approve of the slaughter in cold blood even of priests and archbishops. As it was remarked by one of the opponents of the resolution, distrust of the majority was inconsistent with the mysterious principle which is known by the foreign name of solidarity; but on the whole it is better to be imperfectly solidarized than to become, without provocation or profit, an accomplice after the fact in assassination. A proposal that the Federal Councils should communicate directly with one another, instead of transmitting their messages through the General Council, seems to be another symptom of want of solidarity or of confidence. If the subordinate branches of the International Society become mutinous, the unity of action which the Association professes to establish will be gravely impaired.

According to some accounts, the English Trade Unions are dissatisfied with the working of the International, and even meditate a secession from its ranks. Although the more prominent demagogues were perfectly ready to adopt the subversive theories propounded at Basle or Geneva, the primary interest of their constituents is confined to economical and industrial questions. Without objecting to the French projects for the extinction of the middle classes and of wages, English artisans are in the meantime bent on raising their own wages to the highest possible standard. They were mainly attracted to the International by the prospect of excluding by its influence the cheap foreign labour which might otherwise be brought into competition with their own. The murder of the Archbishop of Paris, and the apology of the International chiefs for its perpetrators, had not the manifest tendency to help the workman in his struggle with the capitalist. At present the working classes, who are everywhere dictating to their employers, seem to have little need of external support. The English artisan is perfectly able to take care of himself, and he is likely to feel a certain contempt for foreigners who, with all their fine phrases, accomplish their objects less effectually than himself. Another difficulty must impede the co-operation of an English Union or Club with a body which national habits and penal legislation have reduced to the rank of a secret society. The large tolerance of English law or practice for mischievous or seditious nonsense compels projects such as those of the Nottingham Congress to explode in the open air, while foreign revolutionists are always hoping to subvert the social order by which they are forcibly compressed. If the Spanish Government should at any time renew its urgent request for combined measures of coercion against the International Society, Lord GRANVILLE might justify his refusal by a reference to the insignificant agitation at Nottingham. It is not worth while to prevent a handful of malcontents from addressing one another by the absurd title of Citizen, or even to silence their ignorant denunciations of capital. If the impunity allowed to demagogues sometimes appears to involve a questionable policy, timid minds may be reassured by the certainty that in England there are no secret plots against authority and society. When an indignant citizen has any quarrel with existing institutions, instead of planning a murder or a riot, he takes the opportunity of earning cheap applause from his associates by proclaiming his conclusions in the most exaggerated form. If the ODGERS and the BRADLAUGHS were to think that the time had come for establishing a Republic, they would scarcely be able to proclaim a revolution in phrases stronger than the language which they and their allies employ on ordinary occasions. The most intelligent leaders of the Trade Unions have never heartily responded to Mr. BRIGHT's invitation that they should devote their energies to political objects. Some at least of the workmen in the building trade who are now out of work in London have formally refused to take part in the intended mob meeting of the Trades. They are prudent in postponing as long as possible a rupture with all classes of society which are attached to the cause of law and order.

In the course of a discussion on the place at which the next meeting was to be held, some of the delegates at Nottingham objected to the selection of Manchester, on the ground that Lancashire had apostatized to Tory principles. An advocate of Manchester of course replied that the people of Lancashire had been alienated from Liberalism by its lukewarm character. It was wholly unnecessary to explain the antagonism of revolutionary artisans to manufacturers who may profess to be Liberals. The Conservatism of Lancashire has been created by a reaction against the old Corn Law League, which attempted to preserve its organization for the purpose of controlling elections, after its original object had been accomplished. Among the crowds which assembled to hear Mr. DISRAELI saying little in many words, were probably included many artisans; but few of them would consent to be included in the imaginary category of the Conservative working-men. The only really popular Conservatism in Lancashire during the last general election was founded on local antipathy to Irishmen, whom Mr. GLADSTONE was supposed to favour. At the same time it may be admitted that Liberalism, whether enthusiastic or lukewarm, has few charms for the members of the Trade Unions or the International Society. Mr. COBDEN, the typical saint or hero of Manchester, was once defined by an imaginative satirist as an inspired bagman who believed in a calico millennium where everybody would buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest. The gloomy citizens who met at Nottingham have no taste for a paradise of applied political economy, and they are fully determined that, as far as they can exercise control, the products of their labour shall not be sold in the cheapest market. The alarming rise in prices has reminded even the thoughtless portion of the community that the rights of labour mean the scarcity and dearth of commodities. In the course of next winter the skilled London mechanic will shiver for the benefit of the colliers who, on the strictest Trade Union principles, have combined to restrict the supply of fuel and to enhance its price. The same cause, combined with the successful assertion of the rights of workers in iron, will add a large percentage to the price of tools; and the increased cost of coal for manufacturing purposes will be added to the price of every thing of fabric which is made by steam. The economic teachers of the artisans generally assume that the amount of consumption is unchangeable, and that a more equitable division of profits between the employer and the workman would have no bearing either on the accumulation of capital or on its returns. If the strike in the building trade is unfortunately prolonged, its consequences will be felt in the rise of house-rent. The carpenters and bricklayers are probably aware that the branch of industry with which they are concerned cannot, like an ordinary manufacture, be driven away to a foreign country; but the great majority of building operations admit of postponement, and often of reduction in scale. In all cases the consumer, who never receives a thought or a word from the working-class orators, suffers more permanently than the capitalist, who adds a percentage to his profits to cover the extortions of his workmen. If capitalists could be prevented from receiving more than ordinary interest on their outlay, the consequent stagnation and decay of industry would cause universal distress; and it would be some consolation that the agitators and their clients would be the first to suffer. The Nottingham agitators hesitated to demand the confiscation of the instruments of industry, by which they probably mean personal property; but they unanimously voted for the nationalization or seizure of land. It is worth observing that the supporters of the most extravagant theories here foreign names; and possibly some of their English colleagues might, if they understood the tendency of their own doctrines, shrink from schemes which would produce universal anarchy and bloodshed.

THE EMBANKMENT MUDDLE.

WE are perhaps bound in charity to assume that the exhausting temperature of Monday had something to do with the weak and unsatisfactory conduct of the House of Commons on the Thames Embankment question. Eighty in the shade will account for a good deal. It was the fog-end of a broiling day, and the resolution of members melted away as the thermometer rose. They had just energy enough to reject the obviously unjust and unreasonable proposal for which the Government had contrived, under the forms of the House, to procure the sanction of a small Committee of peculiar composition, with restricted powers and limited range of view, but not to take the next step, and to settle the question once for all in the way that common sense and common honesty alike required. There are different kinds of intimidation, and Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, in urging members to drop the question, had threatened, if they persisted in going on with it, to subject them to some comprehensive remarks, not only on the general principles on which public lands ought to be administered, but on what he called "the æsthetic question of taste." The result was, that the Bill was hastily thrown out by a majority of twenty-one upon a merely dilatory motion. It should be observed, however, that a number of members on both sides of the House voted with the Government for going on with the Bill who were utterly opposed to it as it stood, but who hoped to meet it in Committee upon the main issue. The majority against the Government would have been much greater if the division had been simply on the merits of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER's demands. Mr. GLADSTONE observed very truly that the question was a practical one, which had been long discussed, and was now ripe for settlement; and Mr. LOWE had previously declared that the Government was prepared to accept whatever decision might now be arrived at, while giving to Mr. SMITH the comfortable assurance that, if beaten, he would hand over the future conduct of the measure to the member for Westminster, who could not have carried it. Accordingly if Mr. SMITH had turned a deaf ear to Mr. VERNON HARCOURT's blandishments, he would not only have thrown it out, but would have earmarked the assumptions against which he was setting himself. It is probable that the Government, although it unwarrantably repudiated the arbitration of the Committee to which it had itself referred the matter in 1871, and although it has endeavoured, with morbid perversity, to oppose or evade the expressed opinion of the House on this subject, has now discovered that it would be as well to get it settled out of the way. But the division of Monday, instead of settling anything, unsettles everything. The original question is complicated by fresh and unexpected issues. The lion of Northumberland House stretches his long tail across the path; and it is suggested that nothing can be done until, at some indefinite period, it has been decided whether a road to the Embankment shall be carried through the mansion of the PEACOCKS. Mr. LOWE pointed out that the two transactions were quite distinct, and had no connexion with each other; the land in the one case being to the north, and in the other case to the south, of Whitehall Place. Even assuming that any of the disputed land would be required for a new road, there is no reason why the Metropolitan Board should be precluded from carrying out any arrangement that might be come to with the Duke of NORTHUMBERLAND in consequence of this land having come under its own control. On reflection the Board will perhaps come to the conclusion that its financial position is not so flourishing that it can afford to squander its money in wantonly carrying a road through valuable private property, for which heavy compensation will have to be paid, when it can make an equally good or better thoroughfare at infinitely less cost, without destroying an important historical edifice. Meanwhile the Board might, without much expense or difficulty, contrive to improve and multiply the other approaches to the Embankment, which will still have its uses even though the main current of traffic should continue to flow by the Strand.

The question at issue was, and is—for unfortunately it has still to be formally decided—whether the citizens of London should be taxed for their public spirit in constructing at vast expense one of the noblest monuments of the age. There is nothing which has added so much to the dignity and beauty of London as the Thames Embankment, and it seems not unreasonable to assume that the embellishment of the metropolis should be a matter of national pride. The capital is visited in the course of each year, not only by a great concourse of foreigners, but by multitudes from all parts of the country. It is a central spot to which people are drawn by business or pleasure; it is the seat of the Government, of the Legislature, and of the chief courts of law, and it is natural and seemly that everything should be done to make it worthy of the nation. It might have been supposed that the Government and the country would have been grateful to the Londoners for having taken upon themselves the heavy burden of constructing the Embankment, and would have been anxious to make the burden as light as possible for them. There can be no doubt that this is indeed the opinion of the country; but the Government has taken another view. Even if the ground required for the Embankment had been actually in the possession of the Government, a strong case might have been made out for the gift of it, in whole or in part, to the citizens for the purpose of this important work; but in point of fact the Government is asked to give up nothing except a technical right to what it never had, and for the best of reasons, because it did not exist until the citizens created it. It is the principle of the Irish Land Act that the tenant has a right to a share of the increased value of land which has been improved by his exertions. In this instance the land itself was altogether created by the people of London; yet the Government, in defiance of its own legislation for Ireland, is anxious to take advantage of its nominal ownership and purely technical rights to appropriate a large slice of the reclaimed soil. The value of the disputed property has been variously estimated at from 40,000*l.* to 200,000*l.*; but ten years ago it was a mass of foetid slime at the bottom of the river, and not only worthless, but detrimental. Mr. Lowe argues that, as the mud belonged to the Government, therefore the solid ground made out of it belongs to the Government also, and should be purchased by the Metropolitan Board at the market price of the best building land, just as if it had always been in that condition. The Metropolitan Board is entitled to reply that it sunk its money in the river, that it was the money which made the filthy ooze into valuable property, and that it has a right to its money in this new shape. It is surely desirable that municipal bodies should be encouraged to construct such works as the Thames Embankment, and should not be taxed for their liberality and enterprise. If Mr. Lowe's principle is to be fairly carried out, the next Budget should contain a tariff of taxation for every parish pump, for every bit of foul land drained and purified, and every project of sanitary reform. The bargain of 1862 was a very hard one for the Metropolitan Board, and therefore for its constituents, the inhabitants of London. The Woods and Forests interfered at the last moment, and declared that they would stop the Bill unless they were allowed to dictate their own terms. They had always been against the Embankment, and the terms were probably not the less onerous on that account. Several of the members of the Committee on the Bill afterwards stated in the House that they would not have sanctioned such extortionate conditions except under the peculiar pressure which the Woods and Forests were enabled to apply. It was natural and inevitable that a bargain driven in this manner should some day be revised; and the recommendation of the large and authoritative Committee of last year, that the ground should be leased to the Metropolitan Board at a nominal rent, after the precedent established in the case of the Crown lessees upon the Embankment, offered a just and reasonable solution of the difficulty, if so simple a question can, without an abuse of language, be called a difficulty. The proposal of this year's Bill was an illogical application of a false principle. The price put on the ground, as that Bill was brought in by the Government at the beginning of the Session—namely, 40,000*l.*—was too high or too low; too high if only a nominal value was to be fixed, too low if it was to be assumed that the Government was selling a substantial property for which it was bound to exact something like its real value. The proposal to which the Committee of 1872, under the skilful guidance of the Government, committed itself, was as bad in principle, though less inflated as to the figures; the money was cut down to 3,000*l.*, but the extent of ground to be surrendered was disproportionately abridged.

Mr. Lowe once observed that no one had a right to be generous with other people's money, but it does not follow that a trustee should invariably make a shabby and ungenerous use of the funds he has to administer. An administrator is bound to make the best use of the property in his hands for the benefit of those for whom he is acting. If a tenant built costly offices on a farm at his own expense, the landlord's agent would certainly not be promoting his employer's interests by insisting that the tenant should be fined in order to compensate the landlord for having his property improved. The land which the Metropolitan Board reclaimed, and which it expects to keep at a nominal rent, never belonged to the Government; nobody will be any poorer for the Board having it, inasmuch as nobody had it till the Board made it; and it is difficult to see why the State should be enriched because the citizens of London have taxed themselves heavily for an important public improvement. Now that the question has again been postponed, it is necessary to remember that this is something more than a mere question of money. It is a question of secondary importance whether the disputed land shall be held by the Government or by the Metropolitan Board. The essential thing is that a noble situation shall not be ruined for the sake of a canting economy or petty attorneyism. Nothing can be more monstrous than the notion of turning an honest penny by cutting up this fine site into private building sites, and covering it with "eligible family mansions" in the newest style of nondescript art. The ground should be preserved for the public, and dedicated to public uses. The laying out of grass plots and beds of geraniums is not the only or perhaps the highest use to which it is possible to apply an open space. A handsome public building of appropriate elevation, surrounded by public gardens, would satisfy local wants as well as aesthetic and economical conditions. The Government would probably find less difficulty in satisfying the House of Commons on this subject if it could show that the part of the ground which it desired to retain would be used in such a manner as to add to the dignity and picturesqueness of the scene.

EDUCATIONAL DIFFICULTIES.

THE passing of the Education Act has not brought us out of the educational wood. Obstacles of all sorts remain to be surmounted or got round. For some years to come each new improvement in educational machinery will enlarge our conception of what it is possible to do, and create a corresponding dissatisfaction with what has been already done. Four conspicuous difficulties have raised their heads during the last few days. The debate on the Education Estimate has suggested three of them; the proceedings in the London police courts have suggested the fourth. It has been evident all along that the great increase of scholars would lead to a proportionate increase in the demand for teachers. The demand has been created by the act of the Legislature; but its supply is left to the energy and foresight of individuals. The objections to the establishment of Government training colleges are obvious. To substitute them for private training colleges would be to attack the voluntary system by a side wind after Parliament has decreed that it shall be maintained. To set them up side by side with private training colleges would be to subject the latter to great disadvantage, and to place the Government in the odious position of being at once judge and competitor. It is needless perhaps to say that Mr. Dixon sees none of these difficulties. He invariably makes his own wishes the measure of the powers of the Government, and with entire consistency he proposes that the present training colleges, in which the students are boarded as well as taught, should be swept away, and day colleges be established in their stead. Mr. Dixon sees that an undenominational training college is an impossibility if it is anything more than a day college; and the Secularist party is so little given to see facts which conflict with its own theories, that he may claim some credit for the admission. What he does not seem to see is that it is impossible to declare war without accepting the conditions of a state of belligerency. You cannot fight against voluntary schools when it suits you, and yet expect them to work in harmony with you at other times. To sweep away Denominational training colleges would be to announce that the State has no confidence in the teachers turned out by them; to make undenominational training colleges universal would be to make a share in the Parliamentary grant dependent on the acceptance by voluntary school managers of teachers in whom they have no confidence. The inevitable result of this would be a complete dissociation of voluntary effort from public elementary education. It has been decided several times over that this shall not be, and Mr. Dixon would be better advised if he accepted frankly the consequences of his defeat. Until a great change has passed over the mind of the nation as regards elementary schools, Denominational training colleges are simply a necessity. If the advocates of purely secular education like to set up training colleges of their own, no objection can be taken to their doing so. The character of the college from which a teacher has come will be a sufficient index to the nature of the education he has received there, and a sufficient guarantee against his being employed in ignorance of it. There may be cases, too, in which the establishment of a day training college, with provision for religious teaching outside the sphere of college work, will be found a convenient solution of practical difficulties. In this matter uniformity is an evil rather than a good. The object to be attained is the supply in the shortest possible time of as many competent teachers as are wanted, and the best way of attaining it is to give full play to every variety of agency which undertakes to meet the need. If the Government gives impartial aid to all, and special favour to none, there can be no room for jealousy or complaint.

Up to this time the administration of the Education Act has been, by comparison with what it soon will be, an easy labour. The Education Department have been busy in sanctioning the formation of School Boards in parishes where the inhabitants are anxious to form them, or in furthering those voluntary efforts which are to make their formation of School Boards unnecessary. They have passed to the rougher work which awaits the Department in parishes where the energy of the inhabitants is devoted to dispensing with schools altogether, and the change from driving the willing to driving the unwilling horse can hardly fail to be very marked. It is far from improbable that one unexpected result of it will be to necessitate the repeal of that absurd clause in the Education Act which allows School Boards to teach what religion they please, but prohibits them from teaching it in the most convenient way. The refusal of Parliament to insert a similar compromise in the Scotch Act shows how generally it has fallen into discredit, and the Duke of ARGYLL's speech on Lord ROSEBURY's amendment will furnish the Government with unanswerable arguments for abandoning their own invention. So long as no feeling against it is shown by the School Boards themselves, there is of course no adequate reason for disturbing the Act. But when School Boards come to be set up in country parishes where the clergyman and the squire will be the working members, and where the parents of the children are all members of the Church of England, the inconvenience of not being able to teach the Catechism to willing learners in a place where there is no other school in which they can learn it is likely to be keenly felt. There will be no need to make the execution of the Act more difficult than it must anyhow be by adhering to a provision which had no meaning to begin with, and which has conspicuously failed to answer its supposed purpose of conciliating Nonconformists.

There can be no two opinions as to the reasonableness of Sir JOHN LUNNOK's wish that the teaching of reading, writing, and arithmetic should not form the whole business of elementary schools. He will himself admit, however, that this part of their duty must not be left undone, and that, so long as it is left undone, the attention of the Government must be chiefly directed towards remedying this initial defect. Unfortunately we are yet a long way from that general diffusion of elementary knowledge which will absolve the Education Department from the duty of making these rudimentary subjects their first care. Even the most hostile critics of the present code admit that its effect has been to force schoolmasters to distribute their attention over the whole of their scholars, instead of giving the lion's share to the most promising. There is very good reason why they should take special pains with this latter class after the minimum of instruction has been effectually conveyed to the whole school. But until this is done a paramount importance must be assigned to elementary knowledge. So far, indeed, as a more general introduction of extra subjects is found to promote good reading there can be no objection to it, but it must be upon the understanding that it is the learning to read and not the knowledge of what is read that is the primary object to be pursued.

The London School Board has at length begun to apply its by-laws for enforcing attendance at school. The excuses offered by defaulting parents may be taken as fairly representing the categories under which such pleas will commonly arrange themselves. Either there was no money to pay the fees, or there were no shoes for the children to go in, or there was no one to see that they went. The first is obviously insufficient, at all events so long as the 25th clause of the Education Act remains in force. But the fact that it is urged points to the eventual abolition of the distinction which the authors of the Act have attempted to draw between inability to give children proper instruction and any other form of destitution. It is generally admitted that a man ought not to be relieved of the duty of educating his children unless his means will not allow him to discharge it, and the law has provided that, in the event of this inability being ascertained to exist, the cost shall be defrayed for him. But how are School Boards to ascertain it? As they have not the means of testing a man's statements, they will be forced to refer to the Guardians for the means of verifying them; and when once a man is brought into contact with the Relieving Officer, it will be very difficult to maintain a line of demarcation between the pauper who has to be assisted out of the poor rate and the non-pauper who has to be assisted out of the education rate. It will be a harder question still to determine what is to be done with children whose parents are willing to send them to school, and able, by some pinching, to pay the school fees, but not able at all times to provide them with sufficient clothing to protect them from the weather, and not willing to send them without such clothing. It will be impossible to punish a parent for keeping his child at home while it is shoeless, and equally impossible to provide the child with shoes at the public expense. This is a real dilemma, and one which, under the operation of compulsory legislation, may easily become serious. The third obstacle, the want of any one to see that the children go to school, is also a real one, but it is not one that need be regarded as formidable. Some kind of agency must eventually be set up to sweep the streets of the ragged and homeless children that now infest them, and as the children who disobey the order to go to school at nine o'clock which their father left them when he went to work at six are not likely to stay indoors all day, they will be enclosed by the same net. Fortunately the difficulties which attend upon compulsion only apply to a small minority of children. The children whose parents cannot find clothes to send them in, the children who have no mother to see that they go, the children who as regards any care their parents take of them are virtually orphans, will be few in number compared with the mass of children to whose parents these and similar cases in the police courts will come as a hint which, however much it may be disliked, will be none the less acted on.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

THE maintainers of capital punishment are naturally tempted to allow their opponents to go unanswered. Why should they take the trouble to refute arguments which have already been refuted over and over again, when the alternative of simply relying on their voting strength lies invitingly open? The history of some similar agitations supplies a reason for taking a different course with regard to this one. It is not safe to assume that a sentimental fallacy has been disposed of for good because it has been disposed of once. The arguments employed against it are forgotten, while the emotion to which it appeals remains, and is continually making new converts. There is no remedy for this but a continual repetition of the same reasoning. There must be no countenance given to the notion that silent votes mean votes that cannot be defended. It is tedious no doubt to go on slaying the slain, but so long as they display an undiminished power of coming to life again they can be treated in no other way.

It is of course difficult to prove to what extent the punishment of death acts as a deterrent to would-be murderers. Statistics on such a subject are necessarily unsatisfactory, because it is impossible to feel sure that we know all the causes which may have contributed to a given result. On the other hand, it is equally impossible to prove that death is a less deterrent penalty than imprisonment; and unless this fact could be established, the balance of argument would be immensely in favour of retaining capital punishment. Imprisonment is a thoroughly unsatisfactory mode of dealing with aggravated crime. It does not meet the popular idea of justice; and it there were no difference in kind between the treatment of murderers and the treatment of forgers or horse-stealers, execution by lynch law would probably become exceedingly common, while the persons immediately aggrieved by a murder would certainly be tempted, if they had the opportunity, to spare the country the cost of maintaining the murderer for life. It should be remembered in connexion with this view of the subject that very long periods of imprisonment necessitate what appears like extraordinary gentleness in the treatment of prisoners. Solitary confinement or a diet of bread and water continued for years would be indistinguishable from torture. Consequently, in addition to the shock to popular sentiment given by seeing murderers imprisoned instead of hanged, there would be the further shock of knowing that they were passing their imprisonment in what, by comparison with the lot of many innocent persons outside, would be considerable comfort. It is always a misfortune when the law and public feeling are at issue, and in this case they would have been placed in this antagonism by a wanton experiment in legislation.

The more plausible objections to capital punishment which were urged in the debate of Wednesday are really objections to defects in the law under which it is administered. It is true that much harm has been done by the uncertainty which has been allowed to grow up as regards the infliction of the penalty. In part, probably, this is attributable to a faulty definition of murder. Men are tried and convicted of murder because the law provides no other name for the homicide of which they are undoubtedly guilty. But public opinion has ceased to regard certain forms of homicide as murder, and the HOME SECRETARY is simply the exponent of this change when he commutes the punishment. Still, the belief that murderers generally get off is naturally strengthened by this means. With a definition of murder which allowed of no doubt that the punishment was deserved whenever the offence had been committed, this difficulty would disappear. A more rational view of the relation of insanity to crime would remove another element of uncertainty. At present there is an unfortunate disposition to accept proof that a murderer was mad upon the particular point which constituted the motive for the crime as sufficient evidence that he is mad upon all points. The one only form of insanity which ought to exempt a man from being hanged is the form which prevents his knowing what the consequences of his crime will be. Thus in the case mentioned by Mr. GILPIN, where a man killed his wife from causeless jealousy, it was no plea for a commutation of the penalty that the act "was referable to insanity." That may, and probably does, mean nothing more than that his jealousy was insane. The question remains, whether when he determined to take his wife's life, he knew that he would be hanged for doing so. A man may be mad on fifty subjects, and yet be quite aware of the connexion between inflicting death and suffering it; and so long as he is so the prospect may have a deterrent effect upon him. The only circumstances under which hanging is objectionable in cases of real murder are cases in which the murderer really does not know that his act is forbidden by the law, or that the commission of it will entail upon him any penalty. Unless the consciousness of this elementary fact is wanting, the fact that a criminal is subject to homicidal delusion is rather a reason for hanging him than not. The argument against capital punishment derived from the irremediable character of the wrong done, supposing that the accused person turn out in the end to be innocent, has no value except in cases where the discovery is made very shortly after the conviction. Supposing, for example, that a man is imprisoned for twenty years, and is then found to have been wrongly convicted, the law cannot give him back the years of life which it has unjustly taken from him. It cannot give him back the wife who has perhaps died of shame at her husband's disgrace, or the children whose prospects have been ruined by the fact that their father is a convict. To give a man liberty under these circumstances is very possibly to give him a boon which he no longer values; to give it him as though the gift were in itself a compensation for all that he has suffered would be to mock at the law's wrong-doing. Upon this point, though upon no other, we agree with Mr. HENLEY. We "must do our best, and trust to Providence to avoid mistakes."

The theological argument seems to us to have no weight. The form it usually takes is that men should not be hurried into eternity without time being given them for repentance. If execution followed immediately upon arrest, or even upon conviction, there might be something in this plea. But inasmuch as there is always an interval of some days, the chances are that, if the criminal is at all disposed to repent, he has a better opportunity in the week or two which are passed in the condemned cell than he would have in years of imprisonment. There is no evidence that prison chaplains are especially successful in dealing with criminals; their experience usually points the other way. And, assuming that the criminal does not repent, the fact that he has shown himself unmanageable by human laws seems to point to the expediency of committing him to wiser hands than those of human rulers. It is clear that there is no place for him in this world; we do not know what possibilities may be reserved for him in another. A life spent in raging against the authorities who keep him in imprisonment, or in contriving plans of escape, is not likely to make these possibilities grater. It may be objected that this reasoning would point to the infliction of the punishment of death for other offences of great aggravation, instead of reserving it for murder alone. As an abstract theory we do not shrink from this inference. If no other ill consequences followed, it would be a good thing if incorrigible offenders were hanged, even though each separate offence might not be worthy of this punishment. For example, a man who knocks out one of his wife's eyes, and then, as soon as he comes out of prison, knocks out the other, would be most properly hanged. It by no means follows that because offences against property were wrongly punished with death it would be wrong to inflict the extreme penalty in cases of repeated offences against the person. The recklessness about taking life, which is the crime against which capital punishment is really directed, may be more shown by repeated assaults than by a single murder. The objection to the judicious extension of capital punishment, which is in itself a thing to be desired, is that men would often be tempted to murder the victim of their violence in order to remove a witness of it. So far as this view is correct, it constitutes of course a solid argument against a change of law in this direction. It is not, however, of much importance to speculate as to the precise weight to be attached to it until public sentiment has undergone a much greater modification on this subject than seems at present likely.

THE NORWEGIAN JUBILEE.

THE sham millenary has been speedily followed by a real one. The Norwegian nation has just been keeping the thousandth year of its national existence. The "Harold Monument" has been unveiled—according to the Times Correspondent it has been "inaugurated," but we must not hold the Norwegians responsible for that—and the unveiling has been accompanied by befitting speeches and toasts from divers of the first persons in the country, from a Royal prince downwards. The event to be celebrated was the union of Norway into a single kingdom under Harold Harfagra. The history of that hero undoubtedly has a mythical element in it, and we should hardly like to pledge our historical credit to the fact of the union of Norway having taken place in the exact year 872, so very nearly an exact millennium before the reunion of Germany. But that the various small States out of which the Norwegian nation was to be made up were banded together into one by the iron hand of Harold Harfagra, and that the event took place, if not in the year 872, yet certainly at some time not very far distant from it, there is no reasonable ground for doubting. The event is an historical one, though some of its details may have come to us in the garb of tradition, and even of myth. But history, tradition, and myth, much as they differ among themselves, all stand together in opposition to conscious falsehood. As far as we can gather from our scanty means of knowledge, Norway contains no ecclesiastical dignitary daring enough to hail in Harold Harfagra the founder of the University of Christiania. It contains no Minister of State daring enough to hail in him the author of the existing Norwegian Constitution. Still, we do not agree that there is any man in high place in the Norwegian Church who stands up to say that tradition and myth are matters of indifference; that falsehood is better than the better truth of the man, and that the man should be the best of the more fitting it is to have a feast held in its honour. The Norwegian custom, in celebrating the memory of one whom they may fairly look on as a kind of national founder, seem to have kept themselves within the bounds of true history, or, at the outside, of probable tradition. The strongest statement ever made about the fair-haired hero was made, not in his own land, but in Norm. Those who believe, or pretend to believe, or who think that it is of no consequence whether they believe or not, that Alfred founded University College may consistently enough tell the world that Harold Harefoot, stiff-necked heathen as he was, was buried in Westminster Abbey.

The wisdom of all these centenary and millenary celebrations is a point on which no general rule can be laid down. Of the Alfred Jubilee in 1849 we need only say that it seemed foolish till it began to seem wise when compared with the immeasurably greater folly of the late doings at Oxford. The feast at Wantage commemorated a fact; the feast at Oxford commemorated a lie. The University College festival might perhaps be better marked with the Wallace festival, were it not that the justification of provincial vanity, and even of provincial spite, low enough motives as they are in themselves, are at least more respectable than an abstract admiration of wilful falsehood. Even the Jubilee of Blücher is more respectable than the interested inventions which alone connect Alfred with Oxford. But we must not measure the Norwegian ceremony by any of these things. It is plainly not a got-up business, not the device of any particular clique or party, but a real utterance of the national memory. In Norway it is as natural to commemorate Harold Harefoot, though he did his work a thousand years ago, as it is in J'rasie to commemorate Von Stein, though he did his work only sixty years ago. The circumstances of our own history are such that celebrations of this kind do not come naturally to us, because the feelings out of which they spring do not come naturally to us. We must try to throw ourselves into the position of the Scandinavian kingdoms, especially those of Denmark and Norway. They are, in a way which we find it hard to understand, at once great and small, at once old and new. The kingdoms of Denmark and Norway are in point of population among the smallest independent States of Europe. Denmark, since its dismemberment eight years back, is also one of the smallest in point of extent. They are far smaller, not only than England or France, than Spain or Italy, but even than several of the component States of the new Germanic Empire. The population of Denmark and Norway together falls far short of the population of the kingdom of Bavaria. But, small as they are in extent and population, little as they count for in the modern balance of the European system, they are historically the peers of the mightiest kingdoms of Europe. They are in the strictest sense nations; their whole being is national and not provincial. Denmark, cut short as it has been, is still an independent member of the European system, bound by no feudal or federal tie to any superior or any fellow. Norway has her yokefellow in the form of Sweden, but the union is one under which the Norwegian and Swedish nations each retain their perfect national distinctness, and their perfect national equality; being joined by no tie beyond the possession of a common sovereign. And in all three kingdoms, if the most modern times have witnessed their fall from the position which they once held in Europe, they have also witnessed the internal regeneration of all the three. All three, small as their European position may now seem, are freer, and doubtless really happier and more prosperous, than they ever were. In such a state of things as this the present and the past become closely connected in the feelings of every man; and connected in a different way from that in which they are connected among ourselves. In our own long continuous history the present and the past so shade off into one another that they are rather one thing than two. We have our great events, our marked epochs in our history, but we have no particular year from which we can date a political new birth of the nation. Norway and Denmark have such epochs, both of them within the present century, both of them within the memory of man. The kingdom of Norway as a united kingdom is, as the jubilee tells us, a thousand years old, two generations older than the English kingdom. The Norwegian nation, as a gathering of separate tribes, is of course, like the English nation, a good deal older than the united kingdom. But the Norwegian kingdom and nation, with its present independence and its present free constitution, is not yet sixty years old. If the year 872 has earned the celebration of its millenary, the year 1814 will, whenever the time comes, deserve no less the celebration of its millenary. The nation is thus, as we say, at once old and young; at once great and small. Among a people in such a case, national feeling and national self-consciousness exist in a form and are clothed with an intensity which is hardly intelligible to natives of countries that are at once of greater extent and have less strongly marked epochs in their recent history. There is no particular moment at which we can say that England became free, having been other than free before. Both Norway and Denmark can point to such moments within the memory of man; Denmark within memory only four-and-twenty years old. And when memories of this kind, certifying the nation to present honour, are coupled with memories of a distant past in which each nation held a greatness which it holds no longer, the national spirit reaches its highest point. Every man is at once a patriot and an enthusiast. To be a patriot he must indeed be something of an antiquary. To the Norwegian, if the Constitution of 1814 is a living thing, the union of the kingdom in 872, or whenever it was, is a living thing not the less. A small nation, a young nation, needs to remind itself and others of its national being in a way that older and greater nations do not need. But when the nation is at once great and small, at once old and young, the national self-consciousness becomes keener still. And to such a state of mind centuries and millenaries, queer as they seem to us, are a perfectly natural outpouring of honest national feeling.

A few questions indeed might be raised about this, as about most other things. Why should a millenary celebration be called a Jubilee? According to our combined notions of arithmetic and the Mosaic Law, if Jubilees are to be kept at all, full twenty Jubilees ought to have been kept between the days of Harold Harefoot and our own. We remember indeed that at the time of the Wantage feast a Jubilee was defined to be a period of a thousand years; but then, if we rightly remember, it was by Mr. Martin Tupper that the definition was given. On this point no light was thrown at the Oxford feast, which was a pity, as Mr. Lowe at least may be supposed to know something about figures. But it is very likely that the Norwegians themselves called it something else, and that the name Jubilee is due only to the inventive powers of the telegram-maker. It is more important to remark that, though the modern Norwegians look on the doings of Harold Harefoot as a subject for national rejoicing, it is quite certain that their forefathers a thousand years back did not so look at them. The great colony of Iceland was founded by those who fled from the heavy hand of him who made Norway one. But in this there is nothing wonderful; it is no more than saying that the Duke of Cumberland and the ex-Elector of Hesse-Cassel have no special love for the Emperor William. Because a remedy was unpleasant at the time, it does not follow that it may not be found to have been very useful a thousand, or even a hundred, years later. And in such a case the chief actor in the change can hardly fail to become a national hero, however little we might have either relished or approved of his doings at the time they were done.

Among the toasts given at the Norwegian festival, one was "Kindred Nations," or words to that effect. We hope that, under this head, we ourselves came in for some of the good wishes of our Norwegian friends. The connexion between England—and Britain generally—and the Scandinavian nations is not the less real and important because many people both in England and in Scandinavia have gone about to exaggerate it. Even without any Scandinavian settlements in Britain, we must look on the Scandinavian nations as our kinsmen in the second degree, nearer than the High Germans, though not so near as the Low; though to be sure, this is only to say that a man's brother is nearer to him than his cousin, but not so near as himself. As for Scandinavian settlements, we in England have had so much more to do with the Danes than with the Norwegians, that we are apt to forget that Britain as a whole has had quite as much to do with the Norwegians as with the Danes. The Orkney and Shetland Isles have never yet formally ceased to be part of the Kingdom of Norway. All the conquest and colonization on the Scottish mainland and the islands was Norwegian and not Danish. And there is every reason to believe that from thence the stream of Norwegian settlement spread itself into districts which afterwards became English, perhaps into some which were English already. The Danish settlement in Eastern Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, and several other shires we know all about. We know when it happened and under what leaders; we know the succession of the Kings and Earls who reigned over it. But Cumberland and Westmoreland are as plainly Scandinavian as Lincolnshire; yet we have no record how they became so. It is absolutely certain that no Scandinavian dynasty ever reigned there. One would think that the change must have been made by gradual indroppings from the Scandinavian settlements to the North of them, and these were certainly Norwegian. From Cumberland the same settlers seem to have streamed down into Northern Lancashire and Western Yorkshire—that distinction needed not to have been made in the time of Domgar. We have heard it hinted that such names as Normanton and Danby mark the points where this Norwegian settlement, creeping in unawares in the West, met the better known Danish settlement which had fixed itself to the East. Part of England then might almost have gone the length of sending its deputies to the Norwegian festival, and the whole, we hope, comes near enough in blood, in feeling, and in a common freedom, to have deserved a share in the good wishes which were extended at the Norwegian festival to the kindred nations generally.

DRAWING-ROOM SLANG.

"It was certainly," writes Addison, "one of the first distinctions of a well-bred man to express everything that had the most remote appearance of being obscure in modest terms and distant phrases." That "infamous piece of good breeding" which loves coarse language could, he thought, be but a short-lived fashion, for "it is impossible that such an irrational way of conversation should last long among a people that make any profession of religion or show civility." But it is quite consistent with professions of religion and shows of civility, as Mr. Spectator would have occasion to observe if he could listen to some "advanced" conversation in a modern drawing-room, and note the rank crowd adoring La Périchole, and "chortling" in their joy over Schneider aux enfers.

Of the two evils—libertinage of speech and recklessness of conduct—perhaps that which degrades language is the worst. Corrupt and disordered lives preach an obvious lesson, even when they do not find commentators in the police, and correctives in the criminal and bankrupt law; but corrupt and disordered speech endangers, not only the individual, but all with whom he has verbal dealings, and it ultimately affects not only the law-breakers but the law-makers. What observant person can doubt the rapid deterioration of spoken language throughout Western Europe? The tongue waxes more and more unruly, and with that hopeless unruliness which is half involuntary; for who pretends to be answerable for the meaning or no-meaning of the slang phrases he employs? Assertion and denial lose their value, truth and falsehood masquerade in undistinguishable forms. It is true that this is an agreeable and useful confusion to many persons, but we will still hope that the many are not the most of us, and that the general sophistication of speech is not intentionally welcomed as an escape from the obligations of veracity.

We do not now inveigh against the uncultivated taste which cannot, or the cynical taste which will not, speak with accuracy and refinement, though much might be written about these enemies to sweetness and light. Well-meaning persons have aimed at the revival of Elizabethan energy by the revival of Elizabethan coarseness. They endeavour to establish their earnestness, and even the excellence of their Protestantism, by sedulously calling a spade a spade. But with the best intentions the natural roughness of the unpolished diamond cannot be restored; and meantime this artificial plainness has encouraged the clownishness of expression into which our young men and maidens fall with insular readiness. We have now to point out the progress of more subtle and widespread social mischief than could be caused by mere rough phrases, and, as usual, we are compelled to say that women are largely concerned in it. In social affairs it would seem that most evils are retrievable until the daughters of Eve put their fingers in the pie; but when once ladies, especially great ladies, are "in the transgression," man appears to lose alike his strength and his prudence. Sampson in Delilah's lap discovers too late that at least he should have insisted on her dropping her Philistine friends. Reckless speech remained, if offensive, at any rate not dangerous as long as only the reasoning sex indulged in it; but now that modes of expression which would have scandalized Lady Blarney and Miss Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs are becoming a feminine fashion, random and coarse talk is being developed with the rapidity to be expected in the sex least able to resist the temptations of the tongue or to discern sophistries of speech, whether those of Eden or of Rotten Row. Adulteration of language is pushed on by feminine agency with a fury which Queen Anne and all her littérati could hardly restrain, and which Chaucer and Spenser might despair to quench, even though they drew for our help the largest draughts of English undefiled.

We have already at different times tried to deserve well of the world by remonstrating against the errors of petticoatery, and against certain froakish "sports" in the rosebud garden of girls. Culture, however, seems to bring its shadows with it, if indeed there can be said to be any development of culture in the innumerable young ladies about town. Whatever its flowers, no one can doubt the yearly crops of ill weeds that are the rank growth of wealthy leisure; and for our own sakes we exhort women to keep that part of the earthly paradise of which they are in charge as well ordered as may be. The great majority of good women deserve to have their hands strengthened at a time when the vanity and ignorance of some prominent prophetesses have brought discredit even on true superiority in education and intellectual power. Women must see to it that they do not fall into the irretrievable inferiority that threatens them. Like dram-drinkers, too many among them think to effect a cure of their weakness by fresh sips of the poison that injures them, while they neglect the legitimate sources of their strength, and wilfully paralyse the influence which they ought to possess. Amongst the many strong cards in woman's hand is her acknowledged subtlety and refined strength in the use of language; but she throws it away when she rivals men in "talking shop," and in professional slang and the jabber of the season. There is an incongruity grotesque but serious in the notion of an "awfully jolly g. p." (girl of the period) presiding at the dawn of intelligence in the child who is father to the man. On her early care and wise governance depends largely the after-day of his life. She holds the keys which open the gates of knowledge, and she possesses in her prudent motherhood a greater power than could be supplied by any possible development of muscle or increase in medical or theological acquirements. A crew of freckled girl-students may some day challenge the older Universities, some withered phenomenon may ride a Derby winner, the phrenological formation of the heads of the coming race of women may be as pronounced as that of Socrates, and all men may be bound in the meshes of feminine legislation; yet these triumphs would be a bad exchange for that natural power of moulding ordinary speech which our fair leaders in jargon seem disposed to sacrifice. From different but convergent causes women are losing position all along the line of social march, and one of the most suicidal of their abdications is their misuse of their mother-tongue. Rough recklessness we might condone, but to be rough, reckless, and unintelligible except to their mates in slang is a note of savagery sounded within our civilized pale that ought to startle us. It is all very well to smile at the incongruity of bad language from sweet and well-cut lips, and to be tickled by the grotesque effect of horsey or Cannon Street terms when used by Lady Clara Vere de Vere; but, however much our satiated taste may enjoy such surprises, these tricks of the tongue are not safe jokes. "Nous ne tenons les uns aux autres que par la parole" was a truth better understood in Montaigne's time than it is now.

A great deal might be, and ought to be, said in reproof of the coarseness of speech that accompanies our increasing looseness of manners. Men do not, it is true, swear as volubly as the Mohawks and Squire Westerns of the last century, though their reticence hardly comes of increased reverence; but women no longer confine themselves to such "sacrosanct oaths" as fell from the lips of the Reynolds and Gainsborough divinites. They assert their "advanced" position by little ventures into the region of blasphemy, and increased profanity in the use of sacred names, as may be seen in certain pictures of life by female hands of undoubted accuracy. Our manners are at the best but of superficial polish, and are very ready to relapse into bulldog barbarism; and here are our ladies, the core and reserve of our civilizing forces, breaking out into strange oaths, or, not having originality enough for that, adopting the used-up expletives of roughs and rowdies. Yet, startling as her profanity may be, we doubt whether the historical young lady of Folkestone who gauged her indifference by "two d—ns of a tinker" is in the long run as mischievous as the langishing fair who cannot be "fetched by such awful chalk" as, for instance, a village sermon—who finds domestic life a "one-horse" affair—whose "relieving officer muffs the business" if he advises certain reforms in her "awfully jolly" style—who requires, as restorative to her over-wrought nerves, "thunder and lightning" or "shandy gaff," though that is, when absorbed, "simply skittles," you know, not half such a drink as a b. and a. —who can put you on several "morals" in the way of "goes" and "chasers," tell the points of her "quad" and the history of the chief "pretty horsebreakers," but "can't execute a large order" in the way of virtues esteemed by those fogies and "howling bores," her grandfathers. But the slang dictionary is becoming so voluminous that we cannot pretend even to give an idea of its various dialects, ranging as they do from the ribaldry of the Kentish hopper to the drawled jargon of Goodwood and Hurlingham. There are as many cantas as there are coteries, and each variety of "g. p." has its own eccentricity of speech. Never was there such havoc in language. In our modish antipathy to formulas we are bringing in chaos. Learned professors are, it is true, playing grand fantasias on Sanskrit, and proving all things by philology; but meantime ordinary speech is attaining that true no-meaning which is not only puzzling but is quite incompatible with wit. It may be well that crafty masters in word fence should conceal their thoughts in subtle phrases at need, but involuntary incomprehensibility is another and less desirable accomplishment. Can it be that the modern précieuse is wise in her generation, and that, like the cuttle-fish, she finds it useful to hide her real self from close inspection by discolouring the element in which she lives? She commits herself to no "indirect claims," she avoids explanation by remaining inexplicable; she disengages herself of many troublesome obligations of faith and morals by adopting a lingo into which certainly neither the Ten Commandments nor the Apostles' Creed could be translated—a lingo so slippery that we seem entering on a cycle in which gesture will be more trustworthy than speech. Everything repeats itself. Perhaps we are going to have a new version of the Tower of Babel legend, with new scenery, when through corruption of speech we become unintelligible. Some new start must be made, and future Max Müllers and Alices in Wonderland will be required to lay anew the foundations of language. Let us hope, meantime, that from some popular actresses may not be learned the alphabet of gesture.

While we remonstrate against the degradation of speech in which women are, as might be expected, largely concerned, we are not sanguine of reform in the taste which will have all its dishes highly spiced. Idle life, and a rage for amusement and new sensations, dissipate our strength until we avoid all action that has not for its end more excitement. Women especially suffer in the general race after pleasure, and are the first to shirk labour. They shriek for work which they know nothing about, because shrieking is in these times a paying profession, and there is in it infinite satisfaction to vanity; but women have, even more than men, lost the habit of labour, and with it disappears the sense of responsibility for action. Hence a growing recklessness among women which we need not point out. To how many idle mothers and daughters nothing "matters much" if the daily round of amusement is secured; and, of course, words matter less and less to these victims of indifference. White lies of greater social mischief than intentional fraud, just as folly is less controllable than knavery, are the order of the day, and slang phrases are the best imaginable cover for loose assertions and equivocations, for the protection of a Mrs. Candour and the sanctuary in time of need of a Becky Sharp. Our exaggerations in colour and ornament, and our appeals in every art to coarser tastes, are from the same source as our eccentricities of speech. We don't believe you, yes, or nay, nay, any more in the facts presented to our senses. Our pictures swear at us from the walls of Burlington House, our writers vent their brains for strong and strange words, the flouting and queer sentences of the day are embodied slang. Our talk is falling from the period of violence into that of drivel, and jabbering with a brevity which is not the soul but the empty machinery of wit. The art of conversation has fallen into caricature, while "general information" has reduced unfortunate proficient in it to a state of idleness which adds to the general unmeaningness of polite speech. To realise our condition let us imagine Imogen, or even Rosalind, Sophia Western, or Di Vernon, as one of those awfully jolly creatures who harrow the talk of the looser world, and flavour it with impropriety and biblical allusions in about equal quantities for drawing-room use. Dolly Varden of the last century would hardly be acquainted with her modern representatives, and how low and distant a courtesy would not Clarissa Harlowe have made to the heroines of some late novels by our favourite authoresses!

Moreover, chiefly by female agency, there is coming on us a most pernicious internationalism of speech. Our Mauds and Hildas lace their London jargon with shreds and patches of argot that is as yet inadmissible by French girls of corresponding rank, though they too are beginning timidly to fly in the face of the Académie with little novelties of grammar and scraps of international phrase. But they are far behind the American belles and the Meeses Anglaises who shook others but are no longer "shook" in their foreign raids. It is obvious how loss of respect must follow on all this, but respect for women is a weakness of the past. The strength of modern amazons can afford to do without that old reverence for the words and the manners of women which, it was fondly thought, was a chief means no less than a chief result of social improvement. But if women can sacrifice their rights, men cannot submit without protest to the consequences of such abdication of her throne by the world's wife, and by, until further notice, the world's mother. If by no other argument, let us persuade the foolish virgins of their folly by making them understand that it is in any case "bad form."

THE AUSTRIAN BISHOPS ON EDUCATION.

THERE are not wanting signs that the anti-German crusade which is being preached so vigorously at the Vatican will extend to the whole of Germany, if not indeed to the whole Continent of Europe. The name of Count Andrássy has already been coupled with Prince Bismarck's in the angry maledictions of the Civiltà and the Osservatore Romano; and the Austrian Government may in one sense be presumed to be in still worse odour at Rome than the Prussian. For a heretic is less offensive in Ultramontane eyes than a "bad," that is a Liberal, "Catholic." And Austria, since she became constitutional, has fallen away from her first love in repudiating the Concordat. Moreover, the Government showed a disposition at first to back up its Old Catholic subjects, and Cardinal Rauscher, the Archbishop of Vienna, was conspicuous at the Council among the opposition leaders, though he has since, like the rest of his colleagues with a few exceptions, found it convenient to eat his words and enforce the decrees enacted against his reiterated and solemn protest. Latterly, however, the Austrian Cabinet, has, to say the least, betrayed feebleness and indecision in its religious policy. The Minister of Worship, Count Stremayer, has administered a snubbing to the Old Catholic clergy, whom he had at first encouraged, and the law is put in force to compel submission to decrees promulgated without any legal sanction. It is but natural that a party whose character has been described by a high authority as "insolent and aggressive" should seize so hopeful an opportunity for pressing their advantage. Austria, unlike Prussia, contains a population of which the great majority are Catholics, and the Catholic Church is the established and recognized religion of the State. Unlike Prussia too, though the Holy Roman Empire no longer retains even a nominal existence, Austria inherits the traditions of medieval Christianity, instead of claiming descent from the "usurping" monarchy of Frederick I. of Prussia, whose Royal pretensions were solemnly denounced by the Pope of the day, in 1701, as "a sacrilege unprecedented in the Christian world." And the Papal organ contemptuously observed only the other day, that "the Hohenstaufens and Hapsburgs were far too lofty to dream of consulting the ancestors of the modern Hohenzollern." In Prussia it is already war to the knife. "The wicked agitator Bismarck"—we are again quoting the Osservatore Romano—is reduced to "a ludicrous compound of perfidy, dishonesty, ignorance, and mendacity," and will sooner or later be crushed under the chariot wheels of the triumphant Papacy. But Austria, though it has fallen very low, may still repent; and as the Osservatore assures us that its partition between Prussia and Russia has already been decided upon at Berlin, it will do wisely to look to its own interests—which are obviously not coincident with Prussian interests—before it is too late. In this case, therefore, the Ultramontane propaganda takes the form of an attack on the religious policy of the Government, not on the Empire itself. The Colonna need not be broken; it may again become a pillar, or at least a buttress, of the Church.

The nature, and, to all appearance, the success of the line of action adopted, is remarkably illustrated in the Memorandum of the Austrian bishops on the education question, and the treatment it has hitherto received from the Cabinet. The text of the document as a whole has not been suffered to become public, but its general drift is perfectly well understood. It is said to consist of four sections, but part of it only was thought to require to be specially reported to the Cabinet, and the substance of this has come out. The copy of the document presented to Herr Stremayer has never, it seems, left his custody, being merely shown to his colleagues. It is also rumoured, as an explanation of the long delay in giving any official reply, that the memorial only urges certain considerations on the notice of the Ministry, and does not make any definite requisition; but this seems very doubtful. The friends of Count Stremayer who have made this excuse for his silence now assert that, were the matter left to him, a negative answer would have at once been forthcoming, but that he has found "insuperable impediments" in the Cabinet to carrying out his intentions. Be this as it may, he has left Vienna for his holidays, without giving any answer; though his own animus is thought to be unmistakably indicated in a rather whimsical order just issued, to the effect that the Ursuline nuns at Linz are no longer to enjoy the right of certifying the sufficiency of the instruction imparted to girls in needlework. It is now, however, stated in "official" journals that the Cabinet have been unable to agree, and fears are accordingly entertained by the Liberal party that the new school law, against which the memorial protests, will not be fairly and consistently carried out. And this question of the conduct of popular education is naturally felt to be one of great importance for the future of Austria. A glance at her past history will be enough to prove so much. And it is a little curious that the Jesuits, who are just now being driven out of Prussia, are very closely concerned also in the pending controversy in Southern Germany.

Our readers are probably familiar with Ranke's vivid sketch of the counter-reformation in Germany in his History of the Popes. That result was achieved almost entirely through the influence of the new Order, not only as preachers and confessors, but also, and chiefly, as educators. As early as 1551 Ferdinand I. introduced them into Vienna, and placed the University under their control. They soon afterwards gained a firm footing at Ingolstadt. From Vienna they spread over the whole of the Austrian dominions, and Ferdinand established a school for the young nobility at Prague, to which he sent his own pages. By 1566 their influence extended over Bavaria and the Tyrol, Franconia, and Swabia, and they had penetrated into Hungary, Bohemia, and Moravia. Nor did they confine their efforts to upper-class education, in which however they were so successful that Protestants used to recall their children from distant schools and place them under Jesuit care. They also provided schools and modes of instruction for the poor, and Canisius constructed his catechism with the special object of meeting the wants of poor children. It must be remembered too that there was, and indeed still is, a "German College" at Rome, founded by Ignatius himself, and entirely under the direction of the Jesuits. Practically, therefore, Catholic education in Austria, as in most parts of Germany, meant Jesuit education. The first Austrian sovereign to withdraw the favour and support of the Court from them was Maria Theresa, and that was not till she had experienced their political use of the confessional. She was the last of the Catholic sovereigns to consent to the abolition of the Order by Clement XIV., but she consented heartily in the end. And it is a noticeable comment on the ultimate results of their system of training that, when all Europe was flooded with the anti-Jesuit literature of which Pascal's writings are the most conspicuous example, not a single work of any force appeared in defence of the incriminated Order. After the abolition, Joseph II. made some attempt to raise the popular education of his subjects, but without much success. The Jesuit spirit and manuals of education survived the fall of the Order, and with its revival under Pius VII. the men themselves returned. No matters went on till the revolution of 1848. The Emperor Francis had that instinctive dislike of "the intellectuals" which might be expected in a man of his mental calibre and strong conservatism. With the present Emperor, himself a pupil of the Jesuits, in his early days of absolute rule came the Concordat which has now been torn to pieces, and its repudiation involves the doom of Jesuit teaching and influence in Austria. To the result of that influence the present generation of Austrians have learnt to attribute the weakness and misfortunes of their country. They quote with sorrowful assent the saying that Prussia owed to her school system the victory of Sedan. And as the Concordat replaced the whole education of the country under the bishops, the Heleharath of 1867 resolved to emancipate it from their control as an indispensable condition of social and national improvement; and this resolve took effect in the law of May 25, 1868, which placed the schools under the management of the State. It is against this law that the episcopal Memorandum is virtually directed. The bishops desire to have both teachers and books made amenable to their own authority. The Minister of Instruction has indeed stated that their petition—about the exact terms of which there seems to be some mystery observed—is "based on the law"; but this can only mean that it demands such an interpretation of the law as will practically set aside its more fundamental provisions. And the evident hesitation of the Government in giving any official reply, or making any announcement of their intentions in the matter, is causing great dissatisfaction, and has been the subject of frequent and very unfriendly comment in the periodical press.

The question thus raised is far too wide a one to be discussed here in its general bearings. But it is not fair to represent it, as of course the Ultramontane organs do represent it, simply as a question between religious and irreligious education. The upshot of the Jesuit, or, as it is there termed, "clerical," method of training, where it has had its full swing on the Continent, does not speak well either for its intellectual or religious effects. No doubt in the century immediately succeeding the Reformation the Jesuit teachers gained a great victory, but from the first their system appears to have contained the seeds of its own destruction. It developed a certain controversial acuteness of mind to a marvellous degree, and taught men how to hold a brief for the Pope, as Paley has been said to teach them how to hold a brief for the Apostles. But it was too right and despot in its methods to develop, or rather to permit, vigour and originality of mind, and thus in the long run it defeated its own end. Its authors, themselves men often of high intellectual powers, had thoroughly mastered the controversies of the Reformation, and they taught their disciples the art of theological argument against Protestantism as they taught them the art of logic or grammar. But, when new forces came to the front, the well-equipped special pleader could devise no weapons wherewith to meet them. We referred just now to the fact of no single effective book having been produced in defence of the Jesuits either by themselves or any of their adherents, when the attack on them in the eighteenth century in the domain of literature and thought heralded the attack of the Catholic Governments. Not further than this, so little did their purely theological vigour outlast the first period of success, that Döllinger has mournfully confessed that Protestant is at least five or six times richer than Catholic theology in Germany, both in quality and quantity. In Spain, with the help of the Inquisition, they contrived pretty well to extinguish theological literature altogether. And if we turn to the practical and popular results of their teaching, its religious influence does not seem, when judged by their own standard of success, to be more reassuring. They have been, till within the last few years, very strong in Italy and Spain, and in both countries, on their own showing, infidelity is now rampant. They have been hardly less powerful in Southern Germany, and there, while Catholic literature and thought have been for the most part depressed to a distinctly lower level than Protestant, the Old Catholic movement is strongest, which is an almost passionate reaction against their whole system; and there, too, by the admission of both sides, scepticism is very prevalent among nominal adherents of the old faith. It may well be doubted, therefore, if the system which the bishops profess themselves so anxious to perpetuate in Austria is really for the interest of their own Church. And it is certainly not to be wondered at that the nation should be very unwilling to acquiesce in its further continuance.

LONDON AS A CITY OF PLEASURE.

THERE are various indications that a change has of late been coming over the spirit of London. It is as busy and bustling as ever, as deeply engrossed in commerce and money-making; but it is also coming out as a city of pleasure. It is evidently taking thought of external appearances, and pluming and trimming itself with an eye to effect. Its host of visitors is continually increasing. For the greater part of the year a large proportion of the inhabitants are a floating population of strangers, coming and going, and bent upon pleasure during their stay in town; and this necessarily has its effect on the community at large. It will be an odd example of the indirect influence of events if the excesses of the Commune in Paris should lead to the smartening-up of the English capital; but it is not unlikely that this will happen. For the present Paris is clearly out of favour, and the throng of travellers and pleasure-seekers is accordingly directed to this side of the Channel. There are whole quarters of London which the invaders seem to have taken by storm. An American will meet almost as many known faces in Bond Street as in Broadway. There were some weeks lately when Americans were arriving in hundreds at a time. And from all parts of our own country the rush to town is more universal than ever. If Dives comes for the season, Larus contrives to snatch a few days by a cheap excursion. Everybody who makes money comes to London to spend it. During the season just ending, it was impossible not to be struck by a certain brightness and glow of colour in the Western parts of the town; masses of flowers in the windows and balconies, trellis-work with festoons of Wistaria, climatis, or Virginia creeper; gossamer lace looped up with silken bands of cerise or purple, gay verandahs and striped awnings, and occasionally the line of glistening snow-white houses broken by a red brick wall in the old fashion, picked out with white. Mr. Ayton's friends the gardeners must be practically reversing the story of the fairy gold that turned to leaves, and qualifying rapidly for residence in the mansions they adorn. At an evening party the exotics will sometimes cost, it is said, several hundred pounds, and the hanging gardens of Belgrave and South Kensington, renewed from week to week, must represent a handsome revenue. We have a notion that not very long ago the display of flowers outside a house was regarded as the height, or rather the depth, of vulgarity, a kind of flaunting, unembashed cockneyism which wanted only a linnet or canary in a cage to make it complete. The minuettes boxes have given place to fine majolica troughs, overflowing with the most brilliant blossoms. The old English love of endow would seem to be reviving. The red brick houses coming, or returning, into fashion are one sign of it, the rainbow hues of the ladies' dresses another. The tonnes dégradés of Paris have been almost blushed down this summer by the full-bodied, ripe colours of our verandahs. At the Academy the ladies make the walls look dull. The sea of colours at a fashionable wedding or garden party, or at the morning promenade of the Row towards Annet time, is dazzling in its chromatic boldness and variety. Altogether out-of-door life is becoming more brilliant and demonstrative. The Marquis of Westminster's experiment with Ebury Square, which is to be converted into a public flower-garden, will probably help to bring more colour into the streets. If the experiment is successful, we shall no doubt before long see other oases planted in the weary desert of bricks and mortar. Some day the poor little orange-trees in big tubs, which with the other humours of Trafalgar Square—the elaborate squirting of the fountains, and Nelson mast-headed for his victories—afford so much innocent amusement to our foreign guests, may give place to more ambitious horticulture, and a cool umbrageous garden may be substituted for the burning waste of dingy asphalt. Mr. Ayton might make amends for his exuberance of savage virtue by taking up this idea, and asking Dr. Hooker to carry it out for him; and the reconciliation might be commemorated by a majolica fountain, or a piece of sculpture representing the Edile and the Doctor clasped in a fond embrace.

One can imagine the scornful incredulity of the Parisians on hearing that the city of fogs and rain, of spleen and suicide, has any pretensions to be considered a city of pleasure, and it may be admitted that London will have plenty to do before in some respects it makes itself as pleasant and attractive to strangers as Paris is. It is naturally out-of-door life with which visitors are most concerned, and it is difficult to imagine anything more wearisome and exhausting than the perambulation of our streets under present circumstances. Tourists are only creatures of flesh and blood like the rest of us, and the noblest architecture fails to satisfy the cravings of their animal nature. Opportunities for repose and refreshment form a considerable element in their ideas of enjoyment. But the unhappy stranger who has turned his back on Charing Cross or Regent Street, and is on his way westward, soon finds to his dismay that he has got altogether beyond the range of cafes and restaurants. There are, it is true, a few benches on one side of Piccadilly, and of course there are plenty of seats in the Park on which he can rest his weary limbs; but if in addition to rest he happens to desire some slight refreshment, a biscuit and glass of wine or cooling draught of seltzer, he is doomed to disappointment and despair. He has no chance of obtaining anything except at the reeking bar of a public-house, in a throng of grooms and stableboys. At some of the Park lodges what is supposed to be curds-and-whey and some other remarkable delicacies are on sale; but we should expect to be told that the British Constitution would suddenly tumble to pieces, or that something equally dreadful would happen, if any place were to be established in Hyde Park where an ice or a glass of wine could be obtained on a hot day. One of the pleasantest things in Paris is to sit on the Boulevards and watch the tide of people flowing past. You walk about looking at the shops, and when you are tired, you take a chair at a café. The consummations cost a few pence, and whether you take them or not the chair is worth the money. There would appear to be some mysterious and inscrutable law in operation in this country by which every refreshment-house is bound to be closed to the street, and made as dark and prison-like as possible. The speculator who first introduces chairs and little tables into London has a handsome fortune awaiting him, and will deserve it. There is no reason why one should be immured, like a skulking voter at the ballot, whenever one wants to sip a cup of coffee, or even to drink a glass of beer. English restaurants seem to have got it into their heads that nobody can ever want anything except a full dinner of several courses. The lounge is legion now in town, and what he wants is an occasional rest and slight refreshments.

While London is being made more agreeable for visitors, residents have also a claim to consideration. Some day in the far future we shall possibly have the advantage of an efficient local administration; but in the meantime something might perhaps be done to limit the freedom which reckless and malicious people enjoy of annoying their neighbours. The music of the streets is an organized conspiracy against the ears and nerves of the community. German bands and negro minstrels go about a dozen strong, with stands for their music, and establish themselves for a regular concert before your door. We should be sorry to wound the susceptibilities of a great race by hinting that the "Watch on the Rhine" is not a triumph of musical art, but it is just possible to have too much of it. Ever since the war the Germans not only play it, but howl it in a fashion which is hardly calculated to promote that benevolent neutrality which Count Bernstorff has so much at heart. A couple of cases are reported in the newspapers of this week which illustrate in a striking manner the sufferings and perils to which the inhabitants of the metropolis are exposed through the inconsiderate selfishness or eccentricity of their neighbours. A number of the inhabitants of Gower Street applied to the magistrate at Bow Street to prohibit the use of a steam-whistle of "terrible power" which has for some time been used by a piano-forte manufacturer for the purpose of summoning his men to work. It began screeching at six in the morning, and went on at intervals during the day. We can easily conceive that, as we alleged, the shrill scream of the whistle was absolute torture to persons in delicate health; and one gentleman has been obliged to send away an invalid daughter on account of it. The magistrate seemed to be in doubt whether anything but an injunction or an injunction from the Court of Chancery would be of any use. In another case, an applicant who was a clergyman for an injunction against a gentleman in Gower Street, who, it appeared, did not consider his garden complete without a stock of serpents, and who kept a large collection of them in his house to the terror and annoyance of his neighbours. The serpents sometimes escaped, and took walks abroad in the streets, to the great alarm of people who encountered them. The patron of the serpents seems to have failed to restore the equanimity of his neighbours by suggesting, as an essential precaution, that when they met a serpent with a black mark on its head they should be very careful not to touch it without first throwing a sock over its head. We should imagine that the neighbours would endeavour to kill any serpent found out of doors, but they are at least entitled to protection against a nuisance which is annoying, even if not absolutely dangerous. Of course there is no accounting for tastes, and we are not surprised to find that the owner of the "snakery" and his friends are amused that any objection should be taken to their pets. One of the friends has written a letter, giving an interesting account of the domestic relations between the M. family and the serpents. The writer admits that he was somewhat startled when he first saw Mr. M. seated at his desk with two large snakes coiled round him. Afterwards he saw a "boa constrictor as thick round as a small tree, twining playfully round Mrs. M.'s waist and neck, and forming a kind of turban round her head." "Nothing," we are assured, "could be prettier than to see this splendid serpent coiled all round Mrs. M. while she moved about the room"; he seemed "to adjust his weight so nicely, and every coil with its beautiful marking was relieved by the black velvet dress of the lady." The children, too, are entirely devoted to their darling snakes. Mr. and Mrs. M. are of course entitled to choose their own company at home, and to wrap themselves up in pythons and boa constrictors as much as they please; but it is rather hard that they should inflict their pets on the general public which does not appreciate them. The hideous screeching of a steam-whistle, and the perambulation of large serpents through the streets, are surely nuisances against which redress should be procurable by some simpler, less expensive, and more summary process than an appeal to the Court of Chancery. Freedom is no doubt a noble thing in its way, but it is conceivable that freedom to annoy and injure one's neighbours for a silly freak or selfish object might be curtailed without injury to society. London would certainly be a pleasanter place to live in if there were some sharper discipline in this respect.

HAY FEVER.

THERE is a misfortune from which many of our fellow-creatures are suffering at this moment which excites much less compassion than it would seem to deserve. For almost every class of evils to which the human frame is subject there is some pity to be found. Hospitals are the practical expression of the general feeling that disease is a calamity which should be regarded with sympathy; and prisons are beginning to give proof that the same sentiment may be extended to crime. We pity the unfortunate person who has taken to drinking, especially if that calamity should have brought in its train a disposition to brutal murder. The victim receives the careful attention of professional philanthropists, and must be somewhat consoled under his heavy affliction by the thought of the warm interest with which he is regarded by a generous public. The class of sufferers to whom we now refer are not subject to misfortunes of such magnitude, nor are they surrounded by that halo which confers a kind of poetic grace upon the hero of some popular catastrophe. And yet they suffer, though, for fear of an apparent bathos, we scarcely dare to mention the cause of their misery. Still as all misery should have its dignity, we have perhaps no real cause for hesitation. Hay-fever is a complaint which is certainly not so severe as smallpox, or so irritating as the gout, or so terrible in its consequences as a homicidal propensity. Its very name is unknown to many people, though of late years it has been rapidly coming into fashion. But there are those to whom it is an old familiar, and who annually dread its approaches. To them the poetical descriptions of summer are a bitter mockery, not for the ordinary reason that an English summer is apt to be a mere modification of winter, but because the intervals of light and heat imply for them a revival of torture. Nothing is more delicious in its way than the sweet smell of new-mown hay. Our unfortunate victim flies from it as he would fly from a plague-infested house. A near approach will be avenged by continued paroxysms of sneezing, which render him at once wretched and ridiculous. Bright daylight is an abomination to him; he is ready to exclaim with Milton's hero, "Sun, how I hate thy beams!"; for the glare seems to burn into his eyelids, and leaves them swelled, red, and in a burning inflammation. Even a summer night has its sorrows. The "embalmed darkness" of the poet means that his enemy is taking a new form. He becomes asthmatic, unable to sleep, and capable only of wheezing out imprecations upon his mucus mechanism. Other men may look forward to the early summer as a period for travelling; but to him a railway journey is prolonged and concentrated agony. The victim will sneeze incessantly from London to Paris, keeping up a series of explosions with the vigour and regularity of fire-arms, and coming only during the passage of the Channel, when even sea-sickness is welcomed as giving a brief respite to his misery. Is all this matter for ridicule? Is it nothing that summer, which calls up poetical associations to the whole human race beside, should for the victim of hay-fever invariably suggest sneezing? that most country odours should grate upon him like the sharpening of a saw? that the very sun in heaven should delight in teasing him with a prolonged practical joke?

Unfair as it may appear to be, there can be only one answer; undoubtedly the victim is ridiculous; it is the very bitterness of his lot that he feels himself to be ridiculous. If in the very paroxysm of his sufferings he happens to meet a fellow-sufferer who answers his signals, as it were, by giving sneeze for sneeze, he cannot resist the impression that he is being intentionally ridiculed. There is something too palpably ludicrous about the whole performance. Our more benevolent, if more superstitious, forefathers are said to have imagined that a sneeze was the convulsion by which a demon was expelled from the human body, and for that reason to have pronounced the benediction customary on the occasion. The hay-fever patient is half inclined to accept the theory, though it apparently involves the inference that when his complaint begins he must be occupied by a whole legion of fiends and can go on for hours expelling on an average one in every two or three minutes. Certainly that is a kind of deliverance hardly to be contemplated without horror. And yet it must be supposed that they are fiends of a frolicsome nature, mischievous rather than malicious, and delighting to play practical jokes rather than to torment their victim seriously. They are of that quaint breed of demon which filled the fancy of mediæval artists—a rather less good-natured variety of fairy, and with none of the terrible majesty which we naturally attribute to the fiends of the plague or the cholera. Admitting himself to be inevitably an object of ridicule, the luckless patient may still fall to see the justice of the arrangement. It is one of those mysteries for which we fear it is not easy to account, that some forms of human suffering are beyond all question irresistibly ludicrous. Few diseases give more acute anguish for a time than the toothache; and yet, for some reason or other, there is a tacit agreement that the toothache is in some sense comic. Nobody would think of drawing a man writhing under the agonies of any dangerous complaint, and inviting us to laugh; but comic artists from time immemorial have found one of their stock jokes in caricaturing tortures of extreme severity, though not likely to be dangerous. Is the bare fact that pain is not likely to kill a man a sufficient reason for laughing at it? Or take again the case of sea-sickness. The suffering is so great that a very short prolongation of its intensity would make life absolutely unbearable; the symptoms, moreover, are disgusting, or we should think them so on any other occasion. And yet, so long as we feel our own internal arrangements to be under perfect control, the sight of a sea-sick friend is undeniably and irresistibly ludicrous. One might have supposed a priori that the most brutal ruffian could hardly derive amusement from watching a friend vomiting under extreme torture; and yet the most refined ladies will indulge in a quiet smile under such circumstances, and the calamity is always mentioned with a confidence, generally justified by the result, that its name will act as a specific for the production of laughter.

We have started from a trifling observation, but we seem to have come upon a dark place in human nature. Are we to accept Hobbes's explanation of laughter as a "sudden glory"? Do we laugh at the trifling sufferings of another person because we feel a complacent sense of our own fortunate exemption; whilst, on the other hand, we are vexed when his sufferings become dangerous because they remind us of our own frailty? We laugh at toothache because it reminds us that our own teeth are sound; we shudder at the plague because it reminds us that we too are certain some day to die. We fear that this doctrine, agreeable as it might appear to a cynical turn of mind, can scarcely be supported by the facts; the perception of the ludicrous nature of a misfortune does not exclusively depend upon our own exemption from its possible influence. The absurdity of certain afflictions seems to result from some more accidental quality. Nobody, for example, is inclined to laugh at a man suffering from a headache; though one would suppose that any cerebral distress was a form of misfortune from which those who laugh at the sufferings of others are likely to be specially free. The fact seems rather to be, that the ludicrous part of suffering is simply the grotesque nature of the external manifestations provoked. In spite of our civilization, we still retain much of the old instinct which made people formerly take delight in professional fools. Anything bordering on the monstrous provokes the laughter of a child or a savage. Nobody would be brutal enough at the present day to laugh at personal deformity in real life; but the figure of Punch which has come down by tradition from an earlier period may illustrate the fact that a humpback was once thought to be absurd; and in pictures, though not in real life, it is still a conventional symbol of the ludicrous. We have always been rather scandalized by the story of how Spinoza used to laugh until the tears ran down his cheeks at the sight of spiders fighting. One of his recent biographers takes much pains to explain away the fact, and declares that the spiders were not really fighting, but making love. However that may be, there is something not quite worthy of the philosopher's dignity in the queer amusement which he selected, though it may not have implied a want of tenderness even for insect suffering. But, after all, we are pretty much alike. Philosophers and fools, we have still a share of those tastes which led our ancestors to take pleasure in the drivellings of an idiot, and which still lead children and the vulgar to take pleasure in the grimaces of a clown. Refined as we may be, we can be amused by simple personal contortions even of a rather disgusting kind, and even when they are indicative of pain; our taste and our sympathy strive against such pleasures, and gradually suppress them in their coarser forms, but do not suppress them altogether. Humiliating as the confession may be, we do not see how to escape the plain matter of fact that there is something amusing in seeing a fellow-creature sneeze exuberantly, or even vomit or screw up his features in agony. When the symptoms become indicative of real danger, the sense of the ludicrous is eclipsed, though it will sometimes recur in a ghastly way even at serious moments. After all, there is perhaps something intrinsically cruel about a sense of humour, much as we boast of the endowment. It means a power of mixing the ludicrous with the sentimental, and taking pleasure in the incongruous mixture. In its coarser forms it degenerates into that simple love of brutal horseplay which is confined to uneducated rustics, undergraduates, and subalterns in the army. But how far some taint of cruelty may not attach to its loftier developments is a question which might be worth considering. One can fancy a humorous devil, but hardly a humorous angel; for a perfectly sympathetic nature seems to exclude the power of blending the two opposite veins of feeling. The speculation however, would carry us too far, and perhaps lead to the dangerous ground of apologizing for some of the devil's propensities. We must be content therefore with exhorting all generous minds, not indeed to refrain from laughing at suffering, but to confine themselves as much as possible to laughing in private.

RESTRAINTS ON TIPLING

IT may be useful to inquire how far restriction upon the sale of liquor has been carried in the colonies. We find, on looking through a blue-book lately published, that the closing of liquor-shops is generally enforced during the night and the greater part of Sunday. The night consists in some colonies of six or seven hours, and in others of only four. On Sunday there is in several colonies opportunity for the working-man to obtain his beer for dinner or supper, and travellers can procure refreshment at almost all times, but drinking on the premises is discouraged. In Prince Edward's Island the sale of spirituous liquors on Sunday has been prohibited for the last hundred years. In Newfoundland no liquor can be sold on Sunday, and on week days all licensed houses must be closed at eleven o'clock p.m. In Bermuda there can be no sale on Sunday except by persons holding tavern licences, and the sale of spirits and wine, but not of beer, is restricted during certain hours of the night. Until 1861 the law provided that all money derived from liquor licences should be devoted to the enlargement of the parish churches. At the Cape of Good Hope the ordinary hours are from 6 a.m. to 9 p.m. on week days, and no sale is allowed on Sunday unless by special privilege, which is granted at the discretion of the Licensing Boards. At Natal there are restrictions on keepers of public-houses, but none on keepers of hotels, and the distinction between the two classes of traders is by no means clearly marked. In New South Wales no holder of a licence can keep his house open between 12 at night and 4 a.m., nor on Sundays except between 1 and 3 p.m. It is reported that intemperance is greatly on the decline throughout the colony, but it would be scarcely accurate to say that such decline springs mainly from the working of the law. The law in Queensland is the same as in New South Wales. The basis of the law of South Australia was the Tasmanian law of the old convict days, "which was necessarily strict." The law now requires closing between 11 p.m. and 5 a.m., and on Sundays, except for two hours of the afternoon, and again for two hours of the evening. This sale on Sundays is allowed only "by a side or private door." The total abstainers are busy in that colony, but they do not make much way. In Western Australia, public-houses must be closed on week days at 10 p.m., and may be opened on Sundays only between 1 and 3 p.m. In New Zealand the hour of closing on week days is generally 11 p.m., and no sale is permitted on Sundays.

It is obvious to remark that the conditions of existence in the colonies are different from those which prevail at home. A man who is hard at work for six days in London or some other great town desires, and perhaps requires, some change of air and scene on Sunday. In almost all the colonies a traveller can obtain refreshment on Sunday, but probably there is little travelling except for business on that day. It may be judged from this Report that the habit of observing Sunday in the colonies is quite as strict as at home, and it is mentioned that at Bermuda the belief prevails among the lower classes that legal penalties attach to its non-observance. We find almost everywhere a power of granting exceptions from the general law, and it is certain that such a power must exist in England if the law be made as stringent as some legislators desire. We believe it to be practically impossible to abridge the facility which is now allowed to excursionists on Sunday afternoons to obtain refreshment in the suburbs to which they go, or in their own neighbourhood after their return. Whether they take refreshment under the general law or under an exception engrafted on it, matters little so long as they get refreshment. It appears, however, hopeless to attempt any considerable restriction of the hours of the liquor trade, and the attention of fanatics is now principally directed to the punishment of drunkenness. As the Licensing Bill came from the House of Lords, every person found drunk in any public place was liable to a penalty not exceeding ten shillings. It is suggested that the working classes are now earning so much money that ten shillings is no penalty at all. So it was proposed to make the penalty twenty shillings or forty shillings, and further to substitute imprisonment, or to revive that venerable institution, the stocks. We have little doubt that the administration of the law would be better than the law itself; but it would be uncomfortable to be liable to be found drunk by a policeman over night and sent to prison by a magistrate in the morning. There might be absolutely nothing in the way of evidence to oppose to the policeman's statement, and the defendant would in vain allege that the salmon had unexpectedly and mysteriously disagreed with him. It would be impossible to define accurately the condition to which the penalty applies. It is intelligible that riotous conduct apparently produced by drink should be punished, but this is dealt with by a separate section. It is quite possible that over-exertion in sultry weather might cause a man to fall and lie helpless by the roadside. An active policeman coming up at the moment would assume that the case was one of drunkenness, and it might be difficult to prove that defect and not excess of alcoholic refreshment reduced the defendant to the condition in which he was found. It would not so much matter if the administration of this law rested wholly with the magistrates and the police. A man may perhaps be drunk, but if he is silently reeling homewards with the instinct which many drunkards possess, it would be the part of a discreet constable to let him go his way. If he cannot or will not go home, and particularly if he hangs about a drinking-bar and demands more liquor, having already had too much, then he may properly be punished for being "drunk." It is impossible however to forget what are the habits of large classes of Englishmen. The farmer usually attends a weekly market, and if he can afford the luxury, he dines at an ordinary and drinks pretty freely afterwards. Then he mounts his horse, or takes his seat in his gig, and rides or drives home. Whatever may be the condition of the man, the horse at any rate is sober. There are farmers who have done this with safety to themselves and no harm to others every week or fortnight for thirty years. But policemen stationed at the outlets of the town might bag every one of these farmers and have them all up before a magistrate next day. Each defendant would be proved to have been found drunk on a highway, and would be liable to fine, or, if some legislators could have their way, to imprisonment. It could scarcely perhaps be contended that he would be liable to the heavier penalty of the next clause of the Bill for being drunk on a highway while in charge of a horse, because, if the case were rightly considered, it would be seen that the horse was in charge of him. We venture to think that farmers going home from market might as well be let alone, and perhaps they would be let alone if there were not busybodies in the town ready to instruct magistrates and policemen in their duties.

Mr. Bruce is, as usual, in a state of pleasing uncertainty as to what ought to be done with this part of the Bill. He says that whether or not drunkenness is a crime, it is a serious offence, and "the fruitful parent of vice," and under one or other of these characters he inclines to punish it. Among sailors the doctrine used to be gravely held that it was not only not wrong, but natural and proper, to get drunk on shore. Many a man whom nothing could tempt from strict sobriety when on duty considered himself entitled to a drinking bout when his ship was safely brought to port. Then among landmen there are many who take more drink than is good for them at Christmas or New Year's Day. Let moralists preach as much as they please against this practice, but it would be silly to attempt to punish it by law. If the drunkard offends against public order or decency, or imperils the life of himself or other persons, then he ought to become liable to punishment. It would be well to hold fast to the principle that vice ought not to be punished as crime; but this would be too much to expect of Mr. Bruce. He expressed his willingness to consent to the infliction of one month's imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for the third "offence" of drunkenness. Happily, however, the Committee had more common sense than the Government. As the Bill now stands, the penalty for the third offence is 40s. The argument in support of this proposed legislation is that under a statute of James I. simple drunkenness was made punishable with a fine of 5s., which represented a much higher value at that time than it does now. But we believe that this statute has become practically obsolete, and we fail to see any adequate reason for reviving it. A modern statute imposes a penalty on being "drunk and riotous or indecent." The word riotous is not of course used in its legal sense, which would create this difficulty—that one man can get drunk, but there must be two or more to make a riot. It is understood by magistrates to mean that there must be some misconduct tending to disturb the quiet of a neighbourhood, or what is generally termed a "row." A magistrate who lately appeared as a witness before a Parliamentary Committee stated that in his opinion there were other offences by drunkards that required punishment. Thus, he said, a man gets drunk and allows himself to be robbed, and this is an offence against society. It is perhaps an offence that carries its own sufficient punishment. Mr. Bruce says that getting drunk is an offence which is "the fruitful parent of vice," and somebody else might say the same of getting half-drunk. We think that the Bill was sufficiently severe as it came from the House of Lords, and if the Committee of the House of Commons should take this view, Mr. Bruce will doubtless find himself able to agree with them. We strongly object to supplying fanatical testotallars with an instrument of persecution.

THE UPPER WYE.

OF the many beautiful parts of England and Wales, who shall say to which the preference is to be given? Putting aside the Lake district and North Wales, which in the picturesque of their mountain outlines and the wildness of their remote glens have sources of beauty rarely seen elsewhere, there are in the rest of the southern part of Great Britain many counties, many rivers, many ranges of hills, which we can imagine selected by the lover of external nature as the most perfect of the whole. If then we, for our part, have a special liking for one tract over the rest, we must not forget that there are points in which it is excelled. South Wales has not that deep glow of purple heather which in autumn clothes the Pennine range, from Northumberland to Derbyshire, with a garment of unrivalled colour; nor has it the overhanging and massive precipices of Malham, Castleton, and Cheddar; nor has it the sea coast of Devonshire, most striking of all for its sudden alternations of beauty and grandeur. But nowhere else are there river systems to be found of the magnitude and incessant scenic variety of those in South Wales; nor anywhere in the districts we have mentioned are the hills so bold, so finely formed, so precipitous as here. Indeed the Brecknockshire Beacons will stand a comparison with most of the summits of North Wales.

Let not the Alpine traveller think with scorn of such scenery as this, under the idea that Switzerland contains it all and much more besides. Switzerland may contain it, but few tourists in Switzerland will give their time to noticing subordinate features. Who, under the shadow of the cliffs of the Wetterhorn, or seeing above him the ice pinnacles of the Rhone glacier, will spend a day in tracking the fern-clad recesses of the hills, the broken edges of rock over pure green or brown pools between waterfalls in the valleys? Who will care for the delicate folds of the woody lower slopes, when he hopes to reach the summit of Monte Rosa? But he who comes to the simple hill country will find a more various and constant, though less intense interest, than that which is supplied by the great snowy mountains—an interest which is no longer overpowered by their mighty presence.

The Wye is popularly and justly considered the most beautiful of English rivers. It has a course of a hundred and fifteen miles, and there is not a tame step along its banks. For though in Herefordshire it flows through a country not generally thought romantic, the distant views from the Herefordshire hills in which the winding river is seen, from the Welsh mountains almost to the Forest of Dean, are among the finest in England. The lower part of the Wye, from Ross to Chepstow, is that which is usually thought of when the name of the river is mentioned, and it is the part where the picturesque is more brought to a focus, more concentrated than anywhere else. It is, however, the upper portion, from Hay to the source on the side of Minlimmon, that we here wish to speak of. We by no means regard this as inferior to the better known part by the Wyndcliff, Tintern, and Symond's Yat. It is true that a tourist who simply walked along the high road from one end of the river to the other might be of this opinion. The immediate banks of the Upper Wye are less perfect than in the case of some rivers of inferior merit; the arrangement of them is somewhat careless, so to speak; it needs search to discover the point of view from which they unite with the river into a landscape such as would be chosen by a painter. But such a search is by no means without its fascinations, even in itself, where the materials for the composition are so rich as they are here. Everywhere there are the tokens of a country built up of strong rocky masses; the bones of the earth protrude through its green vesture; the hills are cleft with deep rocky chasms, through which flow the tributaries. And let us add that no river that we know of has tributaries like the Wye—so numerous, so powerful, so romantic. Ascending from Hay, the little streamlets that flow down from the Black Mountains on the left, by Cusop and Llanigon, are not undeserving of notice. The soil there is of the rich sandstone that gives warmth and a luxuriance to all which it nourishes. Very pleasant is it to stand on the lower spurs of these mountains, with their bare summits rising behind, looking down on the intricacies of the glens below, and a wide extent of hill and plain country in front. But the rivulets that enter the Wye at Erwood and Aberedw flow through ravines of a wilder cast than any which the sandstone contains. Aberedw, with its old church, its huge yew trees, and singular cliffs, is well known; it is well worth while to follow the vale of the Edw for a few miles above this. But the Bachhowey and Calstwr, which from opposite sides flow into the river at Erwood, have gorges still deeper, more tortuous, more sombre, with overhanging rocks and woods, which at one spot on the former stream actually close overhead, and almost shut out the sight of the sky. Here there is a waterfall of some forty feet in height, with a considerable volume of water; a rude bridge, formed of two trunks of pines, has once served as a help to crossing the brook; now it is broken down, and hangs uselessly but picturesquely over the torrent. The Bachhowey, in some old books, is transformed into the Matchway; the waterfall is called the Oraig-pwll-da. In the neighbourhood of Erwood everything is lovely; the slight qualification which we applied above to the perfection of the Upper Wye does not hold here. Going upwards, and passing Aberedw, the Dihonw is the next tributary, flowing from the Epynt hills; the upper course of this is on the sandstone; from the road along its side are fine views of the distant valley of the Wye. Above the Dihonw we come to Builth, the best centre for the whole district. It is but a small place compared to many watering-places, such as Llandudno, Buxton, or Malvern; but for the number of excursions that can be made from it few places can rival it—certainly not one of the three above-named. You scarcely need step out of the village before you find yourself on an open common by the river, which here, if it is tolerably full, flows with a breadth and tranquillity not inferior to that of the Thames at Windsor. Below, however, it is seen between the arches of the picturesque bridge hurrying down a stony declivity; and a mile higher up it is enclosed between massive rocks, some jagged and slaty, some volcanic; these latter are worn into singular hollows, and protrude thin and bony ribs from the bank into the deep and clear pools. But between these pools are rapids and cataracts of great power. The banks are clothed with gorse and trees, large or small; one fir-tree of uncommon height is a conspicuous object up the river. There are some woody islands hereabouts. Nothing, indeed, is more remarkable in the Wye, through its whole upper course, than its breadth, which far exceeds that of most English mountain rivers; and another very conspicuous feature is the bed of hard sharp rock over which it flows, and which is best seen in the part between Builth and Boughrood.

To reach the rapids of the Wye above Builth you cross the river Yrŷon by a swinging bridge. This again is a broad clear stream, overhung with trees, hurrying down rocky descents, and backed behind by the smooth green masses of the Epynts. But the finest part of the Yrŷon is some twelve or thirteen miles from Builth, among the rocky hills of Llanwrtd, another small Welsh watering-place. Five miles above Llanwrtd is Llanfhaengol Abergwesin, with a new and very beautiful church, the solid massiveness of which suits well with, and yet is not dwarfed by, the surrounding hills. Cross these hills to the west, and you come to what is perhaps the most solitary hamlet in England or Wales, Ystradlin, on the Towy, and in one of the most romantic situations.

No visitor to Builth should omit to ascend the many-peaked Carneddau hill, which rises on the other side of the Wye to the north-east. A summer's afternoon may well be spent among its rocky and tangled recesses, and on its broad terraces, from whence the valley of the Wye is seen for a distance of some twenty miles, the broad stream shining like silver in the sun. The Builth bridge is a conspicuous feature from this point. Numberless again, are the wild flowers which colour the fields and scent the air, in early summer, by the side of the Yrŷon and the Wye; the wild thyme, the birdfoot trefoil, the yellow ragwort, the harebell, the mallow, and many others. But the people who live among these hilly parts have absorbed into their natures rather the ruggedness of the rocks than the softness of the flowers. In one wild piece of country on the Radnorshire side of the Wye faction fights are not uncommon. The belief in fairies is yet firmly held by some even of the better sort; and bold would be thought the man who should venture after nightfall into some of the shady dingles of evil repute. Nevertheless the race is a canny one, and if not enlightened, yet desirous of enlightenment. Railways are rapidly making the English language the dialect of everyday use; it is curious to find that in two neighbouring valleys, of perhaps equal wildness and apparent remoteness from the influences of civilization, one will, so to speak, have been submerged by the advancing tide, while the other retains its native Welsh unchanged. But the whole of Radnorshire, in spite of its uncommon wildness, is now practically an English county; the dividing line lies in Brecknockshire.

Let us return to the upward course of the Wye, above Builth. Some five miles above that watering-place the river is enclosed by hills of more broken and mountainous aspect, though not actually higher, than any which have yet appeared on its banks. The woods do not cease to accompany it; so thick are they that for many miles along the high road they shut out all view of anything but themselves—unless indeed where some great rock-throw height shoots itself up with more than ordinary boldness. The river retains its breadth until Rhayader is reached; then on a sudden it contracts into a simple mountain torrent. Except for this diminution in the size of the river, Rhayader is an even more fascinating spot than Builth. The great purple hills, with jagged clefts, lie spread round it; the gorge of the Elan—the stream named from its swiftness, as that of a deer—encloses at a distance of a few miles one of the most picturesque scenes of wood, water, and rock to be found in South Wales. Of Cwm Elan Bowles wrote in elegant verse; and here, too, Shelley lived. Into the Elan falls the scarcely less beautiful stream of the Clarwen. What the upper valley of the Clarwen is like may be gathered from the following anecdote. When the Ordnance maps were coloured lately by the Government to mark upon them the divisions of the parishes, a tract of some two or three square miles in the upper valley of the Clarwen was by mistake cut off from one parish and affixed to another. The difference, however, was quite immaterial for the purpose for which the maps were required; since the gain of the one parish and the loss of the other in inhabitants, consequent upon the transfer, was represented by exactly one!

We have still left unnoticed many of the streams that fall into the Upper Wye, or into its tributaries. The Ithon, the Marteg, the Caumarch, the Dulas, the Chwefru, all offer picturesque scenes to the tourist, and good fishing to the angler. The Wye itself is strictly preserved along its whole length. Neither have we had space to speak of the numerous other rivers of South Wales. The Uak, the Towy, the Teivy, the Neath, have on their banks scenes not inferior to any on the Wye, though perhaps less of long continued beauty. But this must be enough for the present.

EMIGRATION.

THE most striking feature of the emigration of the last three years has been the increase in the number of English emigrants, especially as compared with Irish. Previously to 1869 the Irish emigration had always been much larger than the English. But in 1871 the English emigrants were to the Irish as 59 to 41. Nevertheless, in proportion to population, the Irish emigration is still much greater than the English. By far the largest part of the whole emigration goes to the United States. We hear much of the influence of Irishmen upon the politics of the United States, but it is remarkable that the English emigrants to that country last year exceeded in number the Irish in the proportion of 36 to 33. The Emigration Commissioners, in their recent Report, remark that the large number of emigrants of British birth who went to the United States, compared with the number who went to Canada, will probably be viewed with regret; but this is an inevitable consequence of the extent of the emigration. They state that Canada cannot at present absorb more than 30,000 or 40,000 emigrants a year, and the excess beyond that number can obtain employment only in the extensive labour market of the United States. It appears, however, from other passages of the Report, that Canada could take more emigrants than go there, and the activity of the agency for emigration to the United States is mentioned as one of the causes of the preference shown by emigrants for that country. It is a pity that the Commissioners themselves should help to throw unfounded discouragement upon intending emigrants to Canada. They say that that country can only take a limited number, and if that number be exceeded the surplus must go to the United States, and that it is better to go directly than indirectly to that which must be the ultimate resort. Yet when they come to speak particularly of Canada, they represent the demand for labour in that country as greater than it has ever been before. Thus they quote the agent for Ottawa as saying that a much larger number of immigrants might have been placed by him, and that the rates of wages were never better than at present, both in the city and surrounding country. Agricultural labourers have been in great request throughout the whole Ottawa Valley, and the agent was never able to furnish more than a partial supply to fill the many orders which he received from the farming community. "The openings in every direction are such that there need be no hesitation in those skilled in agricultural pursuits in making this neighbourhood their home." It is a pity that this statement, if correct, should not be widely divulged in England, so that it might help to divert to Canada some part of the stream of emigration which flows to the United States. Again, the agent at Kingston says, "In regard to the number of immigrants applied for during the season, I have no doubt that four times the number of each class could have been settled without the least difficulty within the limits of this agency. . . . The demand for female servants has been very great in this agency for years past." Again, the agent at Toronto says, "The demand for female servants is very great, both in the cities, towns, and villages. Any number will find ready employment, as well as youths from fourteen to eighteen years of age. The demand for all kinds of labour has not been so great in many years as at this moment."

It must not, however, be forgotten what are the classes of immigrants that Canada requires. They are labourers of all kinds, especially agricultural; mechanics, and artisans accustomed to common trades; domestic servants, particularly females; boys and girls over fifteen years of age; tenant farmers; persons of capital yielding sufficient interest for their maintenance. In this enumeration the most desirable class is placed first, and the others in order of eligibility. "The classes who are not required are professional men and clerks." It is remarkable that the demand comes from all new countries for female servants, and although some efforts have been made to supply it, yet that which is manifestly desirable is almost unobtainable. The Commissioners draw attention to the great and increasing excess of females over males in the population of the United Kingdom. This excess is largely due to emigration. According to the census of 1871, the excess of females over males is nearly one million. In the last ten years the emigration of males to that of females has been as three to two. "This must always be the case." However urgent the demand for female domestic servants in the United States and the Colonies, and however great the advantages held out to them, it is not to be expected, say the Commissioners, that young women will leave their homes to seek their fortunes in new countries with the same readiness and courage as men. This of course is true; but it is much to be desired that some organisation should be provided which—to put the matter plainly—would supply with a wife every colonist who could afford to keep one. Something has been done in this direction, but not nearly as much as appears requisite to the prosperity of the colonies. Thus it is stated that in Queensland the female is as to the male population about as 67 to 100. This proportion is stated to be "undoubtedly low." In Victoria there has been a great increase in the proportion of females, which is "very satisfactory." It has been brought about in great measure by the assisted emigration conducted by the Board, which has of late years consisted principally of "female domestic servants." This we take to be the official term for wives for colonists working at agriculture or trades. It is manifest that the progress of a colony of favourable soil and climate depends upon the quantity of labour which it can bestow on tillage, and therefore every healthy child born in it ought to be an addition to its wealth. The anxiety of the Governments of Victoria and Queensland to promote the immigration of women—or, in other words, the marriage of men—is therefore laudable. But it must be remembered that, for women of a superior class, new countries offer but few openings. There is no caution more constantly repeated by colonial authorities than this—that women above the class of domestic servants, and not willing to undertake menial duties, should not emigrate to the colonies.

When strikes occur among agricultural labourers, and are apprehended among housemaids, it begins to look as if emigration from England had been carried far enough at least for the comfort of the classes who do not emigrate. The great impediment to emigration is the want of means to pay passage-money, and in this respect Australia and New Zealand are at a disadvantage compared with Canada, which those communities take apparently insufficient measures to redress. It is perhaps surprising, considering the small numbers of the entire emigration to those colonies, that part of it should have been obtained from Sweden and Norway. If the colonies really require labour for their prosperity, and if they have not money to pay for importing it, they could probably borrow, for that purpose as well as others, in the London market. And if they were prepared to pay, and employed active agents, we should think that they might draw upon the rural districts of England more largely than they do. It is easy for magistrates and clergymen to diffuse information as to the prospects of employment in the colonies, and the means of reaching them; but unfortunately the colonial agents would select for emigration exactly those tenants and parishioners whom it would be desirable to keep at home, while they would be apt to regard poachers and Internationalists as equally unprofitable articles of exportation. The colonies have long since rejected our crime, and they are equally determined to decline our idleness and improvidence. But they are most loud and unanimous in protesting that neither ladies nor gentlemen need apply. We must keep our refinement of manner, and cultivation of intellect, and taste in dress and accessories, to ourselves, and perhaps in course of time, and under stress of circumstances, it may be found possible to combine these ornamental qualities with some of those which are declared to be alone useful in a new community. If the diffusion of knowledge among the working classes leads in future years to enlarged emigration, it will come to this—that the middle and upper classes will be deprived of that assistance in the performance of domestic offices which they now with increasing difficulty obtain. If indigenous labour becomes scarce, it is not obvious from what quarter of the world labour can be imported. The Chinaman and coolie are almost ubiquitous, but it is hardly to be expected that they will ever exhibit their industry and frugality and other less admirable qualities in England. The coolie is eagerly invited to the West Indies and Mauritius, and the Chinaman, although uninvited and almost repelled, finds his way to Australia and New Zealand. Considering that famine in the East Indies occasionally sweeps away many thousands of persons who would be certain to earn a subsistence in the West Indies, it seems desirable that the emigration of coloured races should receive greater encouragement than it does. Unfortunately it is liable to many kinds of abuses, and it is complained that the regulations necessary to prevent abuse check the legitimate development of business. An immigration agent for Trinidad points with justifiable pride to the number of strong hearty men who might have perished from famine, to the number of women who have been rescued from degradation worse than death, and to the troops of healthy and intelligent children who will hereafter augment the supply of labour. These are undeniably beneficial results of a system which requires nevertheless to be carefully superintended. The coolie is useful and inoffensive, but the Chinaman, besides being personally disagreeable to European colonists, is apt to look sharply after his own interests, which may possibly conflict with theirs. We are told that a Committee of the House of Representatives in New Zealand was appointed to inquire into Chinese immigration, and they made a report which negatives various allegations which we believe are commonly brought against the Chinamen. They are said to be industrious and frugal, which no one doubts. They are also said to be as "orderly" as Europeans, which is certainly true in the sense that they do not get drunk and shoot and fight in the streets. It is added that no special risk to the morality or security of the community need be apprehended from their presence, and that "they are not likely to introduce any special infectious diseases into it. This assurance upon such authority will, we think, be satisfactory to the European colonists. The Chinamen are well adapted for manual and light unskilled occupations, but nearly all those who come to the colonies are the purpose of mining for gold. They occupy and turn to good account ground which would not pay the European miner, and they generally return to China as soon as they have amassed a cool. If this be so, they are scarcely likely to become a constituent element in the formation of the race to which the New Zealander who will meditate among the ruins of London, may be expected to belong. And it would appear to be better that they should not. It is difficult to believe that European civilisation, whatever be its faults, would be improved by the admixture of a Chinese element, and it is perhaps fortunate that the English colonist of New Zealand considers the manners and customs of his Chinese competitors disgusting.

THE CANADIAN ARMY.

NOT MORE than a year ago we gave an account of the military organisation of Canada, and of the efforts she was making to render herself independent of any permanent assistance from the mother-country. Since we last wrote on the subject, the Dominion has been thrown almost entirely on its own resources, for the whole of the regular forces, save a small portion constituting the garrisons of Halifax, has now been withdrawn from the colony. The result is, by no means that Canada is defenceless. To use the words of the Adjutant-General of Militia in writing of Quebec and Kingston:—"The British flag that floats over these strongholds is as vigilantly guarded, and the morning gun, as regularly fired, by the Dominion Militia Artillery Corps, who have replaced the regular troops at those stations for garrison duty." The Canadians have only seen in the departure of the Imperial troops an argument for increased exertion, and for developing and perfecting their arrangements for defence. The official report of the Militia for the military year 1871-72 shows that marked progress has been made both as regards numbers and efficiency. At the last enrolment in 1869 the enrolled reserve Militia, comprising every man liable to military service, numbered 656,666 men. In 1871 it had increased to 694,009. There is, it is true, a slight falling off in the paper strength of the active Militia, which at the close of 1870 was 44,519, while on December 31, 1871, it was 43,174. We fancy, however, that this decrease is more nominal than real, and that many of the 1,345 men who make up the difference existed only on paper. It is certain that in 1871 the training was far more systematic and extensive than it had been previously. Out of the total number borne on the rolls of the active Militia at the close of the military year 1871-72, 34,414 officers and men underwent the annual training, of whom 28,544, with 1,996 horses, were assembled at brigade or division camps of exercise for sixteen days' continuous drill, and were paid and supplied as on actual service; 5,210 officers and men, with 319 horses, were assembled in camps for eight days' training, being paid and supplied under ordinary regulations; while 8,760 officers and men performed the annual drill at corps headquarters, or, in the case of many garrison batteries, at certain forts where they were put through a short course of gun drill and practice. Hitherto these latter have been chiefly trained as infantry, but in 1871, the services of competent ex-officers and non-commissioned officers of the Royal Artillery having been obtained, the garrison batteries have been trained to the use of their proper arms, and have fired the regulation allowance of shot and shell. The field batteries have also received due gunnery instruction. A great step in advance has been taken by the establishment of two schools of artillery under the command of specially trained officers of the Royal Artillery. These schools have not only been employed for purposes of instruction, but also as permanent garrison batteries to guard certain forts hitherto occupied by the Imperial troops.

These batteries may indeed be considered as representing the standing army of Canada, and a few details concerning them cannot but be interesting, for it must be remembered that, as they are made up of volunteers from the active Militia batteries, they present a fair sample of the whole of the artillery branch. Besides the permanent staff of instructors, these two batteries, A and B, numbered at the date of last report 209 men engaged for twelve months, and 27 officers and men for three months. The average height of non-commissioned officers and men is in A Battery 5 ft. 8½ in., and in B Battery 5 ft. 8 in.; the average chest measurement being in A Battery 37½ in., and in B Battery 37½ in. During the year 1871, 45 candidates for commissions in the active Militia Artillery obtained certificates at the schools of gunnery; of these 23 were first and 13 second class certificates. Since the establishment of these schools the total number of first class certificates obtained is 231, and of second class certificates 49. It is evident, therefore, that there is already a good harvest of instructed officers in the artillery branch of the Militia, and that soon there will be a large number of trained gunners. We may mention that at each of the gunnery schools there are 6 horses for the purpose of giving field artillery, and especially drill, instruction. At present the number of field guns is small, being only 48, or 1 per 1,000 men; but the Adjutant-General of Militia strongly urges an increase. Of the 48 guns now in possession, 21 are 4 in. 64-pounder Armstrongs; but it is in contemplation to arm all the batteries with M. L. R. 9-pounder guns, such as are used by the British Artillery. The great difficulty is to obtain a sufficient number of suitable horses, and the Adjutant-General recommends that such as may be required should be enrolled in each battery, a retaining fee being given of 10 dollars per horse per annum, and a daily allowance of one dollar when called out for duty. Some such plan might perhaps with advantage be adopted by us for horning guns of position or even the Central waggon. The garrison artillery, consisting of 70 batteries, is now, as we have above remarked, being carefully trained to its proper duties, and, with the exception of the four Quebec batteries, seems to be making progress. With, however, the exception of two 7-in. breech-loader guns, all the guns are old smooth-bore pieces. This defect will no doubt be remedied, as money becomes available for the purchase of rifled guns. The importance attached to the artillery is shown by a recommendation that the limit of training should be extended from 16 to 35 days.

The Engineers are few in number and have scarcely received any instruction in their special duties. It is proposed, however, that in future instruction shall be given at the gunnery schools. Of the three companies, of a total strength of 232 officers and men, one received its first lesson in field engineering last year. Of the other two, one is composed of men in the employment of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and ought, owing to the nature of the daily occupations of its members, to be very useful in the construction and repair of railways during war. The Adjutant-General urges that the number of companies should be increased till there is one in each district. He also recommends that there should be a telegraph company duly provided with apparatus in each province, and that postion trains should be formed.

The proportion of cavalry is as small as that of Engineers, there being only one regiment, 5 squadrons, and 9 independent troops—giving a total of 1,571 officers and men—in the whole Dominion. The increase of this arm and its organization in district regiments is suggested. It is also urged that, as is recommended in the case of the artillery, the training should be extended to thirty-two days, and that the horses should be enrolled. That the cavalry is, however, very efficient even under present conditions may be gathered from the fact that the New Brunswick regiment marched from its headquarters into camp in two days, each troop accomplishing on an average eighty miles, including the distance between troop and regimental headquarters. The infantry consists of 636 companies in 76 battalions, and several independent companies. The great defect in this branch of the service consists in the weakness of the companies, which number rather under 50 men each on an average, and in the fact that there are many independent companies, and that battalions are consequently too small, many battalions at the annual training only turning out about 250 or 260 strong. The men are however fairly drilled, well armed, clothed, and equipped, and remarkable for their discipline. In the course of a few years this arm cannot fail to be at all events highly efficient as regards officers, for the schools of instruction, of which there are four, turned out in 1871 315 candidates for commissions. Of these 42 obtained first class and 273 second class certificates.

But the Canadian military authorities are by no means content with imparting merely theoretical instruction, for all over the country troops were assembled in camps and practised in field manoeuvres. It is to the credit of the officers commanding that these manoeuvres were carried on in such a manner as to prove that the changed conditions of modern war and the modifications in tactics consequently rendered necessary are as fully recognized in Canada as in the most advanced school in this country. Nor were the Canadian Militia altogether without experience in earnest campaigning. In the beginning of October 1871 the distant province of Manitoba was disturbed by a Fenian invasion, and the Government consequently determined to send a reinforcement of 275 officers and men to strengthen the small force occupying Fort Garry. On the 12th October the Adjutant-General received the order, a force was promptly raised, and on the 18th of the following month the expedition reached its destination, having thus accomplished at an unfavourable season of the year, in less than one month, a journey for which the previous expedition had required three months.

The great difficulty which the Canadian Government has to face is that of volunteering. It seems that this method of keeping corps complete is nearly worn out, many captains finding it necessary, to the great detriment of discipline, personally to entreat men to join. There is also this great evil, that as long as the voluntary system lasts, it is often necessary to grant commissions to incompetent men solely on social grounds. Besides, the willing men have become somewhat tired of taking on themselves a duty which ought to be shared by all; and though a certain number of re-engagements for a second period of three years do occur, they will, it is expected, soon cease. Such being the case, a strong feeling, shared by the Adjutant-General himself, is growing up that the time has arrived for making service in the active Militia compulsory. The obligation indeed already exists, but the law has not yet been put in force. It is, however, probable that a change in this respect will soon take place; and when it does, the military position of Canada will be strong indeed. Even without reckoning Columbia, where the reserve Militia system is only now being introduced, the Dominion numbers nearly 700,000 men between the ages of 16 and 60 liable to military service. In the course of some six years a large proportion of these will have passed through the active Militia—already indeed many have done so—and will be thus fully trained soldiers. Even as it is, 30,000 men, thoroughly fit to take the field, could be assembled at any point on the frontier within four or five days, and these would have in support a reserve of about 670,000 men, of whom 13,000 men would belong to the active Militia. Nor have the authorities contented themselves with a mere vague enactment that every man between the ages of 18 and 60 is liable to serve when called upon to do so; but the whole of the reserve Militia is enrolled by districts, and there is a permanent recruiting staff of officers whose sole duty is to forward the number of men required. Indeed in this particular the Canadians seem to have borrowed from the Germans. It might be as well were we to take a hint from our colony. There is at present in England a strong but, we believe, daily diminishing objection to universal liability to military service. That it will be necessary ere long to have recourse to it we can scarcely doubt. Until, however, we learn, with or without the lesson imparted by a Jena or a Sedan, what is the only sound principle of national defence, it surely could inflict but a slight burden on the population were we to adopt at all events the principle of universal enrolment by districts. This would be a step in the right direction, and would tend to prepare men's minds for one still further in advance. We attach no great importance to the common assertion that the nation would not stand such a burden as would be imposed by universal liability to military service. In Canada we see a large English population not only accepting the principle but on the point of carrying it into effect, and what Englishmen can submit to in Canada cannot be too much to expect from Englishmen in England. Otherwise we should have to confess with shame that the patriotism of which in words we boast has in practice died out amongst us, that luxury and a high state of civilization have killed us, and that the only true Englishmen are to be found on the banks of the St. Lawrence.

REVIEWS.

DE TOCQUEVILLE'S LETTERS AND CONVERSATIONS.*

THIS is an extremely interesting book, and a singularly good illustration of the value which, even in an age of newspapers and magazines, memoirs have and will always continue to have for the purposes of history. The reflections which it contains on French politics from 1848 to 1859 are such reflections as one might look for in vain in speeches or articles. They would not be found in speeches, because statesmen seldom say exactly what they think, or all that they think, but only so much as seems suitable for the occasion, adapted to the taste and understanding of an audience; nor yet in the press, because articles are written hastily, often by inferior people in a reckless spirit, and with a view to excite rather than to inform or control the popular mind. In these letters and conversations we have one of the keenest political thinkers of his generation expressing his views on passing events with perfect freedom, candour, and directness, subject in many instances to the cross-examination of another vigorous and congenial intelligence. No expression of views addressed to the public could have the same simplicity and truthfulness; no subsequently written disquisition could have the same value as showing precisely what the impression was which each change in the situation made as it occurred. For this is what the historian most desires, and can most rarely get from a trustworthy source; to him the errors and mistakes of the wise are the most precious of all data.

Probably few men have had a more comprehensive conception of politics as a subject of science, in which facts should be carefully collected and deliberately investigated, than Mr. Senior had; or a more constant sense of being present at the making of history, a more anxious desire to discern what is permanently important in the events of the hour, to recognize and estimate their ultimate historical bearing. The pains he bestowed on his journals and conversations are the best proof of this. It was therefore a singular piece of good fortune that brought him into relations with De Tocqueville, whom he was fitted to appreciate, and out of whose conversations he was at great pains to select what was best worth noting down and preserving. His society was evidently very congenial to De Tocqueville, and in it the latter, whose nature desponding temperament as well as a tinge of pride and reserve prevented him from displaying his full powers in general company, found himself cheered and stimulated, and seems to have been in all respects at his best.

These two volumes consist partly of the correspondence of De Tocqueville with Mr. Senior, partly of Mr. Senior's notes of conversations at which he was present, written out as soon as possible afterwards, and in some cases submitted for revision to De Tocqueville, who added notes modifying any statement which he thought did not precisely represent his views. Mr. Senior laments that in his version the grace and delicacy of the spoken words evaporate; but their more solid merits at any rate remain—they are admirably clear as well as concise. Throughout the book one is struck by the same qualities as those which make the Democracy in America and the Ancien Régime models in their kind. We have the same judicial calmness, the same exquisitely fine powers of observation, the same ingenuity in tracing out causes and connecting facts of diverse orders with one another, the same comprehensive grasp of politics and society as a whole, of the relation of social and economical phenomena to the power and working of Government; finally, the same grace, finish, and lucidity of style. Very pleasant too are the glimpses we get here and there of his personal character and home life, which Mr. Senior's daughter, who edits the book, has judiciously kept as a sort of background to the political discussions which form its main theme. The manuscript seems to have been prepared so carefully that there was comparatively little left for an editor to do, but what there was has been done with great good sense and good taste. Now and then a sentence, or even an entire letter, might have been omitted, as relating to matters purely ephemeral and personal, but the space saved by such retrenchments would scarcely exceed a few pages; and as any one who had set out with a determination to use the pruning-knife would probably have cut away passages which, though not positively important, we should have been sorry to lose, we are not disposed to regret the view Mrs. Simpson has taken of her duties. She has rendered a great service to readers by prefixing a very full table of contents, by whose aid one can follow each topic as it comes up from time to time for discussion.

The main theme of these letters and conversations is of course the contemporary politics of France. There are some interesting bits of literary criticism, and some remarks on English affairs (of which more hereafter); the rest of the book is virtually a running commentary on the Revolution of 1848, the rise of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, the coup d'état, and the earlier period of the Empire. It is wonderfully penetrating and profoundly melancholy. The faults and weaknesses of France are laid bare with a hand not unpatriotic indeed, but perfectly truthful; her dangers are shown to arise from the political ignorance of some classes and the indolence of others, as well as from a too even balance of equally selfish parties. Unhappily these faults and dangers are almost exactly those which the last two years have shown to be still present and formidable; one of them, the ascendancy of Socialism over the minds of the working classes, may even be thought to have grown more serious. The permanence, among so many external changes, of these sources of mischief, shows that De Tocqueville did not err in thinking them deeply seated, and in foretelling a long period of unrest for his country. Nothing can be more remarkable than the way in which some of his criticisms and prophecies, which might have seemed fanciful when they were uttered, have found their illustration or fulfilment in the history of the years 1870-71.

Everything is put with so much terseness and elegance that it is impossible to summarize, and not easy even to select passages to be extracted without injuring them by removal from their context. All that we shall attempt is to indicate the dominant ideas in De Tocqueville's conception of the contemporary political situation, and to urge those who have leisure to read the book to see how he works these out in detail. We begin with the Monarchy of July. He regretted, if not its fall, yet certainly the time and the manner of its fall; but he thought it an ignoble and unworthy system under which France was not improving. Writing in August 1847, he says:—

You will find France calm and not unprosperous, but anxious. Men's minds have been subject for some time to a strange uneasiness. In the midst of tranquillity more profound than any we have enjoyed for a very long time, the idea that our present position is unstable besets them. As for myself, though not without alarm, I am less anxious; I do not exaggerate our danger. I believe that our social edifice will continue to rest on its present basis, because no one, even if he wish to change its foundation, can point out another. But yet the state of public feeling disturbs me. The middle classes, cajoled and bribed for the last seventeen years by the Government, have gradually assumed towards the rest of the nation the position of a little aristocracy, and without its higher feelings; one feels ashamed of being led by such a vulgar and corrupt aristocracy; and if this feeling should prevail among the lower classes, it may produce great calamities. And yet how can a Government be prevented from using corruption, when the nature of our constituencies makes corruption so convenient, and our centralization makes it so easy? The fact is that we are trying an experiment of which I cannot foresee the result. We are trying to employ at the same time two instruments, which I believe have never been combined before—an elected Assembly and a highly centralized Executive. It is the greatest problem of modern times. We have proposed it to the world, but it has not yet been solved.

Three weeks before the outbreak of the Revolution of 1848 he had said in the Chamber, among violent murmurs of dissent:—

Revolution is not far off. Without doubt the disorder does not break out in overt acts, but it has sunk deeply into the minds of the people. Look at what is passing in the breasts of the working classes, as yet, I own, tranquil. It is true that they are not now inflamed by purely political passions in the same degree as formerly, but do you not observe that their passions from political have become social? Do you not see gradually pervading them opinions and ideas whose object is not merely to overthrow a law, a Ministry, or even a dynasty, but society itself—to shake the very foundations on which it now rests? Do you not listen to their perpetual cry? Do you not hear incessantly repeated, that all those above them are insupportable and unworthy of governing them? that the present distribution of wealth in the world is unjust, that property rests upon no equitable basis? And do you not believe that when such opinions take root, when they spread till they have almost become general, when they penetrate deeply into the masses, that they must lead sooner or later—I know not when, I know not how—but that sooner or later they must lead to the most formidable revolutions? Such is my deep conviction; I believe that at this moment we are slumbering on a volcano.

Again:—

The great and real cause of the Revolution (of 1848) was the insupportable spirit which animated the Government during this long reign; a spirit of trickery, of baseness, and of bribery, which has corrupted and degraded the middle classes, destroyed their public spirit, and filled them with a selfishness so blind as to induce them to separate their interests entirely from those of the lower classes whom they govern, which consequently have been abandoned to the caprice of men who, under the name of democracy, lower orders, have filled their heads with false ideas. . . . Sooner or later the Orleans dynasty must have been upset, even if it had reposed on a really democratic basis. But it rested on the most selfish and grasping of plutocracies. There were no nomination seats for the nobles; no seat and lot boroughs for the agitators, no venal ones for the millionaires; the road to power lay along one flat and level terrace of bourgeoisie, looked up to with envy and looked down on with scorn, amounting to disgust, by the better born and better educated classes above it.

With this feeling as to the impossibility of reconciling different classes to one another, it is not surprising that De Tocqueville should not have expected a long life for the Republic of 1848-51. We find him speculating on its extinction and its probable successor on almost the same data and in almost the same terms as those which are used now respecting the present Government of France. For some time he scarcely ventured to predict the time and immediate causes of its fall, thinking the agricultural Monarchists as formidable as the Socialists of the cities. But in 1851 it became clear enough that the real danger was from the President. De Tocqueville, however, though he believed Louis Napoleon unscrupulous enough for anything, and saw him surrounded by a gang of knaves and desperadoes, thought him too irresolute to strike a decisive blow at the Assembly and the Constitution. Nor, although he says the people are now in a state of mind in which, whatever be its follies or its usurpations, they will side with the executive; they are thoroughly sick of revolutions, and would sacrifice the Constitution to avoid a contest, does he seem to have supposed that there was any power in the President's hand sufficient for his purposes:—

He may attempt a coup d'état, he may summon a constituent body in defiance both of the Constitution and of the Assembly. This would fail; the army and the National Guard would side with the Assembly. It is very doubtful whether the President and the Assembly together could effect a coup d'état. Neither of them could do so in opposition to the other.

Signally as this prediction was falsified, it was not, when made, an unreasonable one. For the army had in all previous struggles gone with the people, as it would probably have done this time also had not all its honest leaders been seized by Louis Napoleon and his fellow-conspirators. Nor could any one have supposed beforehand that they were capable either of so much daring or of such unparalleled atrocities:—

"This," said Tocqueville after the coup d'état (December 23, 1851), "is a new phase in our history. Every previous revolution has been made by a political party. This is the first time that the army has seized France, bound and gagged her, and laid her at the feet of its ruler. . . . He began to conspire from November 10, 1848. His direct instructions to Oudinot, and his letter to Ney only a few months after his election, showed his determination not to submit to Parliamentary government. Then followed his dismissal of Ministry after Ministry, until he had degraded the office to a clerkship. Then came the semi-regal progress, then the reviews of Satory, the encouragement of treasonable cries, the selection for all the high appointments in the army of Paris of men whose infamous characters fitted them to be tools. Then he publicly insulted the Assembly at Dijon; and at last, in October, we knew that his plans were laid. It was then only that we began to think what were our means of defence, but that was no more a conspiracy than it is a conspiracy in travellers to look for their pistols when they see a band of robbers advancing."

His subsequent criticisms of Louis Napoleon's policy vary but little from the idea with which they start—that his first necessity is to keep the middle classes scared by the spectre of Socialism, and to occupy the minds of all classes by a restless foreign policy, especially by successful wars:—

What I fear is that when this man feels the ground crumbling under him he will try the resource of war. It will be a most dangerous experiment. Defeat, or even the alternation of success and failure which is the ordinary course of war, would be fatal to him, but brilliant success might, as I have said before, re-establish him. It would be playing double or quits. He is by nature a gambler. . . . War with a Bonaparte means the Rhine. . . . Depend on it this Government can exist, even for a time, only on the condition of brilliant, successful war, or prosperous peace. It is bound to be rapidly and easily victorious. If it fail in this it will sink, or perhaps in its terrors and its struggles it will catch at the other alternative, peace.

But De Tocqueville's opinion of the political capacity, though certainly not of the moral character, of Louis Napoleon seems afterwards to have risen. His head proved strong enough to bear his elevation. His plans, though never comprehensive or masterly, were constantly varied with a sort of watchful cunning which, if it did not ensure success, avoided fatal calamities. It was, however, bitterly mortifying to De Tocqueville to see England, which he not only admired but loved as a second country, grovel (as he thought) before this blood-stained adventurer at the time of the Crimean war; and there are some reflections, not more stringent than true, not only on the ignorance of foreign politics displayed by even our most considerable men, but on the ostentatious hardness and selfishness of our attitude towards other countries:—

The Indian mutiny and the Crimean war show how little sympathy there is for England abroad. There was everything to interest us in your success—similarity of race, of religion, of civilization. Your loss of India could have served no cause but that of barbarism. Yet I venture to affirm that the whole Continent, though it detested the cruelties of your enemies, did not wish you to triumph. Much of this is, without doubt, to be attributed to the evil passions which make men always desire the fall of the prosperous and the strong. But much belongs to a less dishonourable cause—to the conviction of all nations that England considers them only with reference to her own greatness; that she has less sympathy than any other modern nation; that she never notices what passes among foreigners, what they think, feel, suffer, or do, but with relation to the use which England can make of their actions, their sufferings, their feelings, or their thoughts; and that when she seems to care most for them, she really cares only for herself. All this is exaggerated, but not without truth.

There are a good many curious little remarks on English affairs in the book which remind one how unlike we are to France in this at least—that although we have no revolutions, our public questions and the whole aspect of our politics really do change from decade to decade. It is quite amusing, for instance, to read of the commotion created by the so-called Papal Aggression, and to think how dead all that has fallen now, and how far we have drifted in many other respects from our position in 1852, when the admission of six-pound householders had just begun to be talked about. De Tocqueville's views on England are perhaps as just as those of any foreigner can be; but they are sometimes very wide of the mark both as regards individuals and classes. A stranger is of course necessarily at the mercy of those whom he meets; so it is perhaps not very wonderful that he should have supposed, as it would seem he did, that Mr. Henry Reeve had some reputation among us as a writer; or, on the other hand, that the Whig nobility whom he met at Lord Lansdowne's were a fair type of the English aristocracy generally. We are throughout struck by the exaggerated estimate he formed of the merits of the English highest class. It may, however, be that the passion for mere enjoyment and indifference to their public duties was less marked among them fifteen or twenty years ago than it unfortunately is now, and that they had not then so fully identified themselves with the new plutocracy, which acquires their faults so much more easily than their virtues. But one might run on for ever discussing the interesting questions, social and literary, as well as political, which these letters and conversations raise; and which, if they do not always solve, they at any rate always illuminate. De Tocqueville does not seem to have been particularly well read out of the history and literature of his own country; in variety and copiousness of information he must have been inferior to some of the great English talkers of the last two generations—certainly, for instance, to Mackintosh and to Macaulay. But there is a keenness of observation, a brightness, a fertility about his talk, which make this deficiency scarcely noticed; and in these two volumes nothing is more remarkable than his commanding superiority to every other eminent Frenchman whose conversations are reported. Such men seem to rise more and more rarely in France. She certainly does not need them less than she did.

THE GREAT LONE LAND.*

CAPTAIN BUTLER occasionally propounds theories with which we cannot entirely agree; he sometimes indulges in writing which strikes us as being not in the best possible taste; and perhaps he is a little more voluminous than we could wish. But, whatever faults an ill-disposed critic might contrive to discover in his book, he is a companion for whom we gradually learn to entertain a very warm liking, and from whom we part at the last page with sincere regret. He is to all appearance a soldier by predilection; he has a genuine love of an adventurous life; and when his promotion was arrested by the impossibility of procuring the necessary funds under the purchase system, he looked about for some more exciting career than that offered by the dull routine of barrack life, and found an opportunity for active exertion in the Red River Expedition. His tastes and prejudices are of a type not uncommon in his profession. He has no great opinion of the Parliamentary system; he does not venerate the memory of Mr. Cobden, nor is he even stirred to lively enthusiasm at the name of the late lamented Prince Consort; he has evidently strong views as to our duties towards our colonial empire, and is of opinion that we put up with a great deal more Yankee insolence than is desirable. Of these sentiments, as they only crop out incidentally, we need say nothing; and, right or wrong, they are not particularly original, and might be echoed by a good many soldiers. But Captain Butler has other qualities more distinctly his own. He has a very warm appreciation of wild natural scenery, and no little skill in reproducing his impressions. He has a genuine kindness towards beasts and men. The indignation with which he speaks of cruelties perpetrated upon Indians, horses, and dogs is fervid and creditable to him; nay, though he has the instincts of a sportsman, he makes a confession which we fear will injure his character with those who love killing in the abstract. He tells us how once, after a hard fight, he mastered a huge bull buffalo, and triumphantly returned to Fort Kearney with six tongues hanging from his saddle. But, he strangely adds, "never since that hour, though often but a two days' ride from buffalo, have I sought to take the life of one of those noble animals"; and for this he gives the eccentric reason that the buffalo is fast vanishing from the land. Surely, one would say, that should be a reason for joining in the scramble over the last relics of the past. The sentiment is so uncommon that Captain Butler runs great risk of an accusation of sentimentality. We will, however, leave him to his critics, and confess that to our taste the softheartedness which he displays upon this occasion, and upon others when a dog is knocked into insensibility, or an Indian tribe extirpated, gives a decided charm to his pages.

The Great Lone Land of which Captain Butler discourses is a region whose existence is scarcely realized, though it is of course more or less dimly recognized, by most Englishmen. It is that vast territory which intervenes between Canada and the Rocky Mountains to the North of the United States. Captain Butler approached it by the Red River of the North, which rises close to the sources of the Mississippi. It empties itself into Lake Winnipeg. Lake Winnipeg is a great lake even for North America, and besides the Red River, it receives the waters of two huge rivers. One of them, the Winnipeg, descending from near the shores of Lake Superior, has twice the volume of the Rhine, whilst the other, the Saskatchewan, coming from the Rocky Mountains, is longer than the Danube. The Winnipeg, according to Captain Butler's account, must be a singularly beautiful stream, though not as convenient as might be wished for practical purposes. It expands alternately into broad lakes and contracts into a narrow channel, broken by innumerable rapids. It was, however, successfully descended by the Red River Expedition in 1870, which was unlucky enough to be eclipsed in popular interest by certain contemporary events of rather greater magnitude in the neighbourhood of a more historic stream. The Saskatchewan waters a fertile valley throughout its length of some 1,200 miles, and between them the two rivers form a line of water communication by which, when the short interval from the Winnipeg to Lake Superior is traversed by a canal, it will be possible to pass from Quebec to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, some 3,000 miles away. Any one might learn thus much from a map, but probably the importance of this extraordinary system of rivers is rarely appreciated. For, as Captain Butler had good reason to know, the vast territory thus watered is at present amongst the most thinly inhabited parts of the earth's surface. After the suppression of Riel, the dictator of the little rebellion in Manitoba, Captain Butler was despatched on a mission to the sources of the Saskatchewan, with the object of investigating the present condition of the country and its motley inhabitants. The country itself is a vast basin waiting to receive the overflowing stream of population which at present expends itself on less remote districts. Till it comes the traveller must be prepared for rough work. Even at starting, and in summer weather, the Captain encountered annoyances which might deter a more vacation tourist. To say nothing of the pleasures of society amongst the cowboys of the Western States, where every other word is an oath, and the one recreation of the natives consists in the consumption of an indefinite quantity of "straight drinks," the insect world seems to exceed anything encountered by Mark Tapley. The Captain's description of the dense clouds of mosquitoes which darkened the air in his ride by the Red River fairly makes one's flesh creep with a sympathetic shiver. He and his pony were exposed to "choking masses of biting insects; no mere cloud thicker and denser in one place than in another, but one huge wall of never-ending insects, filling nostrils, ears, and eyes." They were a "mountain of mosquitoes." They were six or eight deep on the horse's skin, and every sweep of the hand crushed myriads. We do not wonder that Captain Butler galloped for his life with hands and feet out and bleeding. The Sioux, it is said, killed their captives by exposing them for a night; and, in short, the very air seems to be turned into live mosquito soup.

We know not whether these plagues will expire under the influence of civilization. But there is not much doubt that another enemy of travellers is fast disappearing. Blackfoot and Crees and Sioux are following the buffalo, and themselves recognize their inevitable extermination. It is a melancholy spectacle, and it is impossible not to sympathize with Captain Butler's indignation at the brutal manner in which the process is being carried out. The white savage speedily becomes a more detestable brute than the red; for the red man has in him some glimmerings of religion and poetry of which the white has lost all trace. Captain Butler tells us of a gallant exploit of certain American soldiers who surprised a village, already suffering from the smallpox, and slew man, woman, and child to the number of a hundred and seventy, with no more remorse than they would have displayed in killing rattlesnakes. He has rumours of still worse atrocities, such, for example, as an intentional introduction of smallpox amongst the Indians by certain traders. Assuming this, as we presume we may, to be nothing but a wild fiction, it is still unpleasantly illustrative of the feeling which exists between the races when such stories pass current as at least credible. We wish that there were a better chance that these crimes might disappear before the disappearance of their victims; and yet we must suggest to Captain Butler that he scarcely strengthens his case by talking about the beauties of the Indian character. That the Indians have been maligned we fully believe, and we have no little doubt that they have degenerated. Yet it strikes one as rather absurd to quote Longfellow and Fenimore Cooper as witnesses for true Indian character in opposition to the evidence of eye-witnesses. Indeed when Captain Butler is not indulging in a little rhetoric, excusable perhaps under the excitement produced by narratives of cold-blooded barbarity, he himself tells us some very unpleasant things about his Indian friends. He describes, for example, the mode in which the noble savage now goes on the war-path; how one party, being afraid to attack their enemies, and anxious to obtain a scalp, dig a body out of a fresh grave, and how a gallant young chief, being hospitably received by two women and their children one evening, gets up in the middle of the night, kills them all, and returns in triumph with their scalps. The savage becomes better, urges Captain Butler; but that is just the objection to him. The Indian's "sole toil and thought," he tells us, is war, and he invites us to admire the rude bravery which prepares extinction to slavery. We admire it; but we can hardly regret the extinction of a simply fighting animal as much as we should otherwise do. The preference of extinction to slavery means really that the Indian will rather die than work. When the game disappears he must take to agriculture; and that is a weakness which we can hardly call noble, and which will certainly doom him to destruction, unless it can be augmented. Indeed if it be true that slaying is the Indian's only trade, the white man is in some degree excused. In old days, each tribe tried to exterminate all the rest, and they therefore kept each other in equilibrium. The only difference is that another tribe of less destructible materials is now taking a share in the contest, and the weaker combatants are gradually crushed by its advance. Other influences, as Captain Butler tells us, fight on the same side. The smallpox has exterminated whole families and tribes of the Indians. In his journey Captain Butler found everywhere the most painful evidences of its destructive power. He calculates that 1,200 Indians had died of its ravages during the winter, out of a total population, if we understand him rightly, of about eight thousand; and the plague was still continuing, and likely to continue. Characteristically enough the invalids went on to their very last gasp horse-stealing and scalp-hunting, and they sometimes dropped dead in swimming rivers on these errands in the very height of the disease. Attributing their sufferings in some way to the traders, they did their best to spread the infection, and thus to take vengeance in their death. When we add the influence of the "fire-water," the sale of which is now forbidden on English territory, it is plain that the Indians have still more deadly enemies than the rifle and the bowie-knife. That they must go seems clear; and it is hard to feel much regret for their loss. If a ferocious savage requires to occupy one thousand times as much ground as would keep a decent white family, is it not better that he should disappear? Yet we must add that this by no means diminishes the crime of deliberate extermination. We should not shoot the savage down because we cannot stop the ravages of the smallpox. Some experiments indeed seem to prove that, if we would only give the Indian time and treat him kindly, he might be gradually civilized, and induced to abandon that exclusive delight in war by which he is at present characterized. No duty is more incumbent on the central Governments both of the United States and the British territory than to give him every chance, hopeless as the prospect may seem, and to put a stop to the brutalities so forcibly described by Captain Butler.

We must take leave of Captain Butler with one parting criticism. Why do Americans and Englishmen travelling in America invariably omit the good old word "begin" to make room for "commence." We could wish that Captain Butler had shown them a better example.

L'ANNÉE TERRIBLE.

M. VICTOR HUGO is in one very important respect the opposite of Leonardo da Vinci. Leonardo, though he possessed the creative faculty in great strength, was at the same time so critical, and attached so much importance to the critical overlooking of work in progress, that in him the artist always laboured under the strict superintendence of a critic only too fastidious, who exacted an almost unattainable perfection, and retarded production to a degree which posterity must lament, however grateful it may be for the exquisite taste and finish of those things which he allowed to pass. M. Victor Hugo, on the contrary, is an artist, and a great artist, working quite absolutely without any self-criticism whatever, and too profoundly convinced of his own right to publish whatever his genius may suggest to submit to the restrictions of any criticism from without. There can be no question that an artist may do as he pleases; he is, as Goethe said, a privileged person; he is not to be bound by rules founded on the practice of other artists; but, although this unbounded freedom belongs to him as a natural right, he exercises it at his own peril. There is always, in his case, the danger of losing art for want of that discipline which is essential to sound artistic production of any kind. The form of energy which we call genius is in itself energy and little more—a great force, but a force which can produce nothing permanently worth having unless it is consistently directed by the governing power of a judgment almost independent of self-delusion, a judgment capable of setting itself outside the work done, and even outside of the work as it is being done, to keep it steadily in safe directions. The safety of an artist may be incompatible with great originality, and even with great audacity, just as a horse may be taken safely by a consummate equestrian where it could not go safely by itself, and where an inferior rider would inevitably come to grief; but originality and audacity are sure to lead to danger unless governed by the high controlling power of the cool critical intellect. Now M. Victor Hugo is a fine example of what may happen to a man of genius when his self-confidence is absolute. For several years past he has not produced a single work which an intellectual reader could tolerate in its entirety, though at the same time he never publishes anything which does not bear the marks of undeniable power. All who know into what intellectual habits the author of Ocean of Solitude and Les Orientales has of late years suffered himself to fall, will be fully prepared for the sort of work which abounds in L'Année terrible. The work of it is unrelenting, but there are passages of grand power and some of exquisite beauty and tenderness, which at one time have been

have produced, and which may reward even a fastidious student who has patience enough to find them. The subject is a magnificent one, and admirably adapted to the purposes of poetry, even if not so near to us that political feeling is sure to imbue to the detriment of poetical effect, not only in the mind of the poet as he composes, but in that of his readers as they follow him. The great national rivalries in which the late war began, the tremendous scale of the preparations, the hurry and unremittingness of the French, the vast organization of the German forces, the awful pause before the first blood was shed, the succession of crushing defeats, the grand disaster of Sedan, the fall of the Empire, the colossal siege of Paris, the famines within the beleaguered city, the horrible winter with all its unnumbered woes—all these things are as grand as anything in Homer himself, and as good material for a great epic as any to be found in history. But M. Victor Hugo has not the self-direction necessary for the composition of a great epic. In him the powers of the narrative poet are continually paralysed by the intervention of a shallow political philosophy, and the explosions of a vulgar kind of patriotism. It is intelligible that a writer who for many years has been passionately attached to the Republican idea, and as passionately opposed to Caesarism, should give the rein to these feelings in his writings; but it is surprising that a man who, if not cultivated, has enjoyed every possible opportunity of becoming so, should have a philosophy and a patriotism so inherently and irredeemably vulgar. M. Victor Hugo does not see things as men of culture see them, either in France or elsewhere; he sees things like a man of imperfect education and strong passions. His own countrymen of the cultivated classes do not take him as seriously. And this leads us to observe what a good thing it might have been for France if she had had a poet just now endowed with Victor Hugo's energy, in combination with true culture and sound judgment. One or two of the younger poets have these latter qualities in great perfection; Coppé and Manuel have them, but who has Hugo's fire?

The work before us is not really a poem, but a collection of housades in verse, often pungent and effective, sometimes delicate and tender, more frequently garrulous about the writer's personal opinions and concerns. It would be easy indeed to present the whole composition in a ludicrous aspect, and a foreign critic is especially tempted to do so, because a writer so essentially French as Victor Hugo is always sure to say a great deal which may be made to look absurd by simply translating it into another language. It will, however, be fairer alike to the poet and to our readers to indicate some of the nuggets of pure ore which are to be found in the unordered mass.

There is a fine passage in the Prologue about the difference between the people in the higher sense and the mob. There is too much of it, so that it loses force in diffuseness; but the following verses contain the essence of the poet's judgment of la foule:—

Ah! le premier vous, bourgeois ou paysan,
L'un égoïste et l'autre aveugle, parlons-en!

Il entre dans l'orgie en sortant de la gloire;
Allez lui demander s'il suit sa propre histoire,
Ce qu'était Washington ou ce qu'a fait Harra,
Son cœur mort ne bat plus aux nous qu'il adore.
Naguère il restaurait les vieux cultes, les bustes
De ses héros tombés, de ses aïeux robustes,
Phocion expiré, Lycurgue enseveli,
Ringo mort, et voyez maintenant quel oubli!
Il fut pur et s'en lave; il fut saint et l'ignore;
Il ne supportait pas même qu'il dînât avec
Par l'usage d'aujourd'hui son ouvrage d'hier,
Il devient lâche et vil, lui qui un va et s'érige.

L'honneur lui semble lourd, rouillé, gothique; il raille
Cette armure sévère et dit: Vieille ferraille!
Jadis des tiers combats il a joué le jeu;
Duperie. Il fut grand, et s'en méprise un peu,
Il est sa propre insulte et sa propre ironie.

There is a fine touch in the comparison between the two nations; two pages and a half about the greatness of Germany, then at the end three monosyllables for France, "O ma mère!" This effect is repeated elsewhere in the volume, and successfully, but it might be easily abused, and might readily degenerate into a mere rhetorical trick.

The portraits of the King of Prussia and the Emperor Napoleon are more concentrated than might have been expected:—

L'agne du droit divin, dévot, correct, moral,
Né pour être empereur et rester caporal.

This reminds one of Byron's manner; it is equally terse and pointed, but it fails in accuracy, because the Emperor of Germany possesses the most valuable of all Imperial qualities, that of surrounding himself with the most able men, and letting them get their full share of fame without jealousy of their greatness. Not to have perceived and noted this is one of those marks of vulgarity we have referred to; the vulgar Frenchman cannot see whither accounts that element of superiority which made the Emperor William what he is. In the same spirit Victor Hugo writes of the German army round Paris:—

La nuit comme l'ennemi à la lanterne. Un cri
Surt de l'écrou en débris, et le ment à ri.
Le criait comme le jour; la femme enrie
Attache le criant argente de la vie.

This could only be effective with an ignorant audience; a cultivated one would be aware that there was as much intellectual light in the army that surrounded Paris as in the city itself.

There is considerable grandeur in the few diabolical words with which the poet refers to his old enemy, the Emperor Napoleon. The temptation to an diffuse writer must have lain rather in the direction of elaborate and vindictive satire, but the following is incomparably more telling:—

Leur empereur avait la tête pour l'écrou,
Il avait: Vainqueur? Le petit saint, triomphé,
Et son piége le fait tomber dans une oubliette.

O Manuel un coup de vent dépece en un moment
Cette ombre de César et cette ombre d'armée,
Guerre et l'un est la flamme et l'autre la fumée.

And there is no more concerning the subject of Les Châtiments.

M. Victor Hugo's literary process appears to be as nearly as possible as follows:—An idea occurs to him, and, acting on the excellent old principle of striking whilst the iron is hot, he immediately puts this idea into verse, quite regardless of the proportion of space it may happen to occupy, and with equal indifference to its relative force as affecting the rest of the composition. Whether the book was written consecutively or by fragments to be put in order afterwards, this regardlessness of relation is one of its most striking and characteristic faults. It is peculiarly characteristic too of M. Victor Hugo that some of the passages which have least to do with the action are entirely about himself. For example, under the heading "Novembre," we have no less than four pages "A l'évêque qui m'appelle athée." These pages are clever and powerful, but they have not the slightest imaginable connexion with the subject of the volume. Immediately afterwards comes a touching lyric to a child who was ill during the siege. From the name Jeune which occurs in the fourth stanza we conclude that the little girl was the poet's favourite grandchild. The structure of this lyric makes it quite impossible (the effect being accumulative) to give an idea of it without quoting the whole. Victor Hugo is always charming when he writes about children, and this is as charming as any of his previous compositions in the same kind:—

Si vous continuez d'être ainsi toute pille
Dans notre air étouffant;
Si je vous vois entrer dans mon ombre fatale
Mon vieillard, vous enfant;
Si je vois de nos jours se confondre la chaîne
Mon qui sur mes genoux
Vous contemple, et qui veut la mort pour moi prochain
Et l'autre pour vous;
Si vos mains sont toujours diaphanes et frêles,
Si, dans votre berceau,
Tremblante, vous avez l'air d'attendre des ailes
Comme un petit oiseau;
Si vous ne semblez pas prendre sur notre terre
Racine pour longtemps,
Si vous laissez errer, Jeanne, en notre mystère,
Vos deux yeux mécontents;
Si je ne vous vois pas gaie et rose et très-fort,
Si, triste, vous rêvez,
Si vous ne fermez pas derrière vous la porte
Par où vous arrivez;
Si je ne vous vois pas comme une belle femme
Marcher, vous bien portée,
Rire, et si vous semblez être une petite âme
Qui ne veut pas rater,
Je crains qu'en ce monde où le suaire au lange
Parfois peut confiner,
Vous veniez pour partir, et que vous étiez l'ange
Chargé de m'emmener.

This is very delicate and tender, and quite finished in form too. Some pages further on there is a fine bit about the forts of Paris, in which the poet's taste for a certain kind of sublimity is free to operate on the kind of subject best fitted for it:—

Il y ont les chiens de garde énormes de Paris.
Comme nous pouvons être à chaque instant saisis,
Comme une horde est là, comme l'ambassade vile
Parfois rampe jusqu'à l'écouite de la ville,
Il y ont dix-neuf étages sur les monts, qui, le soir,
Inquiète, menaçante, guettent l'espèce noir,
Et, s'ouvrant aversant dès que la nuit commence,
Tendent leur cou de bronze autour du mur immense.
Il y ont éveillés quand nous nous endormons
Et font tousser la foudre on leurs rauques poumons.
On dort, on oublie. — Eux, ils sont là, formidables,
Tout à coup on se dresse en sursaut; haletant,
Morne, on prête l'oreille, on se penche... on entend
Comme le hurlement profond d'une montagne.
Toute la ville écoute, et toute la campagne
Se réveille; et voilà qu'au premier grondement
Répond un second cri, sourd, farouche, lucide, et Et dans l'obscurité d'autres francs s'éroulent,
Et d'échos en échos cent voix terribles rient.
Ce sont eux.

This is as grand a description of the voice of great guns, and the effect upon the mind, as anything in modern literature. The ramification, too, is masterly in the extreme, full of the most subtly invented and powerful effects of sound. In the part on January there is, on the other hand, an admirable use of the smallest and most familiar facts, told in language all the more familiar for its simplicity:—

J'ai payé quinze francs quatre œufs frais, non pour moi, Mais pour mon petit Georges et ma petite Jeanne.
Tous mangent du cheval, du rat, de la four, de l'âne.
Bientôt est si bien pris, serré, mûri, non,
Gardé, que notre ventre est l'arche de Noé;
Dans ses flancs toute bête, bœuf ou mal famée,

Pénètre, et chien et chat, le mammon, le pygmée,
Tout entre, et la souris rencontre l'éléphant.
Plus d'arbres ; on les coupe, on les scie, on les fend ;
Paris sur ses chenêts met les Champs-Élysées.
On a l'onglée aux doigts et le givre aux croisées,
Plus de feu pour sécher le linge des lavoirs,
Et l'on ne change plus de chemise.

After a while the poet comes back to his little granddaughter, this time not in stanzas, but in the regular alexandrines of the poem. All that he says to her or of her is delightful, the feelings of the poet and those of the grandfather being blended in the most charming manner. The following is an exquisite expression of an idea which has saddened many a parent:—

Vous vous transfigurez sans cesse, et le temps mêle
A la Jeanne d'hier la Jeanne d'aujourd'hui.
A chaque pas qu'il fait, l'enfant derrière lui
Laisse plusieurs petits fantômes de lui-même.
On se souvient de tous, on les pleure, on les aime,
Et ce seraient des morts s'il n'était vivant, lui.

Victor Hugo likes the clergy as little as his friend Garibaldi likes them. One bishop, as we have seen, called him an "atheist," which he very sufficiently resented; another bishop, the Bishop of Ghent, keeps a newspaper which said that, "if he were not a madman, he would be a brigand." The poet did not like this either. The recollection of it occurs to him à propos of the month of June, and he writes a page and half of very pointed verses on the subject. It is always advantageous to a really skilful poet to have his feelings deeply stirred in any way whatever; it is good for him to be angry, and that Victor Hugo really was angry the following extract will sufficiently prove:—

Je n'ai pas de palais épiscopal en ville, Je n'ai pas de prébende et de loto civil,
Nul temple n'offre un trône à mon humilité,
Nul aïeul en colonel ne brille à mon côté,
Je ne me montre pas aux gros yeux des ganaches
Sous un dais, à ses coins ayant quatre panaches ;

Je n'ai ni marguillier, ni bureau, ni syndic,
Ni custode, ni clerc, ni diacre, ni vicaire,
Je ne garde aucun saint dans aucun reliquaire ;
Je n'ai pas de miracle en bouteille sous clé ;
Mon vêtement n'est pas de diamants bouclé ;
Je ne suis pas payé quand je fais ma prière ;

Je suis fort mal en cour ; aucune douairière
Ne m'admire quêtant des sous dans un plat rond,
La chape d'or au cou, la mitre d'or au front ;
Je ne fais point balser ma main aux bonnes femmes ;
Je vénère le ciel, mais sans le vendre aux âmes ;
On ne m'appelle pas monseigneur ; je me plains
Dans les champs, et mes bas ne sont pas violets.

J'ai lutté pour le vrai, pour le bon, pour l'honnête
Et j'ai subi vingt ans l'exil dans la tempête,

Et je fais mon devoir ; et c'est pourquoi, mes frères,
Au dire du journal de l'évêque de Gand,
Si je n'étais un fou, je serais un brigand.

However democratic may be Victor Hugo's opinions, it is impossible for an author who feels and knows the prodigious importance of literature to humanity to regard without reprobation such an act as the burning of the library of the Louvre. His pages on that topic are as eloquent as any in the volume—an eloquence which proceeds from genuine regret that the people should know no better.

Tu viens d'incendier la Bibliothèque ?

—Oui,

J'ai mis le feu là.

—Mais c'est un crime inouï,

Crime commis par toi contre toi-même, infâme !
Mais tu viens de tuer le rayon de ton âme !
C'est ton propre flambeau que tu viens de souffler !
Ce que ta rage impie et folle ose brûler,
C'est ton bien, ton trésor, ta dot, ton héritage !
Le livre, hostile au maître, est à ton avantage,
Le livre a toujours pris fait et cause pour toi.
Une bibliothèque est un acte de foi
Des générations ténébreuses encore
Qui rendent dans la nuit témoignage à l'aurore.

As-tu donc oublié que ton libérateur
C'est le livre ?

After this a torrent of eloquence continues to attack the incendiary, who at the end answers simply:—

—Je ne sais pas lire.

We should owe an apology to the reader for a review which is little more than a string of scarcely connected extracts, were it not that it so far resembles and represents the incoherent nature of the poem under consideration. It has no unity, no charpente, no artistic government subordinating one part to another; the poet has written almost without plan, and altogether without self-restraint. Still the volume contains very many fine passages, rising like islands out of a wearisome ocean of verbosity. It is deeply to be regretted, in the interests of poetic art, that a man gifted, as Victor Hugo has been gifted, with the most energetic and sincere feeling, with great moral courage, with masterly command of language, and with true poetic invention, should have spoiled so much work by mere incapacity to act as his own critic. What a magnificent artist he might have been if, to all his other gifts, the prodigality of nature had added temperance and sanity!

LEGENDS OF LAKE LADOGA.*

THIS small contribution to the knowledge of folklore will amuse all who love to stray for a while in the regions of the wild and wonderful, and will be more especially acceptable to those who have made themselves acquainted with as much Slavonic mythology as is to be found in Mr. Ralston's valuable Songs of the Russian People. Such specially educated readers will regard the information which is given by Dr. Bertram, and which relates to one particular district in Northern Russia, as supplementary to the general description of Russian superstitions to be found in the pages of Mr. Ralston.

Dr. Bertram is known as a proficient in Slavonic and Finnish literature, but the chief source of his exceptional familiarity with the legends of Lake Ladoga was, according to his own account, a scullerymaid who had come from its banks, and who pursued her useful vocation for several weeks at his residence in St. Petersburg. He discovered her erudition by asking her whether three white stripes were still to be seen on the surface of the lake, for he met not with a dry affirmative, but with the story connected with the alleged phenomenon. It appears that upon a certain occasion, when Peter the Great happened to be on the lake, the water became rough. This was an insult to be resented, so the Czar, having steered himself safe ashore, took a whip in his hand and inflicted three lashes on the lake, which still retains the marks of its wholesome castigation. Dr. Bertram knew this story perfectly, but he was delighted with the intelligence of the scullerymaid, and she in turn was delighted with his attention. Her stock of local legends was considerable, but when she began to reveal it in the kitchen the cook would hear nothing of such nonsense. So it is all the world over. Two opinions diametrically opposite may be found on the same subject, and neither may be absolutely wrong. We remember the criticism pronounced by a half-educated man into whose hands a translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses had accidentally fallen—"There are some good whoppers in that book!"

Finding her learning at last appreciated, the scullerymaid asked Dr. Bertram if he would not like to hear some more tales. He was only too glad of his opportunity, allowed her to talk at will, noted what she said, and hence arose the book before us. We should rather say the greater part of the book, for Dr. Bertram with touching conscientiousness owns that he has obtained some of his legends from other sources. This little license he is sure needs no excuse (es braucht wohl keine Entschuldigung), but we all know that the assertion that no apology is required is a kind of mild apology in itself. Dr. Bertram has done his best to atone for his venial transgression by prefixing the letter "M" to all tales not told by the intelligent scullerymaid. Why was this particular letter selected? The student of German folklore will instinctively reply that "M" stands for "Mundlich," a prefix or affix commonly used to distinguish oral from written tradition. We object, however, that stories proceeding from the lips of a scullerymaid are fully as oral as those which are evoked from the memory of a cottager. Let us surmise, for want of better information, that "M" stands for "Mein" and indicates that the specified tales were obtained by Dr. Bertram with more exertion on his own part than when the scullerymaid asked leave to pour out her stores of erudition before him.

The Vodyany, or Water-spirit, we already know as a leading figure in the records of Russian superstition; but Dr. Bertram gives us two legends respecting this class of demon which perhaps are not generally known. According to one of these, a farmer, tilling his field on the banks of the lake, saw a Vodyany rise from the waters, who was clad like a man, but whose face was covered with fine hair like that of a mouse. In reply to the peasant's inquiry as to the intention of his visit, the Vodyany said that he desired assistance against the king of the lake, and that such assistance would be gratefully rewarded. The farmer, asking for further information, was desired to come on the following day with a hatchet, take his station on the bank, and strike at the third of three waves which would pass before him. With these injunctions he complied, and standing up to his knees in water, cleft the third wave, which was much more violent than the other two. When he returned to his field, it had been liberally sown with gold and silver coins, and he became a wealthy man. On the strength of this story one may surmise that the tale of the Emperor Peter and his whip was merely an attempt to connect a mythical tradition with an historical and popular person. According to the second story, a farmer saw a Vodyany sitting on the shore, and asked leave to wash his back, which he had soiled by lying on the grass. The spirit complied, and the farmer taking advantage of the situation, pulled out a piece of chalk, and marked his back with a cross. Nothing could be more offensive to the Vodyany than this symbol of Christianity; and the farmer was one of those bigots of the Mahomedan school who allowed a choice between tribute and conversion. If he, the farmer, and his house were made fireproof, if the wolf were kept away from his flocks, and if, in case of too much rain, his fields were drained into the lake; the cross would be wiped from the back of the Vodyany; otherwise not. The Vodyany accepted the conditions, the offending mark was obliterated, and (the usual moral) the farmer became rich.

The great importance attached to the death of the Russian peasant, and the strong belief that the souls of the departed linger upon earth, have been largely illustrated by Mr. Ralston. Further illustrations are supplied by Dr. Bertram. Suicides, he tells us, buried without ceremonial and altogether unclad, shriek every night from their graves until their bodies are turned, so as to lie with the face downward. In the native village of the scullery-maid a farmer hanged himself, and was buried in unclad condition, his wife having made a present of his shirt to one of the local authorities. This "Umrin," or ghost, accordingly appeared on three successive nights, and asked for the needful article of apparel. The work of restoration was not to be performed without difficulty; but the ghost was so pertinacious that the shirt was ultimately buried with him, and was fastened to the ground with a wedge. Indeed a dead Russian seems to be particularly fastidious about his shirt. Without the assistance of the scullery-maid, Dr. Bertram picked up an odd story about two brothers who lived in the vicinity of St. Petersburg. One was rich and the other was poor, and on the death of the latter his relict persuaded the wife of the former to give him a new shirt, that the corpse might be decently interred. This transaction occurred during the absence of the rich man, who, when he returned, flew into a violent rage, took an old, patched-up shirt to his brother's house, and prepared to pull the superior article from the body. Suddenly the dead man's hand caught him by the wrist, and no power of priestly exorcism or holy water could loosen it. It was cut off with a knife, and the shirt was not removed.

Of the institution of marriage the Russian peasant seems to entertain a view similar to that of the modern French dramatist, and several of the songs translated by Mr. Ralston illustrate the feelings of husbands and wives who dislike their lawful partners and greatly prefer somebody else. Some of our readers may remember the following lines sung by a discontented husband:—

Oh, arise thou terrible storm-cloud !
Strike dead my wife's father !
Pierce her mother with thy arrow !
Beat my young wife to death with the rush of rain !
But spare, spare the fair maiden,
The fair maiden, my older love.

This state of domestic infelicity, which seems to be very general, is forcibly illustrated by a story in Dr. Bertram's collection which indicates a very remarkable state of society. A woman in the village could not endure her husband, but was deeply enamoured of a much younger man. Reproached by her husband for her coolness, she advised him to go into a forest, prostrate himself before the birch-tree, and ask counsel of the "Beresinka"—that is to say, the spirit by which that particular class of tree is inhabited. Her sole design was to get him out of the way, but he pretended to take her advice in good part, and left the house with his gun. His departure was speedily followed by the arrival of her lover; but he soon returned, and, crying out that he had been stricken blind by the Beresinka, desired to be laid by the hearth. This was good news for the wife, who complied with his request, and presently heard him snore. In the meanwhile she had cooked some porridge for her paramour, who, being daintily inclined, could not eat it without butter. There was none in the house, and while she was gone to buy some, her husband, springing up, shot the young sinner through the heart, and contriving to hide the wound, forced some of the porridge into his victim's mouth. He then assumed his place by the hearth. The conduct of the wife on her return could not have been imagined even by M. Octave Feuillet. Observing the condition of her dead lover, she spitefully exclaimed:—"You turned up your nose at my porridge, and that's why it has choked you." Another tale, belonging to the same moral atmosphere, shows the virtue of penitence under the most unfavourable circumstances. A wife whose evil propensities carried her further than the erring lady in the preceding story, which ends with epigrammatic abruptness, not only detested her young husband, but was also considering how she might most readily murder him. At last she persuaded him to come with her to a certain well, the edge of which, if struck with a hatchet, would, according to popular belief, act as a philtre, and contrived to push him down, having first dealt him two blows on the back of the head. The man was extricated by a neighbour, who, having chanced to pass by the well and hear his groans, laid him on the grass, and asked him how he had thus come to grief. "I don't know," was the reply; but the Samaritan, knowing the state of his friend's ménage, hastened to his house, where Clytemnestra had gone comfortably to bed. Being questioned, she was no more communicative than her husband, but simply answered that her husband had gone somewhere, whither she did not know. On the neighbour boldly charging her with her crime, she replied that her husband must have fallen into the well by accident, and agreed to the proposition that he should be brought home. When he had been brought home accordingly, she tended him with the greatest care for about three months, at the end of which he recovered. His neighbours advised him to prosecute her for the felonious attempt to murder, but she vowed that she would stay proceeding by hanging herself. So the good-natured man forgave her, and they lived happily together ever afterwards.

The "Domovoy," or household spirit, whose attributes are described at length by Mr. Ralston, appears in Dr. Bertram's legends in a special capacity as sprite of the stables and outhouses (Domovoy chasain), and the broad statement that he sometimes appears in the likeness of the proprietor of the house is curiously illustrated. A certain General S—, taking stock of the cattle in his cowhouse, observed that while those on the left hand threw even too lustily, those on the right were half-starved. The cowkeeper attributed the phenomenon to the operations of the spirit, who was in the habit of shifting the fodder from one side to the other, and a hearty thrashing was the reward for this absurd information. His report, however, was confirmed by the German Intendant, who declared that he had seen the spirit with his own eyes, in the bodily likeness of the General himself. Further investigation was deemed expedient; so one night the General saw the fodder properly distributed, ordered his people to retire, and looked up the cowhouse. After midnight he returned, and saw his own counterpart moving the fodder exactly in the manner he had heard described. He cleared his throat with a loud noise, and the spectre vanished; but within a week the General was a corpse.

It is matter for regret that Dr. Bertram has increased his amusing little book by the addition of a few supplemental pages, which contain what he calls "Folgerungen"—a word which is to be translated "results" or "consequences," but which we, on the principle of lucus a non, should prefer to render "things of no consequence." While he listens patiently to his instructive scullery-maid, and notes down her teachings, we sympathise with him heartily; but when he begins to argue that Slavonic polytheism affords wholesome nourishment for the soul, and to lament that a faith so admirably suited to the wants of a people is in danger of being extinguished by Christianity, we cannot join in his lamentation. It is one thing to value popular legends as materials towards the extension of ethnological learning; it is another thing to hope that the superstitions which they illustrate will remain for a definite time articles of a theological creed. Schopenhauer may consistently admire Buddhism as presenting a theory which harmonizes with the results of a certain course of philosophical thought to be found in Europe. But why any philosophical theist, pantheist, or atheist should desire the conservation of the rude superstitions of the Russian peasantry we fail to understand.

THE FRAGMENTS OF MÆCENAS.

PERHAPS many of our readers will be of opinion that all that can be known, or at least all that need be known, about Mæcenas is to be found in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Mythology. Very few fragments of his literary productions exist, and no one will be found to gainsay the sentiment expressed by the writer of his life in that publication, that we probably have not suffered any great loss by their destruction. Mæcenas may have been, and probably was, an excellent judge of literary merit in others, but he was certainly a very indifferent writer himself. Nevertheless there may perhaps be some who will sympathise with the attempt to extract from the extant fragments of Mæcenas anything that seems to throw light upon subjects of classical lore, and even in this case the selecta membra poetæ, utterly fragmentary as they are, can be turned to some account.

The name of Mæcenas is familiar to every schoolboy from the frequent appearance it makes in the Odes and Satires of Horace, and from its standing at the head of so many of the Odes and Epistles as the name of the person to whom they were addressed. More advanced scholars will call to mind the allusions to Mæcenas in the works of Tacitus and Quintilian, and the passages quoted from his writings in other less known authors. All the particulars that could be gathered together concerning his life and character had probably appeared in print before, and perhaps nothing can be added to Ralph Schomberg's elaborate Life of Mæcenas, with Critical, Historical, and Geographical Notes, which was published in 1766. The scarcity of this volume must be great, for it has altogether escaped the researches of Lowndes. But unquestionably none but a German would have taken the trouble to scrape together all the passages from antiquity in which the name of Mæcenas is mentioned, and to give an account of all the books that have been published in modern times that speak of his life and works. All, however, that can now be known, or probably ever will be known, of Mæcenas has been collected and printed in the volume whose title may be read below, where it may be seen that so unusual a collection as is implied in the words Tironiana et Mæceniatica has actually reached a second edition which appears auctior et emendatior.

Of the first part of this little volume, the Tironiana, we do not purpose now to say anything. The Mæceniatica is divided into five sections, entitled respectively:—

1. De illis qui de Mæcenatæ adhuc scripserunt.
2. Mæcenatis vita et mores.
3. De Mæcenatis domo, villa, hortis aliisque.
4. De Mæcenatis scriptis, additis eorum fragmentis.
5. De Mæcenatis in literas Romanas meritis.

Under the first three heads we have presented to us a good deal of information which may be read epitomized in Smith's Dictionary of Biography and Mythology. As regards these points, we will only observe that the usual mode of spelling the name, with the diphthong instead of the vowel in the first syllable, is proved to be correct by the Greek form Μαίνακας, as used by Plutarch and others; that the name in full is written Caius Cilnius Mæcenas; and that several monograms were written in the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries on the subject of his life and character. We need not enter into particulars. Suffice it to say that Mæcenas was what in modern phrase would be called a well-educated man, that he did not enjoy good health and was unfortunate as regards his matrimonial connexions, but that of his philosophical principles nothing certain is known. But there is one passage from his works which has been quoted by the writer of the article already referred to, as a specimen of his style, and upon which he observes cautiously that it has been conjectured from these lines that Mæcenas belonged to the sect of the Epicureans. The lines are as follows:—

*Lebium factis manna
Dolilem pede, coxa;
Tuber alstrue gibberum
Lobricos quato dentes;
Vita dum miserat, bene est.
Hanc mihi vel neuta
Si sedulam aruce, sustine.*

Now we may observe that everything that is known of Mæcenas points him out as a perfect specimen of the Epicurean school, and of the habits of mind which are supposed to be usually associated with that philosophy. These lines could not have been written with any other object than to parade the dogmas of that philosophical school, and we are indebted to Seneca for their preservation, who does not quote any passage from Mæcenas except for the express purpose of disparaging the votary of the school of philosophy which was most conspicuous as a rival to the Stoic discipline.

We pressed to extract from the Mæcenateana all the remaining passages of Mæcenas's writing which have come down to us, as it is easily possible to compress them within the compass of a single article. Of course we omit the speech attributed to Mæcenas by Dio Cassius, l. 14, urging Augustus to establish an Empire, which, though in all probability it represents Mæcenas's real sentiments, cannot be taken as containing his exact words, even through the medium of a Greek translation. His writings, if not valuable, must at least have been numerous. It is unquestionable that he composed both in prose and verse, and the fragments are arranged by his editor under seven different heads. Many of them appear to have been quoted for the purposes of grammatical or philological criticism.

The first is given us by Charisius, a grammarian of the fifth century. He quotes the line in illustration of the fact that castrum is of the masculine gender. This means that the word castrum is in use as well as castrum, and Charisius probably preferred quoting an author of the Augustan age, though of so little repute as Mæcenas, to giving a reference to the better known works of Pliny, against whom it might be objected that he belonged to the silver age.

The next passage appears in the Life of Horace commonly ascribed to Suetonius, and though it is not adduced for grammatical purposes, we intend to omit it in this service. The author of the Life quotes it as part of an epigram in proof of the love entertained by Mæcenas for Horace. The lines are—

*Nil te visceribus meis, Horati,
Plus jam dilige, tu tuum sociolum
Nimio videas strigueram;*

to which is added the line which, if it belongs to the same epigram, must be more or less corrupt—namely,

Horati Fluci, et uel, ceto innot.

The use we make of this extract is to argue that the o final of verbs is, strictly speaking, common even in writers of the Augustan age, in spite of the prohibition of the Public School Latin Primer. The writer of that Primer, after asserting that words in o are long, adds with his usual philosophical inaccuracy that the quantity of words in o, especially verbs and proper names, fluctuates in different authors and at various times. Now it is certain that authors of all ages occasionally used it short, and that the later the author the more commonly it is found short; but there is nothing in the instances which can fairly be called fluctuation. "Fluctuation" is just one of those words which indicate the vague and unphilosophical mind of the compiler of the Primer. When the first person singular in o is found short in Ovid and Mæcenas, is somewhat oftener so used by Juvenal and Martial, and is as often short as long in the later writers, it is absurd to give the rule that o final is long, and still more absurd to speak of the exceptional use of it as short, as fluctuating.

Of the iambic line

we must be content to say nothing.

The next surviving passage is the most corrupt of all the remains of Mæcenas that have come down to us. Different editors have in vain tried their hands upon it, and there are more various readings than words in the five lines which we will give as they appear in Albert Lion's edition, without pledging ourselves to the correctness of his representation of them:—

*Læcet o mea vita te emargula
Hervilis quoque Mæce, nec sententes
Nuper, candida margarita, quæ
Nec quos Thyrica lima perpolivit
Anellos, nec insipios lapillos.*

We leave our readers to exercise their patience, if they are so inclined, upon this most corrupt passage, and proceed to the next fragment, which consists of three lines of an address to Cybele:—

*Miles hic, ades Cybele, Dea montigena Dea, Aggrypæno concanti quæte flexibile caput;
Latus horreat Bagdæ, cunctum cheræ thulæ.*

This at any rate is more intelligible than the preceding extract. The next is from some poem called Ortensio, most likely a tragedy. It is preserved by Priscian, who cites it in proof of quæte, making in its perfect sense quæte, as well as parmi and parietis. The line, which it is hopeless in its present shape to attempt to reduce to any kind of metre, is

With this line may be coupled the concluding part of a hexameter,

... nexati retia laeta,

which is similarly adduced in proof of the perfect form nexati existing as well as nervi. In another reference to Mæcenas we have the word volucrum attributed to him in place of the Ciceroian form, volucrum. There are two other allusions to Mæcenas in this same relation. It appears that he is the only writer who uses the word Quiritem in the singular, and torum as a masculine.

The next passage occurs in Seneca:—

Like most of the other passages of our author, it is involved in considerable obscurity. The difficulty here is whether summa is an accusative plural or a nominative singular. None of these, we may remark, can be turned to any account except on the score of philology. It will be observed that they are quoted as if Mæcenas were an unexceptionable authority, which for such purposes he undoubtedly was. The next passage is a whole hexameter line, and gives us a real sentiment which is intelligible:—

Nec tumulum curo, sepelit natura reliquos.

This, and the following,

may be looked upon as favouring of the Epicurean philosophy. In the same relation perhaps may be classed the two questions which he is said to have put to Virgil:—

Quo pacto quis altum felicitasque fortunam servare potest?

But though we have said that Mæcenas may be appealed to as a first-rate authority in a matter of verbal accuracy, a violation of which would correspond to what we should in the present day call a vulgarianism, he cannot be considered, as indeed the short passages already exhibited prove, as a model of style; and the next three portions of sentences are quoted by Quintilian as instances of affected separations of words that ought to have been more closely connected, as

Ne exequias quidem unius inter miserrimos viderem meum.

The only remaining passages from the works of Mæcenas have been preserved in one of Seneca's epistles. Seneca quotes it in proof of the resemblance of the man to his own productions:—

Genium laeto vix suo testem, tenuisse Ceroris fila et crepescem molans socum inter aut usum investiant.

We have given the whole as arranged by the editor, but we can have no doubt that the words Quid turpis are Seneca's, and that the first extract begins with the word Mæce. The difficulty of the whole passage is so great that we venture to give La Cœrge's version of it:—

Est-il rien de plus pitoyable que les tumeurs affectées dont Mæcenas se sert dans son traité de la pureté? Il y parle d'une rivière dont les rives sont courbées aux forêts; de petites barques qui labouraient son lit; de rames qui frappent des jardins renversés.

Quid dira-t-on de ces levres qui pigeonnent une femme, dont les cheveux en boucles sont artistiquement frisés, et qui dit en soupissant, qu'on la porte sans danger sa tête?

Que pen-on de ces façons de parler: nul homme du tyran, une faction lugubrement: ils s'entraiment par les festins, ils tentent les maisons par les bouteilles, ils soutiennent la mort. Que dire d'un génie, qui est à peine témoin de sa propre fête; d'une mère ou d'une femme, qui habillent les fils ou la nœche d'un clerc; d'une masse de farine salée et pétillante?

Our readers will, we think, consider that the expressions in this last extract amply bear out the character which Seneca assigns to them when he describes them as exactly resembling the character of their composer, exhibiting as they do feeble and affected transpositions of words. Their very obscurity he professes to do the same service, as he dilates, evidently with the utmost contempt, on the Epicurean carelessness and negligence of the writer, to be seen alike in his daily life, his loose style of dress, and his effeminate companions. He even argues, from the style of his composition, that the praise of gentleness which had been generally assigned to him was not really his due, that what had been called mildness was nothing but a licentious effeminacy.

We shall at least not be oversteering the case if, after having presented to the reader every existing fragment of Mæcenas, we anticipate his judgment that the world is not much the worse off for the loss it has sustained in that no more of them survive.

TYRWHITT'S CHRISTIAN ART.*

MR. B. TYRWHITT comes before the public with a most flaming Impresser in the shape of a preface by Professor Ruskin, who is anxious to assure us that he likes Mr. Tyrwhitt's writing better than his own; that while on the principles of art they are absolutely one, Mr. Tyrwhitt knows more of men and their ways; that the tenor of the book is sound, and its teaching warm and true; with much more to the same effect, winding up with an emphatic commendation "asking all who have hitherto credited my teaching to read these lectures as they would my own; and trusting that others who have doubted me will see reason to put faith in my friend." Strong, however, as is Mr. Ruskin's belief in his friend, we may venture to doubt if it equals his friend's apparently unlimited belief in himself. In one respect there is a marked resemblance between them, for Mr. Tyrwhitt has studiously imitated Mr. Ruskin's later and debased style, which first came in with the fifth volume of Modern Painters, when he took to aping Mr. Carlyle instead of writing the pure and natural English which constitutes the great charm of his earlier works. Mr. Tyrwhitt's style may be described as a cento of the later Ruskin, Kingsley, and Carlyle, with an extra infusion of self-assertion and of that sort of ponderous jocosity which implies how vastly superior a writer feels himself to be to the profane vulgus whom he is kindly condescending to enlighten. And he seems to have adopted this style as the most suitable vehicle for the muscular Anglicanism—or, rather, perhaps we should say, the Anglican muscularity—which is the keynote of the volume. That it contains some original and several interesting remarks may be admitted, but if the title had been "Stray Observations on Artistic, Religious, and other Cognate Subjects," it would have conveyed a more correct idea of the very miscellaneous contents of the book. Those who take it up in the hope of gaining much new information about art or symbolism will be disappointed; those who wish to learn the author's opinions on a variety of subjects, moral, theological, æsthetic, educational, historical, &c., will have abundant opportunity of satisfying themselves. Sometimes his suggestions are sensible enough, but even then they are generally spoilt by the silly exaggeration and conceit of his way of putting them. He urges, for instance, the employment of decorative art in schools, which is reasonable, but he cannot argue the point without interpolating a page of what is meant for withering satire on the immemorial custom of carving boys' names on the oak panels of our public schools. "How useful it must be for idle little boys to know that their great ancestors were as idle as they were! How absurd, how profane, how heterodox, how very slow, how generally improper, would it be to have a fresco of Marathon, or Hastings, or Cressy, or Trafalgar, instead of the incised autograph of the distinguished little Jawkins, who afterwards became a Cabinet Minister!" We do not say that Mr. Tyrwhitt is profane or heterodox, but anything more utterly absurd he could hardly have indited. By all means let him cover the walls of our schoolrooms with as many historical frescoes as he pleases, but why should that make Harrow boys less proud of the "incised autographs"—which, by the by, are usually not autographs at all—of Palmerston or Peel, or Eton boys of the names of Canning or Gladstone? If he were not so very eager to be funny, he might have perceived that he was simply talking nonsense.

While we are on this subject, we may as well give a few more specimens of what is at once the most unpleasant and most obtrusive peculiarity of the book. In a chapter on "Greek and Christian Art," about which we shall have something to say presently, the author not unastutely comes across the Laocoon; but to most writers it would not appear natural, though to him it is inevitable, that the Laocoon should suggest Mr. Squeers. "It hardly seems necessary, in talking of the Laocoon to go into the question whether he ought to roar, and how much he ought to roar." Quite unnecessary, we should have thought; but Mr. Tyrwhitt proceeds:—"Very loud, I should say, if at all. Homer, Virgil, and Sophocles quite agree about it (what?), and make Mars and Hercules vocal in the extreme; also Charles Dickens" (makes Mars and Hercules vocal in the extreme?). "Did I groan loud, Wackford," said Mr. Squeers, 'or did I groan soft?' 'Loud,' answered Wackford," and so on for about a page. The mention of Pericles in the same chapter inevitably calls up a laugh at "the present Prime Minister" and his Homeric Studies. Elsewhere we are parenthetically informed, not only that Kingsley's Hypatia is "fit reading for all," which a good many people are disposed to more than doubt; but that it should be "taken along with their text-books, like Harvey's Science with cold meat," by Oxford undergraduates; and the occasion is further improved in a note by giving some other recipes for historical "Harvey's Sauce," which can hardly have been new even to "my Oxford pupils," unless they were most exceptionally ignorant. There is plenty of the same laboured fooling throughout, but our readers will have had quite enough of it by this time. We speak just now of the chapter on "Greek and Christian Art," which is, or ought to be, one of the most important in the volume. But it is sadly disgraced by the author's habitual egotism and self-consciousness of statement. To a certain extent he has grasped the contrast of the two styles. He tells us that art and nature met in Greek life, and do not meet in ours; that Greek art was the expression of an exorable self-admiration, and that it dwelt contentedly on bodily beauty, whereas the Christian artist aims at representing spiritual ideas. But what shall we say to the amazing assertion that the Greek's highest aspiration was to represent "himself and his wife, and in as far as he represented anything else he did it in relation to himself and with?" Some vague consciousness of the conspicuous absurdity of the statement seems to have flitted across his mind, for he immediately adds, "Let this expression pass; it does not suit my purpose now to go into the half-Oriental relations of the sexes in Athens in the age of Phidias." And then follows a hesitating admission that "Gothe and Northman" may have more fully appreciated female beauty, and so we are brought to the ex cathedra announcement, supported by a long string of Scripture texts, that Greek art was "inspiration," and that Phidias in particular was "inspired by the Father of Spirits." Be it so; but was "the excellent spirit of the artificer" who carved the Antinous, that most perfect specimen of revived Greek art, also "inspired into him"? The fact is that Mr. Tyrwhitt has quietly put aside with a stroke of his pen the most radical distinction between the two types of art which he professes to be contrasting. It is much as if a critic of Pagan and Christian ethics should lay down that the great principle of the former system, as of the latter, was striving after perfection; adding that it might be said indeed that purity, humility, meekness, and some other kindred virtues were not so clearly appreciated by the Pagans, but "it does not suit his purpose to go into" little minutiae of that kind. Mr. Tyrwhitt has entirely failed to observe that, for reasons which we have before now taken occasion to discuss, but which we have no space to dwell upon here, the distinctive beauty of Greek art is male, while the reverse is the case with Christian art, and hence partly sculpture is the speciality of the one, and painting of the other. The Sistine Madonna and Belvedere Apollo may be cited as typical instances of each style respectively. The Greek certainly did not "think his wife the most beautiful object in nature," or think at all about her beauty; he found his models for that in the palestra. It is amusing to find Mr. Tyrwhitt admitting at last that, with all their muscularity, "the Greeks were rather corrupt." Professor Jowett, who is at least as capable as he is of appreciating Greek art, might have reminded him that, "if the inner life had been presented to us of that period which in art is the most brilliant epoch of humanity, we should have turned away from the sight with loathing and detestation." But Mr. Tyrwhitt's conceptions of beauty, as well as of morality, must be peculiar, as he considers "Tom King, who beat Heenan, and is now a preacher," exactly like Apollo, and quite as beautiful; while he tells us the μυαλότης is "conscious of strength, valour, and beauty, rejoicing in himself without vanity"—a description which those who remember Aristotle's account of the same personage will read with some surprise. In another minor point he is hardly less wide of the mark. Art has often, and not untruly, been called the bloom of decay—in this sense among others, that it represents an age when speculation has superseded simple faith. The gods of Phidias were admired, but were not worshipped. Mr. Tyrwhitt however assures us that Phidias's work was done "in vague general service of his gods," not indeed "exactly because he meant to pray to Theseus," but because Theseus and the rest of them were "manifestations or personified attributes of Zeus," and "were worshipped as symbols manifesting features of the Unknown God." We should be curious to hear Mr. Tyrwhitt's authority for supposing that any notion of the kind ever entered the head of any single Greek; it is so far from being based on the words of St. Paul which are referred to, that it is incompatible with them.

In "Italian Art History" the author seems more at home, though he says little that will be new to those who have any acquaintance with the subject, and deals rather with the history than with the art. It is interesting to know that the great mosaic of the Last Judgment in the old cathedral at Torcello, which no one who has seen it is ever likely to forget, is probably the earliest attempt in existence to represent the scene. It is commonly supposed to date from the tenth century, and the church from the seventh, and in one place the author appears to accept this view, but elsewhere he speaks of both the church and its ornaments as not later than 508. His account of the Catacomb symbols is good as far as it goes, but very slight. The Cross seems first to have come into use as an emblem at Ravenna, where it formed part of the sacred monogram, while the use of the crucifix as an object of devotion only dates from the seventh century, universal as it afterwards became. The chapters on Raffaele and Michael Angelo, and on Dürer and Holbein, are interesting, but chiefly for the sketches they contain of the men themselves; and there is a good deal too much of the author's theological lucubrations mixed up with them. One curious piece of information deserves to be extracted, if only for its novelty:—"The real use of the word Protestantism," we are categorically told, "is for strict personal belief in the Second Person of the Trinity." It follows of course, among other startling consequences, that Roman Catholics do not "strictly" believe in Christ, and that Socinians, who form a large proportion of Continental Protestants, are not "really" Protestants at all.

We have felt bound to speak our mind about what is at best a very slender and inordinately pretentious book. But casual readers, who can make up their minds to put up with a large amount of braggadocio and egotism, may find it not devoid of interest. And, to give the writer his due, we will close our notice with what strikes us, in spite of its affected style, as one of the happiest passages in the volume, comparing Raffaele and Michael Angelo:—

Altogether Raffaele has the best of it; right or wrong, he is the man of the times, and has gone with the times. He found art the servant of religion, and then he pursued it religiously and did best of all. By the time he had come to the Stanza frescoes, he had made up his mind that art belonged to Apollo, and he went on with it just as cheerfully; who Rafael belonged to, perhaps, he had left off asking. It cannot be doubtful, I think, that when he paints on one wall Christ, as Lord and Chief of the Domain of Theology; and on the other Phœbus Apollo, as Lord of the Domain of Poetry, Art, and Inspiration; he proclaims the separation of religion from art, declaring practically that Rafael painted no longer as servant of Christ, but as a student of classical literature, and as servant of Julius or Leo, those marvellous classical vicars of Christ. All artists had held hitherto, and Angelo held still, that the faith was true, and therefore supplies the highest motives for art. Rafael inaugurated, meaning no harm, the new artistic persuasion, zealously insisted on to this day; that mythologic fable is beautiful, and therefore supplies the highest motives for art. One side said for centuries: truth first, and beauty will follow, and she did follow. The other said: beauty at any rate, and all the world will follow. So they did, and she led them the way of the stranger that flattereth with her words; and art became prostitution, and Italy became a scorn and ruin, a land despised or mourned for, in all places where God and honour reigned.

So Rafael and Michael Angelo went different ways in life, and were separated and opposed in spirit, and partly or wholly jealous of each other. And one died, and the other lived on for the time in Florence.

The chapter on "Landscape Sketching"—not its insufferable adjunct headed "Poetry of Landscape"—is less ambitious and egotistic, and sticks closer to the point than the rest. It leads us to hope that, if the author would condescend to write about one thing at a time, and say what he has to say in simple English, without dogmatizing or preaching, or a perpetual laboured affectation of being funny, he might some day produce a book not only readable, but worth the trouble of reading.

ASTON'S JAPANESE GRAMMAR.*

THE similarity which appears to exist between the languages of China and Japan, owing to the very general employment of Chinese characters in writing Japanese, has given rise to the natural impression that the connexion between the two is very close. But this is not the case. They are entirely distinct, the Japanese claiming relationship with the Altaic family of languages, and the Chinese standing alone and unique. The history of the adoption by the Japanese of the Chinese character is a curious illustration of the imitative nature of the people, and is about as unreasonable as their modern passion for Inverness capes and patent-leather boots. It is scarcely conceivable that a people possessing an alphabet, however imperfect, should ever have made use of the hieroglyphics of China to supplement its deficiencies. This, however, is what the Japanese did in their apparently inextinguishable desire for some new thing. The inscriptions on the few ancient scrolls which are to be met with at the present day in the treasures of Japanese temples prove the identity of the primitive Japanese character with that now in use in Corea; and it is probable, as is stated to be the case, that to the people of the latter country the Japanese owe their first alphabet. Through the same channel, in A.D. 285, was also introduced the Chinese language, which at first was received with but little favour, and not until after the diffusion of Buddhism did the study of it become at all general. Dating from that time, it has ever since been deemed an essential part of a liberal education; and with such eagerness have Chinese words been adopted into both the written and spoken languages, that at the present day they outnumber those of native origin.

Although this large infusion of the Chinese tongue has had no effect in altering the nature of the Japanese language, which remains essentially Altaic in its character, it has given rise to an unusually complex system of writing. The hesitating and unmethodical manner in which the Chinese characters were first employed to express Japanese words rendered it impossible to lay down any fixed laws for their use, and the result is that in Japanese composition they now possess four different values. For instance, a Chinese character may either be the equivalent of a Chinese word, or of the synonymous Japanese word; or, again, it may either represent merely the sound of a Chinese word, or of a Japanese word. When used in either of the first two capacities it is termed by Japanese writers Mana, or "true character," and when in the last two Kana, or "borrowed character." To give an example, the Chinese character meaning "heaven" may either represent the Chinese word pronounced by the Japanese ten, or the synonymous Japanese word ame, or it may be employed phonetically to represent the sound of ten. At first Chinese characters were employed almost entirely as Mana—that is to say, they received their ideographic value; but as time went on, the difficulty of rendering by Mana grammatical inflections and terminations for which there exists no Chinese equivalent made it necessary to extend the use of the characters as mere phonetic signs; and as each author followed indiscriminately his own sweet will in the choice of characters to be so employed, great confusion prevailed in the world of letters. A more definite system of writing, therefore, became indispensable. As a first step to this end, the sounds of the language were subjected to a careful analysis, and were finally divided into forty-seven syllables. To represent these, two alphabets, the Katagana and the Hiragana, were adopted. The first, as its name signifies, consists of abbreviated or "side" forms of as many ordinary Chinese characters, while the Hiragana is "nothing more than abbreviated cursive forms of a limited number of the same common Chinese characters."

In modern Japanese composition all three styles of writing—namely, the Mana, Katagana, and Hiragana—are employed indiscriminately, and hence arises one great difficulty which every student of Japanese has to face. For it not unfrequently happens that a sentence which is capable of being translated as Mana is intended by the author to be read as Kana. This difficulty can be overcome only by long practice and a careful regard to the context, which will alone save students from occasionally falling into the most egregious blunders. As a rule, however, the employment of Chinese words is in inverse ratio to the antiquity of the work. For instance, the most ancient style of Japanese literature—that in which ancient poetry is written—is distinguished by a total absence of Chinese words, and by its richness in particles and grammatical terminations. Later again we find in the Monogatari, or historical romances and other classical works of a similar character, a small admixture of Chinese words, at the same time that the grammatical methods of the old language are strictly maintained. Of late the tendency to employ Chinese words and even Chinese idioms has been much on the increase, and it has reached a climax in the epistolary correspondence, official documents, diaries, and newspapers of the present day. In these we find a marked neglect of the grammatical forms of the old language, and an all-pervading Chinese tone, both as regards words and idioms as well as characters. The grammar employed in works of this kind is beyond the scope of the treatise before us, neither are Mr. Aston's remarks applicable to the spoken language, with which he has dealt in a separate work. His present object is to lay before his readers a clear and concise view of the construction of the language of Japan pure and simple, and he has done this in a manner which leaves little to be desired.

It is necessary that the student should, at starting, disabuse his mind of the idea that there is an analogy between the functions of inflection in Japanese and those which it serves in the languages of Europe. In Japanese "the principal office of inflection, as distinguished from the addition of suffixes, is to give to the same root the force of a different part of speech, according to the inflection employed." It has nothing to do with either voice, mood, tense, person, gender, or case. "Instead of a passive voice Japanese verbs have derivative verbs with a conjugation resembling that of active verbs; mood and tense are indicated by teniwoha, or suffixes; person is only occasionally and indirectly intimated by the use of honorific or humble particles; gender is denoted by compounds similar to the English words 'he-ass,' 'she-ass,' and number and case are expressed, if at all, by suffixes or particles distinct from the noun." Japanese grammarians divide the words of the language into three classes—namely, Na, literally "name," including the noun, pronoun, and numeral adjective of European grammars; Kotoba, "word," comprising verbs and adjectives; and Teniwoha, a word composed of the four particles in most common use, namely, te, ni, wo, and ha, under which class are grouped the article and preposition, together with the terminations of verbs and adjectives. In a native grammar entitled Kotoba no chikamichi, Na are called i-kotoba, or "words which remain at rest," that is to say, without inflection—an expression equivalent to the Chinese see yen, or "dead words"; and Kotoba are spoken of as "words of action," that is, inflected, or as the Chinese say, Awō yen, "living words." Some Teniwoha are also susceptible of inflection, and Mr. Aston points out, therefore, that as the principal words are divided into uninflected and inflected classes, so should also the Teniwoha, or subordinate words, be. Of verbs there are three conjugations, and of adjectives two, and in all cases their roots are susceptible of four inflections, called by Mr. Aston the conclusive form, or verb; the attributive, or substantive form; the base for negative and future forms; and the perfect. Of these inflections he gives a table at page 30 which should be carefully studied by the light afforded by the remarks which follow it. It is a pity, however, that Mr. Aston should have adopted the nomenclature employed by the native grammarians for the different parts of the verb, and thus have thrown an additional stumbling-block in the way of beginners. The parts are sufficiently analogous to the division of our own verbs to render the terms employed in English grammar applicable to them. For instance, the conclusive form, or, literally, "decisive, or determining word," has the force of our indicative mood, and in that sense is decisive or determining, but it is also so called from the fact that it is always placed at the end of a sentence. As Japanese books are without a proper system of punctuation, it is of the utmost importance that beginners should be able readily to recognize this form to help them to distinguish where one sentence ends and another begins. The attributive form of verbal roots corresponds to the English participle in ing. The base for negative and future suffixes is nearly equivalent to our future tense, and the perfect speaks for itself.

Japanese nouns may be divided into simple, derived, and compound nouns. They have, properly speaking, no determination. Number and case are rarely expressed, but when they are they "are indicated by means of certain particles placed after the words, which themselves suffer no change." Personal pronouns are seldom used in Japanese; thus the sentence "I will go" is expressed by yukan, which would be as applicable for either the second or third person as for the first. But if in conversation a speaker desires to emphasize the first person when speaking of himself, he uses such humble expressions as "this awkward person," or "this stupid one"; and in like manner when addressing his interlocutor, he indicates the second person by means of honorific terms, as "the noble lord," or "the honourable gentleman."

* Grammar of the Japanese Written Language, with a short Christian Vocabulary. By W. G. Aston, M.A., Interpreter and Translator to H. B. M.'s Consulate, Yokohama, Japan. London: 1872.

From the foregoing remarks the importance to students of an accurate knowledge of the rules which govern the construction of a Japanese sentence will be apparent. Fortunately these are plain, and may be said to admit, except in the case of poetry, of few variations. As is the case in all languages of the Altaic family, every word in Japanese which serves to define another word invariably precedes it. "Thus the adjective precedes the noun, the particle the verb, the genitive the word which governs it, the objective case the verb, and the word governed by a preposition the preposition." The nominative case stands at the beginning of a sentence, and the verb at the end. Although, since in Japanese the forms taken by verbal and adjectival roots when they appear successively as nouns, adverbs, adjectives, and verbs, are distinctly marked, the position of words in a sentence does not occupy the same important part in the grammar of the language as it does in Chinese, still a careful study of it, together with the various final particles, is essential to enable the student to supply the necessary punctuation which is almost invariably wanting in Japanese books. The prominent position which the inhabitants of Japan have of late years occupied in the eyes of Europe has created a corresponding desire on the part of Western scholars to gain an insight into their literature. Apart from that which has been borrowed from the Chinese—and in this list must be included their principal works on religion and philosophy—there is much to interest and attract readers. The task of acquiring a knowledge of the language is not unattended with difficulty, but Mr. Aston's Grammar will help to lighten the labour of students and to make plain much which has hitherto been but vaguely understood.

SIMPLE STORIES.*

THERE is as much art, if not so much labour, required in writing simple stories as in turning out more elaborate work. There must be the same care taken to keep the colour right and the minor parts in due subordination; the same gradual evolution of plot and culmination of interest; the same distinctness of character, if more sketchiness of detail—the first condition of the success of a simple story being the ability to present scenes and people vividly and yet not lengthily, while the method is that rarest of all, the union of compression with vivacity, leaving something to the imagination yet making everything clear to the perception. These short and simple stories come in as a pleasant relief among the long and fevered efforts of the three-volume novelists. They are innocent and wholesome, if their danger is in platitudes; if their sentiment is sometimes washy, it is at least better than coarse and vulgar crime.

The first book of which we have now to speak is essentially a simple story, and deserves well of criticism. The character of the heroine Marjory is a very pretty study; and if the introduction deals perhaps too much with doll-day life, and makes too much of small matters, we cannot deny the merit of the picture as it stands, nor refuse our love to the honest, brave, unselfish little tom-boy who is the central figure. We cannot quite make out, however, what Marjory's fall into the staked pond has to do with the story. True, she says after it that she "was beginning to understand that the old wild Marjory, with her health and strength, was gone away for ever"; but we see no indications of any permanent disablement; and when the thread of the plot is taken up again at nineteen, we find no more change from the pleasant tom-boy of thirteen than would naturally have taken place by the mere lapse of years, and the consequent softening of hoydenish girlhood into the well-bred staidness and propriety befitting a young lady. This is just one of those isolated incidents which unpractised writers mistake for story. It is not in the story at all; it is a mere excrecence, and has nothing to do with the matter in hand. It tells nothing, prepares the way for nothing, and has no kind of relation with anything that comes after; but it serves to fill up space, and is pretty in itself. Still, neither of these is sufficient reason why excrecences should be allowed as excrecences; they should rather be woven into the plot as vital and integral parts thereof, leading to something and meaning something of importance to the rest. But the art of putting a design together, and not letting it lie scattered, is to be got only by practice; and Miss Deane has not sinned in this respect more than is natural in a beginner.

There is a noticeable absence of spitefulness in Marjory. In general lady novelists are such fierce partisans of their characters that they have no perception for half tones; and the effect of modifying influences is a heresy to which they will not subscribe. They add malicious little personal touches that show their own animus more than they increase the spirit of the sketch; as in one instance we remember, where the authoress, to mark her disapprobation of one of her puppets, put on the bonnet awry at a supreme moment—where, however, her looks had nothing to do with the matter—and made her, with true feminine instinct, "a fright," because she had imagined her bad. There is nothing of this in our present story. Antoinette, the naughtier girl of the two, selfish and scheming as she is, is not exaggerated into a demon. She is pretty and vain, worldly and ambitious, unaffectionate and designing, yet she is not a monster of vice, but, on the contrary, is unhappily quite natural. She loves her ease, and she desires to make a good marriage; wherefore she lays herself out to accomplish her ends; and, by the cruelty of circumstances, she succeeds. And though Michael is grim and dour and jealous, he is only just as much so as one might well imagine the younger of twins would be who had lost the estate by half an hour, and who fancied himself in danger of also losing the girl he loved. It was a trial beyond the possibility of such human nature as his to support with equanimity, and though to be sure he did treat poor Gilles like a bear, he only gave way to temper, he did not brood over a crime. We think that so much self-restraint and nice judgment in a young writer is a fact deserving commendation; and that if Miss Deane has done so well in her first attempt, and been able to make interest out of such simple materials as those which compose Marjory, she will do better as time goes on and her powers are more thoroughly under her control. She has shown considerable skill in the way in which she has made a vivid picture out of sketches only. Every character is more or less a sketch, even to Marjory herself, where indications, rather than elaborate work, mark the nature and make out the portrait; but it is just these indications which are so satisfactory. Lady Bridges, the tender, timid invalid; Patience, Marjory's half-sister, sharp and stern, and soured by her own life's disappointment, a good woman at heart, but an excessively disagreeable person to live with; Mrs. Markham, flighty and false; Gilles, bright, generous, and loving; even the maid and the man, Martha and Thomas, he with his faithful wooing and she with her long-delayed assent; and the two already spoken of, Antoinette and Michael—all these are characters more suggestive than elaborated, and yet quite vivid and consistent with themselves. It is good work and wholesome portraiture, and, if not very exciting, is in no wise disappointing. We do not, however, quite believe the story about the White Lady. We do not hold with ghosts, and we doubt Marjory's testimony on that score, and are inclined to put down her vision to any cause but the one she gives. These ghosts are too partial and illogical for us; and, spirits as they are, the curious way in which all their intercourse with humanity confines itself to earthly matters is, to say the least of it, odd, and lays them open to grave suspicion. Still, if Lady Bridges liked to keep a private spectre in the Ghost's Walk, that was her affair and Miss Deane's, and it is not for us to object. Marjory is bright enough to afford the mournful shadow that prophesies of woe; for though the story is substantially a tragedy in that it ends in death and sorrow, still the whole spirit of the tale is brave and cheerful, and the very catastrophe leaves us not so much depressed as merely sorry that things could not have been better. On the whole, it is a pretty, readable, and charming little book; if not strong, thoroughly healthy, and, save the White Lady, natural.

Holme Lee's short stories are as pleasant as Miss Deane's larger volume. We cannot say much for the poetry with which she has interspersed her prose, and which is of the unsatisfactory kind current in second-rate magazines and the like. But some of her little tales are charming, and with a pretty air of mock reality about them which is very taking. "Polly's One Offer," and "A Winter Wedding in the Woods," seem to us the best of all, because of a certain breadth and rustic vitality pervading them. The story, such as it is, of both—for, indeed, the story in the "Winter Wedding" is of the thinnest and slightest description, a skeleton rather than a tale—is well put and vigorous; and, graceful and ladylike as Holme Lee always is, she has not been afraid of the broader humour and bolder handling necessary to her subject. If her big men have to catch up in their arms and smother with unceremonious kisses her little brown mice-like women, well, they do so, and the mice have to submit to the free ways of their half-tamed admirers, and to ponder on the desirableness of retaliation or acceptance, according as pride or affection has the upper hand. We do not like her melodrama so much; though even in some of the most melodramatic of her tales she has numerous incidental little traits as nicely sketched as they have been well observed, which give them a more everyday and lifelike bearing. "Three Nights by Ash Pool" is a pathetic and painful and slightly improper story; but Holme Lee's taste is always true, and her improprieties are inoffensively told. Nevertheless we do not like the story, and do not see what good is done by writing of a theme which every one knows by heart, and of which we all see too much, unless it is handled with consummate skill and real originality.

"Lady Seamer's Long Step" is the worst bit of work, barring the poetry, in the collection. It is one of those inconsequent stories, those queer volcanic eruptive bits of writing, where things happen without cause, and which throw the reader into a state of chronic surprise throughout that is not pleasure. Besides, it is a little unjust and spiteful; and Sir John's madness is treated angrily as a crime, and spoken of with a kind of impatient injustice that may be natural to unthinking people in real life, but is not pleasant to read. The man was mad all through; in which case his brutality and evil temper, and all the rest of the torture his poor wife underwent, though and enough for her, were not wilful crimes in him; and in relating the story there should have been no partisanship in the author, and horror should have been without malice, and subordinate to pity. This unphilosophical partisanship jars on one's sense of justice and fair dealing, and is the prevailing weakness of most women's writing. We are glad that Holme Lee has not attempted any kind of dramatic connecting thread, which authors who collect their scattered stories usually think themselves bound to supply. She has merely tabulated hers under the head of the month, facing, or rather backing, each with a poem of doubtful merit. But even this slight bond of union might have been left out with advantage; for there is no reason discernible why one story should go under the head of March and another under that of June; why "Eylil's Disappointment" should be for a sign of August, and "Lina Ferrate" be bracketed with November. We suppose there is a certain conventionalality of authorship in such matters; and Holme Lee only obeyed the rule of the order when she made her stories and poems topical, but it is silly all the same. However, the beads strung upon the thread are pretty enough; and with this we leave them to the acceptance of the public.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

ANCIENT America* is a popular, though by no means an unscientific, treatise on a subject of which very little is known to the general European public. Indeed some of those writers who have dealt at length with the evidences of perished civilisations have confined themselves almost exclusively to the Old World, and have given at most only a passing mention of the ruins of the New. Most of our readers will probably remember the name, if nothing more, of the Mound-builders; but we doubt whether one Englishman in five, even among the educated classes, has any idea that North America contains, in almost as large a proportion as Western Asia and Eastern Europe, the monuments of races whose history is lost to mankind, whose very name is in some cases matter of doubt, but who have left us proof that they had attained as high a standard of general culture and agricultural skill as the nations whose history has been preserved to us had reached at the period when their records commence. Even Americans are wont to speak of ruins as the peculiar inheritance of this hemisphere, and to treat their supposed absence in America as a signal illustration of the comparative youth of Western civilization. And yet the truth is that there existed in the valley of the Mississippi, ages before Columbus, relics of a character which prove unmistakably the existence of a prior civilization—a civilization probably inferior to that of Egypt, but indicating as clearly as the Pyramids themselves the presence of a vast agricultural and settled population, with a government capable of concentrating and controlling great masses of labour for a public object, of feeding the labourers, and of directing their efforts to unproductive results; a fact which in its turn implies an accumulation of wealth and a confidence in their own resources known only to nations far and long removed from barbarism. We are all of us familiar with the existence of civilized nations and powerful empires in Central and South America at the time of the Conquest; with the mighty monarchy of the Aztecs in Mexico, and the strange social organization of Peru under the divine dynasty of the Incas. But it is less generally understood that Central America at least contains the remains of a much older empire than that of Montezum; ruins which even in his time were overgrown with forest, built by a people whose power had been annihilated before the arrival of the Aztecs, and whose name is only preserved in their records through the traditions of the people they found in possession of the land, and who claimed to have conquered their civilized predecessors. Of the Mound-builders of the Ohio and the Mississippi no trace remains except their monuments. The character of these is discussed at length in the volume before us, and is explained by several plans and sketches, which only fail in not making it sufficiently clear which are properly mounds and which mere enclosures. Both are of all sizes and of various forms; sometimes square, oblong, or circular, traced with great accuracy, and displaying considerable mathematical skill; sometimes in the form of monstrous animals; enclosing sometimes less than an acre, sometimes scores or hundreds of acres. The animal forms are thought to have had a religious purpose; the smaller and loftier mounds to have been intended for watch-towers or astronomical observatories; the more extensive mounds and enclosures to have been designed as the foundations or fortifications of cities. These were probably built of wood, less perhaps from ignorance than from the comparative scarcity of better materials. The Mexican and Central American ruins are of stone; temples, cities, and what might be called castles, adapted to contain a population of hundreds or thousands in a single fortified building; but they contain here and there implements akin to those found in the mounds, and their sculptures show the use of some of these, among which is a species of tube or telescope without glasses, used for astronomical observation. In some of these buildings, as in those of Egypt, are found arrangements obviously astronomical; and symbols which are thought to resemble those of Assyrian or Chaldean star-worship. There are long inscriptions on stone; and there exist a few MSS. of priceless value in the eyes of antiquaries, of which facsimiles are given. The Mound-builders have left no traces of such arts; but this may be due to the perishable nature of their materials rather than to their ignorance. The whole copper region of Lake Superior bears witness to their knowledge and practice of mining; and the author is inclined, from certain points of similarity, to connect them with the first civilized possessors of Mexico and Honduras. That they had no relations with the Red Indians he holds to be certain. Their age he endeavours to fix by several indications of a more or less certain character, and he concludes that they were probably extinct two thousand years ago, if not earlier, and were among the first civilized nations of the world. His speculations as to their origin, affinities, and history are not more trustworthy than such conjectures may be expected to be in the absence of any real data; and he shows an undue credulity in dealing with such mythical myths as those connected with the imagined island of Atlantis, and the reputed voyages of the Phœnicians at a date long prior to that of any existing historians. But his accounts of the ascertained facts and the inferences from which future investigation may gather further knowledge are careful and lively; and his work is calculated to interest all who entertain any curiosity respecting the evidences of prehistoric civilization scattered over the world.

Professor Young, of Dartmouth College, prints a lecture on the Sun and the Phenomena of its Atmosphere† which contains a good deal of the latest information on the subject, chiefly derived from the researches of Mr. Lockyer and Dr. Huggins. His views, however, are not always very clear, and he does not carefully note where they seem to differ from (or perhaps misconceive) those of his authorities; his language is popular rather than scientific, and however acceptable the lecture may have been to his hearers, it hardly deserves the notice of readers who have access to the writings of those from whom the Professor has drawn his materials.

Mr. Hoppin's Crossing the Atlantic‡ is a series of comic sketches in a bold and free style, perfectly free from coarseness or vulgar caricature, and comic only in that sense of the word which is wholly distinct from the farcical associations attached to it by frequent misuse. They delineate in a spirited fashion some of the amusing incidents of an Atlantic voyage, and the personal peculiarities of different types of passengers. Many artists would have thought it necessary to attach a text to them, and print them as "illustrations"; but the terseness of such sketches as these would be devoid of meaning or point, and the "illustrations" tell their own story, so far as they have one, without the aid of type. The volume is excellently adapted for the drawing-room table.

During the recent sittings of the International Congress on Prisons‡ appeared a Report, apparently intended to serve as an introduction to its discussions, from the pen of the American Commissioner appointed to represent his Government in that assembly. Having received his commission some eighteen months before the meeting to which he was nominally accredited, he spent his time in visiting the different capitals of Europe, making preparations for the Congress, and inquiring into the prison systems of different countries. His Report is a valuable addition to that vast and most useful collection of information regarding the institutions and policy of different States in nearly every department of administration and law which it is the practice of the American authorities, State and Federal, to compile, and of which the official documents of the United States present a unique example. We suppose that there are few questions of social polity or administration upon which the libraries of Congress or of the State Legislatures could not furnish a perfect cyclopaedia of practical and historical information, amassed in this way from all countries, enriched by the opinions of the best authorities, and embodied in a well-arranged Report by a writer chosen for his special devotion to the subject, or enabled by his general training to devote himself to it after his appointment. Thus in the present volume we have such a description of the penal systems of France, Italy, Switzerland, Russia, &c., as it would be difficult to find in any other single work, and not easy to hunt out in the Library of the British Museum. The reporter has also taken care to call special attention to a paper embodying the well-known but very peculiar views of Captain Maconochie with regard to the "mark" system of discipline, and recommending that prisoners should be sentenced, not to a definite term of imprisonment, but to perform a given task. The views of different reformers are incidentally given in various places, nearly all of them showing a tendency to look simply at the effect of different forms of imprisonment upon the culprits actually sentenced, and to forget the far more important question of their deterrent influence on those who know them only by repute. But, all such objections notwithstanding, the Report is a treasury of valuable information and important suggestions on a topic of great and immediate interest.

A treatise on the Dangerous Classes of New York § by one who has laboured long and diligently among them merits a much fuller consideration than we can give it here. The author has studied his subject with indefatigable earnestness and patience, has laboured at it with all the devotion of an enthusiast, and writes upon it with calmness, discretion, and moderation. He discusses first the circumstances which create the dangerous classes; among which he gives peculiar prominence to overcrowding, intemperance, and parental vice and neglect, illustrating clearly the terrible mischief done by each, but studiously avoiding exaggeration; and, upon the vexed question of temperance in particular, writing with a degree of judgment and impartiality which sets a good example to the total function. On all the remedies which they have suggested, but which are really likely to work a gradual reform—workmen's clubs, the provision of better public amusements, the introduction of lighter alcoholic beverages, and of drinking-gardens in lieu of public-houses—he lays great stress, and never forgets that he is dealing, not with a thing evil in itself, but with the abuse of a blessing. Those ladies who have chosen the nastiest of topics as a theme for the wildest nonsense and the most shameless misrepresentation might well profit by the perusal of a chapter in which he reasons on the same side, but in the spirit of a gentleman, a Christian, and a man of sense. His account of the practical working of the different charities with which he is connected is equally impartial, judicious, and suggestive. Altogether, we know of no work which deals more wisely with some of the gravest social evils of a highly artificial civilisation.

An Exposé of Polygamy in Utah* professes to emanate from a female convert to Mormonism, who lived long with her husband under the rule of Brigham Young, and was at last driven to apostasy by the intolerable burden of polygamy; her husband having submitted, under the advice of his ecclesiastical superiors, to take a second wife, and her jealousy of the intruder rendering life a burden to her. Much of the narrative may be exaggerated, but it is evident that the pictures of Mormon life, however caricatured, have been drawn by one who has actually witnessed it. The authoress attributes to many of the men an aversion to polygamy which her account of the women's behaviour would fully explain; but she seems to overlook the utter inconsistency between her representations of the crushed spirits and complete subjection of the women and her description of their incessant outbreaks of temper. Again, while she imputes to Brigham Young and his immediate supporters a desire to entangle irretrievably the better men among their converts by obliging them to take a second or third wife, she admits that a sincere Mormon must look upon polygamy in the light of a religious duty. She bears witness also to the inefficacy of the persecution of the Federal Government; the first effect of its legislation against polygamy being that many who had hitherto resisted all the persuasions of the Church forthwith married a second or more wives, in order to throw in their lot with their leaders and give a proof of attachment to their cause. Her pictures of the unhappiness of polygamic households do not agree with the accounts of other and more pretentious writers on Utah, but are perhaps more in accordance with the received ideas of the character of English and American women.

We have two books on "Pennsylvania Dutch"—the one an account of the language spoken by the elder German settlers in Lancaster and the neighbouring counties of Pennsylvania, the other a description of their religious tenets and practices, and of their daily life. They belong to various fractions of the sect known as Mennonites or Menzies, are not unlike the Quakers in the general character of their habits, ideas, and worship, and lead a simple, industrious, rustic life, keeping as much as possible aloof from all but their own people; shunning even the native Germans, and using "Yankee" as synonymous with "cheat," but kindly, harmless, and hospitable. Their abstinence from politics, which some sections carry so far as to prohibit voting, is regarded as a very singular eccentricity by their American neighbours; but they appear to cherish a traditional animosity to the Federal or Republican party, dating from the suppression of certain disturbances in their district by President Adams, the most recent occurrence which has directly interested them or disturbed the even tenor of their isolated life.

Mr. Hayden, U.S. Geologist, furnishes two more volumes of his Survey, the one relating to Montana and the adjacent territory, the other to Nebraska. They deal, as usual, with a considerable range of questions; the general geological conformation of the country, the extent of particular strata, the presence of minerals, and particularly of coal and gold, the agricultural resources, climate, meteorology, and the classification of the fossils discovered in the course of the Survey. Perhaps the most interesting parts of these Reports are those which relate to the presence of coal and to the absence of wood. The former exists in this region, as in other and more accessible parts of the United States, in large quantities, and promises to furnish the country with abundant supplies for all purposes and for long ages, when once the growing density of population leads to the development of this enterprising wealth; whereas wood is so scarce and so poor in this whole region, owing to the scanty supply of water, that it is said to be impossible to make an excelsior of native wood, all that is required for industrial purposes having to be brought from the East. In the description of the country we meet with a most interesting account of the "geysers" and volcanic phenomena of the so-called "Yellowstone Park," now appropriated by Act of Congress as a public domain, and thus preserved for ever as a popular spectacle and scientific study. The natural wonders of the place are as remarkable, to say the least, as those of Iceland, and are well described in the Report.

The Annual Record of Science and Industry† is a miscellaneous collection of short paragraphs, embodying succinct accounts of new discoveries, theories, and inventions in every branch of science and scientific art. Geography, chemistry and metallurgy, agriculture, technology, therapeutics, &c., have each their separate place; but the difficulty of arranging the various topics under these several departments has evidently been too much for the editors, and the reader cannot with any confidence look to finding a notice where he expects it, but must trust to a somewhat succinctly worded index to guide him to the particular object of his search. Notwithstanding the difficulty inherent in the nature of the work, the record is both serviceable as a work of reference and interesting to the general reader.

Mr. Calvert's Goethe, his Life and Works‡, is not a biography, but an essay expanded into a volume; an elaborate review article, "produced," like one of Euclid's lines, "to any length." Mr. C. D. Warner's Saunterings§ has something of the same character. Each single paper is light, graceful, and agreeable, but an accumulation of lightness becomes painfully heavy, and a strain of subdued humour which runs very pleasantly through a few pages becomes a weariness to the flesh ere we reach the end of a volume. Each of the Saunterer's papers might have made an agreeable contribution to a magazine; and month by month one might have read them all. But to sit down to them all at once!

The "Illustrated Library of Travel,"§ edited by Mr. Bayard Taylor, is founded on the idea of collecting and digesting a series of records of travel in the same country into a species of continuous narrative, introduced and interspersed by editorial remarks on the geography and history of the region traversed. Thus the first of the volumes before us is devoted to Arabia, and deals with the journeys of Niebuhr, Burckhardt, Wellsted, Burton, and Palgrave, the last named occupying half the volume; the next treats of Japan, the materials being chiefly furnished by Sir Rutherford Alcock and M. Humbert. If this is not the highest kind of literature, it doubtless serves, in this busy age, to make many persons acquainted with the substantial results of travel and discovery who would hardly have thought of searching the original works for themselves.

The Curiosities of Law Reporters|| is a collection of judicial and forensic facetiae, of quaint incidents and expressions to be found in old law books, exhibitions of temper or eccentricity on the Bench and of high-flutin oratory at the Bar, startling consequences of legal rules, regulations illustrating the immense difference between ancient and modern usages and ideas, and, in short, of all the amusing trifles that enliven the driest of books and the gravest of professions. There are certain passages which might as well be struck out from a work of this kind, where no necessity compels and excuses the appearance of things intrinsically offensive; but these are comparatively few, and the little volume contains enough of wit and humour to make the fortune of half-a-dozen professional jokers.

Fancies for Thoughts and Fables and Legends¶ are two graceful and harmless volumes of verse, the first of which sometimes approaches the character of poetry, while the latter embodies, in fairly correct if sometimes feeble lines, certain old apoloques and fables not unworthy of preservation.

Messrs. Osgood's Boston Illustrated** is one of those handbooks descriptive of the principal cities of the Union of which American local pride furnishes so many, and which may serve either to assist the explorations of a visitor or to give a lively notion of the place to those who are interested in it by their knowledge of its history, or by the residence there of friends or relatives. As regards the general public it has few claims to even a passing notice.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE LORDS.

ON Monday night the Peers wandered into a discussion by no means without interest or importance as to the mode in which the Government treats the House of Lords. The discussion arose in this way. The Cape Colony has passed a Bill establishing representative government in the settlement, and Lord SALISBURY invited the Ministry to advise the QUEEN to withhold her assent to it, on the ground that the Bill had not been carried as a Bill of such importance ought to be carried. Last year the Assembly passed, and the Legislative Council rejected, a similar Bill. This year two members who last year were against it changed their opinions, or, as Lord SALISBURY put it, had been lured over, and the Bill was passed by the Legislative Council, although some of its provisions were only carried by the casting vote of the Chairman. The Home Government had avowedly let it be known that they wished such a Bill to be carried, and the reasons assigned why Lord KIMBERLEY should refuse to advise the Royal assent to it were three—that two members of the Legislative Council had been lured over, that it was not fitting that questions of such primary magnitude for the future of the colony should be settled by a casting vote, and that the electors should have been consulted by a dissolution before so great a change was imposed on them. It did not, however, appear that the two members who had changed their opinions had been lured over in any other sense than that they knew that the opinions held by the Governor of the colony and by the Home Government were opposed to the opinions they had last year entertained. It is part of the existing Constitution of the colony that the Chairman of the Legislative Council may give a casting vote, and as the Home Government approved of the Bill, it was not for him to put the electors to the trouble of a dissolution in order to see whether the minority against the Bill might not be converted into a majority. Lord SALISBURY thought the Bill bad for the colony, and Lord KIMBERLEY thought it good for the colony, and to discuss which was right would be to enter on difficult questions of local politics. But the Government seems to have been right in looking only at the public action of the Legislative Council. It would be a dangerous precedent to reject a Bill because it was vaguely surmised that two persons who voted for it had been lured over, and because, under a Constitution permitting a chairman to give a casting vote, he had given one. When, again, bodies duly elected in a colony pass a measure, it seems hard on them that the Home Government should say that there must be a new election to see if the electors will confirm their decision. But it was quite natural for Lord SALISBURY to see in this incident of colonial history a connexion with home politics of much interest, and especially of much interest to a leading peer. The question so often raised by Lord SALISBURY and other Conservative peers was in an indirect way being fought over again. The Liberal Government treats measures deliberately adopted by the House of Commons as adopted by those whom the House of Commons represents, when no sign of dissent is made in the majority of the constituencies. Conservative peers say that the House of Commons represents the people on a question of radical reform, when the issue was put distinctly before the people, and when the House of Commons was elected. The House of Lords, according to this theory, would be always entitled to ask, as the French Imperialists are so fond of asking, for a plébiscite before it regarded anything as settled. There is much to be said for this theory, but the balance of reasoning is, we think, against it, on account of the extreme democratic consequences to which it might easily lead. The Executive and the House of Commons would be equally discredited if the Peers could thus order a reference to the people.

But Lord SALISBURY raised a further question. He assumed that the Government, finding the opinion of the Legislative Council of the Cape opposed to its own, had determined to break down the opposition by fair means or foul. The Upper Chamber of the colony had seen its just influence set aside, and this, Lord SALISBURY said, was quite in keeping with what goes on at home, where "their Lordships knew with what want of respect this House had been treated by Her MAJESTY'S Government." Lord GRANVILLE eagerly asked him to explain to what he referred, and he said that he referred to the use of the Royal Prerogative for the abolition of purchase last year, and to the refusal of the Crown, under the advice of the Ministry, to comply with the Lords' Address carried by Lord ABINGER, with regard to the appointment of majors in the scientific corps of the army. It is not necessary to enter on the well-worn question of the use of the royal prerogative last Session, further than to remark that it by no means concerned the Lords alone, and that the most serious incident of the whole transaction was the broad hint thrown out by Mr. GLADSTONE that, if he was supported by the people, he did not much care whether either House objected to his use of the prerogative. He was forced afterwards to think over the whole affair carefully, and to gain some instruction from it, and the general course of events warned him to be in every way more moderate. It is therefore of some moment to inquire whether the recent conduct of the Government in dealing with the House of Lords can be fairly accused of having, in the language of Lord SALISBURY, been characterized by anything but sentiments of affection and respect. We must say that we do not think it at all open to this criticism. The Peers complained that they had no work to do; and the Government, wishing to please them, introduced the Licensing Bill in the Upper House. The Peers made many changes in the Ballot Bill; and the Government not only adopted all that they possibly could, but actually tried to adopt more than the House of Commons would allow them to adopt. The Peers have thrown out the Commons Enclosure Bill, on which much pains had been bestowed, without a murmur from the Government. Lord CAMHES extinguished instantaneously the humble flame of the CHANCELLOR'S scheme for Law Reform, and the Ministry had not a word to say. Only last week both law officers of the Crown entirely and positively declined to have anything whatever to do with any question of law reform, because all law reform must depend on the good pleasure of the Peers, and there was no saying what the good pleasure of the Peers might be. If this is treating the Lords with a want of respect, they must indeed be exacting. There only remains the advice of the Ministry to the Crown not to comply with Lord ABINGER'S Address. But surely this was a very small matter. A very elaborate scheme for re-arranging the position of officers of the scientific forces had been long preparing, and was anxiously expected. Lord ABINGER carried an Address in which the Lords requested that the scheme might be delayed for further inquiry. The Crown was advised to reply that any delay would be prejudicial to the interests of the service, and that everything was ripe for the proposed change. The whole question, it must be remembered, turned upon whether there should or not be majors of Engineers and Artillery. Almost exactly a similar case happened in the days when Lord PALMERSTON, with whom the Lords were always very well satisfied, was Premier. In 1864 the Lords carried an Address praying that Wakefield and not Leeds might be made the seat of a district. The Crown was advised to reply that the choice of Leeds had been made, and could not be unmade without inconvenience, and so the prayer of the Lords' address could not be acceded to. The Lords were perfectly patient under their failure, and none of them suggested that the PRIME MINISTER had been insulting them and trampling on their feelings.

Lord SALISBURY is sometimes accused of fighting the battle of the Lords too warmly, and of looking out too eagerly for occasions of combat. All that can be said is that different men carry on public business in different ways, to the great advantage of free assemblies, and that Lord SALISBURY's mode of fighting for himself and his friends is often at least very effectual, and very enlivening in an atmosphere otherwise apt to be dull. The Peers and the public would lose greatly if Lord SALISBURY were not in his place to fight after his own fashion. What is important is that, after the fighting is over, the conduct and position of the House of Lords, and the treatment it receives from the Government, should be calmly examined and fairly judged. Violent invectives against the House of Lords, and violent panegyrics of it, are to be equally deprecated. The Government, whatever may have been its disposition previously, has not, we think, treated the House of Lords badly this Session. On the contrary, if it is to be blamed at all, it is for the too great servility it has displayed, and for the attitude of depressed inferiority it has assumed, in treating the House of Lords as the sole masters and arbiters of Law Reform. In many respects the House of Lords has appeared to advantage during the twelve months of which Lord SALISBURY spoke, and in some respects it has not appeared to advantage. The reproach involved in Mr. GLADSTONE's famous saying, that the Peers often behave like men up in a balloon, was not unmerited by a body which shot down on a wondering world the extraordinary device of the optional Ballot. Lord CAIRNS, again, who has now the field of law reform entirely to himself, may have judged prudently in keeping back his real intentions and plans, so as in due time to bring them forth for the delight and instruction of everybody; but he certainly did not give much indication, when he was crushing out the CHANCELLOR's scheme of law reform, how he himself will fill up the gap. The only important debate in the Lords this Session, that on the Washington Treaty, was not up to the level of their traditional excellence on such questions. The truth seems to be, that the House of Lords has not lost weight or authority this Session, but neither has it gained; and that during an uneventful period of its history, it has been treated as well by the Government, and has had as little to complain of, as is possible when a Liberal Ministry rules with a Conservative majority in the Peers.

MEXICO.

THE death of JUAREZ is a misfortune to a country which has no more urgent want than the need of political stability. Even Mexicans probably respect a ruler who, with or without pretence of re-election, has retained power for half a generation. Nearly all Englishmen who have had a diplomatic or commercial knowledge of Mexico agree in attributing to the late PRESIDENT the rare quality of personal integrity. Although he was not indifferent to his own political aggrandizement, he seems not to have been open to pecuniary corruption. If he was cruel to his enemies, and offensively indifferent to international rights, it will be remembered that he was a full-blooded Indian, and that he was not worse than his rivals and predecessors, the MIRAMONS and SANTA ANNAS. It would be rash to found any preference for a Mexican faction on its title of Liberal; but perhaps the hostile clerical party is still more irreconcilably opposed to good government. The popularity which JUAREZ enjoyed in his later years was in a great measure earned by his determined resistance to the French invaders and to their Austrian nominee; nor is the unnecessary execution of the Emperor MAXIMILIAN regarded by patriotic Mexicans as a blunder or a crime. If there should hereafter be a Mexican history, the retreat of the foreigners from the country and the death of their chief will probably assume in the popular imagination heroic proportions. It will be unnecessary to record the real cause of the failure of the French experiment in the unforeseen collapse of the Southern Confederacy, and in the menacing attitude which the Federal Government was consequently enabled to assume. It will also be an insoluble problem whether the permanent establishment of the Empire might not have been the best method of reforming the country from chronic and helpless anarchy. It is certain that the Emperor NAPOLEON was not justified in expending French revenues on a wanton and chimerical experiment; and he committed an additional fault in entrusting the conduct of the enterprise to a coarse and unscrupulous soldier; but the Archduke MAXIMILIAN was a ruler of a higher order than an indigenous adventurer, and he brought with him the traditions of the highest European civilization. The Emperor NAPOLEON perhaps imposed upon himself when he announced his purpose of elevating the Latin race in the Western hemisphere. JUAREZ, who was Latin only in language, was naturally incapable of appreciating the benevolent intentions of the invader.

Since the death of MAXIMILIAN there have been no diplomatic relations between Mexico and the European Powers. Confident in recent success, and in inaccessible remoteness, JUAREZ affected to resent the recognition of the Empire, although he must have been well aware that England at least invariably acknowledges the existence of actual Governments. He may probably not have wished to be troubled by the presence of authorised observers and reporters of the condition of the Republic. The roads were infested by highwaymen; the treasury in one of the richest countries in the world was occasionally empty, and there were constant rumours of insurrections in the more distant provinces; yet there is reason to believe that industry and commerce had to a certain extent revived, and that the people were increasing in prosperity. Immediately before the death of the PRESIDENT a more than ordinarily serious rebellion in the Eastern States had been suppressed; and a contemporaneous intrigue of the clerical faction under the lead of the Chief-Justice TEJADA had simultaneously failed. JUAREZ had appointed a new Ministry, possessing, as it is said, unusual ability and influence, and on the whole the condition of Mexico seemed to be comparatively hopeful. It is strange that the unexpected death of the PRESIDENT is attributed only to natural causes; and it is well that Mexican politics are not complicated by suspicions of assassination. By the Constitution of the Republic the Chief-Justice succeeds to the vacant Presidency; but if TEJADA wishes to retain power he will probably be compelled to break with his clerical allies. The Liberals have proved by their maintenance of JUAREZ as President for many years that they are stronger than their adversaries; and it is not to be supposed that they will acquiesce in a political revolution arising from an accident. If it is true that the French Government proposes in consequence of the death of JUAREZ to renew diplomatic intercourse with Mexico, the new PRESIDENT may perhaps incur suspicion if he is too ready to encourage overtures of friendship. The French expedition and the scheme of the Empire were first suggested by MIRAMON, who was at that time the chief of the clerical party. There is not the smallest risk of a repetition of the Emperor NAPOLEON's undertaking by the present or by any future French Government, but the people of Mexico are probably not well acquainted with the political condition of Europe.

The natural capabilities of Mexico are unsurpassed, but it is impossible to judge whether the population is competent to profit by its opportunities. The colonial administration of Spain was feeble and depressing, and the tedious war of independence produced no considerable leader or vigorous statesman. The Spanish race has degenerated in a foreign climate, and notwithstanding the comparative success of JUAREZ, it is still uncertain whether the descendants of the Aztecs and of their subject tribes are naturally capable of attaining a high civilization. The Spaniards in America have been less strongly prejudiced than some other nations against the inferior races around them. From the time of the conquest, descent in the female line from a Mexican family has never been regarded as discreditable. The customs and religion of Spain as well as its language have been not unwillingly adopted by the natives; and consequently there is no marked division of the inhabitants of the country into hostile classes. The neighbourhood and example of the great Republic in the North have probably not been advantageous to States which required a strong and independent Government. From the Rio Grande to Cape Horn the ex-colonists of Spain proved themselves unfit for political obedience or control. The most powerful and best governed part of South America, the Empire of Brazil, which had the good fortune to be saved by transplantation an ancient dynasty. If a civil war follows the death of JUAREZ, the consequent mischiefs and confusion will illustrate the advantages of hereditary succession which supersedes the opportunity of dispute. That the head of the Opposition should be the legitimate successor of the head of the Government is an anomalous arrangement; and it is only in settled communities that such transitions and fictions are harmless and useful.

The danger of forcible annexation to the United States is probably less imminent than it appeared to be twenty years ago. The process by which Texas was first detached from the Mexican Republic, and then admitted into the American Union, seemed to admit of indefinite repetition. It was easy for American adventurers to settle in a sparsely inhabited foreign territory, and then to declare their independence; but one of the motives for acquiring Texas was the desire of extending the area of slavery, which for many years controlled the foreign policy of the United States. When California was added to the United States by an easy conquest, the Democrats and their Southern allies were disappointed by the refusal of the settlers to admit the institution of slavery. There is no longer any question of slavery between the United States and Mexico; and the vast territories which were acquired in the last war are still but thinly occupied. Prudent Americans fully understand that there is no room in their system for colonies or dependencies, and that their institutions, however convenient they may be for territorial expansion, are only suited to a tolerably homogeneous community. The Southern negroes, who have been but imperfectly assimilated, have no political tendencies except those which they copy from their neighbours and former masters. The Mexicans, on the other hand, if they were conquered, would be admitted into the Union with equal political rights, although their traditions and tendencies are those of Spaniards and of Catholics. The successful opposition which was offered to General GRANT's ill-judged project of annexing San Domingo was probably dictated by a wise reluctance to include in the Union an alien population. Six millions of Mexican citizens would be more unmanageable than a handful of island mulattoes. It is possible that the American Government may hereafter adopt the intermediate course of establishing a nominal or virtual protectorate in Mexico. The right of restraining adjacent anarchy is independent of international jurisprudence, and it is founded on an anterior national right. Having pre-emptorily forbidden the interference of Europe with the misgoverned States of the American continent, the predominant Power has assumed the responsibility of maintaining some kind of order in the Western world. The successor of JUAREZ will have the opportunity of proving whether foreign interference is necessary.

THE PRICE OF MEAT.

THE high price of meat is so serious an evil that wild and irrelevant projects for increasing the supply or diminishing the demand may be expected to receive a favourable hearing. To excited assemblages in the outskirts of Manchester the most obvious corrective appears to be the repeal of the Privy Council rules. Four thousand persons are said to have voted unanimously in favour of a resolution that the Government ought to abolish the restrictions on the importation of foreign cattle. About the same time Mr. FOSBELL had to answer anxious inquiries in the House of Commons as to the precautions which his department may be taking against the threatened reappearance of the fatal disease in England. The plague on this occasion is approaching from the Baltic; and cargoes of diseased cattle have been shipped to Leith, to Hartlepool, and to one or two other Eastern ports. The Privy Council is on its guard; and, although Mr. FOSBELL declines to prohibit importations from Holstein, he requires from the importer a guarantee, secured by a penalty of 1,000*l.*, that the cattle shall be really the produce of Holstein itself, and that they shall not merely have been landed in that country on their way from Cronstadt. The passionate demands of the Lancashire workmen would, if they were granted, have a suicidal effect. When a conflagration is raging in a city, it is a misfortune that it should be necessary to blow up buildings to leeward for the purpose of stopping the progress of the flames; but it would be a grievous error to be deterred from necessary measures of security by the protests of occupiers who fear to be left homeless. When the plague broke out in England five or six years ago, the best friends of the consumer of meat, as well as of the producer, were the local Associations which, in Aberdeenshire and in other districts, pre-emptorily stamped out the pestilence by the destruction of the infected cattle. The artisans of the towns may be excused for a suspicion that farmers and graziers on selfish grounds discourage foreign importation; but the public authorities have no more urgent duty than to prevent contagion which might convert dearth into famine. At one of the meetings the persons present pledged themselves to dispense with the use of butcher's meat for a month; and they also wished that Parliament should temporarily or permanently prohibit the consumption of veal and lamb. A further resolution that they would do their utmost to reduce the price of meat to 7*d.* per pound indicated a whimsical faith in the omnipotence of the popular will. Before public meetings were invested CAWRA's courtiers proposed that the King should regulate by his decrees the flow of the tide. An earlier and wiser age recognized the inutility of an endeavour on the part of the ox to kick against the goad. No resolution of any meeting will procure for 7*d.* what is worth 1*s.* 6*d.* in the market.

It is possible that general abstinence from the flesh of immature animals might for the time tend to reduce the price of beef and mutton; but artificial interference with productive industry is not the way to make commodities cheap. If Essex farmers were prohibited by law from selling calves to London butchers, they might perhaps take to growing grain crops rather than to fattening oxen for sale. The uneducated or half-educated mind, even in the home of Free-trade, invariably jumps to the conclusion that economic derangements ought to be rectified by arbitrary legislation. A rise in the price of mutton will discourage more effectively than any Act of Parliament the excessive consumption of lamb. It is undeniably true that the flesh of the grown-up animal is more palatable and more nutritious than when it is intercepted in its progress to maturity. A general strike against the butchers would have the effect of rendering meat both scarcer and dearer. The poor and struggling members of the trade would, if the strike were general, probably be obliged to relinquish the business, and their wealthier competitors would consequently find additional facility for recouping themselves for intermediate loss and inconvenience by an additional percentage on their prices. The further rise of price will be partially, but permanently, checked by the enforced frugality of the classes who will be compelled to diminish their consumption of meat. One of the most remarkable results of the manufacturing prosperity of the last five-and-twenty years has been the increased demand, not merely for butcher's meat, but for the most expensive joints, among highly-paid workmen. Artisans have, like other persons, an undoubted right to spend their incomes as they choose; and in many instances they have thought fit to convert high wages into nutritious dinners. During the same time the domestic supply of meat has been largely increased, not only by the maintenance of larger herds of stock, but by improvements in breeding and feeding which bring sheep and cattle earlier into the market. All restrictions, except for sanitary purposes, on the importation of cattle have long since been absolutely abolished; and the trade in dead meat, which has been rendered possible by the facilities of railway transit, has largely increased the available supply of the town population. Nevertheless the demand has advanced more rapidly than the supply, and the present dearth results partly from increased consumption, partly from the fall in the value of gold, and in some degree from the succession of hot and dry summers from 1867 to 1870. There is not the smallest use in passing votes of censure on natural operations.

It must be allowed that Manchester workmen are wiser than some members of Parliament, inasmuch as they attribute the evil of which they complain to a real though inadequate and unavoidable cause. The consumption of lamb and veal is a vera causa of the scarcity of mutton and beef. It is also true that restrictions on the importation of foreign cattle, though they may provide ample compensation for their direct operation, necessarily diminish the supply. Mr. JAMES HOWARD and Mr. WILKIN HOSKINS, when they take the opportunity of airing their favourite theories on land tenure, are more remote from the truth as to the price of meat than the mechanics who meet at Pendleton and Accrington. The state of public business fortunately prevented Mr. HOWARD from proceeding with a notice for inquiry into the relation between the high price of meat and the insecurity of the tenant farmers' capital; and Mr. WILKIN HOSKINS was not less happily rendered unable to show that fat cattle would be cheaper, if, according to the Irish precedent, a part of the property of the landowner were to be transferred by purchase to the occupier. Not a single beast in England is less fat, and not a single flock is less numerous, because the land belongs to the persons who have inherited or bought it, and not to the farmer who has contracted to occupy it. It is not true that the capital of tenant farmers is insecure; or, if any change in the legal tenure of land is expedient, the question ought to be dispassionately considered without reference to any accidental prejudice which may arise from the present state of the meat market. Mr. HOSKINS, as a skilful and scientific farmer, knows perfectly well that no power conferred on a tenant of purchasing an absolute interest in the land could tend to cheapen beef or mutton; and it is highly undesirable to suggest to irritated multitudes the erroneous belief that the condition of landed property has anything to do with their sufferings. The cultivation of antipathies between different classes is not likely to be neglected by professed agitators and demagogues. No popular orator will remind a public meeting of workmen that the body to which they belong is at the present moment busily engaged in exertions to increase the cost of all articles of consumption. It is true that Trade Unions have not yet caused a rise in the price of butcher's meat, but when their organization is adopted by farm-labourers, a new element will be introduced into the expense of all agricultural productions.

Some of the speakers at Pendleton spoke with reason of the rise in the price of coal as a grave misfortune, yet there was probably not a workman present who had not sympathized with the successful efforts of the colliers to obtain higher wages and shorter hours of labour. The additional payment has incidentally diminished the efficiency of labour; and the colliers themselves openly avow their intention of stinting the supply for the express purpose of keeping up prices. The artificial scarcity has raised the price not only of coal, but of iron, and of every fabric which is produced by steam power; and the iron-workers and other operatives in turn are demanding higher wages and shorter hours. Of the reckless gratification which dissatisfied workmen and demagogues derive from the injuries which they inflict on the community, a striking illustration was furnished at a recent meeting of malcontent railway servants. Mr. BAXTER LANGLEY, who presided, is reported to have boasted that there was in consequence of the partial strike a great block of goods on the London and North-Western Railway; and that many tons of perishable food had to be sent down to Willesden to be buried. The Secretary added that the Company had lost 70,000*l.* by the non-delivery of meat. If the railway freight formed a quarter of the whole price, it would follow, supposing the statement had been true, that two hundred and eighty thousand pounds' worth of butcher's meat had been destroyed in two or three days through the action of the railway servants. It is shocking to find that even an angry mob can applaud the waste of an amount of wholesome food which would have provided a day's consumption for the whole of London; and a still graver feeling is caused by the complicity of those who are not workmen, but possible candidates for metropolitan boroughs. Mr. BAXTER LANGLEY's satisfaction in the supposed burying of many tons of meat at Willesden may be commended to the attention of the workmen who met at Pendleton and Accrington. It happily appears from the statement of the Secretary of the London and North-Western Company that the railway servants and their advisers were misled by their too ardent wishes. When labour is engaged in a general conspiracy against consumers, it is not surprising that prices should rise.

FRANCE.

AS M. THIERS draws near to the safe haven of a prorogation, the storms which have lately been raging round him seem to die away. The season of the year has had something to do with this subsidence of the waters. A Legislature cannot declare that it has no confidence in the Executive, and then at once adjourn for three or four months. If it is bent upon taking the government out of the hands in which it is now placed, it must at least go on sitting until it has determined to whom the government shall be committed for the future. But to go on sitting during August and September involves a sacrifice of personal comfort which even patriots can hardly be expected to make. The obvious alternative is to allow the differences which have divided the Conservative party from the PRESIDENT to slumber until the return of winter makes life at Versailles again agreeable. A quarrel, it has been truly remarked, can be taken up at any time, but an autumn spent in political discussion is an autumn entirely lost. For the present, therefore, all thought of defining the Bordeaux compact has been given up. Considering the peculiar vagueness of the arrangement which goes by this name, nothing has been lost by this abandonment. The Bordeaux compact was not only an understanding which was never reduced to paper; it was an understanding the parties to which never went so far as to compare notes upon what it was they understood. It was a compact in the sense in which the cry of all hands to the pumps is a compact. The ship was sinking, and men of all parties laid aside their special views and placed themselves at M. THIERS's disposal, in order not to embarrass one another in the common effort to keep afloat. In so far as this compact is still existing, it is so from the continuance of the state of affairs which gave it birth. The indemnity has still to be paid off; the army of occupation has still to be got out of the country. Men of all parties have to choose now, as they had to choose then, between letting M. THIERS do the work and finding some one else to do it. If they were agreed upon the impossibility of the latter course in the spring of 1871, there is nothing to lead them to a different conclusion in the summer of 1872. It is true that a new orator has shown himself in the Assembly, and that many, perhaps a majority, of the deputies would be glad to see M. D'AUDIFFRET-PASQUIER President instead of M. THIERS. But it does not follow that even those in whom this feeling is strongest would like to see it reduced to action. M. D'AUDIFFRET-PASQUIER has not negotiated a loan of 140 millions which has been covered twelve times over. He does not command the confidence of moderate Republicans and the acquiescence of extreme Republicans. Even if he has the stuff to make a good party Minister, he would not be the accepted ruler of France. That the Bordeaux compact should ensure to the benefit of one or the other party in the country was inevitable; that it should ensure to the benefit of the party with whose name the existing Government is identified was highly probable. But unless the Republicans are unfairly in possession, the Right have no ground for complaint. A Government in possession must be strengthened by any understanding which leaves it in possession. If the Right wish to repudiate this interpretation of what took place at Bordeaux, their obvious course is to turn out the Government in possession. It is clear that they have abandoned all thought of doing this, and are going to enjoy the vacation with M. THIERS still firmly planted on their shoulders.

But if the Right have postponed their darling visions to the combined requirements of the weather and politics, they have taken care to show that they have learnt no more wisdom than was imperatively demanded by the day's requirements. In the sitting of Monday last they were just as excited and just as unreasonable as they were before they had determined to put up with M. THIERS from inability to provide him with a successor. The object of their attack was M. GAMBETTA, and the ground on which it was rested was his alleged participation in fraudulent contracts during the war. A certain M. NAQUET, a chemist of some eminence, but avowedly ignorant of military matters, was appointed a member of a Committee for studying the best means of defending the country. In this capacity he is charged with having advised the purchase of certain batteries at 75,000 francs each, when M. LECESNE, another agent of the Government, offered to get them for 35,000 francs. It is not denied that the larger of these two sums was given, or that M. LECESNE did assert that he could get the same guns for the smaller sum. But M. NAQUET and M. GAMBETTA both maintain that they had doubts whether M. LECESNE was sufficiently in earnest in the matter. He was too much of a man of business. He thought too much of the price at which weapons could be got, and too little of the paramount necessity of getting weapons at any price. M. GAMBETTA adds that he did not believe the tender of 35,000 francs to be serious, and consequently he was not disposed to waste precious time in higgling over it. This account of the affair is at all events perfectly reasonable. The one object which M. GAMBETTA and his subordinates had before their eyes was to go on fighting as hard and as long as they could. No doubt men administering affairs in this spirit would often be told by men of cooler temper that they were paying too much for the arms which they were buying on all sides. No doubt it would often be pointed out to them that, if they would only commission such or such a person to look out for a good bargain, he would be able to get as good arms as they were buying at less than half the price. It is only the old story—so familiar to every one who has ever furnished a house—that buying in a hurry means buying at a disadvantage; and that, if the purchaser will only wait until he sees a good opportunity, he will get a great deal more for his money. But M. GAMBETTA had no choice open to him. It was essential, if he was to buy at all, that he should buy in a hurry. To wait for a favourable opportunity would have been to wait until there was no object in buying either well or ill. He may have been wrong of course in appointing M. NAQUET a member of the Committee, and he and M. NAQUET may have been wrong in distrusting the energy of M. LECESNE. But these were at most errors of judgment, and there seems to be no evidence to sustain the conclusion, in itself so immensely improbable, that either one or the other had any corrupt motive for what they did.

Notwithstanding this, the Right have had the folly to treat the contracts made under the Government of National Defence as similar in kind to those made under the Empire. They have shut their eyes to the difference there is between contracts entered into in cold blood, when there was no immediate cause for haste, and contracts entered into in the very crisis of a war, when every moment had its value, and victory or defeat might turn upon the troops getting their arms a few hours sooner or later. Caution and comparison were duties in the former case, but they would have been crimes in the latter. The business of the War Department under the Empire was to get the largest possible return for the money voted, to make the French army all that those who paid for it intended and supposed it to be. The business of the War Department under the Government of National Defence was to get whatever return for their money they could get quickest, to make the French army not what those who paid for it wished it to be, but what it was possible to make it under the circumstances. No price that could have been asked for arms would have justified M. GAMBETTA in refusing to buy them so long as he had the money to pay for them, and there were none to be got cheaper in the same space of time. In their eagerness to involve the Republic in the disgrace which has overtaken the Empire, the Right have overlooked all this. They have cause enough to dislike and fear M. GAMBETTA, but they might at all events have had the wit to see that such blind hatred as theirs can only do him service. If they had declared that, in spite of much that was unintelligible to them in the contracts made by his authority, they declined to call him to account for what he had done in defending France against the invader, they might have gained credit for a patriotic superiority to party passion. But to class him with NAPOLEON III., as one of their speakers did on Monday, to say that now that justice had been done on the authors of the war it remained to do justice on those who continued the war, is to exhibit M. GAMBETTA to the country in the light in which he most desires to be seen. The peasantry and the soldiers know how M. GAMBETTA fought on to the last, how untiring was his resolution, how unceasing his energy. Above and beside all considerations of prudence and economy this great fact remains, and the Right could not possibly have done a worse thing for themselves than to formally dissociate themselves from all that was heroic in the war, and to make over to the Left whatever credit France has gained in Europe from the campaign on the Loire. A wiser spirit had watched over the preparation of the resolution upon which the debate turned. The Committee had simply proposed that their Report should be referred to the departments of Justice, War, and Finance, and this the whole Assembly could have supported. But M. d'AUDRIFFET-PASQUIER could not refrain from saying that this reference meant censure, though it expressed none, and upon this issue half the Assembly refused to vote. The most advanced Republican could not have wished the Session to end in a manner more disastrous for the Right, or more injurious to M. d'AUDRIFFET-PASQUIER's claim to the post of Conservative leader.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

THE Report of the Lords' Committee on the singular jurisdiction exercised by their House and by the Judicial Committee is more interesting as a contribution to the speculative literature of the subject than as the probable basis of any actual reform. There is unfortunately a sort of truth in the SOLICITOR-GENERAL's complaint that just now law reforms are certain to be elbowed out of existence by the pressure of political measures in which the public, or the party, or the Cabinet, take considerably more interest than they feel in the delays, expenses, and disappointments of appeals to the House of Lords. But this is not quite an exhaustive view of the subject, or we should never have any law reforms at all. In times of movement and of an almost revolutionary spirit such as those in which the traditional claims of the Irish Church and the hard rights of Irish landlords could be swept away at the bidding of a Minister, political questions are necessarily of a most absorbing character, and yet the chances of carrying a strong measure of legal reconstruction were incomparably greater than they are now that the so-called Conservative reaction has set in. Notwithstanding the rivalry of more exciting political changes, a more dexterous helmsman than the Lord Chancellor might have brought his cargo of law reforms safely into port on the crest of the wave which two years ago was big enough to roll over all petty obstacles; but Liberal fervour has greatly subsided, and what Mr. GLADSTONE calls progress and Mr. DISRAELI (out of office) calls subversion, sacrilege, confiscation, and the like, is decidedly out of fashion for the moment in legal as in other matters. The excitement involved in discussing useful Bills for regulating mines and abating nuisances can scarcely be so absorbing as to blind men who would otherwise be enthusiastic to the paramount importance of Law Reform. The real difficulty is that you never can get up sufficient interest in the public to make law Bills a good showy investment for a Ministry that desires popularity, except during those spasmodic periods through which our political world passes at intervals almost as regular as those which plunge the world of commerce into alternate fits of inflation and panic. There is no likelihood for some years to come of a favourable time for the establishment of large reforms in our judicature or our laws; and we doubt much whether the vis inertiae of Parliament would not be too much at present even for such rather petty modifications of existing anomalies as the Lords' Committee have recommended. And yet they would not be without their value, however much one may be disposed to smile at the highly conservative, though perhaps not wholly useless, instinct which led the Committee to frame a scheme under which the ghost of a sham House of Lords and the flavour of an extinct Committee of Privy Council would still be allowed to haunt the purlieus of an ordinary tribunal of paid Judges absolutely supreme over Peers and Privy Councillors alike.

The keenest reformers may be satisfied in this country if they get the realities they demand, though it may please the constituted authorities to pretend that they are conceding nothing. The first condition of any reform of the Appellate Courts is that the jurisdiction should be exercised by an adequate Court of adequately paid professional Judges, in place of the almost amateur judicial body which acts in the name of the House of Lords. In principle the Peers' Committee are prepared to accept this great change, but they stipulate that when the august Appellate Tribunal shall have pronounced judgment, the House of Lords shall be not only allowed, but required, to pretend that a decision with which they have had absolutely nothing to do, and which they are not to be suffered to alter in the minutest particular, is an order of their own House, and to ticket, and label, and docket, and enrol it accordingly, with all due solemnity. If learned and noble Lords like this kind of playing at being Judges, there is no reason why any one should object, and the project will of course satisfy and delight the strange typical Scotsman who is always quoted as incapable of believing that a paid lawyer will decide a case as well as an unpaid peer. Colonial aborigines will also be quite easy in their minds when they learn that the Judges of the new Court will first go through the mysterious ceremony of being constituted members of the Privy Council. All those parts of the proposal may be accepted as perfectly innocuous even by those who attach no importance to them; but the notion of summoning the members of the Court to the House of Lords, with an express prohibition to sit or vote as peers, may be highly distasteful to lawyers whose training would make them very reluctant to occupy a false position.

Apart from this elaborate trifling, the scheme is in its essence satisfactory except in one respect. It is proposed to constitute a tribunal by selection, so far as the paid members are concerned, from the ranks of the judicial body, and not from lawyers promoted solely for the purpose of giving a qualification. It is further proposed to offer salaries of 7,000*l.* a year, which will be sufficient, and not, we think, more than sufficient, to give the Government the pick of the Equity and Common Law Bench. So far the Lords are liberally disposed enough to avoid the rock on which the last Act came to grief. But there still remains a little blight of parsimony which would go far to shipwreck the whole scheme. The number of paid Judges is proposed to be limited to four, and the Court will have to do all the work hitherto done by the Judicial Committee, in addition to all that the House of Lords has despatched. Moreover the amount of this labour has up to the present time been kept down by the enormous and unjustifiable expense and delay which have frightened nine out of every ten suitors who have felt themselves aggrieved from resorting to the ultimate tribunal. Practically it is not the cases which involve the most important and disputed points of law that come, as they ought to come, before the House of Lords or the Privy Council, but just those where an enormous amount of money happens to be involved, or where the unsuccessful suitor below is exceptionally wealthy and litigious. If these obstacles to appeals were removed, it is probable that two Courts constantly sitting would be hard pressed to keep down arrears, or, in other words, the projected Court would always, or almost always, be compelled to sit in two divisions. For this purpose two Judges for each division would not be a satisfactory quota, even with the occasional aid of the Lord Chancellor; and to fill up the Court as is proposed with ex-Chancellors and Law Lords, sitting gratuitously, and perhaps grudgingly, beside salaried colleagues, will not be a desirable way of saving a few thousand pounds. The truth is that the system of gratuitous judging is going dead. Ex-Chancellors act as paid arbitrators in preference to sitting on House of Lords appeals, and no one blames them for preferring paid to unpaid service. There was something grand about the now moribund method of relying on the gratuitous patriotism of retired Judges for work which certainly deserves payment at least as much as any other form of public service; but now that this time-honoured practice is seen to be worn out, it seems to us idle to look to it for the purpose of supplementing the defects of a tribunal constituted on the opposite theory. If a paid tribunal is needed for the administration of justice in the last resort, it should be paid altogether, and, if so, the number of Judges must be more considerable than the Lords' Committee are willing to allow. This is a defect which may be easily remedied by adding three or four more salaries of 7,000*l.*; and if ever the proposals of the Committee find shape in a Bill, Parliament will have to consider whether this additional expense is too much to bear for the sake of establishing a thoroughly sound Court of Appeal. If the game is not thought worth the candle, the only alternative will be to go on with the existing arrangements long enough to make it so.

MR. CATACAZY AND THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT.

SOME months have passed since the American Government published a surprising and amusing account of the reasons which induced the PRESIDENT to demand the recall of the late Russian Minister. The offending diplomatist was accused of having interfered in the domestic politics of the United States, of having annoyed Senators and Representatives by his importunity, of having intrigued against the conclusion of the Treaty of Washington, and of having libelled the PRESIDENT and the SECRETARY OF STATE in the newspapers. It seemed strange that such charges, whether they were well founded or erroneous, should be made public; but it was satisfactory to be assured that the amenities of American diplomacy were not exclusively applied to intercourse with England. Although no political importance attaches to the transaction, those who are curious in the minor details of current history ought to complete their information by reading a French pamphlet in which Mr. CATACAZY gives his own version of his relations with the American Government. Some of his statements incidentally illustrate the spirit in which American claims against foreign Governments are habitually prosecuted, and the singular freedom of some American functionaries from European restraints. According to Mr. CATACAZY's account, a merchant captain named PERKINS had, during the Crimean war, formed a provisional contract, which was never executed, for the sale of a number of muskets to the Russian Government. He afterwards accepted in satisfaction of his claim a sum of 40*l.*, having attempted in vain previously to dispose of it for 20*l.* After the death of PERKINS his widow sold his supposed rights for a trifling sum to a lawyer named STEWART, who proceeded to form a Joint-Stock Company to pursue the claim, with a nominal capital of 160,000*l.*, furnishing a precedent for the recent enterprise of the Tichborne Bonds. It would be interesting to ascertain whether the more famous Alabama Claims have been subjected to a similar financial operation. The Government of the United States from time to time presented the claims of STEWART and his Company to the Russian Government and to its Minister at Washington, and finally they proposed to submit the question to arbitration. A Russian Committee of which Mr. CATACAZY was a member reported that the claims were baseless and fraudulent; and Prince GORTCHAKOFF consequently declined any further discussion of the matter. On Mr. CATACAZY's arrival at Washington he received a personal application from STEWART, and from his accredited agent, TASSISTRO. STEWART informed the Russian Minister that the PRESIDENT's brother-in-law, Judge DENT, was interested in the claim; and that, if they were refused satisfaction, the PERKINS party would "find means to break Mr. CATACAZY's neck." The phrase is not idiomatic; and yet it is difficult to assume that it can have been invented or imagined by a foreigner.

Some time afterwards the same Judge DENT who was said to be a shareholder in the PERKINS Company communicated to the PRESIDENT some spurious despatches which were supposed to have been exchanged between Mr. CATACAZY and General IGNATIEFF, who, according to a false rumour circulated in the newspapers, was believed to have succeeded Prince GORTCHAKOFF as Chancellor of the Empire. In these remarkable documents, which were evidently forged by some American ignorant of Russian forms, the EMPEROR was called by his own Envoy "our Czar," and the CHANCELLOR bore the title of Prime Minister. The principal despatch contained a rude reproof to Mr. CATACAZY for not having paid over a sum which was supposed to have been entrusted to him for the payment of the PERKINS claimants. Mr. HAMILTON FISH, with marvellous credulity, and in entire disregard of the irregular manner in which the documents must have been procured if they had been genuine, mentioned them to Mr. CATACAZY with the remark that they contained grave imputations on his character. On the indignant denial of the Russian Minister of the authenticity of the despatches, Mr. FISH refused to inquire into the origin of the fraud; and he afterwards asserted that the papers had been obtained from Mr. BODISCO, the Russian Secretary of Legation. It is unnecessary to add that Mr. BODISCO utterly denied the accusation; and it is surprising that Mr. FISH could have attributed to any Russian the absurdity of describing his Sovereign in an official despatch as "our Czar." There was no doubt that the papers had been handed to DENT by STEWART's associate TASSISTRO; and STEWART himself avowed in a published letter his complicity in the transaction. It is well known that the PRESIDENT is not lucky in his cousins and brothers-in-law; and if Judge DENT had been an American ARISTIDES, it seems strange that he should, without the privity of the SECRETARY OF STATE, be the medium of transmitting to the PRESIDENT documents which purported to have been taken by fraud or by theft from the archives of a Foreign Legation. Mr. SUMNER in his late speech denounced General GRANT as a would-be despot on less plausible grounds.

An episode now occurred which Mr. CATACAZY carefully verifies by a facsimile of Mr. HAMILTON FISH's letter. The Russian Minister had been directed to buy a site for the erection of an Orthodox church, and it happened that Mr. FISH had a piece of land which was, in the judgment of the owner, suitable for the purpose. In a friendly letter he proposed to sell the ground for 8,000*l.*, adding that by dispensing with the aid of a land agent they might save some hundreds of dollars. Mr. CATACAZY declined the offer, having, as he asserts, ascertained by a professional valuation that the land was not worth half of Mr. FISH's sanguine estimate. About the same time Mr. CASSIUS CLAY, formerly American Minister at St. Petersburg, wrote to Mr. CATACAZY to express his opinion that the PERKINS claims, which he had himself been instructed to urge upon the Russian Government, had not the smallest legal foundation. Mr. CLAY added that "the conduct of the business during eight years by the ex-Secretary of State, Mr. SEWARD, and his assistants did no honour to the American name." Mr. CLAY received his appointment from Mr. SEWARD, and served under him during the whole or the greater part of his term of office. That a diplomatic agent should publicly denounce to a foreigner the policy of his own immediate official superior is an American innovation on the practice of civilized States. This is the same Mr. CLAY who once informed Mr. SEWARD in a formal despatch that the Emperor of Russia had received him graciously and had conversed with him in "excellent American." It is not less characteristic of Mr. CATACAZY's correspondent that, after his appointment as Minister to Russia, he made a violent speech against England at a public meeting in Paris. In his reply to Mr. CLAY, Mr. CATACAZY judiciously guarded himself against the supposition that he might approve of the attack on Mr. SEWARD. His instructions from the BARRON were, as he says, to maintain friendly relations with ~~eminent~~ Americans of all parties; and he professes to have replied in the same spirit to a remonstrance addressed to him by Mr. FISH for maintaining friendly relations with Mr. SUMNER, who, as the SECRETARY OF STATE asserted, was "a bad man and a madman, and had lost his credit in the country." Mr. CATACAZY with perfect propriety replied that Mr. SUMNER was Chairman of the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs, and that he could not withhold from him the courtesies which were both officially and personally his due.

To the charge of having attempted to prevent the negotiation of the Washington Treaty Mr. CATACAZY offers a flat denial; and he explains his own conduct and the instructions of his Government by republishing an obviously genuine report, contained in a despatch to Prince GORTCHAKOFF, of a conversation with an American statesman, who may perhaps be Mr. HAMILTON FISH himself, on the PRESIDENT's offensive message to Congress in December 1869:—"Eh bien ! me dit 'M. X., 'que pensez-vous du Message concernant l'Angleterre ? 'Nous n'y sommes pas allés de main morte à l'égard de la 'superbe Albion. J'espère qu'on en sera content à Saint-Petersbourg, où l'on doit détester l'Angleterre autant que 'chez nous.'" In England statesmen in Parliament, at the Mansion House, and elsewhere, always affect to believe that the Americans reciprocate the friendly feeling which is in England both entertained and habitually expressed. Mr. FISH, or M. X., in his candid utterance of national hatred, only follows the precedents furnished by Mr. CALHOUN a generation ago, and by Mr. DALLAS on the eve of the Civil War. Only a year or two before the people of the Northern States were roused to indignation by the supposed absence of English sympathy, their Minister in an official despatch spoke of England as an enemy. Mr. CATACAZY, instead of approving of the language of the Message, remarked that the extravagance of the Alabama Claims proved even to those who were best disposed to the United States that the American Government was seeking, not compensation, but a ground of quarrel. "Yes," his interlocutor replied, "the amount of our bill is rather large, but it is good 'policy to ask too much that one may get enough." No comment which has been made on the Claims and on the subsequent negotiations is more just or more instructive. Mr. CATACAZY, after his experience of the PERKINS claims, was fully qualified to appreciate the elevated policy of the American Government. He proceeded to declare that the Russian Government detested no one, and that he believed that a conflict between England and the United States would be a calamity to the world. If Russian statesmen entertained less purely benevolent intentions, they would not proclaim their malignant designs with American candour. In answer to the despatch the CHANCELLOR of the EMPIRE communicated to the Minister his entire satisfaction with the language which he had used. Mr. CATACAZY of course repudiates the libellous articles which were imputed to him by Mr. FISH; and he produces letters from the editors of several journals to deny that he had ever communicated to them any private information. It is certain that the charges were not believed by the Russian Government; but it is unnecessary to enter into the quarrel between Mr. CATACAZY and Mr. FISH. The undisputed and collateral portions of his statements are to uninterested bystanders the most instructive.

THE ORLEANS FAMILY.

A GREAT blow has fallen on the ORLEANS family, and has struck with its main force the most eminent of living BOURBONS. The Duke of AUMALE has lost his only surviving son. Six years ago a sudden illness carried off his eldest son. Then his wife was taken from him; and now the one hope of his house has been taken away. The Duke of GUISE, a most promising boy of seventeen, has died of scarlet fever. It is impossible that such a calamity, happening to such a man as the Duke of AUMALE, should not have awakened the liveliest sympathy and regret. The QUEEN has written to claim the prerogative of suffering, and the right to weep with those who weep. She has suffered as a wife, and last winter was nearly suffering as a mother. She may therefore venture, not only as a Queen, but as a woman, to enter into the privacy of grief, and assure a sufferer that she suffers with him. Few men indeed have been more severely tried, or have led a more blameless or noble life, than the Duke of AUMALE. A childless widower, he can call to mind with mournful satisfaction that he was long the centre of family happiness. He devoted all the powers of his mind and the energy of his character to making his boys worthy of the high position to which they had been born. They might or might not be recalled from exile to honour in their country, from comparative obscurity to the discharge of high duties. He was determined that they should be equal to either fortune, and that they should at least be patterns of educated, high-minded French gentlemen. All that severe and assiduous and various training could do for them was done. They were made to work as if their fortunes depended on their exertions. Everything that princes could need to know in adverse or in prosperous circumstances was taught them. It has been suggested that they were perhaps a little over-trained, and that their early deaths may be in part attributed to the strain put on their constitution and their nerves. No one except those intimately acquainted with every detail of their family history can say whether this was so or not. But at any rate their training was but a part of the general training to which their generation of the ORLEANS family was subjected. The grandchildren of LOUIS-PHILIPPE have been all brought up with the notion sedulously wrought into their minds that they must strive to attain all the highest things that it was in them to attain. The heir of the ORLEANS family and his brother were trained as severely and as thoroughly as the sons of the Duke of AUMALE, and eagerly seized the first opportunity in their power to taste the experience of active life, and show themselves soldiers worthy of France. They offered their services to the armies of the Northern States in the American Civil War, and although some exception may justly be taken to such a course, and it is hard to see why French princes should help to kill Southern planters in order to learn the art of war, still it must be owned that they acted in accordance with the standard accepted by their countrymen, and were but learning the first art of gentlemen in the only way open to them. The younger members of the ORLEANS family are a highly educated, courageous, prudent, reflective set of young people, and cannot fail in some shape or other to be of great service to France, if France will but allow them. As to the older generation, the Duke of AUMALE is to English eyes their representative, and to Englishmen all praise of the Duke of AUMALE seems wholly superfluous.

The Duke, in the last few days of his mourning and sadness, is reported to have said that all ambition is now over for him, but that it will be found that he will never be deaf if his country calls on him to help her. This naturally suggests the thought, what is the place of the ORLEANS family in France, and what are the real services they can render her? A year and a half ago it seemed as if the best service they could render her would be to supply her with the machinery of Constitutional government. The Empire was at an end, Europe could not believe that France, even in its hour of depression, would sink so low as to welcome HENRY V. and his priests and his White Flag, and a Republic without Republicans seemed even for France an impossible sort of government. Something stable, something respectable, something more or less English seemed desirable, and the Count of PARIS and his near relatives appeared destined to furnish what was required. But time has rolled along, and a Parliamentary Government under an ORLEANS Prince was not found to have the attraction for France that had been anticipated. The Count of CHAMBORD would not hear of a fusion, and the Monarchists were split into two camps. The ORLEANS Princes were at once cautious and honourable, and would not risk civil war or even distraction and bitter jealousies in the country for the sake of dynastic gain. The Princes have, since they were admitted to take their places in the Assembly, carefully abstained from even the appearance of seeking to be prominent and to form a faction of their own. They scarcely ever speak, and even on important questions they often refrain from voting. If they do vote, they follow their own opinions, and agree or differ just as private gentlemen might do. In the important division a few days ago on the taxes on raw materials, the Prince of JOINVILLE voted with, and the Duke of AUMALE voted against, the Government. They have mixed themselves up with no party, and have allowed themselves to be the tools of no adventurers or partisans. Accepting the order of things which they find established, they have accepted it in all honesty without a thought of intrigue or a wish to control men and events to their profit. Their ambition has been the humble ambition to be quiet, honourable, and useful. At first they were despised and ridiculed for this. They were derided as adventurers who, having a throne open to them, feared to mount it. Gradually justice has been done them, and it has been recognized that they really meant what they said, and, being the first of Frenchmen, had no other wish than to be the first in doing service to France.

But it must be owned that it is not only the virtue, or forbearance, or tact of the ORLEANS Princes that has kept them in the background. It is clear that France, at any rate at present, does not want Parliamentary government or languish for a Constitutional king. To most Frenchmen such a régime seems a state of politics in which there is no fun, nothing to admire, nothing to take part in. The French like the two things to which Parliamentary government is most adverse—the development of what they call logical principles, the following out, that is, of ideas or prejudices without compromise, and personal government. They like the romance of Legitimism, and they like the romance of Republicanism. They also like to follow the fortunes and admire the audacity and success of the great THIERS and the great GAMBETTA, just as for twenty years they loved to sun themselves in the splendours of the Second Empire. The story of the triumph of M. THIERS over the Assembly is to them really interesting—a better story than is to be found in most novels. The steps by which the sou furieux of Bordeaux has raised himself to be the henchman of M. THIERS, and his probable successor, offer an interest scarcely less melodramatic. By the side of careers and incidents so glowing and full-coloured the mild wisdom of Orleanism and government by Ministries under the unseen presidency of a shadowy ruler seem pale and unattractive. The French, so far as appears at present, do not want the article which the ORLEANS Princes have to offer them. They would not care in their present excited state to open a second volume of the tame history of LOUIS-PHILIPPE. But to say this is not at all to say that the sons and grandsons of LOUIS-PHILIPPE are debarred from a career in which they may render very signal service to their country. What France needs above all things is healthy departmental action—contres, if the term may be allowed, of decentralization—men of honour, modesty, high feeling, and high training to lead local efforts and inspire local opinion. Both parties now declare that they must look to the meetings of the Councils-General in the autumn to show them what is the true feeling of France. The provinces are to speak through the leading men of the provinces, and any one who has read the recently published correspondence of TOCQUEVILLE will recognize that, even under the reign of equality, men who by birth, by possessions, by high character, and by sober patriotism are fitted to lead provincial opinion in France do lead it. Among such men the ORLEANS Princes, and especially the Duke of AUMALE, who is the President of a Council-General, are fitted to take the foremost place. It is there that they will reap the fruit of their entire honesty and of their acknowledged abstinence from all cabal and conspiracy. They are among the wealthiest, and, beyond rivalry, they are the highest born amongst Frenchmen. If, as seems best for France, a Conservative Republic is to be definitively established, they can do more than any other men to make this a Republic of a high type and worthy aims. This may not seem a very great part for the descendants of so many ancient kings to play; but it is an honest and a manly and a useful part; and if they play it well, they may, when each in their turn they shall be called on to tread the solemn path on which their young relative has just journeyed, find it as satisfactory a one to have played as any that could have been marked out for them.

MR. AYRTON AND DR. HOOKER.

THE question which has been raised as to Mr. AYRTON's treatment of Dr. HOOKER appears to have passed beyond the limits of a mere personal controversy. Mr. AYRTON's defence is substantially a plea of justification. He admits the accuracy of Dr. HOOKER's charges, but denies that they furnish any ground for complaint. This view has, to a certain extent, been endorsed by the Treasury, and presumably by the Cabinet, and it opens up a number of important points as to the relations which ought to subsist between Parliamentary officials and the permanent heads of departments, the right of the latter to protection against the rudeness or persecution of their political superiors, and the general etiquette and discipline of the public service. Mr. AYRTON boasts that since he has been in office he has "confined his writing to the exigencies of current public business, and desired to avoid using business for the purpose of writing." All his written communications have therefore been as brief as possible; but this description will hardly apply to his Memorandum on the management of Kew Gardens, which he has spun out with industrious elaboration, wrapping up the incidents of a few months in a voluminous historical narrative which extends over six or seven years, and burying the whole under a mass of odds and ends of correspondence, for the most part trivial and irrelevant, and without order, index, or explanation. A number of letters and memoranda are printed twice over, while other papers, which from the allusions made to them may be conjectured to be of some importance, are un-accountably omitted. Not content with plunging into the past, the First Commissioner also projects himself into the future, and speculates on the annexation of Kew as a kind of country house to South Kensington. It is difficult to imagine anything more wantonly unfair or unwarrantable than the introduction into this correspondence of Professor OWEN's letter controverting Dr. HOOKER's evidence before the Royal Commission on Scientific Instruction. Except on one supposition which we shall presently notice, the letter has nothing whatever to do with the questions between Mr. AYRTON and Dr. HOOKER, and the evidence to which it is a rejoinder will not, we suppose, be published for some time to come. Mr. AYRTON flatters himself that in this remarkable Memorandum he has "disentangled the science of botany and the art and practice of horticulture from occurrences which have happened in the course of business"; and it appears to him "easy to conduct the science of botany and the art of horticulture, without recurring again and again to little official omissions, whether they have arisen from haste, zeal, or inadvertence." Mr. AYRTON's opinion of market-gardeners is already known, and perhaps he is disposed to accept the definition of botany as the business of "attaching barbarous binomials to foreign weeds." In any case he is evidently surprised that the sort of people who grow or catalogue plants should require to be treated to any of the courtesies which are usual between gentlemen. He has already "abolished letter-writing, and substituted official memoranda" for the ordinary business of his office; and it would seem to be his ambition to strip official intercourse of everything in the nature of personal civility or respect. Orders are to be given in the sharpest and curtest form; and, above all, the heads of departments are to be kept in their places, and made to understand that "the First Commissioner cannot admit that the efficient maintenance of Kew Gardens, or of any other service under the department, depends upon the continued official employment of any one of its officers"; in other words, it is to be energetically and unceasingly impressed on them that they are mere ciphers in the administration of the department, and that any importance they may for the moment possess is altogether derived from their relation to the First Commissioner.

Mr. AYRTON seems to have started in his career at the Board of Works with a conviction that gardeners, architects, sculptors, and scientific and artistic people generally, all thought a great deal too much of themselves, and that it was necessary to take them down at every opportunity, and make them feel that they were really a very cheap and common article in the market, and could always be had in any quantity. In his eyes one botanist or architect is just as good as another, or perhaps better; the qualifications are not attached to the man, but are imparted by the holding of the office. He appears to have imagined that a First Commissioner had only to smile on a clerk of the works to make him an accomplished architect, and that he could at any moment hail a working gardener trundling his wheelbarrow, and set him, in his shirt sleeves, to discharge the functions of a skilled botanist and horticulturist. This is a favourite autocratic idea. NAPOLEON had the same trick. To show his generals that they were nobody and he was everybody, he would pick out a youngster from the ranks, give him sword, epaulets, and cocked hat, and make him a general as good as any of the rest. It is evident from the official correspondence which has just been published that Mr. AYRTON's policy at Kew, and probably elsewhere, was to play off one grade of officials against another, the Curator against the Director, and the gardeners against the Curator. He acknowledges that he went to the Curator, who is the Director's deputy, and the second in command, and proposed to place him in authority over his superior; and that he not only did this without communication with Dr. HOOKER, but expressly requested that it should not be mentioned to him. Mr. AYRTON says he imposed silence on the Curator because he himself intended to speak to the Director on the subject; but, in point of fact, he never did so. Lord DERBY said very truly that to any one accustomed to official life, we may say to any one accustomed to the courtesies and decencies of intercourse between gentlemen in any sphere, it is impossible to conceive a more singular violation of discipline and custom, or even of the commonest rules of fair play than is involved in this transaction. On another occasion Mr. AYRTON, without consultation with, or previous notice to, Dr. HOOKER, suddenly withdrew the Curator from Kew, where there was a great pressure of business, to attend to some work in London, altogether beyond the sphere of his duties. It was at once explained to Mr. AYRTON that the presence of the Curator at Kew was indispensable, and he was, after some sorry gram-bling and offensive insinuations, compelled to admit this and to cancel his order. It is needless to say that the First Commissioner was not weak enough to apologize either for his blunder or his rudeness.

While humbling the Director on the one hand, Mr. AYRTON took good care, on the other hand, that the Curator should not be unduly uplifted. The duties of this office are varied and numerous, and include the keeping of accounts, the custody of stores, a great deal of correspondence, and the direction of the foremen employed in the Gardens. The Curator found it impossible for him to be everywhere at once, and applied for an assistant, or, as he put it, "a henchman," to whom he could depute any part of his work when he was called off on other business. It is obvious that what he wanted was a kind of confidential private secretary, a young man with a fair education and of good address, with whom he could be on terms of personal intimacy, and who, knowing all the affairs of the office, could communicate in his absence with the Director or with important visitors at the Gardens. If the Director and Curator had been allowed to nominate a person for the office, as they desired, it would have been filled up at once. Mr. AYRTON insisted that it must be left to competition, the Civil Service Commissioners eagerly supported the idea, and the result was that an ignorant and inexperienced sub-gardener at Kew, who could not obtain testimonials from his immediate employers, the Director and Curator, and of whom the Director reported officially—"Writes indifferently, spells badly, incompetent to direct foremen in regard to stores; no preliminary education or training to fit him for the place; has never kept accounts, has never been in charge of stores, and cannot conduct a correspondence properly"—was forced upon the establishment, which could do absolutely nothing with him; and it was with difficulty that Mr. AYRTON, even after he saw his error, could be brought to give way, and allow a useless official to be removed. Mr. AYRTON's conceptions of economy may be gathered from his desire that a man worth 1*l.* a week should receive 200*l.* a year on the chance of his some day qualifying himself for the discharge of duties of which he confessed he knew nothing whatever. But then it would have been a great thing to show that any common gardener could do the work of the Director's deputy, and, if necessary, the Director's work too. It is admitted that Dr. HOOKER was superseded by the Director of Works in the management of the hot-water apparatus at Kew without any intimation or explanation being given to him on the subject. Mr. AYRTON pleads that the resolution of the Board on this point was so well known that it was unnecessary to notify it to the heads of departments; but it is obvious that public business would fall into utter confusion if it were to be conducted on assumptions of this kind. The letter in which the First Commissioner did at last condescend to inform Dr. HOOKER that the information as to his own jurisdiction which he had accidentally obtained from one of his subordinates was correct is a model of insolent curtness, and we can well understand that Lord DERBY when he first read it could hardly believe his eyes.

It is evident, on Mr. AYRTON's own showing, that Dr. HOOKER was treated with systematic rudeness and incivility, but it is unnecessary to assume that this was done in a spirit of deliberate persecution or with any intention of driving him from office. Mr. AYRTON's speculations as to the future of Kew do indeed disclose the hatching of another South Kensington conspiracy, and it is not improbable that COLE C.B. has already in view a modest friend who would not object to succeed Dr. HOOKER. We are reluctant, however, to believe that Mr. AYRTON was consciously promoting this scheme, although he could hardly have devised any measures better calculated to produce the desired vacancy than those which he adopted. Mr. AYRTON's conduct, outrageous and unjustifiable as it was, admits of a simpler explanation. Mr. AYRTON says he has no special ill-will towards Dr. HOOKER, and we see no reason to doubt this assurance. The arrogance, insolence, and utter want of consideration for the feelings of others under which Dr. HOOKER has been smarting are only "pretty Fanny's way." It appears that Mr. AYRTON habitually treats his political associates and superiors, as well as the House of Commons, with a cynical disregard of official discipline and personal courtesy; and Dr. HOOKER can hardly say he is much worse treated than the Treasury or the Cabinet. It will be remembered that Mr. AYRTON lately made a road across St. James's Park without taking the trouble to send in an estimate to the Treasury, and that after sending in an estimate he doubled and trebled it on his own authority. A few days ago he published a set of rules which he had drawn up for the Parks without apparently observing the formality of consulting the Cabinet on the subject, and he has since been compelled to cancel his autocratic project. In the Kew correspondence we find the Treasury repeatedly complaining that their recommendations are ignored, and that documents which are required by them in order to guide their decisions are either suppressed or communicated in a garbled form. It would appear that Mr. AYRTON is inspired by an ambition to put down not only "letter-writing," but good manners, and to reduce public business to the hard, naked elements of ~~order~~ commands and silent obedience. It seems to us impossible to acquit the Government of complicity in a policy which cannot fail, if persisted in, to exercise a disastrous influence on the zeal, harmony, and efficiency of the public service. In their minute of the 24th July the Treasury observe very justly that, while it is of course essential to maintain the superior authority of the First Commissioner, it is evident that this authority should be exercised with due regard to the feelings and position of the officers under him. They then go on to say that they gather from the First Commissioner's Memorandum that, "speaking generally," the business connected with Kew Gardens has been conducted in accordance with the views thus entertained by their Lordships. Most people, we imagine, who take the trouble to wade through this correspondence will be of a very different opinion. The subject is one which can be dealt with more effectually by the House of Commons than by the House of Lords, and it is to be hoped that some means will be found, if not of exacting an apology from Mr. AYRTON, or from the Government on his behalf, at least of protecting distinguished public servants from the kind of persecution to which Dr. HOOKER has for some time been subjected.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION AND UNIVERSAL SCHOOL BOARDS.

THE Report of the Committee of Council of Education for the year 1871 has been looked for with natural interest, as containing the record of the first year in which the Elementary Education Act has been in operation. Viewed in this light it is a disappointing volume. The educational year closes on the 31st of August, and the changes in the Education Department consequent on the passing of the Act were not completed until the following May. The Report only deals therefore with a period of four months, and during this time the department was principally busy in perfecting its machinery and in preparing the way for future work. Another year must pass away before it will be possible to form even an approximately accurate estimate of the effect of the Act. There is enough in this Report, however, to reassure any one who doubts whether the voluntary system might not have been made to supply the educational wants of the country. Assuming that in England and Wales the average daily attendance at efficient elementary schools ought to amount to about three millions, and that accommodation for this number of scholars should be considerably in excess of this average, a maximum attendance of about four millions has to be provided for. The existing voluntary schools meet rather more than half this need. There is room in them for something more than two millions of children. By the time that the last building grants have been paid accommodation will have been found for about three hundred thousand more. For the balance, amounting to about a million and a half, room will have to be provided by means of the Act. It is highly improbable that voluntary effort would have achieved so much had it not been for the stimulus supplied by the hope of escaping a School Board; and it may therefore be taken for granted that the work which remains to be done would have been left undone if the Act had not been passed.

Although the Report itself gives but little information as to how the Act is working, some useful data are furnished by the Reports of the eight senior Inspectors, which are printed in the appendix. The most valuable of these perhaps is one by Mr. BOWSTEAD, on schools inspected in the county of Gloucester. That district contains a very various population, agricultural and manufacturing. In 1871 only three School Boards had been set up, and Mr. BOWSTEAD reports that throughout the county there exists the strongest possible desire to supply all deficiencies by means of voluntary effort. The main cause of this dislike to School Boards is the dislike to local rates. There are important places in Gloucestershire, says the Inspector, where the people are anxious for the spread of elementary education, anxious that this education should be dissociated from any particular religious body, and convinced that a School Board would give them the amount and the kind of education which they want for their children. But when they see that a School Board entails the imposition of a new rate, they prefer to do without it. "Even when they would be willing to accept the rate for themselves, they shrink from the unpopularity of fastening it upon their neighbours." As regards the mere provision of schools this state of things is far from unsatisfactory. There is much to be said for voluntary effort over compulsory rating as a means of raising the necessary funds, and if Gloucestershire has really set its heart upon making voluntary effort do all or nearly all the work, it is far from impossible that, in point of educational position, the county may eventually be in advance of some in which School Boards have been generally established. But a difficulty will arise whenever any steps are taken to make compulsory attendance universal. Mr. FORSTER has almost promised that something shall be done in this direction next year, and there seems no way of doing it except by the universal establishment of School Boards. If in every parish children are to be made to go to school, there must in every parish be some one charged with the duty of making them go. Mr. BOWSTEAD says that in his district the notion of compulsion is not in itself unpopular. "On the contrary, there is among school managers, both lay and clerical, a very strong desire to be armed with the powers conferred upon School Boards by the recent statute." It has all along been clear that, in proportion as the accommodation in voluntary schools came nearer to the number of children within the school age, the feeling in favour of compulsion would increase. No managers like to have built or enlarged their school until there is room in it for every poor child in the parish, and then to find that half the benches are left empty because the children who ought to fill them are either sent to work or kept at home. It is obviously impossible that any body of managers should be armed with powers of enforcing attendance at their own schools. Such powers must be entrusted to a public authority of some kind, and the appropriate authority for the purpose is a School Board. Yet if School Boards are made universal, and the school rate which is their inevitable accompaniment is universally imposed, the promoters of voluntary schools will feel that they have been deceived. In 1870, they will say, you pass an Act which virtually gives to each district the option of doing without a School Board, provided that it makes the necessary effort to supply the requisite school accommodation in another way. The effort is made, and the requisite school accommodation provided on the faith that no School Board will be set up. In 1873 you pass a law providing that School Boards shall be set up everywhere. It makes no difference to the final course of the School Board will that in our own children to go to our school, instead of providing another school for them to go to. The ground of our opposition to School Boards is financial, and even if they do nothing more than drive children to school, there must be a paid staff, and a rate to raise the money to pay it. There is great reason to fear that if this issue is clearly put to the constituencies, the dislike to increased local taxation will be strong enough to make any measure which involves it hopelessly unpopular. The country may reject compulsory school attendance if it is associated with a compulsory school rate.

This difficulty might perhaps be got over in some such way as this. It is assumed that in a given parish full school accommodation has been provided by voluntary effort, and that there is no difficulty in maintaining and working the schools so established. Why should not the expenses of the School Board, so long as it exists for no other purpose than the enforcement of school attendance, be paid out of the Parliamentary grant? Such a payment would not operate as an encouragement to local inertness; on the contrary, no district could claim it unless there had been a great effort of local liberality, and a determination to go on making similar efforts. The moment that the provision of school accommodation fell below the required amount, the Education Department would step in and insist on the deficiency being remedied by the School Board. The title to the special payment out of the Parliamentary grant would immediately become void, and a school rate would have to be levied. The expense of maintaining a School Board for this sole purpose would not be great, and it would only be thrown on Imperial taxation in cases where a sum equivalent to a considerable local rate had already been raised. It is true that, if the population were very poor, a large number of school fees might, as the Act now stands, have to be paid by the School Board, and that if the money thus spent were provided by Parliament, and not by the particular locality, there would be no check on injudicious liberality. But this objection seems in a fair way to be met by another process. The proceedings of the London School Board on Wednesday showed what a strong and growing sense there is of the impossibility of drawing a distinction between one sort of parental inability and another. The law—on the theory that compulsion is universally introduced—will say to every parent, You must supply your children with a certain necessary minimum of food, clothing, and instruction. If he pleads inability to supply his child with food or clothing, he is declared to be a pauper, and either taken into the workhouse or relieved under surveillance at his own home. If he pleads inability to supply his children with instruction, a School Board interposes, and provides either a school to which he can send his children without payment, or the money to pay for their attendance at a voluntary school. There is no meaning in this distinction, and there may easily be a great deal of mischief in it. As this comes to be more clearly seen, the feeling in favour of leaving the question of a parent's ability to pay for his children's schooling to be determined by the same persons who are charged with determining his ability to pay for their bread and butter, cannot fail to increase. The simple solution of the difficulty is to make over this part of the work of a School Board to the Guardians of the poor. The School Board will then report to the Guardians that such and such persons have not sent their children to school, and that they allege themselves to be unable to pay the school fees. The Guardians would then investigate the truth of this statement, just as they would investigate any ordinary application for relief, and would either pay the fees out of the poor-rate or take measures to force the parent to pay them. Either way the burden would not fall on the School Board.

THE SESSION.

THE Session, which was expected to be a stormy one, and not improbably fatal to the Ministry, has proved an unusually quiet one, and leaves the Ministry to all appearance firmly seated in office. This remarkable falsification of sinister prophecies has been the result of a variety of causes, among which the conduct of the Ministry itself deserves to hold a conspicuous place. The Government has brought in and managed to carry a great number of important measures. A Session may be considered more than ordinarily productive of serious legislation which has seen the introduction and passing of the Ballot Bill, the Scotch Education Bill, the Licensing, Public Health, and Mines Regulation Bills. The scheme for the reorganization of the army proposed by Mr. Cardwell was generally welcomed as adequate and well conceived; and the Government has sedulously refrained from risking failure by attempting impracticable measures. The Ballot Bill received important modifications and improvements from the Lords, and the Government not only accepted them, but was willing to go further in the path of concession than the Commons would permit. The Licensing Bill is a small measure, and the Public Health Bill is only a bit of a Bill; but both are worth having, and it is to the credit of the Government that what could be got was not lost through pique or inconsiderate ambition. The saving of the Washington Treaty probably saved the Government that was responsible for it, and there went as much luck as wit to the fortunate issue of a troublesome affair; but Mr. Gladstone and Lord Granville are entitled to the praise of having never despaired, and of having indefatigably tried everything rather than own themselves beaten. Public events also contributed to allay the fever of political strife. The recent illness of the Prince of Wales, the universal interest awakened by the solemnities of the day of thanksgiving, the shock caused by the assassination of Lord Mayo, the general peace prevailing in Europe, and the feeling that, in view of new combinations of labour, the industry and the social relations of England are entering on a phase of which no one dreamt a twelvemonth ago, have all combined to indispose men to see in the political world merely an arena for badgering Ministers and upsetting Governments. The appointment of Lord Northbrook and Lord Dufferin showed that the Government had merit at its command which it was prepared to recognise; and in its peremptory refusal to annul the remaining Fenians, in its resistance to Mr. Fawcett's Bill, and in its treatment of the alleged grievances springing out of the Education Act, the Government showed a firmness in which it had formerly been deficient. The Opposition too has shown itself exceedingly moderate. Mr. Disraeli out of the House has had the amusement of describing the Ministry as looking like a set of extinct volcanoes, and of stigmatising the party that supports them as cosmopolitan and not national. But during the long delay of the Treaty negotiations, though, as Lord Granville said, he sat watching Mr. Gladstone like a cat, yet he held his tongue, and gave an example of patience and forbearance which added to his own reputation for statesmanship and stifled the burning indignation of his followers. Both parties too were equally averse to the prospect of an immediate dissolution, and this, of all the causes that have operated in favour of the Government, has probably been the most powerful. The Conservatives, cheered as they were at the outset of the Session by the West Riding election, did not wish to shake the spear before it was ripe, and Liberals whose seats were in danger did not like to relinquish the prize they had won.

The strength of this feeling was strikingly exhibited at the beginning of the Session. As soon as the Address had been voted, and the new Speaker installed in office, the great Collier scandal absorbed the attention of Parliament. The Government had really no defence, and on the principle of abusing the plaintiff's attorney when there is no case, the Duke of Argyll was betrayed into a coarseness and wildness of abuse of Chief Justice Cockburn for which he was afterwards forced to apologize. The Chancellor spoke with some dignity, and with such evidence that his conduct, however mistaken, had been honest, that the feeling sprang up that he should be censured severely enough to show what was thought of what he had done, and not severely enough to make his continuance in office impossible. This was done in the neatest possible way in the Lords by what would have been an equal division had he not given himself a majority of one by voting in his own favour. In the Commons nothing but the dread of upsetting the Ministry prevented an adverse vote. After the crushing speech of Mr. Denman, the more independent Liberals recognized that the question was not whether the Government could be defended, but whether it was to be kept in office, however wrong it might have been. A bare and poor majority of twenty-seven decided that conscience did not require them to face a dissolution, and the Conservatives were equally pleased at finding their rivals kept in office, and at finding them humiliated by the nearness to defeat. After the Collier case was over, the Ewaine case, which somewhat resembled it, was easily disposed of. Mr. Gladstone had evaded by a subtlety carrying out the intentions of Parliament in the previous year; but if the House of Commons would not face a dissolution in order to maintain the judicial honour of one of its highest Courts of Appeal, it was not likely to incur the danger because there had been something wrong in the appointment of an Oxfordshire parson. It also deserves to be noted that Mr. Gladstone honestly owned that he would never have made the Collier appointment if he had known how much agitation it would provoke. He had had a lesson, and was willing to profit by it, and throughout the remainder of the Session he has carefully abstained from that high-handed indifference to the decisions and wishes of Parliament in which he indulged while he conceived himself to be lifted above all other authorities by the worship of the people.

When Parliament met, the shadow of the Indirect Claims was lowering over the horizon. The Ministry was believed to have viewed this serious danger with extraordinary apathy, and it subsequently transpired that for a month the Cabinet had taken no notice of a grave and unexpected attack on the interests of the nation. Stimulated, however, by the unanimous voice of public opinion, they inserted a paragraph in the Queen's Speech stating that Her Majesty had not understood these claims to be within the scope of the Treaty, and had represented this to the American Government. When the Address was being debated Lord Granville prudently confined himself to a description of the increase in his sufferings from gout which the monstrous audacity of the American Claims had caused him, while Mr. Gladstone nearly made all further negotiation impossible by declaring that his interpretation of the Treaty, by which the Indirect Claims were excluded, was the only one a rational man could entertain. There was nothing to be done but to wait for the American reply, which arrived in the middle of March, and was to the effect that the Indirect Claims, to which the American Government did not attach any extravagant value, were within the scope of the Treaty, and the American Government would be glad to hear why the English Government thought they were not. This opened the door for further negotiations or correspondence; but meanwhile, the 15th of April, when the English Counter Case was to be put in, was rapidly approaching, and Parliament anxiously inquired how the Government proposed to meet this difficulty. The Government announced that it intended to put in the Counter Case, but with a reservation of all rights in case the parties to the Treaty did not agree as to its scope. This was done; but it soon became known that the American Government would not give way, and the Treaty seemed destined to be set aside, when at the beginning of May the Government assumed a tone of confidence, and expressed a firm belief that the Treaty would be saved. Although the negotiations between the two Governments were supposed to be conducted with perfect secrecy, the enterprise of the American press was always sufficient to find out everything that was going on, and the enterprise of the English press was always sufficient to publish at the earliest moment all that was discovered in America. Long, therefore, before an official announcement to that effect was made in Parliament, it became known that the supposed new path of safety lay in the adoption of a Supplementary Treaty which Lord Granville, at the invitation of General Schenck, had sketched out, and which was to provide that, in return for England accepting new rules barring her from urging such claims in the future, the American Government was not to bring the Indirect Claims it had made before the Arbitrators. This was no doubt the intention of Lord Granville, but as soon as the enterprise of the press had published the draft of the new Treaty, it was discovered that the Treaty did not provide for this, but merely provided that no further American claims of the sort should be made. In a word, through an oversight, the Indirect Claims already before the Arbitrators were not to be withdrawn. England, therefore, was to lose after all the point on which she had insisted, and the moment seemed to have arrived when Lord Russell, who had long been threatening the Government with an adverse motion in the House of Lords, might properly bring it on. Accordingly there was a great debate in the Upper House on June 4, in which Lord Derby expressed a doubt whether the Americans had not right on their side; Lord Cairns upheld the American Claims with all the power of a practised advocate; Lord Salisbury condemned recourse to arbitration altogether; Lord Russell stated that when in office he had been abused by the Americans like a pickpocket; and the Government speakers had little to say, except that the proper course was to let the negotiations be finished first and then turn out the Government if necessary. It seemed as if nothing could prevent a hostile vote; but when the Peers met on the 6th for the adjourned debate, Lord Granville had the satisfaction of producing a letter from General Schenck, stating that he had Mr. Fish's authority for saying that the American Government would look on the Indirect Claims made in its Case as at an end if the Treaty were concluded. The Lords ceased to discuss a point which was no longer open to discussion, and as it was known that a large majority of the American Senate was willing to adopt the Treaty, it seemed as if all controversy was at an end. At the eleventh hour a new and insuperable difficulty arose. The Senate had, it turned out, adopted the Treaty, but with modifications introducing such a dangerous vagueness into the wording of the new rules by which England was to be bound, that the English Government could not proceed further with the negotiation. The Treaty seemed dead, but the English Government sent its representatives to Geneva on June 15 to see what might happen, instructing them not to present the final document necessary to complete the English Case. It also asked, but the demand was refused by the American Government, for a joint application to the Arbitrators to adjourn for eight months, that the Supplementary Treaty might be further discussed. All seemed to be over, when suddenly things took a new turn. The Arbitrators themselves came forward and said that, apart from the Treaty, the Indirect Claims could not be entertained according to any known rules of international law. The American Government professed itself satisfied with this exposition of general principles, and withdrew the Indirect Claims. The English Government put in its final document and the arbitration went on. This conclusion of a most unpleasant business was delightful to the Government and satisfactory to the nation, although this satisfaction was unavoidably damped by the discovery that the Ministry had agreed to pay Canada in the shape of a Railway guarantee for England's not having ventured to press on the American Government its claims for the Fenian raids.

The Ballot Bill was the main Bill of the Session, and the vicissitudes of its history were many and great. Very little interest was excited by it at first, and only 160 members were present when it passed the second reading; but in the middle of April a great fight arose over it on the proposal of Mr. Leatham to punish a voter who showed his voting-paper. Mr. Forster had got up the Bill in a very careless manner, and the Government, both on this important point and on that of the hours when the polls should close, wavered and doubted, and had no clear opinion. They decided, however, to support Mr. Leatham, but were beaten by a majority of one, and on challenging a repetition of this vote on a subsequent day the majority against them had increased to twenty-eight. They were also beaten by a majority of nearly a hundred when they supported a proposal to throw the expenses of elections on the rates, and they were forced against their will to adopt a machinery by which illiterate voters might have their votes recorded for them openly. Ultimately they got the Bill through in a shape by no means unsatisfactory on the whole, more especially as it at least did one good thing, by putting an end to the scandal and tumults of nomination days. The Bill passed the third reading on May 30, and on June 10 was read a second time in the Lords, the Duke of Richmond announcing that he thought so much ought to be conceded in deference to the Commons, but that he should entirely alter the Bill in Committee. The wisdom of this course was questioned at the time, and especially by Lord Salisbury, who urged with unanswerable force that it would be much more straightforward to reject the Bill altogether than to let it nominally pass the second reading and then cut it to pieces. The Duke of Richmond, however, persevered, and on the 17th persuaded the Lords to sanction an extraordinary scheme for an optional Ballot, which united every possible disadvantage both of open and secret voting. The Lords made one improvement in the Bill by introducing provisions for a scrutiny; and they also made a change which, after weighing its advantages and disadvantages, may be pronounced beneficial, by limiting the duration of the Act to eight years. The Peers had been unusually vehement and excited during the one evening in which they introduced these and other minor alterations into the Bill, and it was evident that the Conservative leaders had occupied with unseemly haste a thoroughly false position by committing themselves to the absurd plan of an optional Ballot. It was of course at once rejected when the amendments of the Lords came to be considered by the Commons; but the provisions for a scrutiny, with some necessary improvements, and also the limitation of the duration of the Act, were accepted, while it was only by the business of the House that amendments favoured by the Government for depriving candidates of the use of schools as polling-places, and for introducing a mischievous variation in the hours of closing the poll at different seasons of the year, were ultimately rejected. One or two minor matters, such as the mode of making the declaration of incapacity to be exacted from illiterate voters, had to be adjusted, but the Lords forbore from any further serious opposition, owing to the good sense of a majority which was large enough, in face of the persistence of the Conservative leaders, to rescind the vote in favour of the optional Ballot. The measure then became law, being acknowledged to be an experiment to be tried for eight years, but so shaped that it may be expected that the experiment will be made fairly and completely; and it will thus be seen whether the wish of the present constituencies, a wish manifested by the absence of all opposition and by the return of Conservatives pledged to the Ballot, rather than by any enthusiasm in favour of the Bill, is justified by the event.

The Government was freely and constantly accused by its opponents of throwing away the whole time of the Session in order to get its own way on a vexed question of politics like the Ballot, while it left all measures for the real welfare of the people to take their chance. This reproach was by no means justified. Mr. Cardwell's army scheme provided with care and completeness for the localization of the army and the construction of the regular and reserve forces into a whole. For almost the first time for many years it seemed as if we were to have an army costly, but worth its cost, and the House would not listen to Mr. Harcourt's motion echoing the terms in which a long time ago Mr. Stansfeld had tried to impose on the Government of the day some limitation of its military expenses. Unfortunately Mr. Cardwell deferred until a late period of the Session the measure by which the cost of building the necessary accommodation for a localized army was to be defrayed, and although Mr. Lowe explained that he proposed to take the money out of the Exchequer balances, and so no pecuniary difficulty existed, it was open to the opponents of all army expenditure to throw obstacles in the way of the Bill which kept it back for a time. The navy has excited little attention, and the Report of the Megara Commission has had no other apparent effect than one more transformation of the governing body at the Admiralty, by which three secretaries are to secure that every letter is signed by some responsible person, and the Board is to meet every day. Mr. Goschen, however, defended himself with success against the charge made by Lord Clarence Paget outside the House, that it was the parsimony of the Government in the matter of coal that had led to the recent losses of ironclads; he announced, to the satisfaction of the profession, the intended conversion of Greenwich Hospital into a Naval College; and he showed at the end of the Session that he was ready to do his best to meet the views of Mr. Graves as to manning the navy; while a motion to reduce the Estimates by the salary of the First Lord gave Mr. Gladstone an opportunity of defending that strange, but perhaps salutary, part of Parliamentary institutions which places a great and highly technical profession under the almost exclusive control of a man who knows nothing whatever about it. The Budget, again, if so commonplace as to be transparently without any interest for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was yet so far satisfactory that it released the payers of income-tax from the extra twopence thrown on them last year, and extended the exemption in favour of the poorer classes of contributors. Whether the reduction of the duty on coffee by one half is of any benefit to the consumer remains yet to be proved; but at any rate the Budget was a proof, if any were needed, that, in Mr. Gladstone's words, British industry is proceeding, not by steps but strides, not by strides but by leaps and bounds; and Mr. Lowe, if he could not pretend to care for his Budget, has at least had a little triumph of his own, and has carried his Chancery Funds Bill, which will help him towards reducing the National Debt by his favourite method of Terminable Annuities.

The Government has, however, not only escaped from the military and financial pitfalls into which it fell last year, but its minor measures of social improvement have been successful and not unimportant. The Scotch Education Act is an improvement on the English Act in so far as it makes education more compulsory, while casting on the Poor Law authorities the duty of saying what parents are too poor to pay fees, and, perhaps, in so far as it allows denominational instruction to be illustrated by the use of the formularies to which denominations cling. The Bill was nearly swamped through a motion accidentally carried by Mr. Gordon, the effect of which would have been to take away the religious freedom which characterizes the English Act. But the decision of the House was subsequently reversed by a considerable majority, and nothing has remained of Mr. Gordon's motion but the insertion by the Lords of a few vague and unnecessary words into the preamble; while the Government have justifiably resisted the attempt to create a Scotch Board permanently independent of Parliamentary control. The Mines Regulation Bill has done much to improve the position of women and children in mining districts, to prevent accidents, and to provide for competent inspection; and the controversy as to the responsibility of owners was decided by enacting that they should not be held responsible if they have done all that they could do generally to prevent accidents by due publication of the rules accepted. The Licensing Bill was not calculated to please the ascetics on either side; but it will lessen the time in which drink can be sold, will place the trade under strict control, and will, by the reservation of an ultimate authority to the Secretary of State, tend to prevent the arbitrary and accidental character of decisions on application for licences. The Public Health Bill has been shorn of all the clauses which gave health authorities increased authority; but it will be of decided use in vesting in the Town Councils and Boards of Guardians the power to act and the duty of acting. Some opposition was raised to even this modified measure at first; but when Mr. Stansfeld had yielded so far to the defenders of local rates as to engage that half the expense of the medical officers appointed under the Act should be borne by the Consolidated Fund, Mr. Disraeli came to his rescue, declared that the Bill ought to pass, and speeded it on its way to the Lords. The Government also passed a Parks Bill of which perhaps their friends will, if they are wise, not say too much. Mr. Harcourt opposed it as a piece of Algerine legislation, and as an infraction of Magna Charta. He seemed to be opposing it in vain; but the Government thought it better to make things pleasant to him and his few supporters by conceding that the public should have the right of meeting in the London Parks, and that the regulations for the Parks should be submitted to Parliament before taking effect. Until we see how it is worked it is impossible to say whether the Parks will be any the better or worse for the Bill. Of course, if the Government has had its successes, it has had its failures too, although the magnitude of the former exceeds that of the latter. It had to massacre many innocents, and its Bill for the Enclosure of Commons was strangled in the Lords. It provoked the House of Commons into throwing over its Bill for dealing with the Thames Embankment, although the House might have done much better if it had accepted the issue which the Government offered, and negatived the Ministerial proposal. The controversy between Mr. Ayrton and Dr. Hooker once more brought into strong light the dictatorial and offensive mode in which one department of Government is administered; and the Chancellor altogether broke down in a feeble and ill-considered scheme to get the Lords to give up their appellate jurisdiction. In the whole region of Law Reform the Government has totally and avowedly collapsed. The Chancellor is utterly unable to cope with such critics as Lord Cairns and Lord Westbury, and when towards the end of the Session Mr. Harcourt sketched a scheme of Law Reform which had at least the merit of being comprehensive and harmonious, the Attorney- and Solicitor-General united in declaring that they had nothing, and would have nothing, to do with Law Reform, that the law did not need reforming, and that even if it did, the Government could not carry any measure of reform, and was not going to bother itself with such futilities. Thus one of the most fertile and promising fields of social improvement has been altogether abandoned by the Liberals, and remains open and free for their Conservative successors.

Early in the Session there was some discussion of proposals to change the rules of the House of Commons so as to facilitate the despatch of public business. Nothing, however, came of the discussion, except that Monday nights were absolutely given up to the Government, and no doubt this change has been very useful, and has enabled the Government to do more than it otherwise could have done. But at the end of the Session some private members, and especially Mr. Newdegate, complained of the diminishing importance and opportunities accorded to them in Parliament, and a sort of murmur was heard that the Government has now too much its own way, and that private members can do nothing. Nothing, on the contrary, is more striking when the history of a Session is studied in detail than the great variety of questions on which private members find ample opportunity of expressing themselves; and this Session has certainly been no exception. It is not of course often that the Bills of private members are carried through. Mr. Henry James carried a Bill for Preventing Corrupt Practices at Municipal Elections, while the Government could find no time for its own Corrupt Practices Bill; and a Bill has been passed at the instigation of private members for the protection of different kinds of British birds, which was chiefly remarkable for giving occasion to Mr. Bruce to indulge in a pretty piece of poetical description about it at the Mansion House. But it is in points that are not pushed so far as a Bill that the power of private members to determine and control the conduct of Government is most visible. The most conspicuous instance this Session was Sir Massey Lopes's resolution as to local taxation, which was carried against the Government by a majority of a hundred, and has forced them to promise to take up the subject in earnest next Session. But this was not all. The Government was forced to add an English pension to the Indian pension of Lady Mayo, and Lord Hartington at least took advantage of a discussion on a Bill for the purchase of Irish Railways to announce that the Government would be inclined to buy them if the shareholders would take a fair price. Lord Granard was made to resign his Lord-Lieutenancy under the pressure of questions raised by his indiscreet denunciation of Mr. Justice Keogh's Galway judgment. The hands of the Government were strengthened in dealing with the slave trade in Eastern Africa by a discussion in the House of Lords, and Lord Abinger actually carried a motion for an address to the Queen asking that a change contemplated by Mr. Cardwell of introducing the rank of major into the Scientific Corps should be indefinitely delayed. The address did no good to those whom it was intended to benefit, the rivals in the line of the Scientific Corps; the Ministry made the Queen reply that the change could not be delayed; but at least Lord Abinger had the satisfaction of getting what he thought a grievance perhaps even more than amply discussed. Private members have in some instances been even too powerful this Session, as when Sir Robert Peel and Sir Charles Adderley buried a scheme for disposing of the drainage of Birmingham which had received the sanction of a Committee, on the avowed ground that they did not like it as private landowners. The important subject of Railway Amalgamation has been relegated to a Committee which has occupied almost the whole of the Session in its labours, and which has at least prevented this subject of great social importance being settled either by the Government or by the Railway interest. It was also on the motion of a private member that the exciting topic of Mr. Justice Keogh's judgment was discussed. Mr. Butt tried his best to plead the cause of his friends the priests, but all his arguments were more than demolished by the vigorous speech of Mr. Henry James, the most rising unofficial member of the Liberal party. The Government did not do themselves much credit on the occasion. They announced that they were going to prosecute a Bishop, some twenty priests, and the brothers Nolan. But they tried hard to make out that they were bound by law to prosecute, so that the priests might regard them as allies forced by official duty to act adversely; and although the whole Government force was thrown into the overwhelming majority against the adjournment of the debate which virtually decided the main issue, yet the Attorney-General, to whom the defence of the Government was left, took very good care to say nothing more than that the judgment was legally correct. Mr. Matthews in the course of the debate told a bitter truth when he said that the main cause of the arrogance and lawlessness of the Irish priests was that Liberal Governments never dared to look them boldly in the face, and resent their spirit of aggression.

Private members do not always succeed, but still they have their say. Even Sir Charles Dilke had his say with his pitiful cheeseparing Republicanism and attack on the Civil List; an incident of the Session which unfortunately turned to the discredit, rather than the credit, of the House of Commons, and led to a scene of folly and anarchy and uproar which would have disgraced the worst Convention of the worst Republic. The English House of Commons, the greatest assemblage of free men in the world, has also its moments when it shows that it too is but human, and sinks to the level of the smallest. Happily such hours of madness are rare, and we can afford to forget them. The list of subjects on which the Government has this Session been, as it were, put on its defence, and made to declare its mind, speaks well for the vigilance of the House of Commons. Legal education, the legal expenses of Governor Eyre, the course taken by the Indian Government with regard to the Bank of Bombay, the question whether Persia should be regarded as within the sphere of Indian or English diplomacy, the advisableness of Parliament playing the part of the American Senate and controlling negotiations, the worth of treaty guarantees, the desirableness of marking the wickedness of races by not adjourning over the Derby Day, and the irrepressible Claimant and the great problem whether the public interests demand that six counsel should combine to prosecute him, all came under review, and the Government had to announce and justify the course it proposed to take with regard to each. Perhaps Mr. Fawcett's strictures on the duties and payment of law officers deserve to be noticed separately, for it is certainly a serious question for the nation what is the real value of illegal arrangements when it is told that the Attorney and Solicitor-General have nothing whatever to do with the improvement of the law, and that everything is made to depend on the humours and powers of the Chancellor. There has, too, been an abundance of effort on the part of private members to carry on legislation on their own account, and the amplest opportunity has been given for at least gaining notoriety in this way for the views of private members, and taking the sense of the House and of the country in regard to them. Mr. Fawcett's Bill for the reconstitution of the University of Dublin was much the most memorable example of this, and as it passed the second reading Mr. Gladstone, or some of his subordinates, first sounded a wild note of alarm in a Ministerial paper, and then stated that he could not hold office if the control of measures regulating Irish education was taken out of his hands. The portion of the Bill repealing Tests he was willing to support, but he must split the Bill in two, and would oppose the part for reorganizing the governing body of the University. He would not even lend any help to the subject being discussed, and as Mr. Fawcett's Bill manifestly did not carry out the object at which it professed to aim, it was silently buried with general assent. The minor subjects on which members with varying degrees of wisdom or the reverse attempted to legislate were numerous and various. Lord Buckhurst tried to protect acrobats by a Bill which unfortunately was so framed as to include sailors and jockeys, and had to be abandoned. Philosophical Liberals like Mr. Trevelyan and Mr. Morrison sketched out improved plans of extended franchise and electoral districts. Lord Albemarle endeavoured to do away with the special qualifications for Justices of the Peace. The familiar Bill for legalizing marriages with the sisters of deceased wives got as far as a second reading, and then disappeared; while the Burial Bill got this year within sight of a Committee, when it was smothered by what its author denounced as an unhandsome artifice. Women's Suffrage had its turn, and it fared badly, several deserters from its cause being conspicuous, and one or two gallant Liberals declaring that they had found that the ladies were really against it, and that they must bow to their decision. The time of the House at the busiest part of the closing weeks of the Session was occupied or wasted by a purely theoretical discussion on the proposal to abolish Capital Punishment. Perhaps of all the small measures which came to nothing, but which under happier circumstances may command attention among the most really valuable, was the proposal made by Mr. Fowler in the Lower, and by Lord Salisbury in the Upper, House to give tenants for life increased powers of improving cottage property. But it is impossible that Parliament should attend to all the good suggestions made to it. Something is gained if some of the bad suggestions are disposed of, if the Government is called to account in cases of doubt, and if a fair amount of tolerably good legislation is attained. Parliament has come up to this level in the Session now closing; and more need not be demanded until a change comes for which things are not yet ripe, and Parliament, in order to remedy the mischief which gives the only justification for the cry of Home Rule, eases itself of a part of the excessive burden which it chooses to lay on its shoulders, and which it is equally unable to carry and unwilling to drop.

A FRENCH MORALIST.

M. ALEXANDRE DUMAS filis is one of those writers who are the wonder and the despair of their British rivals. Not long ago he surprised us all by setting himself up as a moral censor; by way of corollary he straightway brought out a play which to the dull perception of insular critics appears to be scandalously immoral; and he has now published a book, already in its seventh edition, which is so strange a mixture of morality and immorality that we shrink from the effort of finding any accurate classification for it in our clumsy language. The epithets which occur to us most naturally all seem too harsh and positive for the purpose. Will M. Taine, or somebody of equal omniscience, explain to us how it comes to pass that an Englishman is reduced to such hopeless perplexity in presence of these marvellous productions of French art? It is not, at least so we flatter ourselves, that the French fancy is essentially lighter, or the French perception more acute, than our own. Certainly M. Dumas's book is full of what we should call gross faults of taste, logic, and morality. But that is the very wonder. By some mysterious sleight of hand he mingles his incongruous materials, covers them with a light froth of epigram, adds a dash or two of cynical acid, and a touch of sentimental sweetness, and the whole when served up is so crisp, fresh, and sparkling that we almost fancy for a moment that it shows real genius. When we try to look closer, it must be admitted that the illusion disappears. We begin even to fancy that M. Dumas has really very little to say, and that that little is not very original, although he has played so many tricks with his truisms that they have a superficial resemblance to paradoxes. It is, however, not easy for a British mind to follow satisfactorily the windings of an argument which is composed partly of the ordinary sentimentalism of a French novel, partly of queer fragments of stray science and philosophy, and partly, as one might fancy, of reminiscences of a sermon delivered by some preacher of Dean Stanley's school, or what is known as unsectarian Christianity. Or perhaps it would be a more probable hypothesis that the author of the Dame aux Camélias has lately been studying a Catholic bishop on feminine education, the reports of the late Dubourg case, the Bible, and Balzac's Physiologie du Mariage, and endeavoured to combine his information. Bewildering as we have admitted the final result to be, we are inclined to think that the influence of Balzac is more strongly marked than that of the other authorities. M. Dumas, however, has that happy art of a certain school of French writers which somehow or other gives to the most undeniable morality, apparently preached straight out of the Gospels, a certain flavour of indelicacy. In one sense it is doubtless a great triumph of literary skill to make an apology for virtue fully as piquant as a defence of vice.

The text on which M. Dumas discourses is a simple one. He discusses, à propos of the Dubourg incident, the delicate problem whether a husband ought to pardon or to kill an unfaithful wife. It seems that he has been considering this question for the last five or six years, and that his next play, to be called La Femme de Claude, will turn upon it. Meanwhile, as a friend of his has taken up the more merciful view in an article published in Le Sûr, M. Dumas discusses the philosophy of the whole subject, and explains his reasons for coming to the opposite conclusion. An Englishman would perhaps have thought that some mean might be discovered between the two extremes; but the English, we know, are an illogical people, and given to accept compromises. An Englishman, indeed, has the alternative of divorce, which, as M. Dumas tells us, is indispensable under the conditions of modern society. But then the Roman Catholic Church objects to divorce; and the Church has unanswerable reasons to allege from its own point of view. Here, then, we seem to be landed in a hopeless difficulty, which M. Dumas does not attempt to clear up. Meanwhile let us endeavour to expound his theory, so far as the obtuseness of our language and our intellect will allow us. First we must understand what is the position and character of woman. That is a tolerably wide question, and the greater part of the male sex is altogether too coarse in its perceptions really to understand it. Those, however, who have studied the works of recent French novelists, and especially of their great master Balzac, may perhaps be sufficiently initiated to understand M. Dumas's views. Woman, if she belongs to the superior type, is at present a cunning slave, who really rules when she seems to obey. Man fancies that his superior strength, physical and moral, will give him the superiority in marriage. He deceives himself. As soon as a woman becomes a mother, she has the best of the position. She takes advantage of her weakness to extort concessions from her ruler. The doctrine of the supporters of woman's rights is a miserable delusion. Make woman a free competitor with man in masculine tasks, and she, as naturally the weakest, will infallibly get the worst of it. But marriage, and her consequent position as ruler of the domestic circle, places in her hand weapons which she well knows how to turn to account. The bargain is really to her advantage altogether. She is the mistress of the man's honour, and can do as she pleases by the help of a little feminine diplomacy. And then she has a terrible ally in the priest. The priest is her confidant and her director in matters too holy for the husband's interference. Free-thinkers will never be able to detach woman from her allegiance to the Church; and the Church seeks constantly to increase the feminine at the expense of the masculine element in religion, and to render it more exclusively the worship of the Virgin—the deification of woman. God, man, and woman, says M. Dumas in a queer mystical phrase, are the sides of the eternal triangle. At present, God and woman are in tacit alliance against man. When proper harmony is restored, the world will be at peace, and heaven and earth will be united. But how is this to be done? That is the great question, and unfortunately it is one to which we obtain no very clear answer.

We have, however, a brief sketch of sacred history according to M. Dumas's version. We cannot follow him into his remarkable interpretation of particular texts, and of the meaning of the fall and the redemption of mankind. The great misfortune for the human race, as other commentators have observed, was that man listened to the voice of the woman and thereby abdicated his proper position. The proper harmony was disturbed, and woman became independent, especially when she became the mother of Cain. Cain, as we know, took a wife, for whose existence it is not altogether easy to account, and was thus the progenitor of an inferior race of women, who unfortunately are represented pretty numerously at the present day. The great saying in the Gospels is the phrase, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" That woman, as interpreted by M. Dumas, that the order disturbed by the serpent is to be re-established, and that man is to take his proper place as the mediator between woman and the Deity. This explanation of the "admirable Biblical tradition" delights M. Dumas so much, that he bursts out into a most edifying gush of orthodoxy, and gives us a whole page of emphatic exclamations. M. Dumas, it is obvious, can quote Scripture to some purpose. Finally, having worked himself up to the proper state of unction, he delivers an address to an imaginary son at the age of twenty-one. This young gentleman is the recipient of a quantity of exemplary morality: he is directed to marry an excellent woman if he can find one; to become her guide, philosopher, and friend; to direct her without governing her arbitrarily; to have as many children as possible; to make her understand the sanctity of maternity, and to qualify her to be at once father and mother to his children if he should happen to die prematurely. He is to make her understand life, which is very simple; and to explain death, which is very easy when one has lived well. Thus he will be able to do without the priest, whom our ignorance, and not our credulity, as Voltaire would have it, has made indispensable; and the three sides of the eternal triangle will be found. All which may be very admirable as advice; though, like much other advice, it seems to reduce itself to this—that if we were all perfect, the world would be much better off. However, it is possible that even M. Dumas's imaginary hero may make a mistake. He may find that he has married an unworthy woman, who dishonours him and deserts his family. In this case, he is to declare himself her judge and executioner in the name of his Master. She is not a true woman, but a mere animal, a descendant of the accursed race of Cain—There is! That is M. Dumas's last word, and one may admit that it is tolerably decisive. In England the youngest Dumas would have afterwards to go through disagreeable explanations with a judge and jury. In France we presume that he might count upon a verdict of extenuating circumstances, and would go free with the applause of his fellow-citizens. He might set up for a writer of novels and a preacher of elevated morality, and might endeavour to find a second wife who should not belong to the accursed race of Cain.

To criticize this nonsense seriously would be too absurd; and we suspect that M. Dumas would be the first to laugh at us for taking his irony too seriously, though we must confess that we should find it rather hard to distinguish between the serious and the sarcastic. It is the beauty of this style of writing that it is impossible to grasp any definite meaning except on pain of rendering oneself ridiculous. However, without arguing, we will venture a remark or two such as suggest themselves to a prosaic British mind. Although it is the fashion at the present moment to consider that, because the French were beaten by the Prussians, everything French is essentially corrupt, we must begin by saying that we do not believe for a moment that the ideal woman of the French novelists is anything like a fair representative of the Frenchwoman of real life. Assuming, however, that the portrait drawn by them satisfies a certain tone of sentiment prevalent in a section of French society, M. Dumas's preaching illustrates the unhealthy state of the moral atmosphere which inevitably results. Any virtuous priest, says M. Dumas, understands women far better than the most experienced Don Juan. We should add that there is another person who understands them still better—namely, the man of thoroughly healthy mind, who has not sought his knowledge either in the confessional or by less legitimate methods. If women have to choose, as M. Dumas seems to think, between a morbid asceticism which condemns all natural instincts on the one hand, and a profound brutality, thinly covered with social polish, on the other, we can only pity them, and must certainly approve their choice of the first alternative. Still the sentiment, as indicated by M. Dumas too plainly for us to follow him, is radically unhealthy in both cases. The normal husband, as he represents him, is a Don Juan submitting to the respectabilities for pecuniary or other motives; and the priest is a narrow-minded bigot who regards the conventual as the only true virtues, and tries, by acting upon feminine superstition, to convert every woman into a nun. If sentiment varies between these opposite poles, and oscillates between pure animalism and pure asceticism, we must certainly admit that both the husband and the priest are in great need of reform. There is a higher and better type of woman, in France and elsewhere, though it is probable that the type thus described is not uncommon where the Roman Catholic religion is acting on a corrupt society. The result then seems to be, that the only difference between moral and immoral preaching is that the one panders indirectly, and the other directly, to the tastes of a prurient imagination.

THE LIVINGSTONE MYSTERY.

THE letter of the President of the Geographical Society helps to explain the present position of the Livingstone mystery. Up to Wednesday not a single letter from the Doctor had reached the Society, either directly or indirectly through the Foreign Office. The President had, however, an opportunity of perusing a batch of despatches from Dr. Kirk, enclosing copies of letters addressed to him by Dr. Livingstone; but these letters are devoid not only of geographical information, but of any particulars as to the Doctor's own condition and proceedings, and refer exclusively to the alleged misconduct of the parties employed in conveying supplies during the last three years from the coast to the interior. Other letters, the posting of which had been delayed, have since come to hand, and are said to be full of similar complaints, although in one of them the Doctor, in his delight at exchanging the patent leather "abominations" to which he had been reduced for a pair of stout leather boots, proclaims an amnesty to all the world. It appears that Dr. Livingstone is under the impression that he has been very badly used by his old friend Dr. Kirk and by others of his countrymen, his only information on the subject being presumably derived from Mr. Stanley. We gather that the letters to Dr. Kirk, like all other letters hitherto known to have been written by Livingstone, are extremely brief and of the most matter-of-fact character. In his preface to his first book of travels he remarked that literary composition was so laborious and painful to him that he would rather go through all his journeys once more than write another book. It would seem, however, if we may accept as genuine two letters purporting to be addressed by Livingstone to the proprietor of the New York Herald, that several years' seclusion in the deserts of Africa, and complete isolation from civilized society have imparted a novel fluency to his pen, and have enabled him to cultivate what is called fine writing with remarkable success. It is not stated whether the letters published by the New York Herald are in Livingstone's own handwriting, or whether they were dictated by him to Mr. Stanley. It would seem that Livingstone has profited by his residence in the heart of Africa to acquire a considerable familiarity with American literature and slang, and to hit off the racy, sub-erotic flavour of the New York Herald with conspicuous success. Unfortunately the fragmentary geographical notices which are contained in these letters are, as Sir H. Rawlinson puts it, "too vague" in their present shape to admit of useful scientific discussion. Indeed they contain at least one statement which is obviously and even glaringly inaccurate, and which it is odd that so cautious and careful a geographer as the Doctor should have permitted himself to make. Sir Henry remarks that the theory ascribed to Dr. Livingstone in the second of these letters of a connexion between the great line of drainage which he has traced from twelve degrees south, and the Bahr-el-Ghazal, or Petherick's Western Nile, is simply impossible. The German traveller Schweinfurth has visited the watershed from which the sources of the Bahr-el-Ghazal descend, and it is very little south of the parallel of Gondokoro. It would appear that the river system which Livingstone is said to have followed up to a point in about latitude four degrees south, and longitude twenty-five degrees east, must either empty itself into the south-west corner of Baker's Lake, or must be the upper course of the Congo. Anybody who will take the trouble to consult a map of Africa on which the latest results of exploration have been laid down cannot fail to agree with the President of the Geographical Society, that as far from the Nile question being settled, as was so confidently announced, the solution of the problem is more perplexing and uncertain than ever, if the statements in these letters can be relied on. Mr. Stanley, who is now in London, will probably not object to afford the officers of the Geographical Society an opportunity of inspecting any of Livingstone's manuscripts which he may have in his possession; and when the British Association meets in the course of the next fortnight at Brighton we shall no doubt hear something more on the subject.

Dr. Livingstone is described by Mr. Stanley as being, when he parted from him, "fleshy and stoutish," with an enormous appetite, and weighing, by conjecture, for the Doctor refused to go into the scales, about one hundred and eighty pounds. The letters to the New York Herald which have been published under, or as the Americans would say over, his name, would seem to show that he is in good spirits, and has developed among the savages of Africa a taste for what may be called the gay side of life, which is perhaps somewhat odd in an elderly Scotch missionary. There can be no doubt that the sort of letters he has written will be much more to the taste of the Herald's readers in New York than dry geographical details such as would have gratified Sir H. Rawlinson, or old Sir Roderick if he had been alive. Indeed the writer apologizes at the outset for supposing that those whom he is addressing are akin to the old lady who relished the paper only when it contained "good racy bloody murders." We are treated to a strong dose of the horrors of the slave trade, enlivened by some comic touches, and warm passages about the voluptuous beauty of African Venuses. That the slave trade is a "gross outrage of the common law of mankind," and "presents innumerable obstacles to intercourse between the different portions of the human family," and that it is "partly owing to human cupidity, and partly to ignorance among the more civilized of mankind of the blight which lights chiefly on the more degraded," are no doubt observations which are excellent in themselves, but they are hardly worth fetching all the way from the interior of Africa. It is also true that "piracy on the high seas was once as common as slave-trading is now," and it might be added, on the authority of Mr. F.'s aunt, that there are, or used to be, mile-stones on the Dover Road. The extraordinary thing is, that these letters tell us so little about Livingstone himself, or about the tribes among whom he has latterly been sojourning, and are made up of stale talk about the familiar atrocities of slavery. We are asked to distinguish between the negroes of the West Coast, brutalized by a long course of slavery and rum, and the robust and manly population of the interior. It is suggested that if a comparison were instituted between the Manyema taken at random and the members of the Anthropological Society, all clad alike in kilts of grass cloth, the savages would certainly not be pronounced, in appearance at least, the inferior race. Baudelaire would have sympathized with the Doctor's raptures over the black women. He is quite gushing about "the dears" and "hussies," with their "charming black eyes," "nicely rounded limbs," and "fine, warm brown skins" tattooed all over. Chzembe's Queen would, we are assured, be esteemed a real beauty either in London, Paris, or New York, notwithstanding the hole she has drilled in the tip of her "fine, slightly aquiline nose." Livingstone in one of his letters to Sir R. Murchison, received in 1869, said he sometimes doubted whether he should have allowed his enthusiasm for geographical research to draw him away from the mission of putting down the slave-trade, to which he had intended to devote himself, and there can be no doubt of his profound and earnest abhorrence of this iniquitous traffic. If the language of the letters now published is not exactly that to which we have been accustomed in the Doctor's brief, prosaic communications, the sentiments and opinions which are expressed on this subject may at least be recognized as his. There is probably some ground for the complaints which are made of the Danians as the chief promoters of the slave trade, and of the cruelties of which they are guilty; and the subject will no doubt receive the attention of the Consular authorities.

The Doctor's first letter to the Herald is more in his usual style, and free from the romantic extravagance of the second. It is impossible to imagine anything more startling and bewildering to a man in his position than the sudden appearance of an American newspaper reporter at the head of an expedition which had been organized to search for him. There can be no doubt that Mr. Stanley and his employer are entitled to the fullest credit for the enterprise they have displayed in this affair. Mr. Stanley had had a little experience of Abyssinian travelling, but he knew nothing of the interior of Southern Africa, nothing of the languages, customs, and ways of managing the natives. He plunged into the desert with his life in his hands, and the chances of his ever returning alive were altogether against him. It is strange to find the simple, unquestioning devotion and loyalty of the "Dougal Cratur" turning up in a newspaper Correspondent of our own day. Mr. Stanley evidently knows nothing and cares nothing about geographical research. Till his employer suggested the idea of going to seek Livingstone, he had probably never given two thoughts to his existence. He went to Africa to find the Doctor if possible, but that was only a secondary object—a means to an end; the object was to glorify the New York Herald, to give it something to swagger and brag about, and to make the world talk of it. Mr. Stanley has accomplished a difficult and courageous task, but it is unfortunate that so little should have come of it. We are told that Livingstone was alive and well in the middle of last March, and had received part of the supplies purchased by Dr. Kirk out of the Government grant of 1,000*l.*; and that is the sum of the whole story. Anything may have happened since then; and there appear to be grave doubts whether the stores provided out of the funds of the Search and Relief Expedition will ever reach their destination. Lieutenant Dawson, who went out in command of this expedition, is now in America, and it would be premature to judge his conduct until we have his explanations. But it is impossible not to regret the hasty abandonment of the enterprise. The theory suggested in one of Dr. Kirk's letters, that Livingstone would have resented the appearance of the Expedition as poachers on his manor and rival aspirants for the geographical laurels he has made sure of winning for himself, appears to us to be childish and absurd. It was important that personal communication should be established with the veteran explorer, and that it should be made quite certain that he got the supplies collected for him; and if, when the Expedition arrived, he did not choose to take the members of it with him on any of his journeys, they would naturally respect his wishes. As it is, the stores have been sent on under an Arab leader, of whom "energy," or, in other words, we suppose, courage and good faith, reasonable doubts appear to be entertained. If the Expedition had gone on, they would not have had the credit of bringing the first news of Livingstone, but they would have fulfilled the important mission with which they were entrusted, of succouring Livingstone and affording him such assistance as he required. The simplicity and directness of Mr. Stanley's proceedings contrast favourably with the dawdling and dallying, the doubts, vacillation, and petty squabbles of the English Expedition. There seems to have been as much signing of papers as if they had been going before a Vice-Chancellor instead of into the heart of Africa. A leader who cannot keep his men in order except with documents is not likely to do great things. It is unfortunate that the Expedition should have been given up; but if, as Sir H. Rawlinson hints, a new one may be required, it is to be hoped it will be composed of explorers less addicted to personal differences and to the signing of documents. Meanwhile it is just possible that the next news we shall hear of Livingstone may come from Sir S. Baker, who is working from the north towards him with a strong force.

FULDA.

IT needs a certain effort of the imagination to call up the idea of a Prince-Abbot, and a Prince-Abbot too still living and reigning in times which seem not so very far removed from our own. A Prince-Bishop is strange enough; still the episcopal function carries with it a certain notion of jurisdiction and authority which may easily enlarge its borders from spiritual into temporal matters. Of the Prince-Bishop too we have among ourselves a certain shadow in the Lord-Bishop, and forty years back the Palatines of Durham and Ely had not quite lost all pretensions to the higher title. In short the secular clergy, high and low, must abide in the world; discharging duties which are at least closely akin to those of government, they have in all times and places slipped very easily into the actual exercise of temporal power. The thing has seemed to have no such very great incongruity about it, whether it has taken the form of a parish priest sitting as a justice in Petty Sessions, of a Bishop giving his vote in the House of Lords, or of a Primate of Mainz holding the first place in the election of Kings, and acting as the Arch-Chancellor of the Holy Roman Empire throughout the Kingdom of Germany. We might even go a step further, but we are afraid of getting on too dangerous ground. Some people may in all ages have disapproved of the particular instances which we have chosen, but we are not aware that the temporal functions either of the parson, the Bishop, or the Primate-Elector, have ever been formally declared to be the mark of the beast. But when we move from the secular clergy to the regular, the holding of temporal functions becomes clothed with far greater incongruity. The secular priest lives in the world to look after other men's souls; so the transition is not so very amazing if he is also set to do something in the way of looking after their bodies. But the theory of the monastic life is that the monk has nothing to do with either the souls or the bodies of other people, but that he goes out of the world to look after his own soul. It seems the strangest turning about of things that a man who has thus gone out of the world to look after his own soul should, by virtue of having so done, be called back into the world to look after both the souls and the bodies of other people. Yet such has been the case in different degrees in every place where the monastic system has taken deep root. The monks have been both better and worse than their profession. In the earliest and best stage of monasticism in every Western country, the monks, instead of shutting themselves up in a selfish care for their own souls, everywhere proved the greatest of benefactors to all around them. They were, yet more than the secular clergy, not only the spiritual instructors, but the temporal civilizers, of their neighbours and converts. It was they who reclaimed the wild land; it was they who taught arts to the wild people; it was they who, somewhat later, systematically preserved the annals of past times. Through some of the best of the mediæval historians belonged to the secular clergy, yet it was only among the monks, as at our own St. Alban's, that there grew up a kind of schools of the prophets which handed on the torch from one generation to another. Yet it is plain that in all these good works the monks were doing something beyond their own proper duty as monks. They were doing something beyond prayer and contemplation, beyond even the widest interpretation of almsdeeds. Indeed, almsdeeds might seem inconsistent with the perfection of monastic virtue, for almsdeeds imply worldly goods on the part of the almsgiver, and the true monk ought in strictness to have no worldly goods at all. But the strict carrying out of the rule of poverty was in its own nature impossible. Even monks needed food, raiment, and shelter; but a hovel, a gown, and a loaf of bread are just as much property as palaces and great estates. The doctrine that, though each monk in his own person could hold nothing, yet the society might hold whatever it could lawfully get, easily paved the way for such odd results as that of a man who had gone out of the world to take heed to his own soul becoming thereby one of the temporal princes of the earth. The monastic society could not get on without property; land was the almost only available form of property; and land almost everywhere carried with it more or less of something like temporal dominion. In a country where the central power was strong, the temporal dominion of the monastic body might not go beyond such rights and powers as were involved in the mere lordship of a manor. But in a country where the central power was weak, where every landowner, every city, every free community, had a tendency to grow into a sovereign prince or commonwealth, monasteries followed the general law. The monk had by the necessity of the case become a landlord; from a landlord he gradually grew into a sovereign. The change was strange, but it was natural, perhaps under the circumstances it was unavoidable, by which the lowly missionary planted by St. Boniface on the banks of the Fulda grew into the Abbott, Prince of the Holy Roman Empire, and Chancellor to the Empress, and Primate throughout all Germany and Gaul.

It may be doubted whether this last dignity, carefully recorded on the tombs and the works of the Abbots of Fulda of the eighteenth century, carried with it at that time any very burdensome duties, or whether it would have met with much practical acknowledgment in any part of Gaul except that which was also part of Germany. Then it is as well to bear in mind that, down to the general crush of all things, there was still a Dur Francia at Würzburg, and that both at Prier and at Fulda the Empire still had its Chancellor for its provinces of Gaul. But, before all such things were swept away, a change had come over Fulda, and we may even be tempted to say that the place had lost its special characteristic. In the course of the last century the ecclesiastical princes of Fulda seem to have been tired of being simply Abbots in their own church, and of being driven, if they wished to assume, not only the episcopal garb, but the full episcopal character, to seek it in some imaginary bishopric in some distant part of the world. Thus one of the Abbots of that time bears on his tomb the further title of Bishop of Themiskyra. The choice of the see was perhaps not inappropriate. The Chancellor of the Empress—Dia Augusta, as she appears in the legend—might not unfitly hold a bishopric whose see lay among the Amazons. But soon afterwards the strictly abbatial succession of Fulda came to an end. In 1772 the Abbot of Fulda became a Bishop of Fulda, and a Bishop of Fulda, as those who are interested in modern German ecclesiastical politics know, there still is. The case of Fulda is much the same as that of the kindred ecclesiastical principality of St. Gallen. At St. Gallen indeed the Abbot remained till the time of general destruction, but here too the ancient Abbot is now represented by a Bishop, and in both cases ecclesiastical history has, in the eye of the antiquary, suffered through the long continuance of the succession of ecclesiastical rulers. That is to say, both at Fulda and at St. Gallen the ancient minster has given way to a church in the barbarous taste of the eighteenth century. Had Fulda, like Lubeck and Magburg, fallen into Lutheran hands, the building might have looked squalid and dingy and been choked with pews and galleries; but the memorials of antiquity would still have been there; the ancient roodloft might still have borne the rood and its attendant figures, and the triptychs over each altar might still have displayed the choicest works of the mediæval chisel and the mediæval pencil. But, because Fulda still kept her ecclesiastical sovereigns, because the old zeal and bounty still lived on, therefore, as far as the great minster is concerned, ancient Fulda is utterly swept away. An Italian church, not especially striking even in its own class, covers the ground where the first foundation of St. Boniface had grown into the greatest monastic church of Germany. All that has been preserved from the ancient building is a single figure of Charles the Great, placed against the modern wall. But the minster, even in its new guise, still keeps what in ecclesiastical and even historical eyes must ever be its choicest treasure. There still sleeps, though within a shrine of no ancient workmanship, the apostle of the German land, the man whom converted England sent to enlighten her kinsfolk who were still in darkness, the patriarch of the long succession of ecclesiastical lords alike of Mainz and of Fulda, the man who placed the Frankish crown on the head of the first royal Karling. Boniface at Mainz and Fulda, to Englishmen he sounds more our own by his first English name of Winfrith. It is something for one of the land of his birth journeying in the land of his adoption to climb the Marienberg, the hill of pilgrimage which looks down on Fulda and its minster, and to turn from the resting-place of the martyr at his feet to the Western sun, pointing us it were to the isle which is at once his own land and the land of Winfrith.

From the height of Marienberg, crowned by a church and monastic buildings in the same uninteresting style as the minster itself, we look down on Fulda, with its river and its surrounding hills, on the steeples of the minster and the secondary churches, and on the one surviving tower of the once monastic fortress. Among the group of buildings there is one, less likely perhaps than some others to catch the eye in a distant view, but which on a nearer approach is seen to be a building of an unusual outline, and which in truth proves to be one of singular interest, alike in its own architectural design and as being the one surviving monument of ancient Fulda. This is the small monastic church of St. Michael, standing on higher ground just above the minster, whose outline cannot fail at once to strike the eye as having a most distinctive character of its own. At first sight it might pass as an example of an arrangement rare both in Germany and in England, the Wimborne and Purton plan of a single western and a single central tower. Such an arrangement is uncommon alike in England, where few churches have so many as two towers, and in Germany, where so many, even of not very large churches, are not satisfied with so few as two. In this case each tower is crowned with a spire, but it will soon be felt that the central tower and its spire are neither square nor octagonal, but round. This alone is unusual, and another glance will show a round projection between the transept and the choir which might for a moment pass for an apse of somewhat eccentric form. But, when the same projection is seen to the west between the transept and the nave, the thing becomes more puzzling. The visitor will perhaps hardly get to the bottom of the mystery till he goes within the building. The truth is that a round church, with its surrounding aisle, St. Vital or Anchen on the smallest possible scale, has been, as it were, swallowed up by a cross church of the usual form, the original round being so small as to be treated, like the round of St. Sepulchre's at Cambridge, as a tower, and to become to all appearance the central tower of an ordinary cross church finished with a second tower at the west end. This last is a fair example of the usual German Romanesque tower with midwall shafts; but it is of course on the round, whose real character at once strikes the eye as we enter the building, that the attention of the visitor fixes itself. And yet the round, as we see it above ground, has really only a secondary place in the history of this small building. Go down below; an ancient crypt of the reign of Lewis the Pious, the remains of a church consecrated in 830, is still there, and in its low vaults and intricate passages it still contains the empty tombs which once held two of the early Abbots of Fulda, Sturm and Ratgar. All is plain and rough, with no architectural forms save a single central pillar, short, massive, and with nothing that can be called a base, but whose capital reproduces, as well as Fulda masons of the ninth century could reproduce it, the form of the Ionic capital, and that not in its Roman, but in its older Grecian form. It is singular to compare the rude striving after the highest known form of art shown in this obscure building of the days of the son, with the forms which art could reach in the same land in the days of the father. Compare the crypt of St. Michael's of the days of Lewis with the work with which the gateway of Lorsch was adorned in the days and by the gift of Charles himself. The difference is that between the resources at the command of an Abbot of Fulda, working with such workmen and such materials as his own land could furnish, and the resources at the command of a King of the Franks and Lombards and Patrician of the Romans.

But the time was coming when the little church of St. Michael at Fulda was to show more successful attempts at reproducing the art of Southern lands. The church was again consecrated in 1092, and this doubtless marks the rebuilding of the round, the addition of the western tower, the general recasting of the church in its present shape. The round, as it now stands, is formed by six columns, supporting a plain triforium and clerestory, the latter of which forms at once a lantern for the interior, and what at the first misleading glance seem to be the bulky windows of the central tower. But, if the architects of the eleventh century made their work plain, they at least made use of forms which allowed the artist of later times to add enrichment at pleasure. Two of the columns of the round still keep the rude form of capital so common in the earlier German Romanesque, ruder by far than our own cushion, but suited beyond all others to be, as its original makers no doubt often meant it to be, carved out at any later time into forms of greater richness. The other capitals have been cut out into rich and highly classical shapes, which can hardly be earlier than the later days of the twelfth century; they belong to the best and most adorned form of the German Romanesque, the style of Frederick's palace at Gelnhausen. But at Fulda the Ionic or Composite capital is allowed to retain its natural and purely architectural form. It was only in the immediate presence of Augustus that it was absolutely needful for the volute to take the form of the Imperial eagle.

Deeply interesting as this little church is on every ground, there is a feeling of disappointment at finding it the one memorial of the ancient days of Fulda. Besides St. Michael, a single ordinary mediæval church and the wall-tower already spoken of seem to be the only objects in Fulda which have any claim to rank as antiquities at all. Of modern buildings there is abundance, almost crushing abundance, for a town of such small size. Such is the almost invariable fate of the capital of a small principality, especially of an ecclesiastical principality. It dies of its own rank and of the antiquity to which it owes its rank. Because Fulda is one of the oldest ecclesiastical sites in Germany, because it is one of those whose ecclesiastical lords retained their rule the longest, for that very reason it is poor in ecclesiastical remains as compared with a crowd of places of far less historical dignity. Yet, after all, we may raise the question whether it is not less offensive to see an ancient church wholly rebuilt, as at Fulda and St. Gallen, than to see it utterly Jesuited, as at Würzburg. But to the true antiquary Fulda, after all, is not poor. St. Michael's, spared probably as being deemed unworthy of the care which was bestowed in the destruction of the minster, itself well deserves a pilgrimage; and, whatever may be the form of the walls which shelter him, no man of either of the great branches of the Teutonic race should be able to pass unmoved by the last home of Winfrith of England, Boniface of Fulda.

TRAMWAYS.

THE evidence given by the promoters of the London tramways before the Joint Committee of Lords and Commons furnishes an amusing illustration of the way in which people bring themselves to believe that whatever makes for their own profit ought at all hazards to be carried out, that all existing arrangements should yield to it, and that the world should be only too glad to be turned upside down in order to further so natural and laudable an object. When Brindley, the canal engineer, was asked what rivers were made for, he answered that he supposed they were meant to feed canals; and the tramway people appear to be equally convinced that highways have been constructed for the sole purpose of being some day converted into tramway routes. Mr. T. K. Rowbotham, the manager of the tramways, is satisfied that the opposition to them is "only a matter of feeling," and that there is no real inconvenience for anybody to complain of. Mr. Rowbotham's notions of public convenience are perhaps explained by his answer to another question. He suggests that the "dead-end," or terminus, of a tramway, where the horses are unhitched from one end of the car and harnessed to the other, and where there are sometimes as many as half-a-dozen long, lumbering vans waiting at a time to get in or out, might be established "on the blank side of a street, opposite a church, or anything of that kind." We thus arrive at the conclusion that churches have been built in order to provide a blank side of the street which the tramway cars can appropriate as a terminus. Now that tramways have been invented, the millennium has clearly arrived, and going to church is already an exploded superstition. We are further assured that a couple of carriages or carts can never require to pass each other on the same side of a street; but, admitting for the sake of argument that the ordinary traffic of the streets suffers inconvenience from being compelled to move in Indian file, one vehicle behind another in a single line, the tramway speculators are good enough to remind us that they do not object to the centre of the road, which they have appropriated, being used by the general public whenever their own cars do not happen to be passing that way. Mr. Rowbotham ridicules the idea of a tramway being an obstruction in a street, "because the car is passing, and moves away, leaving the street to be occupied by other conveyances." Mr. Hopkins, the engineer of the tramways, also makes a great point of the cars "leaving the road free after they have passed." It is with a certain feeling of surprise and an overpowering sense of the public spirit and liberality of the Tramway Companies that we find them making this concession gratuitously to the public. It is a proof of the disinterestedness and pure philanthropy with which these enterprises are conducted that the Companies are quite willing that the public should have the free use of its own roads whenever they are not wanted for the cars. The extent of this concession may be measured by the statement that the cars pass each other every two or three minutes, and that at some points, as for example, the south side of Westminster Bridge, where the street narrows, there are, as Mr. Hopkins says, "something like over three hundred carriages arriving and departing during the day," and the road is frequently blocked with a crush of cars, waiting either to get into the terminus or to start on a fresh journey. Allowing for the cars overhanging the rails, a double line of tramway occupies at least fifteen feet in the middle of the road. The rest of the traffic is consequently wedged up in a narrow space on each side, and has to run the risk of grazing the kerb-stones, and perhaps getting on the pavement, or of coming into collision with the cars. The middle of the road is free only on condition that all vehicles using it shall, at their peril, get out of the way of the cars. It must be remembered that the cars are not only very long, but that they are the same breadth, six feet, from end to end, the wheels being underneath. It is therefore much more difficult to pass them than it is to pass a carriage or omnibus, the extreme width of which is only where the boxes of the wheels stand out. There is abundant and conclusive evidence as to the injury which is inflicted on all kinds of traffic by the tramways. Wheels are wrenched or broken off, carriages strained and started, and the people in them bumped, jerked, and occasionally thrown out. A lady who is much accustomed to drive herself in London has borne testimony to the peril of crossing a tramway, the wrench to the wheels, the difficulty of turning, and the danger of a car, or perhaps one on each side, pounding down on you, especially in streets which are not perfectly straight. Drivers of the other sex are equally emphatic in their complaints of the insufferable nuisance of the tramways. Captain Baynes, one of the District Superintendents of Police, states that the rule of the road has been thrown into utter confusion. It is, he says, impossible to meet or to pass the cars in the ordinary way for fear of collision. People who drive are kept in a wretched state of discomfort and apprehension; and evidence was given before the Committee of a number of bad accidents which have occurred. In the Camberwell Road, the thoroughfare is so narrow that the cars almost graze the pavement, and pedestrians as well as drivers are put in serious peril. We can hardly be surprised that carts have fallen along some of the tramway routes.

We are not aware that any of the Railway Companies, which have had to purchase the ground required for their lines at a high price, ever made it a grievance that they should have to bear the cost of keeping up their permanent way, with its bridges and embankments. It would appear, however, that the tramway speculators consider themselves rather hardly used in having to make good the portion of the public highway which they have obtained for nothing for the purposes of their business, and from the use of which they derive their dividends. The evidence of the officials is full of complaints of the expense to which the Companies are put in this respect, and glowing pictures are drawn of the boon which is thereby bestowed on the ratepayers. It is true that the latter are spared the expense of keeping up the middle of the road, but it may be doubted whether this will prove a genuine economy when the heavy and incessant repairs which are required by the rest of the road are taken into account. The Brixton Road is said to be intersected by six cuts, four rails, and two edges of stone. When the rails are laid down, they split the road into different sections, and break up the key of the paving; one section wears down another, and the result is what Captain Baynes calls "the frightful state" to which the roads traversed by tramways have now been reduced. Captain Tyler, the Inspector of the Board of Trade, gives evidence to much the same effect. He has observed that a macadam road usually sinks below the level of the tramway pavement. Ruts are worn where the paving stones have been laid higher than the tramway rails, and the wheels, hugging the rails, grind a groove in the stones. The stones sink away from the tramway, and there is sometimes an inch or a couple of inches of difference in level between the two. It can readily be conceived that these remarkable variations of level break the dull, easy monotony of a drive along the ordinary highways of a civilized country, and provide the travellers and their horses with all the excitement of a journey along a "corduroy" track in the backwoods of America. The blessings of the tramways are infinite. Not only do they relieve ratepayers from keeping up the roads, but they regulate the traffic and render the police unnecessary. Mr. Rowbotham, whose candid faith in trams as a providential dispensation is quite refreshing in these days of scepticism and indifference, is clear that they "assist the other traffic" very much indeed; "they do what the police try to do, marshal the traffic." From a subsequent portion of his evidence we gather that part of the "assistance" rendered to other traffic consists in driving cabs and omnibuses off the road. Mr. Rowbotham has perhaps heard of making a solitude and calling it peace, but we should be sorry to diminish the credit to which he is entitled for the bold originality of his ideas. It must be obvious to the meanest capacity that the traffic of the streets will be greatly simplified when tramways become the only means of conveyance, and all other vehicles are given up. Meanwhile, as long as other traffic is allowed, the tramway-cars will help to "marshal" it, or, in other words, compel it to keep out of their way, under penalty of a collision. They may also be trusted to sharpen the intelligence and promote the vigilance of drivers. A remarkable instance of this is given in the evidence of Superintendent Gernon. There is a hay-market in the Mile End Road, and formerly there was great difficulty in keeping awake the waggons who had arrived in the early morning. They used to go to sleep on their waggons, and were frequently pulled up before the magistrate and fined. Since the trams have been introduced the waggons have displayed the most exemplary wakefulness; in the midst of the perils to which they are exposed, they feel, no doubt, that a nap might be dearly purchased. It is admitted by the officials of the tramways that accidents occasionally occur, but we need hardly say that this is owing to the perversity and wickedness of the public. "Sometimes," says Mr. Hopkins, the engineer, "cabs or carriages have run into the tramway carriages." As all other traffic is assumed to be bound to get out of the way of the tramway-cars, the latter being on their own ground, and the public mere interlopers, it is obvious that when an accident happens, it is the cars which are run down, and that they never run down anybody. The public may have a certain right to use the roads, but only at its own risk and peril.

It might have been expected that Mr. Peel, who represented the Board of Trade on the Committee, would have been above the cheap claptrap of suggesting that the opposition to the tramways is "a question of the upper ten thousand, as illustrated by the lady in her carriage, against the general public who are inconvenienced by tramway accommodation." The public which does not use the tramways happens to be the majority of the population; and Captain Tyler, whose evidence should have some weight at the Board of Trade, stated that "all who use vehicles other than tramway-cars are more or less inconvenienced by them." Light carts, spring-vans, gigs, cabs, omnibuses, are quite as much disturbed and endangered as the broughams and victorias of the aristocracy. It is contended by the supporters of the tramways that they are a substitute for omnibuses and cabs; for omnibuses they may be, but it is ridiculous to speak of the tramway-car as a substitute for a cab. Nobody whose time is of any value, or who is on a pressing errand, can afford to ride on the tramway—the cars, taking the journey through, often going more slowly than the omnibuses—but cabs are used by the poorer classes when they have important business on hand which demands despatch, or in any other emergency. It is monstrous that people hurrying to catch trains, to summon a doctor, or on some other matter of life or death, should be hustled out of the way, obstructed and delayed for the sake of the dozing passengers of a leisurely tramway. Sir J. Lubbock in a recent debate in the House of Commons protested against the idea that the highest happiness of the working classes of this country was to consume the greatest possible quantity of cheap tea. It is equally preposterous to assume that their happiness is boded up with jolting in twopenny trams. It is desirable that everything should be done to improve the omnibus service, but some means might perhaps be contrived of doing this without exposing all other kinds of traffic to annoyance, delay, and danger. The freedom of the road cannot be sacrificed for the advantage of private speculators, or even for the convenience of a large body of people who like to ride in cheap omnibuses. The experience of the tramways which have already been constructed shows that they have a tendency to acquire a monopoly of the roads they traverse; all other traffic shuns those roads as much as possible, and as the relays of tramway-cars become more numerous, the lines are constantly occupied, and the cars follow each other in rapid succession. It is impossible to work a public highway as if it were a railway, with traffic passing only in a direct line from end to end. The people who go straight along a road are a small minority of those who use it. The tramway system makes no allowance for the crossing traffic, for vehicles entering or leaving a street at every few paces, or for stopping traffic, such as waggons loading or delivering goods, and cabs and carriages at shop-doors. Whilst all other traffic has to give and take, to move now a little on one side, now on the other, and twice in and out, the tramway traffic pounds along in a fixed and rigid line, with, as one of the witnesses put it, a momentum that no other traffic possesses, a minimum power of pulling up, and a maximum necessity of going on. It has no elasticity, no power of twisting or accommodating itself to the flow of the vehicles around it; and it is impossible therefore that it can be otherwise than inconvenient and dangerous. The evidence of Mr. Haywood, engineer to the Commissioners of Sewers, Mr. J. Fowler, and Captain Tyler, in favour of roadways composed of Val de Travers and other kinds of asphalt, points to a probable solution of the problem. Because a granite causeway suits the tramways, it is proposed that macadam should be given up and granite substituted. This would be simple and absolute retrogression. The causeway is hard, noisy, destructive to vehicles, and dangerous to horses. Horses slip on asphalt when it is between wet and dry, but this can be remedied by keeping the roads in good order, and even when horses do fall on asphalt they rarely hurt themselves. With a smooth level pavement of this or some kindred substance tramways would be a superfluity. The whole road would be a tramway, and all that would be needed would be perhaps to broaden the tires of the wheels a little so as to give them a better grip. We should thus have all the advantages of tramways, with none of the annoyance and danger arising from the centre of the road being monopolized by a series of huge, lumbering vans ploughing along in a fixed rigid line, and casting the rest of the traffic rudely on each side to the peril of pedestrians and the ruin of shopkeepers. The Joint Committee has common sense on its side when it declares that it would be inexpedient by the establishment of vested interests in important streets to prejudice the introduction of new modes of laying down their surface, which may have the effect of benefiting all kinds of traffic equally, without creating any monopoly in the use of the public thoroughfares.

TIPPLING AND ADULTERATION.

THE publicans complain of the hardship of being expected to know a drunkard or a prostitute when they see one. It is not always easy to decide whether a man is drunk, and it must be less easy to decide whether a man is likely to become drunk. In some parts of the United States a woman having a drunken husband has a right to go to the keeper of a public-house and give him notice not to sell liquor to her husband. If the publican does sell liquor to the husband, he becomes responsible for what may be termed "consequential damages." In the States where this law prevails there is probably no great aggregation of people into towns. But in a densely populated neighbourhood it would be difficult for the publican to recognize the husbands whom he was prohibited to supply with liquor unless the law authorised their wives to sew labels upon their coats. We take the foregoing statement as to "consequential damages" from an American witness who was examined before the Committee on Habitual Drunkards, and a very wonderful statement it is. If the husband whose wife has given notice to the publican is supplied with liquor, and if after drinking it he knocks a man down or sets fire to a house, the publican has to pay damages. The same witness described the working of prohibitory laws in terms that deserve attention. "Our people," he said, "are restless and somewhat credulous, and we pass laws under the impression that they will execute themselves, but we are beginning to find out that they will not." A prohibitory law, in order to be effective, must find persons who complain of its violation. This is doubtless true, but in England such a law would hardly fail for want of persons to put it in operation. It may be that in Massachusetts, the prohibitory law being left to municipal officers to enforce, was allowed quietly to repose; but among ourselves the Alliance would permit neither laws nor law officers to slumber. The law of Massachusetts has been several times altered. It now prohibits the selling of distilled spirits, but towns may vote to authorise the sale of ale or lager beer. "Cider is freed." This we take to mean that cider, which is produced in the district, may be sold everywhere without restriction. It is important to observe that in many places, both in the United States and in our colonies, a strong distinction is made between the sale of spirits and that of beer and cider. The beer is usually a lighter article than that which is consumed among ourselves. The cider is probably the same. Even in the States where prohibitory laws are enacted and nominally enforced, nobody can interfere with the trade in imported liquors if they are sold in the original package. The witness whose evidence we have now before us adds, "The prohibitory law itself admits of the sale of malt liquors and cider." But this general statement ought perhaps to be qualified by saying that the sale of cider is absolutely free, and the sale of beer may be permitted by a town's vote. Even with this qualification, however, it appears that prohibition in America does not, even in theory, go so far as fanatics desire to carry it in England. A prohibitory law for Devonshire that permitted the sale of cider would hardly be satisfactory to the Alliance. It may, however, be confidently asserted that no legislative or executive power could prevent the sale of cider in a district where it is commonly made. There is a law of the State of Iowa which prohibits the seller "from mixing any intoxicating liquor with beer, wine, or cider by him sold." It follows that the Legislature of that State, in opposition to the British Parliament, considers that beer, wine, and cider are not "intoxicating liquors."

This Committee collected much useful evidence, although they based upon it some strange and startling conclusions. They received from a Scotch physician a classification of drunkards which may be interesting. There is, he says, the regular drunkard, who keeps sober and attends to his business regularly during the day and gets drunk at night. Such men may carry on for many years without injury to themselves or others. "I have known," says the witness, "one case where a gentleman was carried to bed drunk every night for fifty years, and yet he made a large fortune, and was in the market every morning attending to his business. I do not think that these are cases requiring any interference." We agree with this sensible physician. But if the gentleman whom he mentions took his nightly allowance of liquor at a tavern, he would be liable to be intercepted before he could be carried to bed by a policeman, who would put him in the way of incurring cumulative penalties under the Bill now before the House of Commons. Another class of drunkards are the tipplers who take small glasses of whisky or spirits of some kind, or ale or beer, at intervals during the whole day. Some of these persons conduct themselves very well. Others, again, injure their business and their families. Another class are those whom the doctors call dipsomaniacs, and regard as proper subjects for restraint, under medical advice. It was observed by another physician that the statistics which are so much quoted upon platforms are of small value, and in this remark we entirely concur. It is obvious that an increased activity of the police in a particular district would produce an appearance of augmented drunkenness which might be contrary to fact. "As to the question whether intemperance is more or less prevalent, I should like to say that it is a question which it is perfectly impossible to answer, unless we had a statistical inquiry extending over a very great length of time." The impression of the witness is, that the increase, if increase there be, is not one of absolute amount, but rather of direction. Certain classes indulge more, and certain classes very much less, than they did. He thinks that amongst the rich, and especially the suddenly rich middle classes, drinking is increasing; but it is diminishing very much amongst persons of greater cultivation of mind. He thinks that it is diminishing amongst the labouring classes, except in certain special places, such as the great manufacturing towns. It is possible that, if this witness had been asked whether he thought that higher wages and shorter hours of labour were producing an increase of drunkenness, he might have answered in the affirmative, but it by no means follows that he would recommend early closing of public-houses as a remedy for the evil. It is supposed that there are many thousands of men who have strong appetites for physical indulgence, and find themselves amply provided with means to procure them. To pretend that the Bill now before Parliament, or any Bill that could be devised, will prevent these men from obtaining the drink which they desire, is like proposing to mop up a spring-tide. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will be pained, and perhaps the Home Secretary will not be very sorry, to discover that the rise in wages largely augments the consumption of duty-paying articles. If any restriction were attempted upon the labouring class in the expenditure of its increased wages, that restriction would certainly be either evaded or forcibly put aside. If they cannot obtain beer easily, they will expend their money upon the more portable articles, gin and whisky.

The long discussion of this subject has, on the whole, promoted rational views; but it is unsatisfactory to observe that Mr. Bruce has not yet abandoned that purpose of prostituting the fanatics which produced his absurd proposal of last year. An American witness has given a description of the origin of prohibitive laws in his own country, which is fairly applicable to Mr. Bruce's Bills. The Legislatures of the various States, he says, are a sort of outlet for the overflow of excitable public sentiment, and laws are often passed under pressure which the Supreme Court of the United States declares to be unconstitutional. "It was quite understood that it would be a good thing to pass the law for certain political reasons, and to leave the question of its constitutionality to the Supreme Court." It was probably understood by Mr. Bruce that it might be a good thing for the Government to propose a clause that might gratify the Alliance, while the question whether the clause should pass or not rest with Parliament for decision. Mr. Bruce had persuaded himself a week ago that a concession of the Permissive Prohibitory principle might be made as regards the hours of closing public-houses. A member of the House touchingly complained that he had been pulled out of bed "in the middle of the night"—or, as ordinary mortals would have said, at noon—to hear from the Government this unexpected and unnecessary proposal. The magistrates of a district have ample means of knowing what its circumstances require, and are fully capable of making suitable regulations. It has been, as we believe, finally resolved by Mr. Bruce and his colleagues that the granting of licences shall be entrusted to the magistrates, and it is monstrous to propose that the control of licensed houses shall be partly placed in other hands. Writers and readers are alike weary of the subject of the legislative incapacity of the Home Office, but it is really impossible to abstain from expressing irritation and contempt at this last exhibition of the squeazable nature of Mr. Bruce. A question may arise whether the general convenience of a district, and not the prejudices of fanatics, requires that public-houses should be closed at ten o'clock or kept open till eleven. Surely the magistrates, assisted by the police, are competent to decide this question; or, if they are in any difficulty, the Home Office can assist them. It may well be asked for what purpose magistrates and police exist if they cannot deal with such a question as this. But we all know that they can deal with it perfectly well. The alteration of the hour of closing on Sunday afternoon from five to six o'clock has been carried by a large majority in the House of Commons; and, if this vote expresses the prevailing feeling out of doors, it will doubtless be maintained. We are not sure, however, that the alteration will be satisfactory to the metropolis. We entirely approve of the proposal for placarding convictions of adulteration, and we should like to see the same treatment applied to the same mischievous practice in other trades. It should be noted, however, that some high authorities have lately denied that adulteration of beer prevails to anything like the extent that is commonly supposed. This, at any rate, is a matter of fact capable of being ascertained; and of course, if there is no adulteration, there will be no placarding. It is difficult to enter into the spirit of the sympathy which appears to be entertained for dishonest tradesmen, whose dishonesty takes the form of reckless and injurious adulteration. An attempt has been made to show that a tradesman will be morally degraded by having a notice of his misconduct affixed to his shop; but, if he has been guilty of adulteration, he has already degraded himself, and the notice to the public may be expected to have the effect of preventing him from degrading himself any further in that way. The object is to check the robberies and poisonings which are practised under the form of adulteration, and if the punishment of placarding has that effect, it will have answered its purpose.

A SUNDAY MORNING WITH BEECHER.

WE have read with considerable interest, in a recent number of the Evangelical Magazine, a careful and appreciative description of divine service as conducted by the great Beecher. The writer is evidently one who has sought through the length and breadth of England for an edifying service, but has hitherto sought in vain. He has a special grievance against all our forms of worship, in church or chapel, but particularly against church services. He has found himself chilled by the coldness or offended by the dressiness of English clergymen. He has found the prayers "dry" and the Litany "long." He has gone to church "in a praying spirit"; but he has been "fairly prayed out of it." Nor has he derived much more satisfaction from the sermons. He has found that "in many places" they are nothing but "a stilted and unnatural humdrum of moral and religious platitudes," of which the best that can be said is that they have a soporific effect. Judging English sermons generally by the test of results, he is still less satisfied with them than with the prayers. He laments deeply over such a state of things; and mournfully reminds us that the final cause of a sermon is not to rock men to sleep. "Those," he says, "who wish to render intelligent as well as really reverent worship, cannot think too highly of the importance of good discourses." Such a man, a man whose soul is set upon "rendering intelligent worship," is evidently just the right man to act as Special Correspondent in America for an Evangelical Magazine; and it is very interesting to find that what he has hitherto failed to render in London, he has at last succeeded in rendering in New York.

Even in our conventional and monotonous Church of England there are many different modes of beginning divine worship. There is the unobtrusive mode, where the clergyman, wholly unattended, and altogether unnoticed by the congregation, strolls up the nave, much as he would stroll up the platform of a country railway-station, enters his reading-desk with about as much ceremony as he would get into an empty second-class carriage, and begins "I will arise" in a subdued and apologetic tone, as if he were really sorry to give his flock the trouble of standing up. There is the pompous mode, practised in some cathedrals, where the officiating dean or canon, preceded by the grammar-school boys, the choristers, the singing men, and the minor canons, just shows himself to an expectant audience in the doorway of the choir, and then, amid the thunders of the organ, and much rattling of brass rings, is obsequiously shut into a kind of carved closet by a black-robed attendant, and is sheltered from draught and from the impatient stares of tourists by an elaborate mechanism of red curtains. But these and all other modes of beginning service are commonplace compared with the mode of Mr. Beecher, as any reader may see from the following extract from the Evangelical Magazine :—

Throwing carelessly his soft felt hat by the side of his chair, Beecher sits down for a few moments, and looks over the notices and letters placed on the table. "He said that the tailor makes the man; but he has certainly had but little hand in making Beecher a minister. A dark blue coat, with velvet collar, a white vest, and a black tie cannot be said to be very clerical. No white tie or closely-buttoned waistcoat does he wear. Seated in his easy chair, he looks lazily round. If you are of his regular congregation, and absent, he will notice it. If you formerly attended his church, and have been away some time, when you return he will probably recognize you. A gentleman at present residing in England, but who when located at New York was a member of the Plymouth Church, told me he had been away several years, and then having to visit New York went on Sunday morning and took his old seat in the gallery. After a time he saw Beecher, as was his custom, running his eye over the crowded rows of people. It was passing the spot where he sat when it rested a moment on his face. Beecher put his finger to his forehead while he strove to recall the name. He remembered it and gave a smile of recognition. Afterwards, in the vestry, he gave him a warm welcome, and told him that he really remembered him. "How," said my friend to me, "can one help loving a man who forgets you not after years of absence, but singles you out in a crowded audience, and at a time when his mind must necessarily have been filled with other pressing thoughts?"

The boldest Church reformer, the man who is willing to make the greatest changes in our forms of worship for the purpose of getting folks to church, may well despair when he reads this description. We may throw overboard this formulary and curtail that ceremony; liberal clergymen and devout laymen may meet together in half the great towns in the kingdom, and may discuss how to make our services popular; but if Mr. Beecher's mode of opening public worship is the only mode which seems thoroughly satisfactory to the Correspondent and subscribers of the Evangelical Magazine, what is the use of all our tinkering? A worshipper who is unable to maintain the "praying spirit" unless his prayers are "led" by a gentleman in a blue coat and velvet collar, and who considers the minister "cold" unless he winks at him when he catches his eye, is certainly not to be won over to churchmanship by any Church reforms that are likely to take place in our generation. English clergymen must be taken from a very different social class from that from which they now spring before we can hope to screw them up to Mr. Beecher's mark. It is possible that some clergyman who is prepared to sacrifice himself, and to depart from the ordinary routine of clerical customs and costume, might be found willing, for the sake of winning souls, to wear "a white vest" and a black tie instead of the customary black waistcoat and white tie. It is even conceivable that one of heroic mould might consent to try the effect of a dark blue coat and velvet collar. But we fear that none of the present race of English clergymen could ever be induced to bring his wide-awake into church and to fling it down by the reading-desk; or to loll back in his stall and stare lazily at the ladies and gentlemen in the front nave seats. But if there should be any bold spirit prepared to adopt the Plymouth programme on any approaching Sunday, we venture to suggest that he should introduce a few variations, conceived entirely in Mr. Beecher's spirit, but adapted to the particular conditions of an English Church. Let him, on sitting down in the most comfortable stall he can select to represent Mr. Beecher's "easy-chair," and after looking through the "notices and letters" placed for him on the reading-desk, call up his senior curate and give him directions about answering some, and placing others in the waste-paper basket, to be handed by the senior churchwarden. While this is proceeding, let his junior curate inform him that he notices the butcher and grocer in their places in the north aisle, and inquire whether he has any orders for those tradesmen; and as soon as the requisite responses have been made to this inquiry, let the junior churchwarden, assisted, so far as may be necessary, by sidesmen or lay deacons, bring him his cup of coffee, his roll, and his copy of the Guardian or Record. Any one can see that such a mode of opening divine service would be quite in harmony with the great Beecher conception; and we have no doubt that, if duly advertised in the Daily Telegraph for two or three preceding days, it would draw many to church who are seldom seen there, and would therefore, of course, tend to the propagation of piety.

The only respect in which Mr. Beecher appears at all to cling to the antiquated formalism of our church arrangements is in the retention of the term vestry for the private anteroom attached to his church. It is evident that a minister who both preaches and prays in a white vest, a blue coat, and a velvet collar, and who even brings his hat into church and flings it on the floor, can have no use for a vestry in the proper sense of the term. And as he has already converted the reading-desk, pulpit, and lectern into the tables of common life, and for the stalls has substituted the ordinary "easy-chair," it is difficult to see why he should maintain the term vestry for the reception-room in which he so cordially welcomed the gentleman from England. Would it not be better, and at any rate more satisfactory to the Evangelical Magazine, that he should logically follow up the analogy of his tables and of his easy-chair, and call his vestry a lobby?

Language almost fails the Correspondent of the Evangelical Magazine in his efforts to describe the merits of Mr. Beecher's prayers on the occasion of his visit to Plymouth Church. The most opposite and the most wonderful qualities seem to have been combined and blended in them. "They were fresh, warm, pulsating, reverent, God-ward breathings." The union of freshness and warmth, rarer in nature and in works of art than that even of sweetness and light, the happy mixture of pulsation with reverence wherewith Mr. Beecher "leads extemporaneously the devotions of his people," are very wonderful, and we fear that our Book of Common Prayer, much as it has been admired, and largely as it is now used even by the most eloquent Dissenting ministers, can hardly claim to display so much talent on any of its pages. Most of its prayers are undoubtedly "reverent"; and many of them, we hope, possess the occult quality of "God-wardness." Some of those in the Litany might, we think, fairly be called "warm," and others, such as some in the Baptismal Service, have always seemed to our prejudiced minds delightfully fresh. It is even possible that, if we knew exactly what it meant, we might find "pulsation" in some of them. But we should find it very difficult to name any prayer which combines all those qualities in the way in which Mr. Beecher is described as combining them. The Correspondent would have done us a real benefit if he could have copied out one of these prayers verbatim in his interesting paper; though, perhaps, after all, even one of Mr. Beecher's prayers would lose much of its effect on a congregation unless "led" in the appropriate costume—the white vest, the blue coat, and the velvet collar.

The crowning act of Mr. Beecher's ministrations, as of course it must be of all "intelligent worship," is the sermon; and the Correspondent gives a very full account of the specimen which he heard, which he says was a very fine one. We shall not attempt to describe this sermon, but shall simply give one extract from the Correspondent's description:—

Thus he illustrated his dislike to the practice of forcing too many doctrines into the small brains of children. It was oftentimes as an over-anxious mother might act if, when her child should be going out to a picnic, she should say to the servant, "Bring down the great trunk to put in all Edith's dresses." Edith comes in. "What for are you putting my dresses in that trunk, mother?" "Getting them ready for you to take with you to to-morrow's picnic." "But I shall not want more than my pink dress; let me leave the rest at home. I shall only be out for one day." "No no, my child; you do not know what you will need; and if these things do not come in useful to-morrow, they will some time; besides, they are all ready, and you must take them." The child takes the trunk, is cumbered with it all day, brings it home, keeps it unopened a long time, and when several years after she opens it, thinking to take out something that may be fitting to wear, finds that all the dresses are too small, and wonderfully old-fashioned.

We feel it a privilege to have preserved for our readers this magnificent specimen of easy-chair oratory; and we feel sure that, after reading it over, they will be able to sympathize with the Correspondent of the Evangelical Magazine, when he exclaims in a paroxysm of enthusiasm, "Go to sleep in Beecher's church!—as little as would a lady in a draper's shop anxiously balancing the suitability and prices of different silks!" Those who, after this, do not long to join the blessed band of Beecherites must be suffering from something worse than invincible prejudice.

ANCIENT AND MODERN JEWELRY AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

THE Loan Exhibition of Jewelry and Personal Ornaments at the South Kensington Museum is one of very great interest. Perhaps not so attractive to the many as its more glittering modern rival on the other side of Exhibition Road, it is far more instructive to the art student, the historian, and the antiquary. We have indeed heard expressions of disappointment at its dullness, and it may be wanting in sensational effect from the absence of that which makes Regent and Bond Street shops so attractive to the superficial observer. Not that there is any lack of costly precious stones, those beautiful natural productions enhanced by art which excite a dreamy notion of indefinite value, and which have exerted from earliest time so powerful an influence over the cupidity of princes and of people; but that, in truth, the difficulties and artistic merits of the goldsmith's handicraft, and the nature and qualities, the varieties and excellences, of gems and jewels, are superficially estimated and little understood by the majority even of educated persons. Those who would care to enlarge their knowledge in this direction have an admirable opportunity presented to them by this exhibition, guided by Mr. Soden Smith's excellent, but too hastily prepared, Catalogue. The collection itself is conveniently arranged in upright cases, occupying that gallery of the Museum which our fair readers will recollect to have been appropriated last year to the show of Fans.

We can only attempt to glance at some of the more important objects, and we shall begin our examination, as does the Catalogue, with the first case presented to our view on entering from the staircase. This commencement is moreover chronological; and here we find those remarkable Italo-Greek objects shown by their fortunate possessor, Mrs. Burt. Two fibulae of thin repoussé gold, formed as lions, are among the largest of this class of ornament which have descended to us. A wreath of golden leaves, a noble ornament from Canosa; an Italo-Greek necklace of granulated beads (11) of very fine workmanship, as also (15) an ornament of gold of exquisite delicacy; and a rich display of earrings, many of remarkable design, are contributed by Mrs. Burt. Antique Egyptian jewelry is but poorly represented, almost the only characteristic piece being an inlaid scarabæus in the same case, belonging to Mr. Gee. The Museum specimens which have been brought upstairs for this occasion (comprised under 31) are public property, always open to view, and therefore need not be particularized. Among those belonging to the Rev. Montague Taylor (32) are examples of very fine work. Colonel Lane Fox shows some interesting objects from Idaliun (39). A pair of earrings and a gold pendant of opus interrasile, set with true emeralds (43-4), are of later Roman times, and date from the third century; they are good examples of the use of that stone (probably from the mines of Coptos), the knowledge of which, previously to the discovery of America, has been doubted by some writers; they are the property of Mrs. John Holland.

Not very attractive, but highly interesting, is the series of bronze ornaments inlaid with enamel, which are shown by that assiduous antiquary, Mr. John Evans, under Nos. 50-51. This style of ornament was in favour during the later Roman period, and seems to have been greatly developed in England, where examples of it frequently occur in Romano-Celtic graves. The examination of these leads us to Mr. Evans's important collection of Celtic and Anglo-Saxon ornaments, which, with the Merovingian, are arranged in the next division of the Catalogue. We must not, however, pass without a glance at Mr. Westropp's series of penannular fibulae (55). Colonel Lane Fox and Mr. Evans are the great contributors. Note the lunette ornaments, and the massive torques, the trumpet-ended fibulae, and so-called ring-money (73, 76, &c.). Note also Macleod of Cadbold and Colonel Fox's Irish-Celtic brooches (80, 85, 86). Of Saxon workmanship in the Merovingian manner are the buckle (96) found at Tostock, the cross (98) found at Stanton, with the finely-worked fibula (93), and Earl Amherst's brooch (101*), from Thanet. But the choicest example of the goldsmith's art, of Saxon or of Celt, is the portion of a dagger hilt (97) found near Windsor, and ornamented on a silver panel sunk in the bronze, with interlacing serpents, and foliated network of marvellous execution. We must not leave this case without noticing the rude ornaments from Western Africa, and from old Indian graves in Columbia.

A total change came over the spirit of the goldsmith's art at the period of the Renaissance. With the exception of a few rings, of which anon, this collection affords but little to illustrate the personal ornaments in use during the period intervening between the seventh and fifteenth centuries, a period of the darkest decadence, succeeded by the Gothic revival. Even of the fifteenth century we have few examples, and we find little to claim attention till the full tide of the bel cinque cento had set in, abundant in its productions of the richest ornamental character, and leaving to us many of its gorgeous jewels as its art receded from a less vigorous and less artistic taste. The objects exhibited of this period are rich and rare. The list begins with the Darnley jewel, contributed by Her Majesty, more remarkable for its historical authenticity than for its beauty of design, although the workmanship is excellent. It was made for the Lady Margaret Douglas, mother of Darnley, about 1576. Her Majesty also contributes a pendant formed as a mermaid. Singular for curious contrivance and rich ornamentation is that belonging to Mrs. Gordon Canning (131), formed of a portion of the arm-bone probably of a saint, which serves as a receptacle for other relics, and which is mounted in enamelled gold with precious stones, and figures of the Virgin and St. John. Another work of historic interest is the Penruddock jewel (134), a triangular pendant, set with a large sapphire, diamonds, rubies, &c. This was presented by Queen Katharine Parr to Sir George Penruddock about 1544. Again, the sapphire which occupies the centre of Lady Cork's star (137) is historical; having belonged to Elizabeth, and been conveyed by Robert Cary, who rode with it to Scotland, presenting it to James VI. as a token of her death. The jeweller's and painter's arts, as well as historic considerations, claim our attention to the three interesting and beautiful objects contributed by Lady Elizabeth Elliott Drake (143-5), to whom they have descended from the Admiral. One contains Hilliard's portrait of Drake, painted in 1581. Another is the noble jewel given by Queen Elizabeth in 1579 to the conqueror of the Armada, consisting of a richly enamelled and jewelled pendant, containing a portrait of the Queen by Hilliard, behind a finely executed cameo on one of those choice sardonyx which have descended to us from Roman times. The third was also a gift from Elizabeth to the Admiral, a star-shaped pendant set with precious stones, the central ruby engraved with the Royal orb and cross, and on the other side a smaller miniature of the Queen by Hilliard. The Hunadon is another specimen of the finest quality of sardonyx, of unknown origin, but which, acquired by the Romans of Imperial times, were worked upon by some of the glyptic artists of the sixteenth century. This noble stone has been elaborately cut in cameo to represent the subject of Perseus and Andromeda. Lady Fitzhardinge is also the fortunate owner of the enamelled gold-bound prayer-book which Elizabeth wore at her girdle, and which contains the young King Edward's last prayer, written, it is believed, in Elizabeth's own hand.

But we must not dwell too long on the many fine pieces of enamelled jewelry. Passing several worthy of remark, we stop again at that exhibited by the Empress Eugénie—an open work pendant, of the most careful and finished execution and elegant design (158), said to have been worn by Henri II. Even among these choice examples Mr. Beresford Hope's ewer rises as a giant, though it is not more admirable than the enamelled gold missal cover (159) possessed by the Museum, and said to have belonged to Henrietta Maria. But perhaps the most elaborate work of this period is the necklet (165), a marvel in artistic design and minute execution of enamelled subjects, modelled in high relief. Its excellent preservation is remarkable. Lady Mount-Charles also shows one of the most elegant pendants (212), "Venus and Cupid in the Temple of Love."

Continuing our examination of the cases in that line, we pass by the Hungarian and Albanian mantle clasps, Brandenburgs, and other ornaments, and find ourselves in face of the Marlborough gems—too serious a matter to encounter within our present limits. The Devonshire gems are in the room beyond, with a wealth of finger rings to which we must return. Precious stones in all varieties are to be seen in the Hope and Townshend collections, but there are other contributors of rich treasures. Large brilliants are shown by Col. Dawson Damer, and the star, aigrette, and turban ornament of rose diamonds belonging to Lady Elphinstone are interesting as having been presented by the Sultan Selim III. to Lord Keith in 1801. Lady Sinclair's brilliant suite must excite envy until eclipsed by that belonging to the Duke of Portland (747-50). Messrs. Garrard contribute some very remarkable precious stones—brilliants of various colour, a priceless pearl of perfect form weighing 124 grains, sapphires, a charming cat's-eye, and ornaments of rich material and excellent design. There are but few examples of asterias corundum, of the rarer ruby, or the sapphire tint; one of the latter and more frequent colour (769) belongs to Mrs. R. Temple Frere. This curious variety, which shows a six-rayed star when placed in brilliant light, would be more highly prized if better known. The Orientals, who esteem it highly, have a curious myth:—

One morn a Peri at the gate
Of Heaven sat disconsolate.

For some unusual peccadillo, offended Allah had condemned her to everlasting imprisonment in the coldest stone; there she is shining still, a brilliant star glittering from the midst of a jewel which is colder to the touch than any other crystal. We ought not to omit here the interesting series of coloured stones exhibited by Professor Church under No. 815.

Ornaments of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries are abundantly represented. A Venetian neck-chain of the sixteenth century (174), "formed of hollow gold beads covered with minute circles of wire soldered on," is remarkable, and is placed among the works of more recent date. Hereabouts, also, are some fine modern works, as Castellani's copy of the Cumæ Corona (582), and others by the same artist. Lady Llanover's memorial clasp, given by William III. on the death of Mary to Ann Granville, is of a style of ornament of purely English character, much in vogue at that period for snaps, rings, &c., accompanied by black and white enamelling. There are some pretty devices among the Spanish ornaments of the last century exhibited by Sir Digby Wyatt, parallel in their rococo character to the Norman and some other European peasant jewelry, of which there is a rather superabundant supply. Pretty and gay as they may be, we prefer the stricter elegance of our English ornaments of the last century, imbued with the spirit which inspired Wedgwood and Flaxman; of such are some included under Nos. 348-50, &c., the property of the Baroness Burdett Coutts. The watches are not numerous; Sir R. Wallace shows some of early French make; but the richest is No. 465, belonging to the Countess of Cork, and made by Breguet for the First Napoleon. We must pass by chatelaines, a rich assortment; the boxes and bonbonnières, to which the Princess Mary of Teck contributes, and the badges, among which richly jewelled "Georges" are conspicuous; as also the rather heterogeneous contents of the immediate cases. But we cannot refrain from marking (669) a bracelet set with enamel portrait of George IV. as a characteristic example of the depth of artistic degradation in jewelry to which we had fallen in 1825. Of Renaissance and recent cameo cutting on rare material may be noted some huge emeralds carved with Medusa's head; the same subject, an admirable work by Pistrucci, on a piece of red jasper of such surprising evenness of colour as to make one suspicious of paste; and (595) a fine work by Girometti on turquoise.

We move on to the Oriental department of the exhibition, where we shall find the direct descendants of that art a collateral branch of which probably inspired the antique works which first engaged our attention. Among the Indian, Egyptian, and other African ornaments we shall find the motives and the methods of manipulation still surviving, which were probably the ancestors of Greek and Etruscan jewelry. Let the visitor examine those from Nubia and Upper Egypt; from the West African coast; from Damascus; Upper India, and Ceylon. Her Majesty exhibits fine examples from India, rich in cabuchon emeralds, in pearl, and diamonds (1156-61); and the crown of Theodore from Abyssinia. There are some gorgeous bangles, and some of admirable metal-work. Miss C. M. Powys shows specimens of the fine gold and green enamel work (1189). Mrs. Alfred Morrison is a rich contributor to this and other sections, and

Sir Digby Wyatt's specimens are numerous. Mrs. MacCallum shows Egyptian and Arabian silver work of great variety.

Weary with looking and admiring, we yet must enter the further room, in which the Devonshire gems are exhibited, and where we shall also find the Dactylothece of this Exhibition. Here is enough indeed to stimulate the flagging energies of the true amateur and archaeologist. The Rev. Montague Taylor shows some antiques of great beauty, and Mr. Drury Fortnum contributes others, twenty-two of which are in their original settings as finger rings. Here we notice, as also among the Devonshire gems, palpable refutations of some dogmas advanced by a learned writer in the first edition of his erudite work on Antique Gems. Of finger rings we have all those as yet arranged of the Waterton collection, now belonging to the South Kensington Museum. Mr. Soden Smith sends a numerous and highly interesting series, centered by his Cheval de bataille (894), an Anglo-Saxon found near Covent Garden. Note also (887) a massive Roman found in Sussex, and (901) a charming ring, probably of the fourteenth century; the episcopal, memorial, aigret, and English fifteenth-century rings; the puzzle and posy are also noteworthy. Mr. John Evans sends forty-nine rings, many of which were found in England; Roman, Anglo-Saxon, Celtic, episcopal, iconographic. Mr. Beck sends, among others, that supposed to have been Fair Rosamond's. Mr. Drury Fortnum contributes from his numerous series a selection commencing with early Christian of the third century of our era and ending with the last century. Among these are several rarities, and the fashion of that ornament is illustrated by examples of Byzantine, Saxon, and Carolingian; a series of six of the fourteenth century found together are singular for their form, some having projecting bunches of pearl an inch in height. There are also Renaissance specimens, some of great elegance; note also (17) an Italian of the fifteenth century, set with a diamond, perhaps one of the first cut in Europe. No. 16 is a Templar's ring. The Duke of Richmond shows some elegant rings of the last century, and Mr. S. W. Singer a fine series with posies. We have reserved to the last two of unusual interest. One belonging to Captain Spratt, found on the same spot and at the same time as that statue, is believed to have adorned the Venus de Milos; the other (864), probably of Celtic, and admirable workmanship, though possibly under Saxon influence, and ornamented with niello, corded wire, and inserted pastes, belongs to Lady Fitzhardinge.

The errors connected with this highly interesting Exhibition are not its own. Greater time given to the classification and arrangement would have rendered its study more easy and more satisfactory. Excellent as is the Catalogue, it is wanting in more definite classification, a fault probably arising from overhaste in its preparation. We would direct particular attention to the concise, but very able, introductory notice, conveying a large amount of information in a small space.

THE OPERA SEASON.

NEW amateurs will assert that the operatic season of 1872 has been, on the whole, one of great excitement. It would perhaps be too much to expect from the directors of such costly speculations as the Italian Operas that they should abandon the established routine, and escape from the groove in which hitherto, year after year, they have moved with undisturbed complacency. On the other hand they might frankly state their case, and thus at least earn a reputation for having the courage of their opinions. Why, before they open their doors to the public, do they issue prospectuses containing, in the majority of instances, so many pledges which they must be aware will never be redeemed? The consequence is that an atmosphere of fiction envelops the doings at our Italian Operas, which is anything but creditable to their promoters. If managers are persuaded that their subscribers in particular and the public in general will be satisfied with hearing certain popular singers (prima donnas especially), there is no imaginable reason why they should hold out further inducements. Let it be understood that Madame Adelina Patti will perform in a series of familiar operas, Madame Pauline Lucas in another series, Madlle. Christine Nilsson in another, and so on; subscribers will then, knowing what they are to expect, have no just cause of complaint. We are at a loss to conceive why the prospectus of an operatic undertaking should not be a document planned and drawn up in as much good faith as the prospectus of any other kind of business enterprise; but that this rarely happens, and that an opera prospectus must invariably be taken cum grano salis—in other words, looked upon in a great measure as rather a statement of possibilities than of probabilities—is notorious. The subject, however, is well nigh exhausted, and to discuss it further would be a mere waste of words. We can see, indeed, little chance of reform. Meanwhile, the "high salutin" about our Italian Opera-houses being "temples of art," &c., should be abolished as preposterous. Let them be regarded as what they are, what they have been for a long period, and what there appears every likelihood of their remaining for a period just as long—simply, places of relaxation and amusement, with which art in its highest and noblest demonstrations has little or nothing to do. If a great work, by some inexplicable chance, is revived, it is pretty sure to meet with such scant encouragement from habitual subscribers that it is impossible to let the outside public become intimately acquainted with it, except at so serious a temporary loss, that managers, who have seldom themselves the gift of appreciation, cannot from their own commercial point of view see their way to continuing the performance. Of this we had an example in Cherubini's Medea—certainly among the grandest and sublimest of lyric dramas; and, only just now we have had another, in the same composer's Deux Journées, which, though produced at Her Majesty's Opera with the utmost care, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, who never gained laurels more honourably, was played once, and then thrown aside. The pure and simple story, the natural though scientific music, counted for little or nothing. True, Medea given several times, and repeated in after seasons, was happy in a representative of the heroine-like Madlle. Tietjens, who had all the requisites for the part, dramatically and vocally; whereas when the same gifted lady took upon her to assume the character of Constanze in the Deux Journées, the illusion had vanished.

Singula de nobis anni præstantur cunctis.

Madlle. Tietjens was just as ill fitted for the young wife of Armand as she was well fitted for the matronly and terrific spouse of Jason. Nevertheless, although she could neither look nor act the part, she sang the music of Constanze like the admirable musician she is; and, in short, the execution of Cherubini's opera was almost in every respect irreproachable. Yet it obtained so higid a reception from subscribers that Mr. Mapleson, wise in his generation, shelved it there and then; and to the public—the paying public of galleries and pit (when pit there is)—not a chance was vouchsafed of judging Cherubini's opera. Yet all the incidents of the operatic season put together sink into insignificance when compared with the production of Les Deux Journées. Prima donnas—Patti, Nilsson, &c., with their grace, fortitude, and roulade—counted for naught in an artistic sense by the side of this performance of one of the greatest works of one of the greatest and most earnest of masters. And after all, who and what is Cherubini, that the time for appreciating him should have departed? Has his art grown old? By no means. His art is for younger, fresher, and more vigorous than that of Bellini, Donizetti, and Verdi. True, he does not stuff his operas full of exhibit on solo, and in fact he provides but rare opportunities for the egotistic display of singers of renown—wherein, by the way, he resembles Herr Wagner, though Cherubini is a Wagner with a sense of musical form and symmetry, which the actual Wagner does not possess, or at any rate systematically repudiates.

At the same time, it is useless denying that Les Deux Journées—the work of a man proclaimed by Haydn and Beethoven “greatest of dramatic composers”; about whom, thirty years later, Mendelssohn, looking over the newly published score of Les Abencerrages, said, “Here is a matchless old fellow!” and described by Schumann, as “that stern Florentine whom I often feel inclined to compare with Dante”—was received with such comparative indifference by a half-filled house as to dissuade Mr. Mapleson from repeating it. So poor a welcome accorded to this recognized masterpiece probably induced the director of Her Majesty's Opera to withdraw an opera of a very different kind, though hardly less a masterpiece in its way; and thus, of the two novelties announced in the prospectus, only enjoyed the advantage of a single performance, while the other (Auber's Diamans de la Couronne) was prudently laid aside. In revenge, Mr. Mapleson regaled his subscribers ad nauseam with some of the most hackneyed works of the common repertory—by which we mean the repertory common to himself and Mr. Gye. A reference to our last article on the Italian Operas (June 29) will show what these were; and when we add that, since we wrote, only two or three of the same calibre have been added, we may be spared further details. We shall have a word or two to say further on in addition to what has already been published about Mr. Mapleson's leading singers.

Whereas Mr. Mapleson had promised two novelties, one only of which was forthcoming, and that, as we have said, only on one occasion, Mr. Gye pledged himself to four. These were Lohengrin, Il Guarany, Gelmina, and Les Diamans de la Couronne. The operas of Wagner and Auber, first and last in the catalogue, would have been by many degrees the most interesting; but it was precisely these which, at the eleventh hour, were abandoned. Mr. Mapleson's excuse for withdrawing Les Diamans de la Couronne was sufficiently comic—to the purport, mainly, that the unprecedented support he had received during the season justified him in depriving his liberal patrons of one of the principal treats he had promised them. Another time, probably, if the public is less liberal, Mr. Mapleson may take a noble revenge, by keeping his promises. In justice to the director of Her Majesty's Opera, however, we must say that—like Mignon, Donorah, Der Freischütz, Un Ballo in Maschera, Anna Bolena, Il Flauto Magico, and Otello, the Diamans was announced among the “novelties,” without any preliminary flourish of trumpets; only that, like the other operas enumerated, it was not given. Mr. Gye's announcement of Lohengrin was not merely a flourish, but in its way a curiosity—as those who have glanced at our first notice (May 4) of this season's operatic doings may remember. Mr. Gye, emboldened by the success of Lohengrin at Bologna and Florence (with Signor Campanini as the hero), came forward, valiantly, as Herr Wagner's champion, declaring that “the presentation of one of Herr Wagner's productions to his subscribers should not be delayed,” and that—having the requisite German singers at hand—he was “determined to produce Lohengrin as soon as it was possible to complete the rehearsals.” Nevertheless Lohengrin put in no appearance, and, one by one, the Wagnerian singers, having been tried and found wanting in certain operas, not Wagner's, disappeared. Mr. Gye's chief reason for producing Les Diamans de la Couronne seems to have been that “no such suitable living artist for the part of Caterina could be found as Madame Adelina Patti.” And yet, while, according to the prospectus, the Diamans was “to be given soon after the arrival of Madame Patti” (who remained to the very end of the season), it was not brought out at all, if indeed it was at any time really in preparation. Lohengrin might possibly have proved as little of an attraction as Les Deux Journées, and Madame Patti may not have taken fondly to the part of Caterina in Les Diamans; but why make promises without a fair likelihood of their being carried out? Gelmina was a sorry substitute for either Lohengrin or Les Diamans. Auber's opera, with Adelina Patti as the heroine, might have been reckoned upon as a sure success; and curiosity alone, after the deafening storm of controversy which has been kept up incessantly by its composer and his disciples during the last quarter of a century, would in all probability have brought crowds to Lohengrin. Nor was Il Guarany much better than Gelmina. If Prince Poniatowski's work was flavoured with the ideas of other composers, that of M. Carlos Gomez, “the young Brazilian,” was saturated with them. Beyond a certain dashing effrontery, M. Gomez has yet everything to learn. He ought to burn wax tapers in commemoration of Meyerbeer and Verdi. The performance of Il Guarany—in which the chief characters were supported by Madlle. Sessi, Signors Nicolini, Cotogni, and Baggiolo, M. Faure, &c., with Signor Bevignani as conductor—was really good; and the mise-en-scène, although made up for the greater part of well-known materials (the Africain, &c.), was very striking; but this and much more could not give interest to soilly a libretto, or life to musical shreds and patches gathered here, there, and everywhere. On the whole we should greatly have preferred Lohengrin to Gelmina, and the Diamans de la Couronne to Il Guarany; so, we think, would the public. As far as Lohengrin is concerned, the many Wagnerians, German and English, in this country pined for it; the non-Wagnerists also pined for it—for a different reason; while curious spectators, indifferent to either side, pined for it no less, so great has been the commotion about Wagner, his works, his controversial books, and criticisms, &c., not to speak of his Nibelungen Trilogy, for the perfect representation of which a town must be enlarged, a vast theatre built, and a palatial residence erected expressly for the author. It was therefore mistaken policy on the part of Mr. Gye, having announced Lohengrin, not to bring it out; and a no less mistaken policy to announce it without the certainty of its being ready to hand when called for.

In our first notice of the Italian Operas a fair estimate was given of the resources, vocal, instrumental, &c., at either house; and in our second (June 29) we endeavoured to show what the principal singers had done up to that period. Little remains to be added; but, in order to make our record complete, we subjoin a list of the operas played, in the order of their production. At Mr. Gye's establishment we have had—Faust e Margherita, La Sonnambula, Fra Diavolo, Lucia di Lammermoor, the Huguenots, La Favorita, Il Flauto Magico, La Figlia del Reggimento, La Traviata, Hamlet, Martha, Fidelio, Donorah, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Don Giovanni, L'Africaine, Le Nozze di Figaro, Rigolotto, Il Trovatore, Der Freischütz, Gelmina, L'Elisir d'Amore, I Fanciulli del Nord, Linda di Chamouni, Norma, and Il Guarany. At Mr. Mapleson's we have had—Fidelio, La Sonnambula, La Figlia del Reggimento, Semiramide, the Huguenots, Don Pasquale, Faust, Lucrezia Borgia, Lucia di Lammermoor, La Traviata, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Il Trovatore, Les Deux Journées (I due Giovanni), Rigolotto, Martha, and Le Nozze di Figaro. Thus at the Royal Italian Opera twenty-six operas have been given; at Her Majesty's Operas only sixteen. Mr. Gye kept his theatre open from seventeen to eighteen weeks; Mr. Mapleson kept his theatre open during sixteen. Mr. Gye had again two conductors—Signors Vianesi and Bevignani; Mr. Mapleson had only one conductor, Sir Michael Costa—worth (not to pay him a very high compliment) the two put together. It cannot, however, be denied that Mr. Gye offered more variety to his subscribers than Mr. Mapleson to his; and it is to be questioned whether the superiority of Mr. Mapleson's orchestra would have much weight with a quasi-ignorant public, who go in crowds to such a piece of threadbare trumpery as Martha, because Madlle. Nilsson sings “The Last Rose of Summer,” and turn their backs upon Les Deux Journées, a piece in which Benvenuto Cellini, had he been enough of a musician, would have revelled—for a subtler piece of artistic musical chiselling does not exist.

The list of operas cited above will suffice to show that the great singers upon whose performances we dwell at large in our last notice have had little more to do that is worth recording. Madame Adelina Patti, as usual one of the chief attractions of Mr. Gye's season, has again attempted to show that no character—it matters not for what calibre of voice intended—is beyond her means; and thus, for the second time she has merely proved that she can no more rival Madame Pauline Lucca as Valentine in the Huguenots, than Madame Lucca can hope to rival Madame Patti as Rosina in the Barbiere di Siviglia.

Quam solit uterque — extorcent artem.

In certain—nay, in very many—characters Madame Patti is wholly unapproachable; why should she not then be satisfied to shine alone in her sphere? There are parts beyond her physical means. Valentine, in the Huguenots, is one of them, and Leonora, in the Troubadour, another. In both operas her performance is poetical and intellectual; but if she does not wish to impair the unequalled beauty of her voice, she should, as much as possible, eschew Verdi and Meyerbeer. Even in Dinorah, though with the single exception of Madlle. Ilma di Muraka, Madame Patti is beyond all compare the best representative of a half-demented maiden we have seen, her exertions are evident; and the same observation applies to her Caterina, in L'Étoile du Nord—piquant, characteristic, and finished a performance as it undoubtedly is from beginning to end. Madame Patti is one of the most consummate lyric artists since Malibran, and to strain so precious a voice as hers is neither more nor less than high treason against music. Among Mr. Gye's now singers this year the one who has made a genuine impression is Madlle. Emma Albani. We thought favourably of her from the beginning, and are glad to find our early belief confirmed. The young French Canadian lady has succeeded beyond question, and is already a favourite with the English public. To say more about Mr. Gye's company—a strong one, it must be owned, in every department—would involve needless repetition.

Of Mr. Mapleson's chief singers we have also already spoken at length. It remains to add that Madlle. Christine Nilsson—engaged, it is stated, at an enormous salary, no less than 200*l.* a night, exactly 40*l.* more than is received by Madame Patti (how can operatic managers exist with such salaries to pay?)—although she appeared sixteen times, only sang in five parts during the entire season. In these five parts—Violetta (La Traviata), Margaret (Faust), Lucia di Lammermoor, Martha, and Cherubino (Le Nozze), Madlle. Nilsson has been seen and heard over and over again. Her two years in America have by no means improved her voice, and by no means added refinement to her style; on the contrary, they have manifestly deteriorated both. This is to be regretted, because Madlle. Nilsson, when she first appeared among us, was one of the most charming artists on the lyric boards, fascinating as much by her unaffected graceful manner as by the exquisite beauty of her voice and the purity of her method. We are at a loss to understand the metamorphosis, but it has been a subject of general comment, and it would be useless to seem blind (or deaf) to it. Pity that Madlle. Nilsson was limited to some half-dozen well-worn characters, without the opportunity of once again appearing as Desdemona, Ophelia, and Mignon, through which her reputation was so greatly enhanced during her last visit to London!

Mr. Mapleson's new tenor, Signor Campanini, has at the very best but half maintained his position. He is no Gunglioni—that is certain; far less is he a Mario. At the same time, he has qualities which, if discreetly managed, ought still to help him to attain a high rank in his profession. But he is apparently negligent—sometimes singing admirably, at other times indifferently, at others even badly. Signor Campanini cannot afford to rest upon the laurels so brilliantly earned on the night of his first appearance as Gennaro, in Lucia di Lammermoor, with Mado. Tietjens and Signor Rota (the new baritone, who has a somewhat disappointed expectation). The unanimous praises awarded on that occasion should have spurred him on to increased exertion.

About Mr. Mapleson's other leading vocalists, we can only say that Madlle. Marimon sings more than ever like a bird, and acts more than ever like an automaton; that the American prima donna, Madlle. Clara Louise Kellogg, has had, and, what is more, merited, a genuine success, upon which she virtually put the seal by her excellent portrayal of Susanna, in Mozart's incomparable Nozze di Figaro—the other chief parts being sustained by Madlle. Tietjens (the Countess), Madlle. Nilsson (Cherubino), Signor Rota (the Count), Signor Agnesi (Ligaro), and Signor Borella (Bartolo). About this representation we may fairly add that, thanks to the care and ability of Sir Michael Costa, a finer ensemble has rarely been attained under any circumstances. The performance of Le Nozze and that of Les Deux Journées would alone have made the season of 1872 at Her Majesty's Opera, memorable.

We might write more about both operas; but we have written enough, and must conclude with the expression of a hope that next year we may hear Lohengrin (to settle philosophic doubts), at one theatre, and Les Deux Journées (for the sake of "abstract music"), at the other.

THE THEATRES.

THE play which Mr. Tom Taylor has supplied to the Queen's Theatre might, like some other recent pieces of the same author, have been improved by taking a little more trouble. The principal object doubtless was to provide parts for Mr. and Mrs. Bandmann, and if they are intending to carry this play with them upon a tour, it is perhaps convenient that they should require as little as possible of the assistance of other artists. There is really nothing that is not either trivial or disagreeable except the two leading parts, and the comic business would be hardly tolerable in one of those farces which precede or follow the principal entertainment of the evening, and which nobody need see who is not so disposed. The conception of the play is fine, and if neither Mr. Bandmann nor his associates are equal to the grandeur of the prologue, we must allow that the task imposed on them is very difficult. The time of action of this prologue is the year 1805, and the place is the head-quarters of the French Imperial Guard on the night before the battle of Austerlitz. By a venial departure from historic truth these head-quarters are placed at Brunn, and the shouts of the French army as Napoleon rides along its line are supposed to be heard within a castellated structure which affords to the scene-painter more scope than he would have found in the field-hivonak of reality. Happily the dramatist has had the discretion to abstain from bringing upon the boards Napoleon and his Marshals. Even Murat is only talked about without being seen, and besides the Colonel of Cuirassiers, whom Mr. Bandmann undertakes, the only military celebrity who actually appears is a sergeant of the same regiment, who swears awfully at the notion of being despatched on the eve of battle to Berlin. The Colonel, it should be observed, has brought his wife with him to Brunn, and she has contrived to get him ordered on diplomatic business as a means of preserving him from the danger of the impending battle. The sergeant is ordered to ride on this peaceful errand with his master, and they express emphatically, each after his own fashion, vehement displeasure at this arrangement. A professional diplomatist arriving at this moment offers to undertake the business at Berlin, so as to leave the Colonel free to lead his regiment into action, and the sergeant free to follow him. The Colonel goes off to seek an interview with the Emperor, and returns triumphantly with his sanction to the proposed arrangement. The Colonel's wife, whose scheme for her husband's safety is thus frustrated, is obliged to share, or seem to share, his anxiety for glory. They take of course a pathetic farewell, at which their little daughter assists, and it is not the author's fault that Homer has represented a similar scene before him. The modern Hector is not a particularly military personage, and his size and bulk suggest that he will need a weight-carrying charger if he really means to lead his regiment next day. His soldiery, like his English, is manifestly required for the occasion, and lacks the spontaneous ease which only and long familiarity alone can give. The idea of this prologue is, however, good. The genius of Napoleon was at that moment preparing one of his greatest triumphs which he announced beforehand to his army. At nine o'clock in the evening he passed along the whole length of his line, for the double purpose of judging the direction of the enemy's forces and of animating his troops. He had first issued to them a proclamation, not only promising them victory, but even explaining to them the manoeuvre by which he was to obtain it. The news of his presence before the front of the corps d'armée, passing from one to the other like electricity, reached the extremity of the line. By a spontaneous movement the troops, raising bundles of blazing straw on poles, produced a novel and imposing illumination, while their shouts of "Vive l'Empereur!" carried proof to the enemy's camp of the enthusiasm which his presence had inspired. It took him not half an hour to pass along the line, and the splendour éclat during the short hours of repose. At four o'clock Napoleon was again on horseback. The moon had gone down, and the night was cold and dark, though the weather was fair. The reports which now and then indicated that the allies were continuing the movement which would give him the expected opportunity. At half of day a light fog obscured the horizon. Suddenly the fog cleared away. The camp of Austerlitz began to glow with fire, the heights of Pratzen, lately covered with Russian-Austrian troops, and now abandoned to Napoleon's meditated advance. As he rode toward Soult's corps, which he intended to make the decisive attack, he tells the soldiers that the enemy has imprudently exposed himself, and bids them close the campaign by a clap of thunder. Napoleon had a fine instinct for stage effect as well as tactics. The battle of Austerlitz was very like a play, and therefore a play may with some propriety be founded on the battle. The calm confidence of the Emperor, the enthusiasm of the army, the shouts and the illumination are a subject on which a dramatist of ancient Greece or modern France would have composed some hundreds of resounding lines. But Mr. Tom Taylor knows his business as an English playwright, and does not expend poetic ornament where it would only probably be thrown away. He could doubtless have written good blank verse upon this as he has done upon other inspiring themes, but he would have to find first a person to speak it, and secondly other persons to listen to it. We hear shouts and trumpet-calls, and see rather a feeble imitation of "boot and saddle" among the Colonel's troopers, upon which the curtain falls. We know from history that the Russian Cuirassiers of the Guard overthrew a battalion of French infantry and carried off its eagle. Napoleon directed to this point Bessières with the cavalry of his Guard, and ordered him to charge. The Russian cavalry, after a most honourable defence, yielded, and the play, when it begins, informs us that Colonel de Maurienne received a sabre-cut on the head while leading his regiment in this charge, and was left upon the field as dead.

The play suits Mr. Bandmann better than the prologue. The Colonel regained consciousness when actually lying in the trench for burial, among those who were dead beyond recovery. His wound healed, and he begged his way from Brunn to Strasburg, and entered by that Gate of Austerlitz where still, in mournful contrast between the generalship of the first and the third Napoleon, a handpost points the road "à Vienne." Arrived in France, the dead-alive asserts that he is Count de Maurienne, Colonel of the Cuirassiers of the Imperial Guard, who was returned as killed at Austerlitz. He is treated as the victim of an insane delusion, and makes the round of the madhouses of France. Between wandering and confinement eighteen years have passed, and when he makes his way to Paris his wife has married again and since died, and his daughter is grown to womanhood, and is entertaining the first germs of passion for a young doctor, under whose care her unknown father has been at Charenton. The villain of the play is the diplomatist, now a Duke, who undertook the mission to Berlin, and thus provided De Maurienne with the opportunity of which he availed himself to get knocked upon the head. The Duke married the widow, is guardian to the daughter, and testifies a disposition to stick to the family estates. The claim advanced by De Maurienne is treated as evidence of a fresh access of insanity, and his daughter is prevailed upon to assist the young doctor in luring her father back to Charenton, under the pretence that he is being acknowledged and restored to his own home in Paris. There is much pathos in the situation when the father finds that his daughter joins in the general belief that he is a madman, but his soliloquy is marred by the grotesque apparition of a keeper with a strait-waistcoat. Afterwards the Count, despairing of escape from Charenton, obtains poison and is about to drink it, when his daughter and the doctor appear to ask his pardon and his blessing. Documents attesting the recovery of the dead-alive in the Hospital of Brunn are discovered in an old knapsack by the agency of the comic characters of the play, and the wicked Duke's machinations are defeated. There is much to praise in the acting of Mr. and Mrs. Bandmann, as father and daughter, in these scenes in the Asylum. We wish that the author could have made a better play upon so good a subject, but if a conveniently portable article was required for a tour round the world, he has supplied the want.

Many of the theatres have now closed for a short recess, and when they reopen, which may be early in September, the winter season will, in theatrical parlance, have begun. As Mr. Boucicault has said, there are always enough people in London to fill a theatre if they can only be drawn into it. There are many features of the past season which may be reviewed with satisfaction. The success of Pygmalion and Galatea at the Haymarket, which was chiefly due to the acting of Miss Robertson, shows that the public is ready to recognize and reward merit, even when it takes an unusual method to display itself. A drama founded on a classical subject would appear unsuitable alike to the taste of the audience and the capacity of the company at this theatre, but nevertheless this drama was performed for many months to full houses with unbounded applause. Another great and legitimate success was attained by the revival at the Vaudeville Theatre of London Assurance. All the parts in this amusing comedy were well played, and some of them very well indeed. Whatever Mr. Boucicault may have written or acted recently, it ought never to be forgotten that he supplied the stage with a play that is always certain to be successful if a company can be found to act it. This play has only recently been withdrawn, and the same company, with some additions, has produced The School for Scandal, which bids fair to amalgamate the summer and winter seasons into one. Those unfortunate persons who are doomed to spend the month of August in London may obtain some mitigation of their misery by going to see Mr. W. Farren in the part which his father used to play so admirably. The success of the scene in the study was most largely due to Mr. W. Farren, but Miss Fawcett, Mr. Clayton, and Mr. H. Neville also deserved and earned an ample measure of applause. Indeed the applause was manifestly restrained in order that not a word or gesture of this excellent performance might be lost by the attentive audience. There is scarcely one of the parts in this play that is not well acted; the defects are small, the merits are great and varied, and the general result is a complete and well-deserved success. The managers, who contribute their full share to the effect of the scandal-mongering scenes, are probably satisfied, by nightly evidence of their success, that the promised production of Money may be indefinitely postponed. We spoke some weeks ago of the performance of Lord Lytton's play at the Prince of Wales's Theatre; and we can only repeat the expression of our satisfaction at the success of that establishment, which has been due to the production of good plays, well acted. Another house which has done a high class of business with fair encouragement is the Court Theatre. The manager has not, we think, been always happy in the choice of plays, but the revival of a comedy, by Mr. Falconer called Extremes has fitted the company accurately, and has afforded great and manifest satisfaction to the audience. That meritorious actor, Mr. Vezin, was seen to better advantage than he had lately been, and Mrs. Stephens and Mr. Righton, as the widow and son of a Lancashire farmer who have come into an enormous fortune, were very amusing. It is not perhaps a high compliment to say that this comedy was much more laughable than the burlesque which followed it. The fun, such as it was, of seeing Mr. Righton enact a parody of Mr. Irving in the Bells must have been pretty well worn out. If nobody else needs a holiday, the burlesque writers certainly do, and on their account it was quite time that the Court Theatre and some others should close their doors.

REVIEWS.

MEMOIRS OF BARON VON STOCKMAR.*

"THE life which you have led has been a subterraneous, an anonymous one; before long no man will know what you really were." There may at first sight seem something paradoxical in the fact of such a remark having been addressed to the late Baron Stockmar, and apparently acquiesced in by himself. Much misinterpreted as well as much honoured during his lifetime, the prediction may seem hazardous that he is likely to be forgotten soon after his death. At all events, however, it is doubtful whether even the monument raised by filial piety in the shape of a biographical sketch and a compilation of extracts from Stockmar's papers and from other sources concerning the chief political settlements and questions with which he was connected will enable posterity at large to do full justice to the services of this remarkable man. The truth seems to be, that with those who have consciously and deliberately chosen for themselves such a career as his, virtue must emphatically be its own reward. A title and a pension repay the services of an every-day courtier as of an every-day statesman. The honour is more rare of a tomb on which "friends in the reigning Houses of Belgium, Coburg, England, and Prussia" have inscribed the record of their grateful remembrance; but an epitaph is at best only a perfunctory substitute for fame. The late Baron Stockmar, when, in leading the life of a courtier—of the "good courtier" whose portrait was drawn in the Elizabethan age by Spenser—he steadfastly sought to pursue the aims of a statesman, consented to all the self-abnegation of the one career without aspiring to the most dazzling rewards of the other; and the one recompense which he has obtained is that of having, in the words of the German poet, "satisfied the best of his own," and thus "lived for all time." One of the least effusive of modern sovereigns, the late King of the Belgians, recognized in him "a friend rather than a servant"; and one of the most clear-sighted of modern statesmen, the late Lord Palmerston, declared that among politicians he had never met but one absolutely unselfish man, and that this was Stockmar. This is much; but it is well that it should also be remembered how the "good courtier" was also a true patriot; how he was prepared, if such had been his destiny, to assume a most responsible place in the direction of the affairs of the nation whose cause was ever nearest to his heart; how he was something more than the friend and adviser of princes, something better than a useful go-between, something utterly different from a successful intriguer. It is therefore most fitting that, before his memory has become a mere family reminiscence of the House of Coburg, his real services, which were by no means confined to that House, should have been permanently placed on record. The method in which this has been attempted by his son, Baron Ernest von Stockmar, is upon the whole, apart from some occasional indiscretion, fairly successful. His biographical sketch of his father's career is at once clearly and modestly written; but in the special chapters dealing with the principal political questions in which the late Baron bore an important part there is too much discursiveness, and, above all, too much quotation from well-known books. The par parenthèse way of trotting difficult political problems makes these Memoirs hard to digest, and places anything like a satisfactory summary of their contents out of the question.

Christian Frederick Stockmar began life as a physician—a profession which has naturally enough produced many courtiers, but few statesmen. Stockmar, who was destined to present so peculiar a combination of both characters, was wont to attribute much of his success as the confidential adviser of great persons to his medical training. "It was a clever trick," he writes in 1853, "to have originally studied medicine; without the knowledge thus obtained, without the psychological and pathological insight thus acquired, my savoir faire would have often been left out in the cold." But as yet he had no visions of this particular application of his capabilities; his heart was full of bitterness against the Napoleonic oppression under which Germany was groaning; and as chief physician to the Coburg and other Ducal Saxon contingents, he bore his part in the campaigns of 1814 and 1815. It was thus that he gained the confidence of Prince Leopold of Coburg, who, on his marriage to Princess Charlotte, summoned Stockmar to England as his body-physician. His journals contain many notes of the Royal personages and their surroundings with whom he was thus first brought into contact. In these the doctor's power of observation, particularly of physical peculiarities and habits, has the upper hand; and, upon the whole, the gallery of Royal portraits is anything but complimentary in character, so that we loyally confine ourselves to an extract concerning the impression created by an illustrious foreign visitor, the future Czar Nicholas, in 1816:—

He is an extraordinarily handsome and seductive young fellow; taller than Leopold, without being thin, straight as a pine-tree. The face as youthful as his, exceedingly regular in features, a fine open forehead, handsome curved eyebrows, an extremely handsome nose, a handsome, small mouth, and a finely-chiselled chin. . . . His behaviour is vivacious, without any constraint or stiffness, and yet extremely gentlemanlike. He speaks French very much and well, accompanying his words with not inappropriate gestures. Although not everything said by him was thoroughly sensible, yet everything was at all events exceedingly pleasant, and he seems to have a decided talent for paying court to ladies. If he wishes to give any special emphasis to anything in conversation, he shrugs up his shoulders and raises his eyes rather affectedly heavenwards. In all things he displays great self-confidence, but apparently without pretension.

He was not particularly attentive to the Princess, who addressed him oftener than he her. He ate very moderately for his age, and drank nothing but water. When after dinner Countess Lieven played on the piano, he kissed her hand, which struck the English ladies as extremely odd, but decidedly desirable. Mrs. Campbell could find no end to praise of him. "What an amiable creature! he is devilish handsome! he will be the handsomest man in Europe." On the following morning the Russians left the house. I was told that when bedtime arrived, a leathern sack filled with hay was placed in the stable for the Grand-Duke by his people, it being his invariable custom to sleep in this fashion. Our Englishman declared this to be an affectation.

The unhappy death of the Princess Charlotte put a sudden end to the happy life at Claremont, and for Stockmar personally this event may be said to have proved the beginning of his real career. He had prudently declined to exceed the sphere of his duties by attending the Princess in her confinement. "I was too well aware of the rocks ahead, and knew too well that the pride of the nation and the contempt of foreigners would, in case all went well, allow me no share of the praise, and in case it went ill leave me all the blame." Thus he was spared the bitter sense of responsibility which drove poor Sir Richard Croft to a desperate end; but it was at the deathbed of the Princess that Prince Leopold made his faithful follower promise never to abandon him, and that the relation between them began which formed the basis of the influence gradually acquired by Stockmar in the affairs of the House of Coburg. "I had no hesitation," he writes to his sister, "in promising what he may perchance consider permanently desirable, and perchance choose to do without already next year." But, whatever might be the result, he cheerfully accepted the issue. "I feel more and more that my lot is made up of unexpected turns, and many more of these will come before all is over. I seem to exist rather in order to take thought for others than for myself, and I am well contented with this mission." Yet it was no foolish trust in princes, but only a gradually maturing confidence in the character of the particular prince, which upheld Stockmar in his resolution. "The favour of princes is in general not worth a feather; but he (Prince Leopold) is in every respect an honest, good man, and therefore an incomparable prince."

The wisdom of Prince Leopold and of his adviser (whose post of body-physician had been exchanged for that of Private Secretary, Treasurer, and Comptroller of the Household, and who was soon afterwards ennobled) was for the first time severely tested on the occasion of the question of the Greek throne. In these transactions justice has hardly been done to the conduct of Prince Leopold; but though we may allow that it cannot be freed from the charge of inconsistency, it is clear that had Stockmar's advice been followed, the Prince would have avoided the false step which brought him so much obloquy, particularly from Russian sources. The Prince committed, against Stockmar's advice, the double error of dealing directly with the Greek emissaries, instead of sheltering himself behind the cover of an intermediary agent, and of signifying his readiness to accept the crown before securing the conditions—in particular the larger extent of territory—upon which he afterwards found it necessary to insist. The result has shown that Leopold acted wisely in refusing at the last; and that the policy was shortsighted which mutilated Greece at the moment of its new birth. But the notes of Baron Stockmar sufficiently disprove the common allegation that it was the prospect of the Regency in Great Britain which finally determined Prince Leopold's refusal of the Greek crown; and indeed the argument is incontrovertible, that the prospect in question was no prospect at all, for—

If George IV. died, the succession fell to the Duke of Clarence, then sixty-five years of age, who might very well live ten years more, and actually did live seven. Seven years were wanting to the Princess Victoria—then eleven years of age—towards her majority; the probability therefore was that she would attain to it (as it indeed actually happened) while the Duke of Clarence (William IV.) still lived, or that in the other case the regency could only last for a short time. And for this regency there were nearer candidates than Leopold—namely, the mother of the future Queen, the Duchess of Kent, and two English princes, uncles of the Princess, the Dukes of Sussex and Cambridge.

In any case the Greek crown was refused by Leopold, not without regrets; and these regrets, it is curious to know, survived even to the period when his tenure of the Belgian throne had become secure, and the chief trials of his position had been successfully overcome. He was even then at times heard to confess that Greece would have better satisfied his imagination than the somewhat sober charms of the Belgian monarchy. It was to such a confession, of which few may have suspected King Leopold to be capable, that Stockmar once answered very characteristically as follows:—

As to the poetry which Greece would have afforded, I do not attach much value to it. Mortals see none but the bad sides in the things which they have, and none but the good in the things which they have not. Herein lies the whole difference between Greece and Belgium, although it is not to be denied that when the first Greek King shall have perished after multitudinous troubles, his life might furnish the poet with a fine subject for an epical poem.

The mistakes committed in the Greek business were not repeated in the Belgian, and on one occasion at least in the course of these transactions the advice of Stockmar seems to have been of decisive importance. Leopold appears to have hesitated about accepting the Belgian Constitution, and this at the very critical moment when there was still a doubt as to the acceptance by the London Conference of the Eighteen Articles which alone made it possible for the Prince to venture on assuming the hazardous task:—

After a careful examination of the Belgian Constitution, my master doubted whether by means of such laws a State could be governed, and liberty and order, the two inseparable conditions of a progressive human community, could be preserved. "Dear Stockmar," said Leopold, "I wish you would read through the Constitution and tell me your opinion." I read through the new Belgian fundamental law with great attention, compared the several articles with one another, and in point of fact found that the power of the Government is mightily restricted. But my firm confidence in the people helped me through. "True," it was in some such terms that I addressed my intelligent master, "perfectly true, the authority of the King and of his Ministers is very greatly limited by this Constitution. Make the experiment whether all these liberties are reconcilable with order, make the experiment of governing according to the spirit of this Constitution, and that with the utmost conscientiousness. If you then find that with such a fundamental law a good Government is impossible, send after a time a message to the Chambers, in which you openly declare your experience, and demonstrate the defects of the Constitution. If you have in real truth acted to the best of your knowledge and conscience, the people will most assuredly stand by you, and gladly carry out all the changes of which the necessity can be proved."

King Leopold followed my advice. It is known that no evils of importance have shown themselves; it is known that in many respects Belgium stands as a model among European States.

King and people might look back with satisfaction upon the result of the Royal confidence thus generously urged. And it can hardly be doubted that no act of King Leopold more clearly attested his comprehension of the national duty of a king than that by which he cut the golden tie which bound him externally to another State. It is perhaps hardly worth while to revive the discussions by which certain over-jealous economists for a time deprived King Leopold's sacrifice of his English annuity of the recognition which it merited. It is known that this sacrifice neither was nor could be absolute; but the fears of Sir Samuel Whalley and others have proved imaginary; and time has demonstrated the absence of necessity for the inquiry which in 1834 Lord Palmerston derided in the following letter, which is too good to be left unquoted:—

MY DEAR BARON,—I have many apologies to make to you for not having sooner acknowledged the receipt of the Papers you sent me last week, and for which I am much obliged to you. The case seems to me as clear as day, and, without meaning to question the omnipotence of Parliament, which, it is well known, can do anything but turn Men into Women, or Women into Men, I must and shall assert that the House of Commons have no more right to inquire into the Details of those debts and engagements, which the King of the Belgians considers himself bound to satisfy before he begins to make his Payments into the Exchequer, than they have to ask Sir Samuel Whalley how he disposed of the fees which his mad Patients used to pay him, before he began to practise upon the foolish Constituents who have sent him to Parliament. There can be no doubt whatever that we must positively resist any such inquiry; and I am very much mistaken in my estimate of the present House of Commons if a large Majority do not concur in scouting so untenable a Proposition.

My dear Baron, yours sincerely, PALMERSTON.

In 1834 Baron Stockmar went to Coburg to spend a longer period of repose than usual with his wife and children. His son compensates the reader for the want of any personal reminiscences during the interval from 1834 to 1836 by a Memoir drawn up by King William IV. concerning his policy in the four preceding years. This document, never published before, will be of considerable interest to English readers, and by no means only to that gradually diminishing number who are never tired of hearing new correct versions of what the King said to Lord Grey on this occasion, and what Lord Grey said to the King on that. Moreover, it proves that King William IV., if more ready to listen to advice than his predecessors, was at heart equally convinced of his own directing intelligence, and was as true a son of his father as any of his brothers. With the accession of Queen Victoria, Stockmar's influence in English affairs recommenced, and he was above all an active participator in the negotiations which led to the happiest of Royal marriages, to which both Queen and country have owed so much. The chapters in the present work dealing with those transactions form an interesting supplement to the reminiscences which Her Majesty has herself given to the world. Stockmar accompanied Prince Albert on his journey to Italy in 1839, and was among the first to be informed of the engagement between the Prince and the Queen, which followed in the autumn of the same year. It was he to whom, as agent of the Prince, was confided the actual settlement of the marriage-treaty with the British Ministry, and it devolved on him to manage as best he could the awkward questions which arose as to the annuity and the Regency. The principle which he sought to assert, in the former case without success, was that Ministers should arrive at an understanding with the chiefs of the Opposition, and not abandon to Parliamentary discussion questions personally affecting the Royal Family. But his efforts were not, as he had thought, at an end with the completion of these arrangements. The birth of the Princess Royal opened a new sphere of activity to the trusted family adviser; "the nursery," he humorously complains, "gives me as much trouble as the Government of a kingdom could cause." Nor were his cares all of so pleasant a description; and those who are interested in such matters will find that as a reformer of the management of the Royal household the Baron found abundant opportunity for the exercise of his gift of common sense. His attention was once more turned to the interests of his original patron by the question of the Spanish marriages; but it is known how shortlived was the scheme of bringing about a union between Queen Isabella and King Leopold, in which he took so active a part. Nothing new is added to the story of a transaction upon which nobody but M. Guizot probably remains to look back with unqualified satisfaction; but though Baron Stockmar was in this instance not a dispassionate prophet, he was a true one when he foretold that this successful intrigue would prove the ruin of Louis-Philippe's reputation, and thus deprive his throne of its best element of stability. "From the innermost depths of truth a voice sounded to him—Où va trop loin, cela va fausser toute la politique de mon règne. He had guessed rightly; he lost the casquette which he had so long maintained, and will never regain it." Three months afterwards he was a fugitive in England.

What remains of these Memoirs relates principally to the affairs of Stockmar's own country. In these he had never ceased to take the deepest interest; but it was not his lot to exercise a really determining influence over them. In the crisis of 1848 he advised King Frederick William IV. with the same prudent boldness which he had exhibited towards Prince Leopold, but the sovereign with whom he had in this instance to deal was better capable of appreciating men than of resolving upon measures. Stockmar's plan for the regeneration of Germany, to which he in vain endeavoured to gain the assent of Bunsen, belongs to the forgotten schemes of the past; its essentials consisted in the gradual conversion of Germany without Austria into a united country under Prussian hegemony, by an act of self-denial which no Prussian statesman was ready to advocate. In a word, the Prussian States were to become the nucleus of a new Empire by a renunciation of all specific Prussianism in their constitutional life; they were to become immediate to the Empire, which the other States were to join with a temporary retention of their separate constitutional organizations. At one time Stockmar had nearly been summoned to fill the post of Prime Minister of the Empire as established by the Frankfort Parliament; he was ready to accept the office if Bunsen consented to accept the portfolio of Foreign Affairs. But the scheme came to nothing; and with the failure of the Frankfort Parliament Stockmar's active participation in German affairs came to an end. To the English Court he ceased to pay any personal visits after the year 1857, his last work having been to aid in the negotiations for the happy marriage of the Princess Royal. Already, in 1855, he had written:—

What I could afford by way of exhortation, advice, and aid has been furnished during eighteen long years; what hereof has not brought fruit, will hardly now begin to be of use. Nature accommodates itself to education up to a certain point; what lies beyond remains as nature has made it. Moreover, the Queen as well as the Prince are thirty-six years of age. They have already learnt much, and have throughout proved themselves intelligent and honest at heart. They have passed beyond the necessity of being actually guided—nothing beyond the mere counsel of friendship would be permissible. But, in order that such counsel should take effect, it must be given after a lively and vigorous fashion; this is no longer possible to me, and instead of creating the right impression, my advice would frequently only seem that of weakness, of excessive caution, and of nervous timidity.

In his retirement at Coburg it was his fate to survive nearly all those whom he had best served, and by whom he had been most truly honoured. King Frederick William IV., Prince Albert, King Leopold, all preceded him to the grave. In the first he could only regret one from whose hand he had long ceased to hope for the realization of his highest schemes. The death of the Prince Consort brought with it the satisfaction of seeing for the first time fully recognized merits of which he had contributed to develop the germ, and which he had helped to defend against perverse misjudgment during the discreditable squabble of 1853-4. The loss of King Leopold was bitterest of all, and brought the faithful old follower near to the verge of despair. A few months later he passed away himself, nearly seventy-seven years of age.

The element of greatness in Baron Stockmar, or, if the expression be preferred, that which enabled him to co-operate beneficently in the real progress of his age, lay in his conviction of the power belonging to the moral forces in humanity. These he was diligent to encourage in individuals; and fortune brought him into active contact with a princely family called to play a considerable part in European history, and naturally qualified to play it. But he also believed in the eternity of these forces in the life of nations. He honoured England, and such Englishmen as Sir Robert Peel, without any blind belief in the infallibility of our constitutional system or in the absolute excellence of any particular party programme. But he had no patience with reformers who wish to overthrow the balance which has ensured stability to the government of our country; "the omnipotence of the House of Commons," which he believed to be the object of the rising school of English politicians, he declared to be "revolution itself and death to the true old English Constitution." So far as in him lay, he helped to strengthen the authority of the Crown—from no servile motive, but because he knew that there must be authority in human society, and that authority is most readily obeyed when based on tradition combined with personal respect. He had not much reverence for diplomacy, except where it continuously pursues clearly defined ends in consonance with the real necessities of nations. He was decried as a backstairs intriguer; but there was in reality nothing secret about his dealings, as there was nothing which required to be hidden about his motives. It was not his lot to be practically much more than a well-wisher to the cause of his own nation; but it will be well for a State monarchically constituted like the new German Empire if its princes find servants as candid, advisers as disinterested, and friends as single-minded as the late Baron von Stockmar.

THE CHURCH OF UTRECHT.

(First Notice.)

THE opportune appearance of this little work from the pen of a German Protestant divine naturally invites us to say something of the history of a Church which, from its unique character and position, must always possess an interest for the ecclesiastical student, but which just now is attracting the notice of a much wider circle of readers. The recent Confirmation tour of the venerable Archbishop of Utrecht among the Old Catholics of Germany has given rise to various comments, favourable or unfavourable, in English journals, but almost invariably betraying a profound ignorance of the antecedents and claims of the body he represents. One paper, which manages to combine Ultramontane sympathies with advanced Protestantism, went so far as to ask, with a lofty disregard of the history both of doctrine and of fact, how Dr. Dollinger could recognize the orders of a Church tainted with Jansenist heresy. And even those who have some inkling of the actual state of affairs generally know little more than that a religious body exists in Holland, Roman Catholic in doctrine and ritual, but out of communion with Rome, which, however, does not dream of disputing the validity of its episcopal succession; that the announcement always formally made at Rome of each fresh election of an Archbishop of Utrecht is met by a fresh excommunication; and, perhaps, that the Archbishop and his suffragans presented a formal protest against the definition of the Immaculate Conception. Recent circumstances, however, have forced into public notice the only communion which is in a position to supply regular episcopal ministrations to the Old Catholics, and where indeed, as a Dutch historian, Janssenius, has pointed out, the very name of "Old Catholic" has been in use for a century and a half in the sense now given to it by the opponents of the Vatican Synod. At the Catholic Congress of Munich last September, where three Utrecht priests were present, Dr. Dollinger delivered an address on the history of this Church, in order to show that the charge of Jansenism was a mere ex post facto Jesuit libel, while the real origin of the quarrel with the Court of Rome must be sought in the strenuous resistance offered by the native hierarchy to the arbitrary attempt to supersede them by a new importation of Papal "Vicars Apostolic." He added that the bishops, priests, and laity of the Church had always declared the charge to be false, and that they had nothing to do with Jansenism, as was shown by their presenting professions of faith agreeing in every respect with Catholic doctrine. Even before the present controversy broke out in the Roman Catholic Church, the little Church of Utrecht was beginning to excite the interest both of Protestants and of Liberal Catholics. As early as 1838 a Protestant professor at Bonn wrote a work on the Archbishopric of Utrecht, with a view of showing its crucial importance whenever any boni fide attempt at reform should be made within the borders of Catholicism. And even before that, in 1826, the organ of the leading Catholic Faculty in Germany, the Theologische Quartalschrift of Tübingen, had called attention to this "unique phenomenon in the Catholic Church," which for more than a century had been able to hold its own, isolated as it was from the communion of the rest of Christendom, and repudiated by the chief pastor of the Church, "not for erroneous doctrines, but through human passions and pride." We may refer again to Sainte-Haube's charming, though somewhat discursive, History of Port Royal, and Reuchlin's work published under a similar title in Germany, which however have only a remote bearing on the Utrecht Church. But more lately it has been frequently treated of both in the Observateur Catholique and by M. Réville in the Revue des Deux Mondes; while in England some learned articles appeared in the now extinct Christian Remembrancer, from the pen of the late Dr. Neale, who also wrote one of the best books on the subject, A History of the so-called Jansenist Church of Holland. The work named at the head of this article is composed, the author tells us, "in the same ironic spirit as Dollinger's famous lectures on reunion," and appears to be written with great accuracy and fairness. We shall chiefly avail ourselves of its contents in the brief sketch we now propose to give of the history of the Church of Utrecht. That history naturally divides itself into the periods before and after the separation from Rome about the beginning of the eighteenth century; and the latter period may again be subdivided at the fall of Napoleon in 1814, when the persecuted remnant had passed unscathed through the second great crisis of its history.

It is curious, in view of later events, that our first notices of the Church of Holland in the middle ages represent it as engaged on the anti-Papal side in the conflicts of the day. Bishops of Utrecht were present at the Synods of Aix and Metz in the ninth century, and again at the Synod of Rheims in 992, all held in opposition to the claims of Rome. So again in the great contest between Hildebrand and the Emperor Henry IV., Bishop William of Utrecht took the Imperial side, and was the first to sign the decree of the Synod of Worms pronouncing the deposition of the Pope, as his successor, Bishop Conrad, signed a similar decree of the Synod of Brixen in 1080. Later on the Dutch bishops appear to have taken the Papal side, which was indeed on the whole the right side, in the investiture controversy; but afterwards the oppressive exactions of the Court of Rome, especially during the time of the Avignon Captivity and the schism of the anti-Popes, led to fresh quarrels between the Papacy and the Church of Holland, and in 1423 the country was placed under interdict by Martin V.; but the clergy resisted, and Eugenius IV. had to remove the sentence. Meanwhile the Utrecht bishops were honourably distinguished by their zealous encouragement of the reading of the Bible and the numerous vernacular translations published under their auspices. The "Brethren of the Common Life," of whom some account is given in Dr. Neale's history, were also a product of the Church of Holland. Thomas à Kempis being their most conspicuous ornament. And the last non-Italian Pope, the pious Adrian VI., who only survived his election a twelvemonth, was a Netherlander. But before the Reformation the Franciscan and Dominican monks, who gained an entrance into Holland about the middle of the thirteenth century, were sowing the seeds of discord between the Papacy and the native episcopate, of which their more energetic successors, the Jesuits, were afterwards to reap the harvest.

It was not till the Reformation, and partly as a counter-move against it, that Utrecht was raised to an archbishopric by Philip II., and the five newly created sees of Haarlem, Deventer, Leuwarden, Groningen, and Middelburg placed under it, and the nation seem to have resented the change as an attack on their liberties. The first Archbishop, Frederick Schenck, was consecrated in the Cathedral of Utrecht in October 1568, and twelve years later the city submitted to the Prince of Orange. Both the Archbishop and his suffragan died without leaving any succession. The next Archbishop nominated by the Spanish Crown never put in an appearance, and the Chapter elected Sasbold Vosmeer Vicar-General, who was afterwards consecrated at Rome under the title of Archbishop of Philippi, in order, as the Pope explained, to avoid irritating the heretics. But meanwhile the Jesuits had effected their first settlement in Holland in 1592, and Vosmeer on returning home found himself implicated in a charge of high treason occasioned by their political machinations, and was sentenced to banishment and confiscation of his property. Thenceforth, till his death in 1614, he had to rule his diocese from Cologne, and in chronic warfare with the intrusive Order, who wanted to get the archbishopric abolished and the Church of Holland placed under the jurisdiction of the Nuncio at Cologne, or, in other words, placed entirely in their own hands. The last official document of the Archbishop, issued only four months before his death, is full of complaints of the ambition, avarice, fickleness, and hatred of the Jesuit missionaries. And matters only grow worse afterwards. The next Archbishop was Rovenius, who was very active in combating the Protestant sectaries, but he too found himself involved before long in difficulties with the Jesuits, and addressed an elaborate misive against their "fraudulent machinations" in 1623 from Rome to the pro-Vicar of Haarlem, which, as the writer in the Tübingen Quartalschrift observes, clearly proves that he claimed "ordinary" jurisdiction over all the clergy, both regular and secular, as Archbishop. At last a Concordat with the Jesuits was arranged, with the sanction of Urban VIII., but they could never be induced to observe it. Ten years afterwards Rovenius writes to a certain Father Tirinus, "entreating him by the mercies of God to cease stirring up the hearts of the innocent against their pastors," and similar complaints are repeated five years later in a memorial addressed by him to the Pope. Jansen, the famous Bishop of Ypres, was a friend of Rovenius, who seems to have formed a favourable judgment of his Augustinus, but assented at once to the Bull directed against it in 1642. On his death, in 1651, James de la Torre, who had been his condjutor, succeeded to the archbishopric. He had been a close ally of the Jesuits, but nevertheless he now found himself compelled to protest against their proceedings at Rome, and issue stringent injunctions for the better observance of the Concordat; but all in vain. He died of a broken heart, and the Chapter elected John van Neercassel, a man of sterner metal, who vigorously resisted Jesuit aggressions. And now first the nickname of Jansenists began to be applied to the episcopal party who had formerly been called "Sasboldians," after Sasbold Vosmeer, by their Jesuit assailants. The explanation is a very simple one; many of the persecuted Jansenist clergy so-called, who had been driven out of France where their enemies ruled supreme, took refuge in Holland, and being men of piety and sterling worth, were naturally welcomed as helpers and allies by their clerical brethren there, who had the same foe to contend against. Neercassel presented thirteen propositions for the restraint of Jesuit influence to the Pope, and as similar complaints against them as "enemies and rivals of episcopal authority everywhere" were pouring in from bishops of the most remote regions, and even one of the Cardinals had denounced their "universal disobedience," a General Congregation of the Sacred College, in 1671, sanctioned most of Neercassel's demands, but with little practical result. He had to encounter another serious difficulty in the bitter enmity against Catholicism provoked by the dragonnades of Louis XIV. and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. But his personal character seems to have commanded general respect, and he was also distinguished as a devotional writer; but his chief work, Amor Patriæ, which was highly praised by Bossuet, was put on the Index at Rome, though Innocent XI. would never allow the decree to be published. It was published in 1690, the year after his death, when the author had already gone to his rest. He died of an illness brought on by over-exertion in a Confirmation tour in 1686.

And now we come to the most critical epoch in the history of the Utrecht Church. On Neercassel's death his friend, Francis von Heussen, was elected by the Chapter, but the Jesuit party contrived to have his appointment annulled at Rome, thinking it a favourable opportunity for getting the native hierarchy suppressed, and the Church of Holland placed, according to their old scheme, under the Papal nuncio at Cologne. But in this they were foiled. The Chapter elected Peter Codde, a man of deep piety, but undecided and scrupulous, and the election was confirmed at Rome. Five years later, Innocent XI. having died in the interim, the Jesuits lodged a formal charge of Jansenism against him before the Holy See, but a Commission presided over by Cardinal Albani, afterwards Clement XI., entirely acquitted him. His assailants, however, were not to be so easily discouraged. In 1697 Father Doucin, a Jesuit who had accompanied the French Embassy sent to Holland about the Treaty of Ryswick, published an anonymous pamphlet "On the Condition and Progress of Jansenism in Holland." The alleged grounds of the indictment were the encouragement of Bible reading, the too great strictness in the confessional, the use of the vernacular in baptism, marriage, and extreme unction, and the inadequate devotion paid to relics and images. The Court of Rome acted warily; many vigorous replies were published, and the Archbishop himself wrote three times to the College of Propaganda, demanding an investigation, but could get no reply. At last he sent in his defence, and on September 25, 1700, his deposition was secretly decreed, but on the same day a polite invitation was despatched to him from the Propaganda to come to Rome, "where his counsel was needed in certain weighty matters." Codde, to use the words of Professor Nippold, was "one of those men of the Hanseburg and Hufels stamp, who are ready to sacrifice their convictions to external union with Rome." He obeyed the summons, and was received with studied courtesy, but his request for a written statement of the charges against him and the names of his accusers was persistently evaded. However, he handed in a second reply, and more than three hundred of his clergy wrote in his defence, of not including any of the Jesuits. The matter was allowed to hang fire for two years, when at last a Commission of ten Cardinals, appointed under hostile influences, felt constrained to acquit him in December 1701; but their decision was kept secret, and the opposite party contrived to get it superseded in the following May, for, as the Tübingen reviewer observes, "they cared nothing about his orthodoxy; their object, and their sole object, was to get him deposed, and a friend of the Jesuits put in his place." At last, in June 1702, Theodore de Cock was named Vicar-Apostolic, and his nomination announced to the Chapter of Utrecht, but without any intimation to the Archbishop himself, who had now been detained two years and a-half in Rome, and was still outwardly treated with every mark of respect. The Chapter refused to recognize "the usurped authority" of De Cock, and the Government annulled his appointment, and threatened to imprison him and banish all the Jesuits from Holland if Codde was detained any longer. That kind of argument Rome always understands. Codde was at once dismissed with the Pope's blessing, but without being informed that six days before a Papal misive had been despatched to the Catholics of Holland, endorsing the sentence of deposition against him. Meanwhile a letter of De Cock's to the Propaganda, which fell into the hands of the Government, led to his flight and banishment, and thenceforth he resided at Rome as Chamberlain of the Pope, and continued to traduce and vilify his native Church at his leisure. Codde returned home, but was too scrupulous to resume his episcopal functions; in reply to fresh accusations, he professed his acceptance of the five articles against Jansenism, but steadily refused to the last to declare the condemned propositions to be contained in Jansen's book. The supreme absurdity of defining, not as a matter of criticism but of dogma, that certain propositions are contained implicitly in a large folio, and the immoral tyranny of requiring persons who have never read the book, or who, like Codde, have read it and come to different conclusions, to swear that they are contained there, is of course self-evident. Nevertheless for refusing to do this the Roman Inquisition anathematized him after his death, and forbade his having Christian burial or prayers being offered for his soul.

But the patience of the Chapter of Utrecht was already exhausted. Catz, who had acted as Vicar-General during the Archbishop's detention at Rome, and had been suspended, issued a protest against the decree of Propaganda, and appealed ad Papam melius informandum, and the Chapter refused to receive Adam Dæmen, who was appointed Papal Vicar. In July 1700 the Jesuits were actually banished from Holland. On December 18, 1710, the Archbishop died excommunicate, and the breach with Rome had begun. At that time the Jesuits were still seemingly at the zenith of their power. They ruled the French Church through the King's mistress, Madame de Maintenon. Only the year before Codde's death the hated establishment of Portugal had been broken up by an armed force despatched by Cardinal de Noailles, the much-enduring nuns ejected and distributed among different French prisons for refusing to swear assent to two contradictory decisions of successive Popes, the convent buildings levelled to the ground, and the bones of their former occupants exhumed and burnt amid outrages too loathsome to be specified. Three years later the long struggle of the Jesuits for doctrinal supremacy was crowned by the Bull Unigenitus. But already they were tottering to their fall. The Provincial Letters had been in circulation for half a century, and in another half-century the Order was destined to succumb to the universal indignation of Catholic Europe.

In a future notice we hope to trace the history of the Church of Utrecht from the separation with Rome to the present time.

THE HEBREW OR IBERIAN RACE.*

HERE is another of those astonishing productions which ever and anon come from a set of worthy people who, one would think, must live, like the Cyclopes, in caves or on the tops of mountains, or, like Homer's goddesses, each one by himself in an island of his own, musing much, reading somewhat, but seeing and hearing nothing of what goes on in the common world. We might conceive them as a kind of intellectual anchorites, each man quartered in a different corner of the desert, and each diligently watering his own dry stick, at the bidding, for aught we know, of the supreme Archimandrite of this austere and self-denying order. Self-denying we say; for it really must need something of an effort when a man, whose wish evidently is both to gain knowledge for himself and to spread it abroad among others, deliberately cuts himself off from all the ordinary opportunities of finding that for which he is seeking. It is of course easy to understand that a man who cares nothing about a particular subject may know nothing of the sources of knowledge which seem most obvious to those who do care about it. But it is not easy to conceive a man who has tastes which lead him to study, or at least to think about, a particular subject, but who really knows as little about the most obvious sources of knowledge on that subject as if he had himself never given the subject a thought. It does seem to imply something of a deliberate act, something of a designed self-banishment to such caves and islands as we before hinted at. The only difficulty as to our theory—shall we say our Cyclopean, our Cimmerian, or our Troglydote theory?—is that the members of this remarkable sect do contrive, in one very important point, to keep up a connexion with the outer world. We think it was not a philologist of any kind, but a commentator on the Bible, who himself printed his many folios in his own kitchen with no help but that of his maidservant. But the class of whom we now speak are not driven to such shifts; they find printers and publishers in London, Oxford, and other cities of articulate-speaking men. Mr. Kilgour indeed seems, by the quarter in which his speculations are given to the world, to aspire to a circulation spreading over a wider field than the Isle of Britain. Indeed "the right of translation is reserved." We can only suppose that Mr. Kilgour has hopes of seeing himself appear either in the Hebrew or in the Basque tongue—only, on his theory, perhaps one translation might do for both. The better known languages of civilized Europe would perhaps hardly come within his range. At any rate we fear that Mr. Kilgour in any language will find the wise men of Germany very stubborn in belief; a long way removed from his theories about the Hebrews and the Iberians.

Mr. Kilgour is not at all of the same sect as Mr. Kavanagh, who knows what the comparative philologists have said, but who thinks it all wrong. Nor is he of the same sect as Mr. Brown, who writes about Poseidon, who also knows what the comparative philologists have said, and who thinks that he believes the same as they do, while in truth he says something quite different. With Mr. Kilgour all the scientific research of the last half-century goes altogether for nothing. We think that his treatise contains no reference to it whatever, beyond a single contemptuous mention of the Sanscrit language. There is no sign that he ever heard of such distinctions as Aryan, Semitic, Turanian, and such like. Still less is there any sign that he ever heard of such a thing as Grimm's Law. If any two names in any two languages happen to have a letter or two the same, it is enough to make Mr. Kilgour put this and that together. It does not matter whether history and geography allow of any connexion between the two things; it does not matter whether the laws of language allow of any connexion between the two names; it does not matter whether Mr. Kilgour has got hold of the genuine forms of the words, or only of some modern corruptions of them; if he can find a b and an r in any two names in any part of the world, it is enough for him to prove them to be undoubtedly connected, and to infer their bearers to have been Hebrews, Iberians, Cumbrians, Hibernians, and what not, all at once. Wherever a b and an r are to be found, there is Heber; and wherever a p or any letter at all cognate to p is found in company with n, say, for instance, among the Vandals, or at Winchester, or generally anywhere else, there are the Poeni, or Phœnicians, who are the same as the Pelasgians, who are again the same as certain Jews in Abyssinia called Falasha or Falasyans. The Guebres in Persia are Hebrews. "In Thrace we have the large river the Hebrus, the derivation of which from Heber is self-evident, and which, like the river Chaboras, flowed through a country inhabited by the children of Eber." So of course did the Iberus or Ebro in Spain, "and the name of Iberia directly shows the connexion of Spain with the children of Eber." "The derivation of the name Epirus (Eberus) is discernible at once." All this is a comparatively mild form of lunacy, but things get stronger when we are told that "the towns of Cabyra, Cabira, Ibor, Imbrus, Baris, Darissa, and Prusa, the people called Tibarenti, and the rivers Thymbrus and Thymbrius"; Phrygia, too, Parones, Bornæa, Bessapara, Selymbria, and Mesembria, Perhaolia (Eberhebia), Brauron, Paros, Imbrus, and "the Promontories of Zephyrium in Crete, of Caphareus in Eubœa (sic), and of Cyparietus in the Peloponnesus," and the isle of Cyprus itself, all bear in their names the signs of the presence of these same ubiquitous children of Eber. More strangely still, they have their mark on the district of Parasopias in Boeotia, and on "certain of the Spartans called Parthenians." These last bits of etymology are fine examples of the way in which a man with a theory will pass by the things which lie most directly under his nose. So again, the following bit shows how much better it is to go all lengths while one is about it:—

Hesperia was an ancient name of Italy, and of Spain. It is submitted that this name was derived from Heber. Another derivation has been given, namely, from Hesperus, the evening star. But, as often happens, is this not reversing the derivation? Has Hesperus not been derived from Hesperia? In corroboration of the derivation from Eber, we have Hispania as a name of Spain, Hispalis (the modern Seville) as the name of a most ancient and most important city of Spain, stated to have been founded by the Poeni. Now the name of Hispania is evidently derived from the Poeni—His-Poeni—and Hispalis from the Pelasgi, His-Pali; and may we not therefore most justly conclude that Hesperia is derived from Hes-Iberia?

Meanwhile it is funny that, when Mr. Kilgour comes across a real bit of Hebrew, he does not see it. We had always thought that the name of Dido was good Semitic, and was in truth nothing else than the feminine of David. But Mr. Kilgour says that "the name of Dido (Divido) seems to be a Latin translation of Peleg or Pelasgi—her other name, Elissa, seeming to be a softened and contracted form of Pelasgi." This instance shows that while Mr. Kilgour is so busy with his friends under their primary name of Hebrews, he does not forget them under their other titles. So again when he is in the thick of Parasopias and Perhaolia, alias Eberhebia, he does not forget that the latter district has "the large river Peneus [we wonder how Mr. Kilgour writes this name in Greek] flowing along its boundary, and deriving its name from the Poeni, another name of the same race, and we also know that the same race, under the name of Pelasgi, were so numerous and powerful in Thessaly that it was called Pelasgia." One passage more, and we think that we shall have given specimens enough of the theoretical parts of Mr. Kilgour's essay. While we are in the middle of these more ancient speculations we suddenly find ourselves carried away to people who more nearly concern us, and to the days of the Wandering of the Nations:—

It may be here adverted to that there has always been to us something of the nature of an enigma about the German Vandals having conquered Spain in the year 411 of the Christian era; and about their country Andalusia—that is, Vandalusia—lying in the most southern part of Spain; and about their conquests in Africa—an enigma never as yet cleared up to our satisfaction. In point of fact, was all this not brought about by the native Jews or Vandals of Spain? But into this matter we cannot enter further at present, as it would take up too much time.

We could almost wish that Mr. Kilgour had found time for the purpose, as few things could be more curious than the arguments by which it might be shown that Gonseric was a Jew.

But we had inklings all along that there was something at work in Mr. Kilgour's mind more than mere ethnological or etymological speculation. Very early in the argument, among "facts now existing" we find "that the Jews, like the old Phœnicians, Poeni, or Vends, have been from time immemorial, and still are, great traders and financiers; the Jewish family of Rothschild being, in this respect, in the present day, the first in Europe or the world, whether as regards Jews or Christians." But we come to greater things when we get into our own island. It is a small matter to be told that "there is every reason for believing that Britain was originally Eberitain," and that Eber is to be found at Dumbarton, the Humber, Eboracum, Cumberland, and a crowd of other names, besides the remarkable fact that "certainly the name of the Western Isles—the Hebrides [where unluckily the ri is a mere miswriting for u—embodies the name of Heber with scarcely any contraction whatever." It is something more when we read

There was a town in Northumberland, in the territory of the Brigantes, named by the Romans Birenium, and which evidently meant the Hebrewmen. In connection with this, it will be found most significant that a well-known Hano town of the same name—Bremen—existed in Germany, where the Vends or Vandals were settled.

But in the next page we come to something far more important:—

It may be allowed to be observed as not without interest, in connection with the origin of the names of the Britanic Isles and the race of Eber, that an undoubted descendant of that race has lately occupied the position of Prime Minister in the Government of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland.

After this we confess that we hurried on through a great deal about Vandals and other people, and about the names of the Deity in various languages, and even about such more exciting facts as that the Latin pundus and English pound, the Latin fœnus, "meaning usury or interest," and yet more fœnia, a rope—"for commerce can scarcely be carried on without ropes in connexion with ships and otherwise"—were all obviously derived from the mercantile Poeni, Phœni, or Vends; who, by the way, were called so called from their habit of wounding or going about, or else the verb to wound was formed from their name, which last Mr. Kilgour thinks is more likely. Considering several of the Moss's laws, we were not surprised to hear that "an extremely old and close connexion had existed between the Hebrew race and goats," but it did seem strange to read, "that the Hebrew race had to do with the rearing and breeding of swine may be deduced from the names of the male of the sew in Greek, Latin, and English." It was even more curious to read that "Pony seems to be directly connected with Poeni," and that "ponny is evidently derived from Poeni." The following also was not a little interesting:—

That the names of wine in Greek, Latin, and English—oince (or phoinos), vinum, and wine—are all evidently derived from the name of the Poeni or Peni, who must therefore have introduced its use into these countries; and must be admitted that the Hebrew race have always had a strong love for alcohol in every shape, vinous and otherwise. Beer may be traced to the same race, the Iberi, and ale to the worshippers of El. We have also the Latin word ebrius.

Yet we hastened through all these things to get to some pages in smaller print towards the end, which looked as if they contained some more practical suggestions. It seems that Mr. Kilgour wishes to promote the further progress of mankind, and with that end he has "written and published two brief yet comprehensive papers—one of a political and social, the other of a scientific nature—both of which, he humbly apprehends, clearly point the way in which such progress ought to proceed." The second, or scientific paper, has a title which is too hard for us, "Nitrogen shown to be carbonic oxide in an allotropic state." But, according to Mr. Kilgour's own account of it, "in it is revealed a harmony in the constitution of nature of the most simple, beautiful, comprehensive, and self-proving order, having the effect of elevating and expanding the mind, and redounding in the highest degree to the glory of the Creator." We deeply regret therefore that both this paper and its fellow "had, as was perhaps to be expected, very little circulation." Yet the title of the other, first published in 1858, and republished in 1869, was a taking title, a title which, as Mr. Kilgour says, "in some degree explains the object of the paper, that object being in complete accordance with the deeply interesting history and the most valuable traditions of Great Britain." It runs thus:—"Proposition of a Joint Committee of the Legislatures and Governments of the British Empire, having periodical meetings in Great Britain." We have very vague notions of what such a Joint Committee would be like, but we are assured that, "most carefully guarded and thoroughly practical, the proposed institution would tend to elevate and expand the minds of men in a way never before witnessed." "The still, small voice of the Goodness and the Truth embodied in the propositions in these papers, but especially in the first, shall yet, it is believed, prevail over, and will help entirely to supersede, the various kinds of artillery with their melancholy and terrible power of devastation and destruction." The institution of the Joint Committee "will constitute one of the great eras in the world." "The Acts enacting its institution will be the truest educational Acts ever enacted." And no wonder, for "the Empire will then be made, in one point of view, to form, as it were, one vast educational University." The Joint Committee is to do all kinds of wonderful things for the whole British Empire. It is to be a greater work than the Suez Canal; it is to get rid of all need of Ballot Bills and Permissive Bills, and even, if we rightly understand Mr. Kilgour, to banish "party vainglory, party strife, and party selfishness, at least for a time." "The proposed unification, first commencing with the colonies, will ultimately include India. Carried into effect, this will no doubt be one of the greatest crowning works of the Hebrew race." We presume therefore that it is to be carried out by that "undoubted descendant of that race who has lately occupied the position of Prime Minister." But it is upon Ireland, Hibernia, the island in whose name, as Mr. Kilgour reminds us, "the name of Heber is retained without any contraction whatever," that the Joint Committee will shed its choicest blessings. "Such a union will be seen by our Irish brethren to be infinitely more desirable, and calculated to be infinitely more beneficial, than Home Rule, with its isolating, and therefore most retrogressive tendencies, a union which ought to cause all good men of every creed and of every country to rejoice, and to look forward to the future with high hope, and in the contemplation of the realization of which Heaven itself would resound with songs of the highest joy." These are great things to come of a Joint Committee, even aided by the fact that nitrogen is carbonic oxide in an allotropic state. We feel about them as we do towards our old friends the Freemasons when they tell us all about Freemasonry except what Freemasonry is. So our heart turns towards the Joint Committee and the allotropic nitrogen which are in this way to regenerate India and Ireland; only we long to know what they are. If we had ever seen the two papers, doubtless we should know; but, owing no doubt to the very little circulation of the still small voice of goodness and truth, we have, alas, never come across them. Yet we feel sure that they would raise us far above any such small matters as whether pennies and pence take their name from the Poeni, whether the Wends were so called from their habit of wending, and whether the city of Bremen really means a dwelling of Hebrew men. We will only end with Mr. Kilgour's glowing picture of what the Hebrew race is to do when once the Joint Committee is appointed:—

In this way, shall we carry out into full development the great civilizing mission of the Hebrew race, for we venture to predict that the proposed Joint Committee, when instituted, would, through the benign influences which would be brought to bear upon it, naturally and gradually, however slowly, expand into the sublime spectacle of a World-Council, with all its benefits.

BRITISH MUSEUM PHOTOGRAPHS*

THE British Museum has long ago made good its title to the foremost place among national collections of its class. Nor is this supremacy due alone to the encyclopædic character of its contents. It is even in a higher degree owing to the unsurpassed excellence of the objects which it has to show in well nigh every department. The energy and ability of its official staff, backed by the munificence and public spirit of many a donor, added to a highly creditable liberality on the part of the national purseholders, have brought about a result not only flattering to the national pride, but of invaluable service to the study of science and art.

Limited as the immediate benefit of collections of this class has hitherto been, and in the nature of things must to a great extent ever be, to those who can command opportunities of personal inspection and study, there is much that can be done in an indirect way to diffuse a knowledge of their contents. The advance recently made in the auxiliary processes of art has opened a way in this direction which promises results of a highly satisfactory kind. It is precisely in this department that photography best lends itself to the purposes of diffusion and study. The representation of art treasures such as those we speak of has been till now possible only at an immoderate cost. An enterprise lately set on foot with praiseworthy spirit will henceforth place within the scope of ordinary means a series of the masterpieces of the national collection. By the sanction of the Trustees and with the aid of the principal Librarian, nearly a thousand plates have been taken of objects selected by the several heads of departments, which may be looked upon as typical specimens in each class. It has been stipulated that the price of each print, varying in size from 12 by 10 to 10 by 8 inches, shall not exceed two shillings unmounted. The price of mounted prints rises in a graduated scale to 3s. 9d. for cut mounts, buff, white, or blue, with gilt-edged opening. Suitable portfolios are provided, and are offered gratis to each purchaser of a set, a complete section, or any 100 selected photographs. The complete set, comprising 929 mounted photographs in twelve portfolios (gratis), is to be purchased for 116l. 2s. 6d., or, bound in twelve handsome volumes, in the highest of three optional styles, for 143l.

The full series of photographs, made up of seven parts, is designed to exhibit evidences of man's advance from the earliest known stage of his history, with the gradual development of social life and usage, of belief, science, and artistic culture, to their highest or latest standards. The Prehistoric and Ethnographical section, which rightfully leads the way, has been selected and catalogued by Mr. A. W. Franks, who has also discharged the same good offices for the Antiquities of Britain and Objects of Mediæval Art which form Part VI. Parts II.—V. inclusive, comprising respectively the Egyptian, the Assyrian, the Grecian, and the Etruscan, running into the Roman period, have been committed to the able hands of Dr. Samuel Birch, assisted in the Assyrian Department by Mr. George Smith, the editor of the recent Life of Ashur-bani-pal, and in that of Classic Antiquity by Mr. Charles Newton. To Mr. Walter De Gray Birch is due the Catalogue of Seals of Sovereigns, Corporations, &c., which forms the Seventh Part. No higher authorities, it will be seen at once, could have been chosen for the conduct of the design; and the selection of examples, ably photographed by Mr. Stephen Thompson, bespeaks the care and judgment with which their task has been fulfilled. The general introduction, from the pen of Mr. Charles Harrison, marred as it is in parts by slovenly writing, traces with clearness, and with as much fulness as is compatible with the limits of a popular summary, the successive stages of culture illustrated in each several series as connected periods in the evolution of mankind. No pains have been spared in preparing what the publishers have reason to regard as the best and cheapest means of placing such collections before the historian, the student, or the public, especially if it should be followed up by a systematic exchange of similar photographs between the chief national and local Museums of Europe and America.

Exact chronology in the case of the rude objects which betoken man's earliest presence upon the earth is of course out of the question. In presenting, however, a selection of unpolished stone implements from the drift at Hoxne, Herno Bay, Gray's Inn Lane, and Abbeville, it cannot be questioned that the series before us carries the mind back to as remote and rudimental a period of man's being and intelligence as we have the means of figuring to ourselves. Other groups of chipped flints, some bearing unmistakable marks of wear, from Porth, the Aveyron, and elsewhere, furnish no less typical specimens of prehistoric handicraft. Plates 5 and 6 show seventeen harpoon-heads of reindeer horn, some barbed on one side, others on both sides, probably used in fishing, from a cave near Bruniquet, Tarn et Garonne. To the same Palæolithic, or First Stone Period, belong the needles and other instruments, chiefly of horse's-bone, together with divers bones showing figures of animals rudely etched, which form a succession of interesting plates. Most noteworthy of all must be thought the rough but expressive figure of a mammoth (Plate 10) carved in reindeer horn, as the handle of a poignard, from a cave at Montastruc, near Bruniquet, photographed from a cast in the Christy Collection. We fail to see the not less curious etchin of the side view of a mammoth on a large bone, apparently of the urus, which, unless memory deceives us, is also to be seen in the Christy Museum. These rude drawings are of infinite value as unmistakable proofs of man having lived in company with the mastodon and other long extinct mammals. Three casts of skulls found in a cave at Oromagnon, near Les Eyzies, Dordogne (Plate 12), exhibit probably as early remains of man himself as research has disinterred from their resting-place of ages. It is interesting to compare with these the modern carving in walrus-ivory, horn, and wood (Plate 91, Ethnographical Series), by natives of the North-West Coast of America. We may further, by the aid of the same series, study side by side the earliest prehistoric flint flakes from the Glacial drift with implements used at the present day by the Arctic tribes or Pacific islanders. Here are proofs of the persistence of the most archaic and simple forms of human art down to the present day. Intermediate forms may be instructively seen in the implements of the Neolithic or Polished Stone Period, and that at which bronze, and subsequently iron, came into use. Picks from antlers of red deer, probably used in getting from the chalk the material for flint weapons, implements, or ornaments (Plate 18); hammers pierced probably with a wooden drill worked with sand and water; knives, scrapers, and arrow and javelin heads of flint, together with the cores from which they have been chipped (Plate 21), are fair and graphic illustrations of primeval art. From the simple threshing-machines now in use in the East or at Aleppo (Plates 42 and 43) we may infer other modes in which these hard native materials were made into a rude kind of machinery, not less difficult to make or less ingenious in invention than many a more complex engine of our day. Still higher ideas of the artistic taste and powers of handicraft attained at that early age are forced upon us by the curious colossal figure, Hoa-huka-nana-In, from Easter Island (Plates 77 and 78), hewn from hard granite, most expressive in its gorilla-like cast of feature, the back incised with native animals and symbols. Whether we agree or not with the view taken in the preface, that this idol is the work of a race that knew not the use of metal, we can scarcely be wrong in recognizing in it the memorial of a civilization long passed away.

Passing from the prehistoric to the historical period, we find ourselves first upon firm and solid ground among the mighty monuments of the Nile valley. The wealth and variety of materials furnished by the Egyptian Department of the National Collection enables Dr. Birch to illustrate the earliest authentic stage of civilised life with a degree of fulness of which none other is perhaps equally capable. What particularly arrests the eye is probably the high pitch of artistic skill and domestic comfort at which the Egyptian is thus early seen. Porcelain tiles dating as far back as the Second Dynasty (Plate 286), a glass perfume bottle bearing the name of Thothmes III., Eighteenth Dynasty (1450 B.C.), the earliest glass known with a date (plate 283), a wooden board with Hieratic inscription, a treatise on grammar and rhetoric for the use of a school, written about 1800 (Plate 280), mural paintings and tablets in tempera, almost without number, depicting scenes of domestic life, agricultural work, sporting, music, and dancing, royal triumphs, rites of religion and care of the dead, bring before us every phase of a national life which reached its culminating point some thirty-three centuries ago. Arranged as far as may be in chronological order, and grouped systematically as connected subjects, these expressive plates furnish a pictorial history in which the native and original elements of art and thought can be traced without a break till they wane and are superseded under the influence of foreign and intrusive styles. Another great and independent well of civilization is opened up among the newly recovered treasures of Assyria and Babylonia. It is in this department that one main design of the present publication is most signally to be realized. The magnificent series of inscribed slabs, cylinders, and tablets may be studied by the aid of these clear and well-defined photographs with a facility greater even in some respects than is possible within the walls of the Museum itself. Students of cuneiform writing will find here examples in almost endless number and variety, admirably selected and classified. Not to speak of the sources of historical knowledge to be opened up in the records of the realm, with the codes of law or domestic usage, it were sufficient to point to the series comprising an entire grammatical encyclopedia from the library of Asshur-ban-i-pal (667 A.D.), of which an analysis is given in Mr. Harrison's introduction. Arithmetic, astronomy, a methodical pharmacy mixed with a less scientific system of incantations, have a place in this characteristic literature. Fractions are to be recognized, with the denominator 60, the sole representative of the decimal and duodecimal scales; and (see Plates 559, 560) even algebra and square roots.

The master works of Greek genius, in which the Museum is transcendently rich, are too well known to be easily singled out for notice. We need say no more than that the Panathenaic series from the Parthenon appears entire, as do all the colossal though sadly fragmentary glories of Phidias from both eastern and western pediments, with the grand remains from the Mausoleum, &c. The associated groups and examples of sculpture exhibit the contrast or change of feeling characteristic of successive periods of Greek art, whether at home or in the colonies, as well as its points of affinity and contrast with the arts of Egypt and the East, which the tiro will find succinctly and clearly drawn out for him in the introduction. Apart, however, from such educational functions, the choice array of specimens here brought together have a charm of their own as embodying types of supreme beauty. Engraved gems, bronzes, vases of the archaic and later periods, with delicate works in terra-cotta and glass, find in the photographic process a medium peculiarly fitted for effective display. The same delicacy of representation, with no less feeling and knowledge in selection, is shown in the later portions of this choice collection, which hands on the lamp of artistic skill and culture to our own shores and to the present day. It is impossible by any process of selection to do justice to the profusion or to the significance of the varied objects which make up this handsome contribution to the literature of art.

BARON GRIMBOSH.*

WE have recently witnessed the revival of a literary fashion which for a long period seemed to be almost extinct. Prophets have begun to speak to us in parables. That peculiar department of literature which in the last century received contributions from Captain Gulliver, M. Candide, and Prince Rasselas has lately been revived by several clever writers. The great success of Gin's Baby was the first symptom of the revival. Since its appearance somewhat similar attempts have been made by the authors of the Coming Race and of Erechon. Both of those books showed decided talent, and have received very high commendation. It is only natural that other writers should try their luck in working the same vein. When a mine has proved successful in a new district, the public is forthwith tempted by the attractions of any number of similar ventures. To some such impulse we probably owe the appearance of Baron Grimbosh, which aims at conveying an elaborate political satire under the form of a fanciful fiction. Of course the proper remark to be made on such an occasion is that no such trenchant satire or pungent wit has appeared since the time of Swift. For reasons which will presently appear we do not feel able to pronounce so high a eulogium upon Baron Grimbosh, but the comparison may suggest a few remarks upon the canons of criticism applicable to this species of literature generally. Gulliver's Travels and Candide are two of the most popular books ever written. Much of the writing in both is anything but edifying. Swift's misanthropy and morbid love of filth are frequently repulsive in the highest degree; and Voltaire's wonderful novel has faults which, to put it gently, would probably prevent a bishop from recommending it as a text-book for the study of the French language in girls' schools. The impression, however, which is made in each case is so vivid that the moral which each writer wishes to recommend is undoubtedly impressed upon us more indelibly than by any quantity of direct preaching. The obvious explanation is of course that Voltaire and Swift were men of the very highest literary power. Swift gives the essence of that strong rough humour which is the conspicuous quality of much of our best English writing; and Voltaire gives an equally perfect specimen of the analogous French characteristic of incomparably brilliant, clear, and logical wit. But why do the wit and humour find so convenient a vehicle in this special form of composition? Nothing in this world is more generally tiresome than a prolonged allegory. When a poet tries to express an abstract truth by the action of concrete personages, he generally succeeds only in provoking the question why he cannot give us one thing or the other, or the two things separately. The merit most required in the statement of an abstract theory is that it should be perfectly clear and coherent. The great merit of a story is that it should be capable, like every true narrative, of suggesting an infinite number of meanings, besides the obvious prosaic moral. When an attempt is made to bind the two things together both generally suffer. The theory becomes less intelligible by the indirect mode of conveying it, as may be inferred from the infinite number of meanings generally attributed by commentators to stories suspected of being allegorical. The story meanwhile is spoilt because the actors are compelled to walk in fetters instead of developing the plot according to its æsthetic capacities. When one reads, for example, an elaborate attempt to interpret such a poem as the Second Part of Faust, an Englishman at any rate feels that the philosophy would have been the better if not trammelled by the poetry, and the poetry if not confused by the philosophy. Now in the books of which we are speaking this difficulty is simply obviated. Voltaire and Swift each took a very simple text to expound. That the best of all possible worlds is a strange chaos of good and evil, that the human race is vile, petty, and contemptible, are propositions which are short, pithy, and, it may perhaps be added, partially true. They are true enough, that is, to express very general and deep sentiments, though sentiments which are very much in want of correction. No elaborate machinery was required to work out the theory contained in either book. On the other hand, any number of vivid illustrations of the doctrine might be accumulated. The more grotesque they were the better. Any amount of play might be given to the fancy, as a fable in which beasts talk is all the better for its flagrant impossibility. The symbol should be as strange and fantastic as may be, though preserving a constant reference to the essential facts of human life. Each story is a gallery of caricatures, all illustrating the same doctrine, and forcing it upon us by their accumulative influence. The purpose is not to prove a theory, but, by a fanciful extravagance, to set it in the clearest light.

The conditions thus indicated are the most obvious ones for a successful story of the satirical kind. There should be some clear and simple proposition to be enforced, the mind of the reader should be steadily fixed upon it, and it should be expressed by as many and as grotesque illustrations as possible. It is a very difficult thing to preach an obvious truism in direct terms without becoming intolerably monotonous. The method of which we are speaking is an ingenious way of drilling a simple truth into the public by presenting it in every possible light and under cover of extravagant forms which amuse us by their oddity. The old "Dance of Death" was an analogous variety of pictorial art. That death takes every man was a platitude which the utmost rhetorical skill could scarcely make interesting; but when death was shown in every fanciful combination, dancing with the king, the priest, the soldier, and the peasant, the old familiar saying became impressed by the incessant repetition in various forms.

If we proceed now to test Baron Grimboosh by the standard thus set up—rather a high one it must be admitted—we shall probably not be disposed to treat it very seriously. The idea is tolerably simple. Grimboosh—we do not quite understand why he is called Baron on the title-page and made into a Duke in the body of the book—is supposed to have been appointed Governor of Barataria. Barataria represents England; and the Governor is full of the most admirable intentions of suppressing drunkenness, enforcing universal education, discouraging war, and generally making his subjects happy, wise, virtuous, and prosperous. Immediately upon entering on his office he is surrounded by all the various quacks, political and social, who are in the habit in real life of expressing their sentiments in Social Science Associations, and at other meetings of a kindred character. A number of memorials are immediately laid before him from these amiable persons. The first proposes the abolition of war and of standing armies; a second, the establishment of perfect equality between the sexes; a third, the forcible suppression of the habit of drinking spirituous liquors; a fourth, the suppression of the use of butcher's meat; a fifth, the suppression of adulteration; a sixth, the suppression of diplomacy; a seventh, the suppression of seduction; an eighth, the raising of wages, and the provision of rose-water baths for the general public; a ninth, the facilitation of divorce; a tenth, the suppression of tobacco; and an eleventh, the establishment of national workshops. After receiving these memorials Grimboosh proceeds to hold a number of interviews with various deputations, and with the most eminent men amongst the Baratarians. These last, we may remark, are intended for portraits of Lord Palmerston, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Bright, and others, which do not imply that the author has any great skill as a caricaturist. Grimboosh receives the deputations, and exposes the fallacy of their theories by arguments which we fancy that we have heard before. We do not sympathize with the defenders of women's rights, but we do not think that those pushing persons will feel themselves crushed by a repetition of the statement that home is their realm, and that if they leave it for the hard, stony highway of politics and public affairs, they will deprive themselves of all true happiness. Finally, Grimboosh allows himself to be partially converted by some of these enthusiasts. He proposes measures for the abolition of the liquor-traffic and the institution of a court of arbitration between nations. Both measures are ignominiously thrown out; a revolution follows, and Grimboosh has to abdicate, and to return to his native country, Pumpernickel. His sovereign tells him that as a statesman he is a fool, but confers a dukedom upon him for his skill in inventing salads.

So much for the fable. The moral, if we understand it rightly, is tolerably simple. It is apparently that the various measures proposed for the regeneration of the species are contemptible quackeries, and that a statesman who should try to carry them out would be a fool. Of the truth or falsehood of this opinion we have no desire to speak. That is a point of minor importance. Nor need we inquire whether a writer of adequate ability might not make it the foundation of any number of ingenious illustrations. We must confess, however, that the author of Baron Grimboosh scarcely appears to us to be equal to the task. The caricature is scarcely as burlesque as it ought to be. The deputations of course talk nonsense, but they do not talk it in a very original or amusing fashion; and the confutations addressed to them, though sensible enough, are not remarkable for point or novelty, and are very much too diffuse to be epigrammatic. Any newspaper article on a meeting for the rights of women or the increased wages of the labouring classes gives pretty much the same statement of the demands generally put forward, and the obvious replies to them. One is induced to ask what is the use of wrapping up in the form of a fiction a few remarks about the various agitators who are just now working in the country? Of course they would consider themselves to be misrepresented in Baron Grimboosh; but there is not that amount of fanciful extravagance in bringing out the callant absurdities which justifies the adoption of this style of writing. When one has invented a Baron Grimboosh and a land of Barataria, one ought to make one's puppets behave with a little more originality and vivacity. It is not worth while travelling to an ideal country to come across a repetition of the places from which we started under so thin a disguise. On the same principle we object to the intrusion of our old familiar friends, such as Lord Palmerston and Mr. Gladstone. They have, it is true, rather new parts to play; but when personal satire is intended, it is better to attack the persons more directly. If, indeed, the book were more conspicuous for genuine wit, we might easily pass over the deficiencies of the design and the faults of art in the execution. But though it is fairly written, and there is here and there a good stroke, we cannot say that it sparkles with any great vivacity, or that it does not occasionally sink into downright heaviness. In short, there is too much of the ordinary political pamphlet, or too much of the grotesque element. The mixture does not appear to us to have been very happily hit off or to show much power of satire. But the writing is tolerable, and it may amuse a spare half-hour not disagreeably.

JOHNSON'S LUCRETIUS.*

IT is a bold undertaking to translate Lucretius, and whoever attempts it has rocks ahead which he can scarcely hope to avoid with half the success and skill of the great poet who originally made the voyage. Lucretius undertook and achieved the rare task of bodying forth in sonorous, spirited, and nobly sustained verse, speculations, technicalities, and matters of dry statement and demonstration which might well have seemed to defy expression in prose, much more therefore in poetry. His genius carried him through the venture, relying on the clear conception he had of the philosophy which he had mastered, and on the inherent dignity of his theme. But those who have hitherto attempted to translate him into English have all, more or less, made shipwreck. In some of the picked passages which he essayed, Dryden, as we might be sure, exhibited his wonted fire; but it is needless to add that accuracy and faithful transcript of the original were no features of even his fragmentary effort. The blank verse translation of John Mason Good is too dull to have left any mark upon its readers' minds; and the much earlier version of Creech is about the best English presentment of the Nature of Things, though the story that it won him his fellowship at All Souls, however much it may have redounded to the credit of that foundation in days that knew not of University Commissions, certainly represents an over-payment of very moderate merit. Our Transatlantic cousins are laudably anxious to "whip" the Old World in literature, as in all else; and truly the veteran American poet Bryant has evinced first-rate powers of translation in the Homer which is the fruit of his old age. Emulous of like success, Mr. Charles Frederick Johnson has essayed to translate Lucretius; and it is only fair to say of his performance of his task that its chief faults are faults of detail and of oversight, whilst his general level is high and well maintained. But we must add that if he soars above his predecessors, he owes much to the comparatively recent accessions of help towards a study of Lucretius which lie open in Mr. Sellar's sketch of the poet in his Roman Poets of the Republic, and still more in Professor Munro's thorough edition of the Nature of Things, a work which is no less a treasure of Latin scholarship than a model of helpfulness on all points to the readers and translators of Lucretius. No acknowledgments of Mr. Johnson's—and we do not call in question his sense of obligation—can do justice to the profound insight into his author and his author's language which is shown in that arguere et docere of English scholarship, Munro's Lucretius. If, as has been somewhere remarked, "it is to Lucretius that we owe an adequate idea of the power of the Latin language," assuredly it is to Professor Munro that we owe the diffusion and popularization of that idea amongst English students. No one who has had the resolution to master his admirable work can fail to leave it with an acquisition of knowledge fully compensating the outlay of labour; with a closer and more intimate acquaintance with Lucretius and with Latin; and—last, but not least, especially in the case of possible translators—with most instructive hints as to the essentials of a model translation. Mr. Johnson, who had the good fortune to light upon Professor Munro's edition in time to revise by its aid the first draft of his translation, candidly records his obligations to it in his introduction; and indeed proofs of this constantly present themselves to the reader of Mr. Johnson's translation, which is in blank verse, of a fairly sustained character for the most part, and often, in passages which challenge special care, rising to a certain height of eloquence and vigour not unbefitting the original.

Its merits as well as its shortcomings may well be exemplified in one or two extracts of some length. Take, for instance, the well-known passage in the Fourth Book, vv. 962-1001 (Est quo quisque fere, &c. &c.):—

What occupies the mind, on what it most Delighted dwells, in dreams will reappear,
And nightly visions reflect the day:
Lawyers plead causes and interpret laws;
Soldiers new battles fight, and range their fields;
With warring winds sailors rude contests wage;
While I, the worshipper of Nature, in
My country's language seek her truths to clothe.
Thus come illusions of our loved employ
In dreams, and haunt the chambers of the mind.
So those who day by day attentive dwell
Upon theoric shows; when now the scene
No longer meets the sight, open remain
The mental avenues, and phantoms throng
A shadowy world along accustomed ways;
E'en as awake they dancers seem to see
In timely measures move their floating limbs,

* Lucretius on the Nature of Things. Translated into English Verse. By Charles Frederick Johnson. New York: Lent & Co. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

While liquid sound of harp and speaking strings
Ring in their ears; the gathered throng they see,
With all the splendours of the painted scene—
So vividly is stamped what occupies
Our waking pleasures and our day's employ;
Not in men only, but as well in brutes:

The hunter-dog, in sleep unquiet wrapped,
Twitches his limbs and utters smothered cries;
With eager nostrils snuffs the frequent air,
Or starting, follows in a quick pursuit
The phantom of a deer his fancy sees
In flight—too soon, alas! awake, the fond Illusion fades, reality returns—
The faithful watchdog see light slumbers chase,
Quick from the earth snatch his reclining limbs,
At fancied sight of stranger form suspect,
Within the limits of his guarded realm.

The first impression produced by these lines is that of a more faithful adherence to the tenor and sequence of the original than is exhibited by such translators as Creech—an improvement obviously due to the faithfulness of Mr. Munro's accurate translation, which withal is couched in such well-chosen and poetical language that in this respect also it is of the greatest assistance to the verse translator. The illustrations of the poet's thesis drawn from the stage, and from the hunting dog and the house dog, come out more truly, and in keeping with the original. There is less temptation, doubtless, with such a guide, to run off into the laxness of Creech, when out of the single verse—

Nautæ contractum cum ventis degere bellum—

he spins the purely imaginary couplet—

The merchants' dream of storms, they hear them roar,
And often shipwrecked leap or swim to shore;

or when, again, he imports into another verse (980) words about "wantons dancings," which are not in any way warranted by the language of Lucretius. But, as we go deeper into the comparison of the original with the closer and more careful rendering by Johnson, we find that the latter fails in the nice insight and appreciation of the author's sense which Mr. Munro's superior scholarship exhibits. In the fourth of the verses given above, Johnson and Creech are alike content to see in nothing more than the modern lawyer's double function of pleading causes and interpreting Acts of Parliament. Creech, indeed, seems to think that "componere leges" means "making laws," and to confuse the senator's occupation with the lawyer's, whilst Johnson apparently takes "componere" for "exponere." But when we refer to the prose translation of Munro, which it is curious that Mr. Johnson should have overlooked in this instance, the lawyer's occupation turns out to be more consistent with our own ideas of it—"they plead causes and draw up covenants of sale"; and on consulting the exegetical commentary we find that "componere leges," in the sense of "settling terms or drawing up covenants of sale," is not uncommon in Cato De Re Rustica, and is justified by a passage in Cicero De Legibus. In connexion with the passage which we have quoted up to a certain point, but broken off, for lack of space, before giving Lucretius's illustration of the lesser birds cowering in dreams "into the sacred grove's recesses" at the fancied approach of the eagle, come two lines which, by an inadvertence probably, Mr. Johnson has left out altogether:—

*Et quo quæque magis sunt aspera seminorum,
Tam magis in somniis cadem seivire necesse est.*

They are seemingly an inference or corollary from the two descriptions of the canine species which have occurred just above; and if Mr. Johnson had rendered them, he could not have done better than reduce to blank verse the clear "construe" of Munro—"And the fiercer the different breeds are, the greater rage they must display in sleep." No one who has read the note on "leonum seminium" in Mr. Munro's commentary upon Lucret. III. 741 could have any doubt upon the matter. It is a pity that Mr. Johnson has omitted the lines in question, because it may leave an impression that he did not know how to translate them, though an examination of his general handiwork will go far to acquit him of such utter and palpable misinterpretation as is exhibited in Creech's version of the couplet:—

But now from images whose forms comprise Rough principles, the frightful dreams arise.

It were a sorry compliment, however, to Mr. Johnson to spend time on contrasts between him and Creech, because the latter is almost always vague and diffuse, whereas a very few lines will serve to show that the former wisely risks the imputation of indebtedness to Munro by creditable adherence to the Latin and the English prose version. We take an instance from the Fifth Book (vv. 460-4)—an illustration by Lucretius of his theory of the heavier particles of earth squeezing out the lighter atoms of the other parts of the world, and of the bursting forth of the fire-laden ether from the various earth pores:—

*Non alia longe ratione ac sæpe videmus,
Aurea cum primum gemmantis rore per herbas
Matutina rubent radiati lumina solis,
Exhalantque lacus nebulam fluvioque perennes,
Ipsaque ut interdum tellus fumare videtur;
Omnia quæ auranti cum concitantur, in altum
Corporè concreto subtexunt nubila cælum.*

Professor Munro renders these lines—

Much in the same way as we often see, so soon as the morning light of the beaming sun blushes golden over the grass jewelled with dew, and the pools and the ever-running rivers exhale a mist, and even as the earth itself is sometimes seen to smoke; and when all these are now gathered together aloft, then do clouds on high with a new cohering body weave a covering beneath heaven.

Mr. Johnson's transcript is a very fair sample of his Muse:—

As oft we see when matinal light of day
Pours golden blushes o'er the jewelled grass,
Lakes and the running streams vapours exhale,
And earth sends up a mist that, rising, is Condensed, and clothes the firmament with clouds;
And thus the light-diffusive ether rose.

Very frequently in single lines the influence of Munro is appreciable in this version—as, for instance, in III. 1042, "Ipse Epicurus obit, decurso lumine vitæ"; a line to which Lachmann demurred, because he could not see "quomodo vitæ lumen decurratur," but which Mr. Munro clears up by pointing out a blending of the two ideas, "decurso vitæ spatio" and "extincto lumine vitæ," and a possible reference to the course of the sun. In this sense he translates "Even Epicurus passed away when his light of life had run its course"; and Mr. Johnson judiciously follows the lead:—

E'en Epicurus died, his course fulfilled.

At other times it would be well if he kept closer to his master—e.g. where, in showing how conscience makes cowards of the guilty, Lucretius says (III. 1023):—

Hic Acherusia fit stultorum denique vita.

This verse Mr. Johnson had better have turned with Munro, "The life of fools at length becomes their hell," than rendered, as he does—

Thus for the wicked life grim hell appears.

So too in the Second Book, vv. 359, 360, where it is said of the bereaved cow, whose calf has been sacrificed—

Completque querellis Frondeferum nemus absistens—

there seems in Mr. Johnson's version to lurk a confusion between "consistens" and "absistens":—

Oft standing still,

She fills the leafy grove with loud complaints.

For "standing still" should be substituted "leaving off her quest."

Indeed there can be no doubt that, with much merit, which we most willingly acknowledge, there is in Mr. Johnson's version ample occasion for a very large table of "errata." It would seem as if correction of the press were more honoured in the breach than in the observance by New York authors and publishers. And this is all the worse when, as we discover is the case with the volume before us, a work is stereotyped. In these days of "women's rights" we dare not comment upon the fact that "it is stereotyped at the Women's Printing House, Corner Avenue A, New York"; and yet we could have wished it were otherwise. In the page which gives the author's version of Iphigenia's sacrifice—a passage which the women should have printed in their best style—there are three serious omissions, and consequent marrings of sense. Not much further on, the words "Unde æther sidera pascit" reappear in the queer form "how ether feeds the censor (query censor) of the skies"; and very frequently, in the course of the six books, some obvious omission of a particle or conjunction robs a line of its just metre and proportion. It is only right to say that there are some mistakes in the shape of Patagonian lines, and lines that never could be reduced to harmony, which it would be hardly just to saddle on the fair printers; nor can they be held responsible for such false quantities in proper names as Democritus and Ixion (III. 317 and 1012).

Still, in the main, and in despite of faults of detail, there is, we repeat, merit in this version—merit that shines forth in the presentment of the fine exordium of the Second Book; in the passage which reveals Epicurus's view of the world beyond (Apparet divum numen, &c., III. 18-30) in the Third Book; and in diverse passages of equal power in the Fifth and Sixth. If there were a chance of an improved edition, which would be tantamount to sacrificing the stereotype, we should counsel the removal of such Yankeeisms as the word "directress" in III. 95, and a few other solecisms. As it is, we must be content with noting the proof which this translation gives that, since the publication of Professor Munro's edition, a really competent version of Lucretius is feasible.

CLOTH OF FRIEZE.*

THERE are novelists whose work satisfies the critics rather than the public; there are others who, having fairly established a reputation, seem to set themselves thenceforward to try what liberties they may venture upon; there are others who might be warranted to turn out any quantity of work of fair average quality; and there is the great mass who shovel out rubbish that does not repay the sifting and sorting. Finally, there are a considerable number who write books, often with decided merits, but always with conspicuous faults; books that are consequently pronounced good or bad as they chance to suit the taste of particular readers. In the last category of authors we should be inclined to place Lady Wood, and we may take this latest novel of hers as a very fair illustration of what we mean. For unquestionably * Cloth of Frieze. By Lady Wood, Author of "Sabina," &c. 2 vols. London: Chapman & Hall. 1872.

Cloth of Frieze has its merits. In the first place, it fulfils to a considerable extent the primary object of a work of fiction—it interests. Yet all along we have an unpleasant consciousness that the author wants constructive power and is deficient in artistic talent. If her story interests, it is certainly not owing to the love or sympathy we are made to feel for any of her characters. Its main idea is good morally, and by no means bad artistically, for it places worth and worthlessness, the cloth of frieze and the cloth of gold, in effective contrast. It is true that the worthlessness is made sufficiently repellent, thanks to the extreme meanness of the shapes it assumes. But then, on the other hand, the worth owes so very little to adventitious advantages that we cannot for the life of us do more than respect it. It is natural enough that the young heroine, in making her choice between the cloth of gold and the cloth of frieze, should have chosen wrongly. But it takes all the subsequent sobering by sorrow, when she is paying the penalty of her precipitation, to make us believe the lot an enviable one which she shares with the very gallant and respectable officer who offers her his hand in second nuptials.

To our mind the strongest objection to Lady Wood's novels is a marked partiality for what we must call meanness, and a decided tendency to what we can only characterize as coarseness. And in speaking of the mean, we rather refer to meanness of treatment, for treatment goes for so much that it is hard indeed to say what is meanness of subject. The picture of a child from the gutter may be made simply loathsome by obtruding debasement of feature and squalor of person and drapery; while genius may cast a halo of pathetic beauty over the same study by a certain refinement of idealization which shall scarcely do violence to the realism of nature. So doubtless you may write about the sordid money sorrows of a struggling life, as Lady Wood did in a former novel, and find great dramatic suggestiveness in the subject. Yet it is a subject you would scarcely select to work at as a labour of love. In the main idea of Cloth of Frieze we are bound to say that Lady Wood has avoided the mistake which made On Credit what the French call trivial reading. It glorifies the unpretending sacrifice of a profound love, and Percy Pierce has merited the tardy gratification of his passionate attachment by a long course of painful self-abnegation. But Percy Pierce, although he shows as great personal daring as moral fortitude, remains a mere abstraction to us. Although his heart must be beating warmly within him, he always seems to us like one of those cold studies of classical virtue which we meet in the pictures of David and his followers. On the other hand, Lady Wood has gone to work with a will in the companion study of Jasper Reed; she has elaborated all his degrading vices and his little meannesses until she has succeeded in turning out one of the most unattractive personages that ever moved in decent society. Doubtless the story is carried back to a time when gentlemen habitually got drunk with comparative social impunity. But it would have been in better taste perhaps simply to indicate the fact, rather than to continually express it, the more so that we believe Lady Wood exaggerates in absolute defiance of artistic considerations. We do not believe that even in the beginning of this century quiet-living gentlemen were perpetually, and on the very faintest provocation, having "drappies in their ee," a quotation which Lady Wood repeats ad nauseam. Nor do we suppose that even younger men who intended to shoot at an early archery party for valuable prizes would drink so freely that their unsteady hands left an easy victory to a novice who had trained on ginger-beer. It is not a pleasant picture, that of a very worthy baronet gradually flushing up over a quiet dinner with his wife and daughter; or of the daughter, a very pretty girl, imitating the paternal gluttony, and then retiring after dinner with her friend to unlace her plump charms, and rest from the effects of excess—especially as this young lady subsequently plays second heroine, and comes out as all that is sweet and kind and amiable. We are far from saying that gourmandise is incompatible with good nature; indeed, we believe they often go together, and an excellent digestion may do duty for a heart throughout a lifetime. But we do say that it is characteristic of Lady Wood to obtrude the animal so unpleasantly in Miss Alabaster, whom we afterwards are made to like and admire as Mrs. Ryder. Lady Wood evidently holds her sex in exceedingly small respect, and in a series of asides she is continually giving us the benefit of her unsatisfactory experience of women. Then there is an unpleasant episode where a husband desires to foist his mistress on his wife as lady's-maid. The wife by accident sees the mistress's child, who has been established in one of the gamekeepers' cottages, and at once recognizes it by its extraordinary likeness to her husband. She is naturally greatly hurt by the fact of the child's being there at all, as well as indignant at the outrage intended her. Lady Wood remarks that "a young lady of the present day, in our advanced ideas of education, would have looked leniently on the fact of the baby's illegal existence; but even the fastest of Britain's daughters would have resented the insult of putting the left-handed wife in contact with the one who was lawful, though such conduct had royal sanction." The whole sentence has an unpleasant ring, and especially in a woman's mouth, from the commonplace cynicism of its beginning to the playful allusion at the end. The best that can be said for it is that it is in excellent keeping with the episode over which it moralizes. Men often form irregular connexions before marriage, and it is quite possible to imagine a man so shameless as to attempt to provide for a deserted mistress by impoisoning her upon a newly married wife. But incidents of this sort can only be turned to good artistic purpose by the most discreet and delicate handling, and it is to be regretted that they should be so much in favour with lady novel-writers. We might indefinitely enlarge our catalogue of the unpleasant touches to which we object. Old Captain Swift is captivated by Miss Mary Capper's plump shoulders when he shavels her, and thin Mrs. Hawser engages an inside place with him in the London mail that she might make love to the Captain through the medium of her graceful ankles—the ankle, we are informed, being the most lasting of feminine charms. Colonel Ryder, who is represented otherwise as all that is high bred and honourable, takes advantage of the roué Jasper Reed being in desperate embarrassment to buy off his attention to the object of the Colonel's earnest attachment, by a temporary accommodation of 100*l*. Things may of course have possibly enough passed as Lady Wood describes. We can only say that she would have written a more agreeable story by avoiding or merely glancing at much that she brings out into glaring prominence.

Still there is, we repeat, a certain interest about the story, while we can imagine readers to whom some of its blemishes may prove positive attractions. It gets well under way at once. Ella Swift, the heroine, is thrown on the hands of her uncle, Captain Swift, an old half-pay naval officer. Ella is launched in the small society of Mudborough, a little provincial town of the type of Mrs. Gaskell's Cranford, although, to carry out the nautical metaphor, she rather sticks on the ways for want of the needful money to grease them. Captain Swift is a poor man, and her allowance is an exceedingly small one. Ella, however, is a very pretty girl, and she speedily finds a couple of lovers. One of them is Lieutenant Percy Pierce, Captain Swift's adopted son, poor, ugly, gallant, and highly meritorious. The other is Jasper Reed, who characteristically rushes into the Mudborough Assembly Rooms, flushed with wine, at the head of a band of excited young officers, like "the leader of the rabble rout in Comus." Finding Ella there alone, he falls in love with her at first sight. Jasper is also in love with the rich Miss Alabaster, afterwards Mrs. Ryder, or at least with Miss Alabaster's money. He is of no profession, is excessively extravagant, and is kept by his father exceedingly short of money, although he is an only son and heir to a fine place and fortune. Probably prudence would have triumphed over impulse, and, notwithstanding Colonel Ryder's loan, he might never have married Ella Swift, and might have married Miss Alabaster. But he behaves exceedingly badly in a quarrel with Lieutenant Pierce, and the lieutenant challenges and shoots him. Then Pierce brings Ella to the wounded man's bedside to nurse him; next, he persuades him to marry her; with infinite trouble he smooths away all obstacles elsewhere to the union, and provides the couple with the costly special licence out of his own scanty means. Surely never was self-sacrifice carried further, for all the time he is himself passionately in love with Ella. Then Ella's tender nursing pulls the good-for-nothing Jasper through, and before her honeymoon with the convalescent scamp is half over, her sorrows begin. She finds that her husband has his Mephistopheles in the shape of a rascally valet, with whom he lives on terms of low confidence. Oddly enough, he consents to continue in the valet's power; for, although he has a fine, if encumbered, property, and knows that the man robs him scandalously in his monthly accounts, he will not make an effort and pay him off. We forget to say that he had succeeded to the title and estates while he lay on his sickbed. Sir Jasper drinks at all hours, and is habitually drunk at the dining-table. He neither regrets, on his own account nor on hers the fact that none of the neighbours' wives will call on her. He has brought his former mistress and his child to a cottage close by the garden, and, as we said, he has her recommended to his wife as maid. When the Ryders come and settle in the neighbourhood, he makes violent love to his former flame, who is now his wife's bosom and only friend. But by this time Mrs. Ryder detests him, and only tolerates him for his wife's sake, so no actual harm comes of that, although it is painful enough to Ellen, whose old affection is not utterly extinguished. But perhaps what is hardest of all on her is the brutal half-drunken candour with which he blurts out to her all that he ought to have kept concealed. At last his valet murders him on a dark night, or at least the reader is left to lay the crime at the valet's door, and high time it is that he disappeared from the scene. Lady Reed returns to her uncle, poor as she left him, for there was no settlement. The constant Captain Pierce, who has won in the meantime promotion, reputation, and prize money, comes forward and marries her. He proves to be the long-lost nephew of a venerable old gentleman, the new heir of Sir Jasper's place, Aberhill. The uncle welcomes his nephew and niece to his affections; he makes over the property to them on condition of their paying him an annuity of 5,000*l*, in the shape of expenditure on the estates, and if money and sterling qualities in a husband can assure Ella's future happiness, happy she ought to be. We ought to have said that, as befits a story where two of the leading personages are naval heroes, Cloth of Frieze is very much of a nautical novel. But we do not profess to criticize Lady Wood's seamanship, or to follow her among the shoals and shallows of the nautical technicalities in which she is so fluent. We can only say they sound to us somewhat more like echoes from transpontine theatres than the naval writing we have been accustomed to in the pages of Tom Cringle and Mr. Midshipman Easy.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

A MAGNIFICENT edition of the four Gospels*, which has been in preparation for several years, has been brought out by the enterprising firm of Messrs. Hachette. The principal feature of this important work is that the illustrations composed by M. Bida are not, as is too frequently the case, fancy subjects taken from the artist's own imagination, and which have therefore very little in common with reality. M. Bida spent a considerable time in the Holy Land for the purpose of studying the scenery, architecture, costume, and manners of the people, and the drawings which he has brought back in his portfolio, whilst they reproduce with much vigour the principal incidents in the life of our Lord, are also exact transcripts of Oriental life and Oriental places. The text is the French one of Bossuet, and in addition to the hundred and twenty-eight steel plates for which M. Bida is responsible, each page is surrounded by appropriate marginal decorations likewise engraved on steel, and reflecting the greatest credit upon M. Roussigneux, the artist.

M. Paul Cère, who lately filled the post of prefect of one of the French departments, has written an excellent little volume† on the dangerous classes of society. He observes in the first instance that Government allows itself to be too uniformly engrossed by politics, strictly so called, and that the care of international relations prevents statesmen from dealing with the formidable elements which constantly threaten the very existence of civilization. In the meanwhile the facilities for crime are increasing in a wonderful proportion, the condition of the labouring poor remains extremely precarious, and the artificial state of society in which we live has brought about a perilous degree of corruption and of immorality. The pretensions of Socialist and Communist reformers may be, and are, no doubt, ridiculous enough; but the movement includes some legitimate elements, and the best way of combating the theories of M. Assi's followers is to adopt frankly whatever is reasonable in their demands. M. Cère examines in detail all the questions connected with the moral welfare of society. Public education, prisons, military service, workshops, emigration—such are some of the subjects which he discusses; his remarks are always deserving of serious consideration, and the facts which he quotes by way of illustration have been derived from the most authentic sources.

The late M. Prosper Mérimée used to say, "Je n'aime de l'histoire que les anecdotes." M. Edmond Guérard has selected this remark as the motto for two closely printed volumes of amusing scraps borrowed from the stores of historical literature.‡ France, the classical country of memoirs and epistolary writing, has naturally been at all times fertile in neat little stories, concise and witty, polished like epigrams when they are not distinguished by some exquisite détail quite as worthy of being recorded as the choicest specimen of pathos. The mere enumeration of the volumes of ans published amongst our neighbours from the days of Tallemant des Réaux down to the present time would fill a good-sized catalogue, and M. Guérard has had to go over a considerable tract of ground in making his extracts. The anecdotes he prints are arranged under appropriate heads, the sources from which they have been taken are always indicated, and a few notes are inserted where necessary. We must say, however, that although any reader acquainted with the niceties of the French language may enjoy the witticisms collected by M. Guérard, the historical incidents which supply the material for nearly every quotation require, to be fully appreciated, an accurate knowledge of memoir literature. We would also take the liberty of remarking that some of the anecdotes are too coarse for a collection intended for general readers.

We have heretofore had to notice a few instalments of M. Camille Rousset's Bibliothèque de l'Armée française. Several more volumes of this collection are now before us.§ It is to be regretted that some kind of preface or introduction should not have been given, stating on what plan the series is conceived, and what works are intended to form part of it. It strikes us also that, even at the risk of increasing the expense, some good maps should have been added; and finally, in works of this kind notes are quite indispensable. Soldiers cannot be supposed to understand anything about the system of Greek and Roman strategy by merely reading the narratives of Xenophon, Julius Cæsar, or Sallust; nor can they discuss the merits of the Seven Years' War, the character of the generals who took part in it, and the political results to which it led, if they have before them nothing but the memoirs of Frederick the Great. We hope that M. Rousset will so far modify the execution of the volumes which he intends to publish as to make his collection a really useful one.

Dr. Livingston's treatise on Criminal Law is a work of so much importance that we cannot wonder at its appearing in a French dress through the diligence of M. Charles Lucas, a member of the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques, and himself a friend of the celebrated American jurist. Our readers may be aware that in 1820 the criminal legislation of the State of Louisiana was ordered to be revised, and that the care of this revision was entrusted to Livingston. He prepared immediately a report on the subject, and after having consulted the most eminent lawyers both of Europe and of his own country, he composed a treatise which is still looked upon as a standard work on one of the most difficult parts of legislation. It is a new edition of Livingston's exposé which is now before us.* M. Charles Lucas has prefixed to it, first, a very valuable introduction; and secondly, the éloge delivered by M. Mignet on the celebrated American lawyer.

The two volumes of Œuvres diverses† which the friends of the late M. Charles Clavel have just published consist of short essays written at various times in the Économiste belge, the Journal de Genève, and the Bibliothèque universelle; they treat of education, government, and moral philosophy, and they reflect the greatest credit upon the writer. Born at Geneva, M. Clavel at an early age directed his attention to political questions, and although his writings are only newspaper articles, and he never aspired to any higher position than that of a journalist, he has left behind him a well deserved reputation as one of the most eminent thinkers of the present day. He belonged to the school of M. de Tocqueville, and the biographical sketch with which M. Frédéric Passy has introduced the collection of his works enables us to appreciate exactly the position he occupies on the list of practical politicians.

About twenty years ago, shortly after the coup d'état, the lady who assumes the literary pseudonym of Daniel Stern was led to reflect on the extraordinary suddenness with which the Republican institutions of France had twice been thrown down and replaced by the despotism of the sword. Why should such abrupt transformations be possible in France, whilst in other countries institutions of the same kind had prospered and lasted? The wish to solve this problem led Daniel Stern to study the history of nations where democratic principles had flourished, and from the list of such nations she selected the Netherlands.‡ At that time the work of Mr. Motley was not known amongst our French neighbours, and the Abbé Raynal's superficial Histoire du Stat-houdérat was the only source of information they had on the subject. The volume just published by Daniel Stern is the first of a work which is intended to contain a detailed account of the origin and formation of the Dutch Republic; it takes us as far as the death of Oden Barneveldt, and is written of course from the democratic point of view. The author's style is remarkably clear, and the notes prove that in every instance the best sources have been consulted.

M. Gustave Bertrand is one of those who think that political discussions have nothing to do with questions of art and philosophy, and that true patriotism is perfectly consistent with admiration of the works of Weber, Mozart, and Beethoven.§ How indignant genuine connoisseurs used to be, some time ago, at the narrow-mindedness of Italian dilettanti who would not admit that either Germans or Frenchmen understood anything about music! With what expressions of contempt they talked of the feuds between the Gluckists and the Piccinists! Well, says M. Bertrand, let us not fall into the same fault ourselves, but let us admire the authors of Der Freischütz and of Don Giovanni, although they are Germans. M. Bertrand's book is a series of monographs written by an experienced musician, who endeavours to be impartial, and who feels quite aggrieved at the thought that Offenbach should be just now more popular than Gounod or Ambroise Thomas. In his last chapter, on the twofold influence of Verdi and Wagner, he contends that the composer of Lohengrin cannot hope to succeed in moulding French art, for the simple reason that even in his own country his pretensions are far from being universally acknowledged. Out of the two thousand Wagnerians residing at Berlin, says a German critic quoted by M. Bertrand, the majority are merely dreamers whom the metaphysical theories of the composer have led astray, and who, when they listen to his operas, do so not musically, but psychologically. If a man says that his mission is to revolutionize music after the fashion of the French democrats, he is sure to gather around him a crowd of fanatics, and that, we are told, is just what Wagner has been doing.

It is a volume of sad experiences which M. Amédée Achard publishes under the title Souvenirs personnels d'Émeutes et de Révolutions.|| Sad, from our point of view, at least; but a Parisian would perhaps take a much less gloomy view of the subject, for, as our author remarks, "Grattez le Parisien et vous trouverez le révolutionnaire." From the days of the Maillottes and of Étienne Marcel the inhabitants of Paris have been constantly steeped in riots, and when we see most of the statesmen who have governed France since 1830 serving their apprenticeship as conspirators before undertaking the task of putting down conspirators, we can scarcely wonder at the enthusiasm with which every one rushes in to swell the ranks of the militant opposition. M. Achard has fortunately grown wiser. There are three stages through which all persons have to pass who meddle with revolutions. They begin by helping to construct barricades, and by firing at the agents de despotisms. After two or three experiments of the kind, if they are fortunate enough to escape being shot or shipped off to Lambessa, the next revolutionary outburst sees them assuming the position of mere spectators. Their sympathies are still secretly with the insurgents, but they do not care to manifest these sympathies, and they remain quiet. Later still, rendered more steady by experience, having a social position, an income, and a family, they understand that after all, revolutions do much more harm than good, and when the drum beats to arms they join the party of order, with the consciousness that they are helping to save that society which a quarter of a century before they did their best to upset.

M. Drapeyron-Seligmann* is a decided Republican, but his political views are as far removed as possible from those of the Commune, and he does not hesitate to tell very wholesome truths to the men who in his opinion have compromised by their extravagance the cause of democracy. Never, he says, has the tide of error and of sophistry been so strong as during the twelve months which followed the revolution of September 4. The part of a real patriot was to resist, not to follow, the stream. Our author holds that one of the principal causes of the misfortunes by which France has been lately visited is to be found in the deplorable ignorance of the population. Many persons regard intellectual eminence as an attack upon the principle of equality, and a return to the privileges of the ancien régime; whilst many more, doubting the reality of their own beliefs, are afraid lest reflection and calm inquiry should dissolve them at once. M. Drapeyron-Seligmann, as our readers may imagine, had some trouble to publish, under the reign of the Commune, plain-spoken remarks made from the point of view we have just indicated; but he managed to obtain for them the hospitality of M. Arthur Picard's journal L'Electeur libre, and he now reprints them in a volume as a memorial of the war and of the subsequent insurrection—those two acts of madness of modern Paris.

In his Roman des Soldats† M. Jules Claretie has endeavoured through the medium of fiction to describe the leading features of the French army at four distinct points of the revolutionary period. 1792, for instance, represents the epoch of enthusiasm and of disinterestedness, when the spirit of militarism had not yet seized hold of the nation, and when patriotism, not the love of gold and of pillage, urged forward the troops of Hoche and Dumouriez. With 1815 commences a series of disasters arising from the undue preponderance given to the army; and in 1871 the same causes led to exactly the same results. M. Claretie has introduced his tales by a preface on the state of the French army, and on the means of restoring it to its old efficiency. He would have the whole male population trained to arms, by which means, as he contends, the system of the l'etorian bands, so favourable to despotism, would be annihilated at once. We are glad to see M. Claretie distinctly repudiating the foolish and mischievous notion, already so successfully refuted by M. Camille Roussot, that the volunteers of 1792, representing the armed nation, deserve all the credit of the brilliant campaigns of the early part of the Revolution. It is well known that the victories which marked that epoch were gained by the disciplined troops of the old French regular army, and that then, as in 1871, when the volunteers acted alone, they showed what, after all, was quite natural, a weakness and ignorance which no amount of patriotism can compensate.

Incidents and personages connected with the late war still give rise to an immense number of pamphlets written under the most conflicting views, and which deserve to be studied by those who at some future time will write the history of the campaign. Garibaldi, so violently attacked by some, has found in M. Aug. Marais an eloquent champion.‡ M. Marais is, however, very unfair towards M. Schneider, General Ducrot, General Trochu, and all Frenchmen who do not adopt to their full extent the principles of the Revolution. The life of Admiral Bouet-Willamez§ is related in a simple and interesting manner by M. Félix Julien, who takes the opportunity of showing that the science of war is completely lost sight of by modern officers. Things have come to such a pass that a mere stump-orator who never saw a field of battle in his life, and never got on horseback, was a few months ago in a position to impose plans upon generals, and to direct the operations of armies in a war where the very existence of France was at stake. A German writer decanting eloquently on the tyranny of Prince Bismarck is certainly something quite novel.¶ Prudence has led him to conceal his name, and to borrow the French language for the purpose of expressing his hatred of Prussia; but we question very much whether the bitterness of his anti-Bismarck tendencies will atone in the minds of Frenchmen for the severity of his judgments upon France. According to him, the spirit of patriotism has entirely disappeared under the enervating influences of vice and luxury; selfishness is universal, and after the revolution of September 4, instead of finding at the head of affairs statesmen whose pretensions were justified by their virtues and their talents, we discover only idiots, madmen, and monsters. The French translator of this remarkable pamphlet has corrected here and there in foot-notes some of the author's statements, and added to the information which he gives us. §

M. Albert Dumont's statistical documents on the Prussian propaganda in Alsace have been previously published by the Revue des Deux Mondes.* They are given as the preuves justificatives of a narrative which contains curious details respecting the invasion of Eastern France during the late war. M. Dumont aims, first, at refuting all the ideas circulated by Prussia respecting the Teutonic affinities of Alsace; and, secondly, at showing that the extreme severity of the measures adopted by the invaders proved how little they trusted to the sympathies of the inhabitants.

The interesting Yellow Book† published on the Communal insurrection is now completed by a third volume of illustrative documents. We have, first, General Ducrot's evidence, and then various procès-verbaux and reports of meetings held by the members of the Central Committee, the Committee of Public Safety, the International Society, the Republican Alliance, &c. To these the members of the Board of Inquiry have added Prince Czartoryski's letter on the supposed share taken by the Poles in the movement, and finally a certain number of protests called forth by the statements of some of the witnesses. M. Etienne Arago's flat denial of the accusation made against him by General Ducrot is a curious case in point, and it deserves to be attentively weighed; but it is not easy to get over the equally strong and explicit assertions of the officers who saw M. Arago at the Hôtel de Ville. Which are we to believe?

M. Charles Vatel‡ would have rendered his work on Charlotte Corday much more interesting if he had suppressed half the materials placed at his disposal, and arranged the remainder in something like methodical order. It is impossible to imagine a more hopeless mass of confusion than the three volumes now before us. Some of the facts recorded are valuable either from a literary or from a purely historical point of view; but M. Vatel has sent to the printer an astounding quantity of useless rubbish. The most prominent piece is a tragedy composed on the subject of Charlotte Corday by a Girondist politician named Salle, who was acquainted with the heroine, and whose dramatic production was corrected by Pétion, Buzot, and Barbaroux. It is curious to read the critiques made by these three distinguished Republicans; the most interesting one is that of Barbaroux, because it bears not upon points of style, but upon the character of Charlotte Corday, which Salle had succeeded in delineating, and therefore it has all the value of an historical document. M. Vatel has added to the tragedy a complete list of all works of the same description composed on the death of Marat; the enumeration is a long one, and is illustrated by extracts and comments. We have afterwards a large collection of letters, official decrees, and other papers referring to the unfortunate Girondists, and a separate album of portraits, autographs, views, &c.

The Récit d'une petite fille §, which we noticed a few months ago, gained a popularity which encouraged the young authoress to complete the narrative by a brief description of her visit to Ireland. Madlle. Suzanne's volumes are very pleasant reading; the freshness of the descriptions and the naivete of the thoughts are delightful.

THE MEETING OF THE EMPERORS.

THE proposed meeting of the Emperors of GERMANY, AUSTRIA, and RUSSIA at Berlin is an event of considerable importance. But its importance lies as much in what it does not betoken as in what it does betoken. Fifty years ago, or even twenty years ago, it would have meant that the members of the Holy Alliance were met to fulminate the edicts of despotism over the face of Eastern and Central Europe. It would have meant that the heads of political reaction were gathered together in a common design hostile to the liberties, and probably to the peace, of their neighbours, and adverse to all that was enlightened and independent in their own territories. Now it indicates nothing of the sort. It is a meeting of Sovereigns who have many interests in common, and some few causes of discord or distrust, and who desire to see how peace may be preserved and difficulties arranged. The first origin of the meeting may be attributed to the political needs and apprehensions of Austria. No country has gained more from disaster; and no country has shown less of enmity to her enemies. To fight Austria seems to be the surest avenue to her good will, while Russia might add that to help her was the surest title to her ingratitude. Austria was beaten by France in 1859, and immediately afterwards was on the best of terms with the Tuileries. Austria was beaten by Prussia in 1866, and though not beaten, was thrice attacked by Italy. Now Austria is the happy, unassuming, cordial friend both of Italy and Prussia. But Austria has great difficulties to contend with. She has disaffected nationalities which seek to break up her newly invented dual Government. She has a furious ecclesiastical party smarting under many humiliations, and able to embarrass every Ministry that opposes it, although not strong enough to create a Ministry to carry out its wishes. Lastly, she has the turbulent tribes of the Lower Danube to control, so that she may hold that great highway of communication for the benefit of herself and South Germany. It is natural that in confronting all these various heads of opposition she should seek the counsel and assistance of Germany. It is a matter of the deepest concern to Germany that the Slavonic populations should not gain a mastery over the German populations in Austrian provinces, or the waters of a great European strife might be easily let out. Germany is necessarily anxious that the Jesuits, when expelled from the limits of the Empire, should not make Austria a hotbed of their intrigues. The Danube is far too much a German river for Germany to be indifferent as to who may hold the keys of it. But directly Germany and Austria touch on the Slavonic and Danubian question, and, with Poland so near, it may even be added on the Ultramontane question, they find that they must at every turn take Russia into account. They cannot pass Russia by. They must either work with her or against her. They have decided very wisely to work with her if possible. The Czar has therefore been invited, and has agreed to meet the German and Austrian Emperors, and to discuss, with a view to a friendly settlement, all causes of actual or probable difference. Germany thus appears not so much the arbiter as the peacemaker of Eastern Europe. She draws together Austria and Russia, not as one who is a calm spectator or an impartial judge of the quarrels of others, but as having a most keen interest in the affairs of her two chief neighbours, and yet regarding them from a point of view different from that in which they regarded them, and having some sympathy with each, and much power over each, of them. This meeting of the Emperors marks a new phase in the history of Germany. Nothing could up to this time have proved less true than the prediction to confidently expect during the war of 1870, that Germany would show herself to be a dominating and aggressive Power. This meeting of the Emperors is the first remarkable sign of German foreign policy since 1870, and it indicates a wish for peace much more than for war, and a desire, not for aggression, but for action in concert with allies. The Germans have, we think, a right to point to this, and to appeal to it as some slight proof that they were right and that their adverse critics were wrong in the judgments formed as to the consequences of the French war. There is something disagreeable in praising the prosperous, for it looks like the adulation of success; but prosperous people may claim to have justice done them as much as unfortunate people can claim it. It is surprising in how many things the Germans have proved to be right, as to which the preponderance of European opinion, while the war lasted, thought they were wrong. It was said that they were crushing the life out of France by exacting an indemnity of two hundred millions sterling. The French are now in a state of the greatest possible delight at having shown that this was a mere nothing for them to raise, and that three-fifths of it could be subscribed in a day twelve times over. It was said that the Prussian army, having tasted blood and being flushed with success, would forthwith invent and insist on new wars. The Emperors of AUSTRIA and RUSSIA are to meet at Berlin in a few weeks to join Germany in making war for some time at least impossible. It was said that under the cold shadow of the new Empire, and under the insolent tyranny of Prince BISMARCK, all the feeble liberties and faint independence of Germany would wither away, that the wishes of the people would be disregarded, and the wishes of the Court would be all-powerful. One of the objects of the meeting of the EMPERORS is to discuss the religious question, which question has suddenly become important because the wishes of the great mass of German laymen have been attended to, the control of the schools taken from the clergy, and the Jesuits expelled, in spite of the reluctance of the EMPEROR and the avowed opposition of the EMPRESS. There is always supposed to be some kind of harmony between the character which a Congress of great potentates is to wear and the character of the place where it assembles. The meeting of the EMPERORS is universally recognized as a pacific meeting. No one fears that there will be anything tyrannical about the decisions come to, that schemes of plunder will be discussed, that nations will be sold and bought like flocks of sheep, or that family or dynastic interests will prevail over those of nations. Berlin is entitled to the credit of being the scene of such a meeting, for it could not have been held there unless it had been recognized that its objects and its character would be in unison with the policy uppermost in the capital of the leading State of Germany.

In old days Europe was ruled by the Five Great Powers; and if the sovereigns of three of them had met at Berlin, there would have been trepidation and offence and alarm in the Courts of the other two. Now England has not only nothing to say to the meeting, but is perfectly indifferent to it, or even regards it with a mild satisfaction so far as it troubles itself about it one way or the other. This is not only because we have to a very great extent ceased to interfere in Continental politics, or because we have realized that, with the many wars on our strength, we cannot pretend to do more than a limited amount of work. It is also, and perhaps chiefly, because the principles for which we used to contend are in the ascendant. We hated the Holy Alliance, and did what we could, not without considerable success, to baffle and outmanoeuvre it. Our side has won; the principles, the aims, the very machinery of the Holy Alliance all belong to the dead past. Among our other reasons for viewing such meetings as the meeting of the Emperors with calmness, we may safely claim as one the success with which we have laboured to give a new character to the meetings of such sovereigns as these three EMPERORS. As he grew old, Lord PALMERSTON's foreign policy grew tamer, but this was due, not only to his having a changed England to deal with, but a changed Europe; and Europe had changed for the better in no little degree owing to the firmness which in early days Lord PALMERSTON had shown as a diplomatist. France, too, is now as much left out of consideration as England is when meetings like that of Berlin are arranged. This denotes a great alteration in the state of Europe. France may of course say something like what England can say, and may comfort itself by thinking that it has on the whole been steady in its opposition to the old Holy Alliance and its modern representatives, and may be content to be quiet when a renewal of the Holy Alliance is, partly through French exertions, made impossible. But France has not so much withdrawn from the field of European politics as it has been driven out. It was the boast and delight of the Second Empire, and one of its principal titles to the respect of Frenchmen, that it had a finger in every pie, that nothing could be done in Europe without its permission, and that it saw, like a speculative financier, openings for striking operations in every quarter. The French had even invented a theory, in which they devoutly believed, that they had a natural and providential right to be supreme in Europe, and that it was not intended that the affairs of the Continental States should go on without French interference. This theory, and all that it represented, melted into thin air on the field of Sedan. That the French have got to keep quiet for a while is the most cherished result of the war to the people in whose chief city the EMPERORS are to meet. Fortunately the French have other and greater things to think of. The meeting at Berlin does not trouble them while they are mourning for Alsace and are exhausting new forms of taxation. How long this indifference of France to what is going on beyond her borders will last, and how far the enforced withdrawal of France from European politics will be salutary to Europe, are points on which it is as yet impossible to form an opinion; but for the present it may be said that France does not seem to feel any acute pangs at the loss of her old eminence in Europe, and that the intended meeting of the EMPERORS is one to which France, if she had the power to object, could make no just objection.

MR. GLADSTONE'S NEW ATTACK ON THE LANDOWNERS.

HAVING disposed of the Ballot, of Scotch Education, and of several other questions of importance, Mr. GLADSTONE is preparing for the next Session a formidable attack on the property and local influence of the landed gentry. In answer to Mr. ST. AUBYN he lately announced his intention of reproducing in a more comprehensive form Mr. GOSCHEN's Local Government Bill of 1871; nor can it be disputed that he is perfectly consistent in his policy. Both Mr. GOSCHEN and Mr. GLADSTONE himself have on several occasions intimated their designs against the landowners in a tone of menacing irony which is but seldom adopted by official statesmen. It was in preparation for a readjustment of taxation that Mr. GOSCHEN, in concert with his chief, compiled the marvellous statistics by which he proved that the land bore a larger proportion of the public burdens in Hungary than in England. Although the first attack was defeated, the Ministers with just confidence anticipated that the rashness of their intended victims would furnish them with an opportunity of renewing the assault. Sir MASSEY LOPES and his supporters were unable to resist the temptation of inflicting upon the Government a welcome and acceptable defeat. The majority of 100 which affirmed the expediency of relieving the rates at the expense of the Consolidated Fund provided Mr. GLADSTONE with a desired pretext for recommencing his campaign against landlords and county magistrates. He will have lost nothing by the enforced delay of two years, for the Ballot will have rendered the landed gentry absolutely powerless in any contest in which their rights may be brought into collision with the supposed interests of the tenant farmers. Mr. GLADSTONE's object is probably rather political than economical; and he will have achieved a great party triumph if, by bribing the majority of the county constituencies out of the property of the minority, he can break up the close ranks of his Conservative opponents. If the blow could fall exclusively on Sir MASSEY LOPES and his principal adherents, it would leave the satisfaction which always follows the award of political justice; but the arbitrary increase of local taxes and the transfer of provincial authority from justices to delegates of ratepayers, will affect the property of those who were innocent of a silly agitation, and the good government of all the rural districts of England.

In announcing his intention Mr. GLADSTONE referred with well-founded complacency to the division on Sir MASSEY LOPES's motion. "The authority of that decision," he said, "we acknowledge to this extent at least, that we must give our best efforts to see what can be done with a view to the improvement of the present arrangements." He then proceeded to explain that all the changes to be proposed by the Government would be in a direction exactly opposite to the wishes and opinions of the county members who had blindly rushed on their fate. "I may say that, with respect to the guiding governing aim, we shall have in view, at any rate we shall look very much to, the following points. First of all, to the introduction of the representative principle into local institutions where that representative principle does not already obtain; secondly, to equality and justice as between the landlords and occupiers of the soil; thirdly, to equality as between the different classes of the community in respect to the aggregate contributions they make to the public burdens; and fourthly and lastly," to empty general propositions about frugal administration and local self-government. In plainer words, the county magistrates are to be deprived of their administrative functions in favour of elected Boards; the landowners are to pay half the rates, and to have no practical share in regulating the expenditure; and taxation in general is to be readjusted to the advantage of owners of personality, and to the detriment both of owners and of occupiers of land. Even in the absence of an authorised gloss, little sagacity would be needed for the interpretation of Mr. GLADSTONE's threatening language; and Mr. GOSCHEN's abortive Bill of last Session supports the probable version as an ancient manuscript sometimes confirms the soundness of a conjectural emendation. It has often been explained that, notwithstanding Mr. GLADSTONE's eagerness to inflict pecuniary loss on a class which he regards as generally hostile to his party, he will inevitably be baffled in his attempt to transfer the burden of the rates from the great landowners to their tenants. Their wealth and the prudent liberality which has deterred them from exacting the full value of the land from the occupiers, has placed them in the position of being able to add to their rents whatever may be taken from them in the form of taxes by factious legislation. On the greater number of large hereditary estates the farmers enjoy a virtually permanent tenure, although they nominally hold only from year to year. When the landlord directs his steward to alter the rent-roll so as to correct any alteration which may have resulted from Mr. GLADSTONE's pretended measure, any remonstrance on the part of the tenant will be at the same time unreasonable and useless. Mr. GOSCHEN's Bill, indeed, officiously provided that any contract for the payment of the owners' share of the rate by the occupiers should be illegal and void; but it will be scarcely possible for the present to limit by Act of Parliament the rent to be paid for land. Nevertheless, although the proposed change in the law of rating will not affect the income of the great landowners, it will have the advantage of inflicting upon them serious inconvenience, and in some instances it will disturb their friendly relations with their tenants. Their less fortunate neighbours will suffer in pocket as well as in political influence. The small landholder who has struggled to retain a scanty inheritance, or who has invested in the purchase of two or three farms his professional or commercial savings, is comparatively at the mercy of the tenant farmer, who knows that the owner would be ruined if the land were thrown on his hands. The rates have in the original contract been deducted from the rent which would otherwise have been paid; but when Mr. GLADSTONE transfers one half of the burden to the landlord, the owner will often be unable to secure himself against a purely wanton wrong. The incidence of taxes has often been to a greater or less extent determined by the interplay of prejudices of powerful classes; but the scheme on which Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. GOSCHEN are bent is peculiarly distinguished by its exclusively political character and motive. The tenant farmers whom they propose to bribe by the offer of gratuitous relief have never complained, and could not have complained, of abiding by the contracts which they have voluntarily made. An increase of rates during the term of a tenancy of course imposes an additional burden on the occupier; but the possibility of an imposition of new rates ought to have entered into his calculation. As a matter of fact the recent increase of rates almost exclusively affects the small tenant farmer who has in the course of his life accumulated a small their municipal representatives to payments for which they have generally received a full equivalent.

The accumulation of land in the hands of a comparatively small number of owners will be facilitated and accelerated by legislation which will render the condition of petty proprietors even more undesirable than at present, although it is intended by its authors to injure landowners in general. A rate which will perhaps be equal to an income-tax of eighteen-pence or two shillings in the pound will often compel the freeholder to mortgage, and the mortgagee to sell, and experience shows that the probable purchaser will be the great landowner of the neighbourhood. The whole project was so preposterously unjust that Mr. Goschen, in the pamphlet which contained his original scheme, thought it necessary to invent a theory that owners were at present insufficiently represented in the local bodies which administer the rates. He accordingly proposed that the owners should return a certain number of representatives; and he perhaps persuaded himself that they would be simple enough to accept the illusory boon as an equivalent for the novel burden. In any assembly which imposes or expends taxes, a minority representing a separate interest discharges an idle and nugatory function. All persons who are practically familiar with rural administration know that in Boards of Guardians and similar bodies the gentry are powerless whenever they are supposed to have opinions or interests of their own. It was but an unreasonable jest to offer landowners powers for which they had never asked, in compensation for penalties which they had not deserved. It may perhaps have been unavoidable that the powers given by the Sanitary Acts should be vested in Boards of Guardians; but the law would have been more liberally and more providently administered if a larger share of authority had been allowed to justices. It will scarcely be possible to resist the impending substitution of elected Boards in counties for Courts of Quarter Session; but the experience of municipal corporations shows that the most enlightened classes are in a great measure excluded from influence where office is conferred by popular election. When the local revolution is accomplished, burdened and disfranchised owners of land will sometimes, in their orisons for the welfare of Mr. GLADSTONE, not fail to include a special benediction for Sir Massey Lopes.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

THROUGH a curious combination of circumstances the House of Commons has become once a year the scene of one of the strangest performances known to any governing body of men. The Under-Secretary of State recites a sort of prize essay on the present condition of India. The notion underlying the ceremony is that, since the Crown took over the government of India, Parliament must be informed of what is going on there, and must have an opportunity of forming an opinion as to the mode in which Indian affairs are administered, and of controlling and directing the Government of the day so far as any shortcomings or errors in Indian administration may appear. But the House of Commons hates hearing about India. It does not understand Indian affairs, and has the wisdom not to pretend to understand them. So long therefore as there is any vitality in the Session, and as a body sufficiently numerous remains to debate matters in which real interest is taken, it will not have India obtruded on its notice so as to damp its spirits and waste its time; and the Government, which is anxious to press on its measures as rapidly as possible, is very happy to fall in with these views, and to shelve India to the last practicable moment. Accordingly, the Under-Secretary of State is made to wait till just before Parliament is prorogued, but he must be ready at any time when there may chance to be a vacant hour. A little fraction of time being thus carved out for him, when every one is supposed to be gone, when there is no one to criticise him, and no one but the reporters to listen to him, he is put up to make a solemn oration about India. Mr. GRANT DUFF is exactly the right man for the place. He is a round man in a round hole. He delights in composing and reciting a prize essay on India. His enormous knowledge, his boundless appetite for facts, his keen interest in every department of Indian affairs, his pleasing optimism, his delight in power wisely used, all find a fitting field and abundant scope in the task assigned him. He enters thoroughly into the spirit of the thing. He knows he has got to compose a prize essay, and he composes it after the same approved pattern. He works as if he were working for the Oxford Theatre, and as we read his performance we feel as if we were carried back a quarter of a century, and were sure that before he began to write even one must have set him some such theme as "Quamvis fuerit apud Indos 'Anglorum imperii vis et utilitas'?" So completely has he thrown himself into the humour of the thing that he has grown impatient of anything occurring to spoil the completely prize essay character of his speech. Mr. FAWCETT, whose mind is cast in a different mould, and who has a painful habit of treating Parliamentary discussions as serious, gave notice that this year he should propose an amendment touching matters of some moment, such as the uselessness of a portion of Indian expenditure, and the inexpediency of a portion of Indian taxation. This seemed to Mr. GRANT DUFF thoroughly misplaced. The notion of an amendment to a prize essay! It was absurd; and so, before he had done, Mr. GRANT DUFF warned his handful of hearers that it was he who had been duly appointed to recite the appointed composition, and that no one else could possibly have anything to say that was worth hearing. Before Mr. FAWCETT had uttered a word, Mr. GRANT DUFF was certain that, say what he might, he would be wrong. Of course anything he might say would be wrong, for it would lead Parliament entirely out of the right groove, and might even make ignorant people in India believe that discussions on Indian affairs in an English Parliament are seriously meant.

Mr. GRANT DUFF gave a very bright picture of Indian affairs, and although as an official he was naturally inclined to take the happiest views and say the best possible things of everything connected with his office, yet he is transparently honest, and it is satisfactory to know that so competent a judge can see so unclouded and serene a sky in everything Indian. It is true that, with a kind of classic courtesy to NEMESIS, he warned Parliament not to be too confident, and said that no wise man would ever say that our rule in India was free from all danger. But this was merely a kind of decorous hedging. He did not wish to provoke the angry fates which tumble the proud man in the dust. The bad things of India belong to the unknown, while it is only good things that fill the measure of the known. Everything that can be ascertained about India is radiantly cheerful in the eyes of the Under-Secretary, and especially the current price of Four per Cent. Stock. How any one, in face of the high quotation of this stock above par, could have the heart—to say nothing of the chivalry—to move an amendment to his prize essay was, to Mr. GRANT DUFF's mind, utterly unaccountable. There were the facts. Four per Cent. seven above par. What was the good of talking of the problem of Indian Government? Solutum est ambulando. It was solved by the gentle march upwards of Indian Stock. And everything is in keeping with this main and most prominent symptom of prosperity. In finance the general result of the past year is that the Government had half a million more of revenue, and nearly a million less of expenditure, than in the year before. For the current year there is an estimated surplus of a quarter of a million, and the cash balances are so large that there can be no necessity for borrowing. There has been a slight excess of expenditure over income in the last few years, but then India has in those years got nearly forty millions worth of public works, which were perfectly necessary to her if she was to rank among civilized nations. Meanwhile her trade has been nearly doubled, and the Suez Canal is turning out to be as profitable to Calcutta as to Venice. Dr. HOOKER has extended the range of science in India, and a most valuable work has been written on the bites of venomous snakes. As to the Indian income-tax, which Mr. FAWCETT presumed to attack in his amendment, no one in England has as yet any conception how slight is its unpopularity in India. The Indian Finance Committee has been hearing evidence about it, but the Government has been allowing all that could be said against it to be said, and has got its own evidence all ready to be brought out at the right moment for the utter confutation of its adversaries. Lord Mayo at one time thought badly of the tax, but before his death he changed his mind, and considered its alleged unpopularity a delusion. What more could be wanted? India is in perfect peace. Two hundred thousand men keep a hundred and fifty millions in complete subjection. The Mahomedan revival is a fleabite. Trade is excellent, and finance is sound. Government Stock is very high, and the only thing now is to rest perfectly satisfied, and—to use Mr. GRANT DUFF's words—to allow res vobis ut vadunt. Things have but to go on as they are going, and India must continue to be as happy as she is now.

But Mr. FAWCETT was deaf to all this charming, and insisted on having his say; and if Indian affairs are to be criticised in Parliament at all, his observations were certainly well chosen and judicious. His main points were, that in India we are continually spending more and more, while we cannot increase our revenue proportionately. We have arrived at the maximum of taxation. Prices have risen enormously, and therefore every department of Government is carried on at a much greater cost, and the Government is in many ways exceedingly extravagant. More than 150,000*l.*, for example, has been expended on a country house for the Governor of Bombay, and in 1870 his household expenses reached 21,000*l.* But the revenue cannot be easily augmented. Its three chief sources are the land-tax and the duties on salt and opium. But the land-tax is a fixed amount, the salt duties are as high as they possibly can be without choking the consumption, and the revenue from opium, always precarious, is now doubly so in consequence of the resolution of the Chinese to grow their own opium. Vast sums are spent in public works which do not nearly repay their cost. No Indian department knows what it spends, or how it spends it. This, it may be observed, is not only Mr. FAWCETT's statement. It is stamped with the authority of the Committee on Indian Finance, which has deferred its labours to another Session because the India Office has honestly confessed that in many respects it has no means of knowing how the money goes. In this state of confusion, of extravagance, of augmented charges and unelastic revenue, the only resource of Indian statesmen is, according to Mr. FAWCETT, the Income-tax; and authority after authority may be quoted to show how unpopular the Income-tax is in India, and how unsuited to the country. How far Mr. FAWCETT may be right we do not pretend to say; but it is quite to mistake the point of his remarks to urge that the Income-tax is now a very slight burden, that it is hardly at all unpopular, and that it is only intended to produce half a million of money. What Mr. FAWCETT says is that there is no other resource left but the Income-tax, that the expenditure is extravagant in itself, and is necessarily increasing, without blame to any one, on account of the general rise in prices, and that therefore the choice must soon come between reduced expenditure and a heavy Income-tax. If the Indian Government were to say that it was perfectly aware that it must keep on spending more, but that as it spent more it would keep on augmenting the Income-tax, and that it could do this without burdening the natives too heavily or exasperating them too bitterly, the real issue would be clearly raised. Probably the Committee on Indian Finance will throw much light on this difficult matter; and it is a striking illustration of the honesty and sincere desire of the India Office to do its best for India, that Mr. GRANT DUFF spoke with great respect of this Committee, and with an entire absence of official jealousy. His view seems to be that the only way in which Parliament can really help or control the Indian Government is by the agency of such Committees, which patiently collect evidence, bring different independent minds to bear on given points, and are under a sense of serious responsibility when they make statements or suggestions. Possibly this may be so; but this is quite a different thing from Parliamentary control, as it is generally understood. Mr. FAWCETT has taken very great pains to master Indian subjects, he thinks clearly on them, and reasons boldly. If they are to be discussed in the House of Commons at all, such speeches as his ought to afford material for discussion. But the House of Commons and the Government have decided that there shall be no real discussion of Indian affairs in the House. They are felt to be at once a great bore and very unreal, and the crown and embodiment of unreality is the speech of the Under-Secretary of State. Well as he may speak such a speech, it is no gain to any man like Mr. GRANT DUFF to have to go through the performance. If the whole thing had not been an unreality, Mr. GRANT DUFF would have had to grapple with Mr. FAWCETT's arguments, and in so doing to show his own command of a most difficult subject, and to throw great light on a matter which in one way or another is of considerable importance to Englishmen. But this was not to be; the rules of the game forbade it; and so an August afternoon, and the greater part of an August evening, and the abilities and knowledge of Mr. GRANT DUFF and Mr. FAWCETT were wasted, not that any human being in England or India might be benefited, but that, in compliance with a foolish custom, a piece of routine might be got through.

THE AMERICAN CONTEST.

ALTHOUGH the reported Democratic success in North Carolina has not been confirmed by later accounts, the chances of Mr. GREELEY's election are still not inconsiderable. It seems to be admitted that, if the whole Union were polled as a single constituency, the coalition candidate would be returned; but each State gives all its votes according to the decision of a bare majority; and consequently the distribution of the supporters of either candidate matters more than their numerical strength. It is not yet certain whether New York will support Mr. GREELEY, and the vote of Pennsylvania is still more doubtful. The Civil Service, for some time past been manipulated with exclusive regard to the interests of General GRANT; but official corruption involves the grave disadvantage of marshalling a still larger body of aspirants against the actual holders of places. There is no reason to suppose that Mr. GREELEY would be less grateful than General GRANT; and he would have greater facilities for rewarding his adherents. Mr. MURPHY's nominees in the New York Custom House can at the best only retain their places or establish a claim to promotion, while many times their number may hope to succeed to the vacancies which would follow a change of administration. General JACKSON's system of awarding the spoils to the victor worked more smoothly and simply when two great and sharply defined parties were openly contending for power and public money. Both Democrats and Republicans knew that their chance of salary depended exclusively on the success of their respective factions, and American politicians, to do them justice, have seldom the effrontery to change sides for purely personal objects. In the present election the Democrats, although they have no chance of office under GRANT, can scarcely be assured that their claims will be fully recognized by their ultra-Republican candidate. The office-seeking Republicans, on the other hand, are puzzled whether they shall rely on the corrupt election managers who surround General GRANT, or on the equally unscrupulous agents and advisers of Mr. GREELEY. The two Senators for New York, Mr. FENTON and Mr. CONKLING, both professional politicians of the most approved type, have taken opposite sides in the contest. As Mr. FENTON has for some time past exercised the entire Federal patronage of the State, while his colleague hopes to supersede him in the disposal of places, prudent voters may reasonably hesitate before they cast in their fortunes with either patron.

It is true that the great mass of American citizens have neither the prospect nor the desire of place. The politicians and the candidates for office may be counted by tens of thousands in a constituency of eight millions. It unfortunately happens that in ordinary times, and in the absence of great political excitement, the organization and activity of the regular election managers give them an influence utterly disproportioned to their personal merits and importance. Many of the most powerful persons in the Union are notorious for political and private dishonesty; and it scarcely ever happens that a leading politician is admitted into the most respectable society. In the present election the power of the politicians is at its highest point, because no great principle is involved in the contest, nor is it possible to arouse popular enthusiasm in favour of either candidate. In spite of the vulgar common-places of the press and the platform, American voters are too intelligent to care for Mr. GREELEY's affectation of rustic simplicity, or for General GRANT's experience as a tanner at Galena; but they are not to be blamed if they allow themselves to be controlled by the familiar agents and managers of the party to which they may happen to belong. The strongest argument in favour of the actual PRESIDENT is that he is the regular nominee of the orthodox Republican majority as it was represented in the Convention at Philadelphia; yet a Republican can scarcely feel that he is deserting his party when he supports Mr. GREELEY, who belonged to its extreme or Abolitionist wing, and when he follows the advice of Mr. SUMNER, who was long regarded as the organ of the strictest Republican sect. After some hesitation Mr. SUMNER has proclaimed his adhesion to Mr. GREELEY in a letter addressed to the coloured voters, who may probably listen to the appeals of their most prominent advocates. Among the better class of Republicans Mr. SUMNER's opinion would perhaps have exercised more influence if he had not ostentatiously displayed his inveterate hostility to General GRANT. The PRESIDENT on his part cannot be acquitted of imprudence in converting political dissension into personal enmity. Mr. SUMNER's successful opposition to the ill-judged project of annexing San Domingo was the immediate cause of his removal from the chair of the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs; and Mr. SUMNER is not a man to forgive an injury. Mr. BANKS, a Republican leader of an inferior order to Mr. SUMNER, has also declared in favour of Mr. GREELEY. His adhesion shows that the professional politicians of the Republican party are not united in support of General GRANT. Mr. BANKS is not devoid of the kind of eloquence which pleases a vulgar audience; he was for some time Speaker of the House of Representatives; and, like CLAY, he was at one time employed in a high military post for which he was ultimately found scandalously unfit. Before his failure Mr. LINCOLN was with difficulty persuaded not to appoint BANKS to the chief command on the Mississippi in place of GRANT, who had not then fully established his military reputation. If the PRESIDENT had not been overruled, it is probable that Vicksburg would not have been taken, and perhaps the whole civil war might have had a different result. Time has provided Mr. BANKS with the opportunity of meeting his successful competitor in another field, and probably his services in the Presidential canvass may be useful to Mr. GREELEY.

There must be grounds which are not fully understood by foreigners for the widely-spread dissatisfaction with the government of General GRANT. It is not known that he has incurred either at home or abroad any conspicuous failure, for his most prominent opponents are even more responsible than himself for the discreditable sharp practice which ended in the collapse of Geneva. Mr. SUMNER invented, and Mr. GREELEY warmly supported, the attempt to extort, under cover of the Washington Treaty, consequential damages from England; nor is there any reason to suppose that the advancement of the Indirect Claims was disapproved by any considerable section of the community. In domestic affairs General GRANT has had the good fortune to be in office while the debt was largely reduced; and he has lately been enabled to propose a reduction of the excessive taxation which was imposed after the war. In almost all countries the credit of national prosperity is consciously or unconsciously attributed to the Government, and although the PRESIDENT is utterly ignorant of political economy, the protective measures which have checked the progress of trade have been maintained, not by the Executive Government, but by Congress. It might have been expected that a victorious General would retain the personal popularity which attaches more conspicuously to military exploits in a democracy than in a society which recognizes other forms of personal superiority. The PRESIDENT's inability to make speeches was at one time not unreasonably regarded as a creditable distinction in a community of stump orators; and imperfect familiarity with political affairs is readily pardoned in the case of a successful soldier. Nevertheless it is evident that the name of General GRANT excites no enthusiasm even among his own supporters, and that he has contrived to provoke bitter hostility. His dozen of cousins and brothers-in-law, all in office, and some in disrepute, may account for a certain amount of scandal; but Mr. LINCOLN, though he was troubled with relatives by marriage who were suspected of practices bordering upon treason, never found that his popularity was impaired by family miscarriages. Whatever may be the reasons which indispose Northern Republicans to the regular candidate of the party, it is not surprising that the white population of the South should resent the postponement of amnesty, and the continued prevalence of military law. Congress is really responsible for the policy which General GRANT has only executed to the best of his judgment. The Legislature which authorised the PRESIDENT to suspend the Habeas Corpus must have intended that he should exercise extraordinary powers without regard either to abstract principles or to his own popularity. There is no reason to doubt that in the suppression of disturbances, and even in the maintenance of a coercive policy, the PRESIDENT has acted according to his sense of public duty; but the most acceptable of all Mr. GREELEY's professions, and of the resolutions of the Convention of Cincinnati, was the declaration that there ought to be an immediate and universal amnesty, and that the constitutional rights of the Southern States should be completely restored. It has not been forgotten in the South that Mr. GREELEY was at one time willing to recognize the Confederacy, nor that he generously offered bail for Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS when he was treated by the Federal Government as a criminal. It will perhaps be difficult to reconcile his claims on the support of the white electors with his well-founded pretensions to the coloured vote as one of the earliest and most consistent of the Abolitionists. For the present, notwithstanding the result of the contest in North Carolina, Mr. GREELEY, whose candidature was two months ago not considered serious, must be regarded as a formidable competitor for power.

MR. AYRTON AGAIN.

THE debate of Thursday night on Mr. AYRTON's behaviour to Dr. HOOKER leaves matters in a more amusing and perplexing condition than ever. The official documents that had been laid before Parliament showed clearly enough that Dr. HOOKER had been treated with systematic and persistent disrespect, and that every opportunity had been taken of thwarting and humiliating him. Indeed the First Commissioner had even gone so far, in defiance not only of all official discipline, but of the most elementary rules of intercourse between gentlemen, as to set aside the Director of Kew in making arrangements with regard to the internal economy of the establishment under his charge, to supersede him in important functions without giving him any explanation or even intimation of the fact, and to communicate with his subordinates behind his back. This view of the case was, to a certain extent, confirmed by the Treasury Minute, in which the First Commissioner was pointedly reminded that he was bound to exercise his authority "with due regard for the feelings and position of the officers under him," and that on all points he should communicate with the subordinate officials only through the Director, who was the responsible head of the establishment. But all of a sudden we are treated to a startling transformation scene, and Mr. AYRTON presents himself to our astonished gaze as the weak and helpless victim of a scientific tyrant. We are asked to believe that Mr. AYRTON, the most meek and pacific of men, who lives only to make others happy, and who never, even under the most exasperating circumstances, forgets the rule of Christian charity so far as to meet attacks "with an angry counter-sure or a long expostulation, but treats them in an easy good-humoured way," has for several years been subjected to cruel persecution by the Director of Kew. But even a worm will turn at last, and Christian charity has its limits; and Mr. AYRTON now appeals to the Government and the House of Commons to protect him from further outrages. It appears that an apology has been demanded from Dr. HOOKER, and the First Commissioner threatens to resign, or at least to hold no further communication with Dr. HOOKER, unless an apology is made. For his own part Mr. AYRTON, forgetful of the Treasury Minute, holds that he has nothing to apologize for or to explain. He "does not wish to pride himself on anything." He does not thank Heaven that he is not, as some other men are, notorious for a "knowledge of organic or inorganic matter." Providence has saved him from that, but it might have been otherwise, and he will not exalt himself with vain pride on this account. It is true that while these misguided men have been going astray after organic and inorganic matters, he has been giving his mind to the great subject of "the relations between man and man," and the duty of judging righteously and acting justly. But still he is not proud. He is willing to make allowance for the frailties of humanity, and is disposed to take a lenient, "easy, and good-natured" view even of scientific attainments.

It is perhaps hardly surprising that the House should have been so taken aback by this extraordinary statement that it allowed Mr. GLADSTONE to bring the discussion to a close, without expressing an opinion on the monstrous perversion of facts and insolent justification of official misconduct to which it had just listened. Mr. GLADSTONE was no doubt placed in a difficult position, and it was evident that he was trying to say as little as possible; but it is unfortunate that he should have seemed to afford any countenance to Mr. AYRTON's theory, that good manners are not only superfluous, but out of place in the public service, and that a Parliamentary official is bound on all occasions to let the permanent, and especially the scientific, officers of his department know that "he's there," by the rudeness of his behaviour and his disregard of the common civilities of life. It was not unnatural that Mr. AYRTON should ignore the Treasury Minute censuring his conduct, but it might have been expected that the First Lord of the Treasury would not have shrunk from repeating in his place in Parliament opinions which have been published under his official authority. We do not intend again to go through all the details of Mr. AYRTON's blundering and discourtesy in this affair. The facts are admitted, and the rules which the Treasury have laid down as to the manner in which the First Commissioner must for the future "govern himself" in his management of Kew Gardens, and in his official relations with the Director, supply a conclusive condemnation of his past behaviour. Mr. AYRTON insists that Dr. HOOKER should withdraw the charge of evasion and misrepresentation; and of course there should be no difficulty in doing so after Mr. AYRTON's assurances on these points. But it must be remembered that when the charge was originally made, all that was known was, that the First Commissioner had been secretly communicating with the Director's right-hand man, and had prohibited him from disclosing the communication to his chief. Moreover the Treasury, in their letter of the 20th June, addressed to the First Commissioner, find it necessary to "ob-serve that your letter of the 8th September, 1871, to the Civil Service Commissioners" on the subject of the Curator's assistant "does not enclose a copy of Dr. Hooker's letter of the 6th September, does not contain the whole of the recommendations which Dr. Hooker makes in it, and does not mention him by name or office." They also point out that the First Commissioner had, in the first instance, altogether suppressed the fact that there was a fundamental difference of opinion on this question between himself and the Director. It is quite possible that Dr. Hooker may be "excitable," but a Parliamentary official who systematically treats his subordinates as Mr. AYRTON treated Dr. Hooker has no reason to be surprised if he finds them "querulous." Members of the House of Commons can judge from their own experience whether Mr. AYRTON's manners are easy to bear with. Mr. BRIDLEY DAVENPORT administered a just and necessary rebuke to Mr. AYRTON, though some of the expressions were unnecessarily Ayrtonian, when he said that a member who put a simple and decorous question to a Minister had a right to expect a civil answer, and not an epigram flavoured with impertinence instead of humour. It may perhaps be regarded as one useful result of this controversy, that it has brought to light the project which is hatching for the flinging of the South Kensington shoe over Kew Gardens, and making the barbarium a washpot for COLE, C.B.

On the plain facts of the case Mr. AYRTON's behaviour is altogether indecent and inexcusable; but the very violence of his conduct makes one wonder whether there is not some deep explanation of it which it does not suit his purpose to disclose. It must often have occurred to those who have been critically watching Mr. AYRTON's official career that, not only his rudeness, but his wrongness was rather over-done. He is certainly not the only Minister who has been rude and wrong, but there has been a persistency, a vehemence, we may say an extravagance, not only in the uniform offensiveness of his manners, but in his eager going out of the way to do outrageous and quite unjustifiable things, and to place himself in thoroughly false positions, out off alike from defence or retreat, and, above all, in his resolute ingenuity in making a bad case worse, which appears to surpass the natural limits of personal superciliousness or official blundering. There is a suggestion of over-acting about the whole thing. A rule man might occasionally be right, and an indiscreet official might cover his escapades with a little civility to opponents. And further, it should be observed that something like method may be detected in this seeming madness. If we could conceive Mr. AYRTON to have satisfied himself that reaction and disgust formed one of the most potent agencies for influencing mankind, and to have resolved to employ it in political affairs, much that has hitherto seemed inexplicable in his conduct would be explained. The democrats, for example, are wroth with him just now for having foreworn the turbulent Radicalism of his earlier years, and attacked the people with a set of tyrannical Park regulations. But the seeming inconsistency disappears if we look to the natural result, rather than the professed object, of the grotesque and preposterous Rules which the First Commissioner published the other day, without the knowledge of his superiors, as a subject for the mockery of the mob. It is obvious that if the object had been to bring the regulation of the Parks into contempt, to provoke defiance of the law, and to provide the Friends of the People with a pretext for agitation and disorder, it could hardly have been promoted more effectively than by the wild absurdity of these foolish and impracticable regulations; so that Mr. AYRTON has really been doing a good turn for his old friends, the demagogues, while pretending to take part against them. Possibly when these Rules are under consideration during the recess, it may be as well, after the recent explosion at the Treasury, to throw in a warning to Ministers that reckless frolics with gun-cotton cannot be allowed in the back gardens of Downing Street. From this point of view Mr. AYRTON would appear to be a subtle humorist and profound philosopher, who puts irony in action, and takes up opinions and lines of policy which he at heart detests, only to render them offensive and ridiculous, and to excite a strong reaction the other way. He is a CHESTERFIELD in disguise, teaching, not by example, but by contrast; a secret patron of arts and sciences, who travesties Philistinism in order to bring it into contempt. He has certainly done the men of art and science a service by waging war upon them so recklessly and uncompromisingly. A similar disposition had before been manifested by some other members and subordinates of the present Government in a comparatively mild way, and if indulged in moderately and cautiously, it might have escaped the strong and unanimous censure which has been provoked by Mr. AYRTON's irresistible reduction of absurdum. It may be suggested, however, that in this respect Mr. AYRTON has done enough for the present, and is fairly entitled to the relaxation of a little civility.

ENGLAND AND THE POPE.

THE House of Commons has within a few days had occasion twice to consider the inevitable consequences which follow from the existence of a Church which claims and exercises temporal power. Popular declaimers are in the habit of insisting on the abolition of establishments and endowments; and in Italy some considerable statesmen have hoped to solve the ecclesiastical problem by the application of the plausible formula of a free Church in a free State. A political philosopher would prefer in theory the opposite system of the middle ages, in which the State and the Church were the same body regarded in different aspects; and there is much to be said for modern compromises which have the effect of moderating and humanizing sectarian zeal. If the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland were endowed and recognized by the State, the scandals of the Galway election would have been avoided; but the bigotry of English Nonconformists rendered it impossible even to provide globes and pectorals for the priests out of the funds of the Protestant Establishment; and it becomes necessary to deal as well as circumstances may permit with troublesome forces which a wiser policy might perhaps have controlled and made useful. Five-and-twenty years ago it occurred to the Ministers of the day that it might be convenient to hold diplomatic intercourse with a potentate who exercises a great, though undefined, influence over some millions of the subjects of the Crown. According to the best legal opinion there was nothing to prevent Lord JOHN RUSSELL and Lord PALMERSTON from accrediting an Envoy to the Holy See; but there was a traditional belief that the practice which has prevailed uninterruptedly since the Revolution was founded on some constitutional or statutory prohibition. As the ATTORNEY-GENERAL showed in the recent debate, the penalties which may be incurred by communion with Rome affect only spiritual relations; but the Popes have never distinguished between their own divine and human attributes; and it is possible that the contemporaries of JAMES II. and WILLIAM III. would have confused diplomatic courtesies with religious deference. It is a wholesome practice to procure the assent of Parliament to the revival of any part of the prerogative which may have fallen into desuetude; and it was therefore deemed proper to pass an Act for the purpose of removing any doubts as to the power of the Crown to establish diplomatic relations with Rome. The project was rendered abortive by the scruples of some members of the Opposition, who procured the insertion of a clause by which the Crown was prohibited from receiving an ecclesiastic as the representative of the POPE. A foreign Government might as reasonably have refused to recognize any English Ambassador who belonged to the regular diplomatic profession. It has always been the practice of the Holy See to employ prelates in all branches of the public service, and especially in foreign missions; and the Pope properly resented the restrictions of the Act by refusing to send a Minister to London, or to receive an English Minister at Rome. Necessary business was transacted through a member of the Legation to Florence, who resided at Rome in a kind of diplomatic incognito. It was customary to select for the post a confidential agent of modest official rank; and two successive attachés at Rome have since become Ambassadors at Paris and Berlin. As it would be anomalous to make the English representative at the Vatican dependent on the English Minister who is accredited to the King of ITALY in Rome, Mr. JARVIS, the present successor of Lord LORAIN and Lord ONE BUESAL, is nominally on the establishment of the Foreign Office; and, but for Acts of Parliament, political facilities and religious prejudices, it might have been thought that after all his misfortunes, his losses, and his blunders, the Pope was still a personage sufficiently considerable to deserve the attendance of a Foreign Office clerk.

That the Roman Catholic Church and its Head have the means of embarrassing the domestic administration of Ireland was opportunely proved by the discussion which Mr. HOWARD raised on the removal of a suspended priest from the management of the National Schools in his parish. The Education Commissioners had been divided on a question which in replate with difficulty. Mr. O'KEEFE had been a manager in virtue of his office, and the function might be plausibly regarded as accessory to his position. On the other hand, Mr. BOGVEAN and Mr. HENLEY contended that the Commissioners had given effect to an illegal deprivation, for it appeared that the Vicar-General of the diocese and Cardinal GALLER had suspended Mr. O'KEEFE for bringing actions against his Bishop and his curate. The ecclesiastical litigation had, as it seemed, been brought to the knowledge of the Pope himself; and it is not satisfactory that a foreign authority should interfere to punish a subject of the Queen for resorting to a judicial tribunal. If the Government and the Parliament of the United Kingdom had been sagacious enough to provide Mr. O'KEEFE and his successors with a residence and an income, the jurisdiction of the secular Courts could not have been ousted by any Vicar-General or Legate. Parish priests who depend on voluntary contributions occupy a more precarious position; and it may be doubtful how far they are entitled to the protection of the law against the tyranny of their superiors. The Education Commissioners were not bound to dismiss Mr. O'KEEFE, nor to appoint his successor to the management of the schools; but they may urge in their defence that the co-operation of the parish priest is indispensable to the management of the schools; and the majority probably holds that the State can only recognise the priest who is designated by the hierarchy. In France, under the Concordat negotiated by NAPOLEON I., who approved of despotism even where it was not exercised by himself, the majority of the clergy hold their benefices subject to the absolute discretion of the bishops, who may consequently ruin a priest for the crime of obeying the law. The German Governments are at this moment engaged in a puzzling conflict with the Church on the same issue which is raised by the suspension of Mr. O'KEEFE. It is not yet decided either in Prussia or in Bavaria whether priests who reject the decrees of the Council of the Vatican are capable of holding Church endowments. The difficulty is greater in Bavaria and in the Palatinate, where the Roman Catholic Church is established, than in Ireland; but the right to property held in trust for voluntary bodies necessarily falls within the cognizance of secular tribunals. The Courts enforce the conditions of the trust, as far as they are legal; but a dismissal from office inflicted as a punishment for bringing an action seems at first sight to be a contravention of law. If it were possible to avoid disputes of this kind by the establishment of a friendly understanding with Rome, the object would be cheaply attained by the payment of a moderate salary to a diplomatic agent. It is true that German Ministers at Rome have not succeeded in preventing the present rupture; but in former times they have probably surmounted many smaller impediments. Negotiations sometimes fail, but without negotiation there can be no settlement of disputes.

Mr. MORRIS's objection to the appointment of Mr. JEAVOISE derived colour from the words of the Act, in which the Pope is described as Sovereign of the Roman States. As the extent of the States is not defined, it might be held that the words of the Act are satisfied by the sovereignty of the Pope, if only it exists, over the little strip of land on the right bank of the Tiber. The Crown has recognized the title of the King of ITALY to the possession of Rome, but it is not certain whether Rome includes the Vatican and St. Peter's. The designation of the Pope as Sovereign of the Roman States, which was caused by an objection to the proper title of Sovereign Pontiff, has created the unforeseen ambiguity; and, although the ATTORNEY-GENERAL argued that the statute was only declaratory, and superfluous, an enabling Act implies a previous disability. Lord BURNHAM made a false point in resting the Pope's sovereignty on his refusal to recognize the title of VICTOR EMANUEL. For this purpose the recognition which is essential must be accorded, not by the Pope, but by the Queen. As Mr. OSBORNE MORRIS remarked, King AMADEO is recognized by the English Government as King of Spain, although it is highly improbable that his title would be acknowledged by Queen ISABELLA. Two separate classes of opponents objected to the maintenance of a representative at the Papal Court. Mr. OSBORNE MORRIS would probably dispute the right of the Pope to any portion of territorial sovereignty, while zealous Protestants scruple to hold relations with a spiritual usurper. Some inconvenience may possibly arise from the presence in the same capital of two English diplomatic correspondents independently of one another with the British Office in Downing Street; but by some means provision ought to be made for communication with the Pope on matters affecting the good government of the Queen's dominions. Although the present occupant of the Holy See has not been found manageable, his successor may perhaps pursue a different policy. The contrast between the doctrines of the Syllabus and the practice of the Galley clergy might perhaps shock an unprejudiced Pontiff, if it could be shown to him that the interests of the Church would be promoted by some approach to consistency. As a Roman Catholic member truly said in the course of the debate, every Government in Europe, including schismatic Russia, acknowledges that after all the political changes which have occurred, there is still a great Power in the Leonine city; and the business of statesmen is not to consult their wishes or their theories, but to recognize existing facts. If half the population of England were unfortunately to become Moslems, it might be prudent to employ a confidential agent at Utah.

CONSERVATISM AT POWDERHAM.

THE Conservatives of "the four Western counties" might have had a more triumphant, but scarcely so happy, a time, if the meeting at Powderham had come off at the beginning instead of the end of the Session. Six months ago it was on the cards that they would be in office any day, and the legitimate enthusiasm incident to this state of things would have been tempered by the anxieties which surround untrodden paths. Now that the Government must last at all events until next February, the Opposition can criticise with unalloyed pleasure the mistakes or the crimes of which Ministers have been guilty. There must be a special satisfaction also to the cooler members of the party in having the Ballot Bill behind their backs. Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOOTE can call with perfect safety upon Conservatives to oppose the principle of the new Act. Resistance to the principle of a measure already passed is a much less embarrassing thing from a party point of view than resistance to the passing of a measure which is still under discussion. It is difficult not to suspect that if the Conservatives had taken office before the Ballot Bill had received the Royal assent, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOOTE would now have been hinting that the general demoralization of public opinion on the subject made doubtful whether it would not be better to pass the Bill with proper safeguards, rather than allow the Liberals again to make it a stalking-horse to power. As things stand, he was free to hope that all his hearers would combine in lifting up their voices and declaring their opinions. As it is usually the interest as well as the pleasure of persons who attend Conservative meetings to be known for what they are, there is not much doubt that Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOOTE's hope will be fulfilled. The party agents will not insist on opinions being declared when the necessity of doing so might prevent an elector from voting, so that the result will probably be that where the Conservatives are in a majority they will vote shouting, and where they are in a minority they will vote in silence. This arrangement seems very well adapted to secure the solid advantages of the Bill, while retaining the liberty of abusing it.

The honour of unfolding the Conservative programme at Powderham was reserved for Sir MASSY LORR. It cannot be said that his speech has made it any easier to answer the question as to what the Conservatives intend to do when they come into office. Conservatism, he says, is "a policy of building up, strengthening, and repairing the old foundations of our ancient institutions, and it is a policy of amending all these institutions; but, at the same time, with the exception of amending them, keeping them inviolate and intact." There is a fine constitutional flavour about this sentence, but unfortunately it is an extremely evanescent flavour. As soon as Sir MASSY LORR's definition of Conservatism comes to be examined, it turns out to be a definition of all English parties, with the exception of that which finds a mouthpiece in Mr. BRADLAUGH. We are all, Liberals as well as Conservatives, and Radicals as well as Liberals, anxious to keep inviolate what we are not anxious to amend. Sir MASSY LORR is not much more precise when he descends from generals to particulars. The first aim and object of the Conservative party, he tells us, is the maintenance of a monarchical form of government, and of the three Estates of the Realm—Queen, Lords, and Commons. Sir MASSY LORR is a little hazy in his notion of what constitutes an Estate of the Realm, but, putting this aside, he has described what is the aim and object of very nearly every single man in Parliament. Liberals indeed are more Conservative as regards the Monarchy than Sir MASSY LORR himself, for they, so far as we know, do not propose even to amend it, while Sir MASSY LORR does not think it needful to except the Crown itself from the list of institutions which have to be amended as well as kept inviolate. There are differences of opinion no doubt as to the amount of amendment which might profitably be applied to the House of Lords, but it cannot be said that the Liberal leaders have shown any disposition this Session to do anything except submit to it as it is. The second great characteristic of Conservatism is its devotion to law and order, its recognition of the rights of property against confiscation, and its dislike to Communism. Sir CHARLES DILKE might have a word to say upon Conservative devotion to order; and some of the Bolton magistrates are hardly an illustration of Conservative devotion to law. But, putting aside a momentary deflection here and there, no one will withhold the praise which Sir MASSEY LOPES claims for his friends. It would have been more to the purpose, however, if he had shown wherein the Liberal party is the enemy of law and order. If a description is to be worth anything, it must distinguish the thing described. It is just the same as regards respect for the rights of property and dislike to Communism. On Sir MASSEY LOPES's showing we are all Conservatives. If a Government were to be formed on the basis of "No confiscation," it would have to provide for double the ordinary number of Cabinet appointments. Both sides would have an equal claim to be represented in it. From property Sir MASSEY LOPES comes to the working classes, but after the experience of the Session he wisely treats this part of his subject in an historical rather than a political spirit. Our old friend the Factory Bill is made to do all the work. We are quite ready to concede, if only for argument's sake, that this Bill was all that Sir MASSEY LOPES's fond recollection paints it—the forerunner of all the measures passed of late years for the protection of the labouring classes, and a measure brought forward by Conservatives and opposed by the Whigs and Radicals. Probably if Sir MASSEY LOPES had seen his way to doing it, he would have come further down the stream of time, and have said something about the way in which the Conservatives have treated the measures which have followed upon the Factory Acts. His wisdom in abstaining from such a survey is unquestionable; but it is allowable to suggest that in 1872 it would have been more to the purpose to hear what the Conservatives thought of the Mines Regulation Act than what they thought of the Factory Act a quarter of a century ago.

Towards the close of his speech Sir MASSEY LOPES did succeed in discovering a Conservative principle which is not absolutely identical with the ordinary Liberal view on the same subject. The third characteristic of Conservatives is their anxiety for the maintenance of Church and State and of religion against Secularism. There are many Conservatives probably who look upon the Established Church with different feelings from those with which they regard any other institution of the country. It has a sacredness all its own; to touch it is not revolution merely, but sacrilege. But even now that a genuine party distinction has at length been unearthed, it turns out to be of no real value. In the first place, it relates to a controversy which for immediate and practical purposes need not be considered. If Mr. GLADSTONE had himself gone to the country on the question of disestablishment, instead of advising Mr. MIALl to do so, this feature in Conservatism would have had great importance. But whatever call may hereafter be made upon devout believers in the indissoluble union which should exist between Church and State, it is a mere waste of breath to raise the issue at present unless it be in proposing the health of the bishop and clergy of the Diocese. In the second place this religious devotion to the theory of an Established Church is apt to be but a weak-kneed devotion. It has an ugly trick of giving way just when it is most wanted. To judge by some Conservative oratory, it might be thought that disestablishment is a thing to be resisted even unto blood, that the obligation of fighting against it transcends the ordinary obligation of obeying the law, and emancipates the maintainers of Church and State from their allegiance to the powers that be. But only two Sessions back Conservatives were peaceably discussing in Committee the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and devoting themselves with business-like assiduity to getting all the money they could for it. Should the day ever come for the disestablishment of the Church of England to be an equally practical question, we have no doubt that the Church and State party will display the same practical good sense. As regards the antagonism between religion and secularism, Sir MASSEY LOPES is right in holding that there is a section of the Liberal party with whom secularism really stands for a dislike to the teaching of religion. But the numerical strength of this segment is infinitesimal. If it had to construct a Government, it would have to use up its whole rank and file, and then leave some places vacant. The great body of those who now call themselves Secularists really differ from their opponents, not on the question whether religion shall be taught to the children attending elementary schools, but on the far less important question when and by whom it shall be taught to them. A Continental secularist would open his eyes in contempt and wonder at the way in which the term is applied in England. A man who wished to see religion taught after school hours by the clergy of the several confessions would be classed in his estimation with the most priest-ridden Ultramontane. Even at the last, therefore, Sir MASSEY LOPES gives us but a very slight gleam of enlightenment. If Conservatism stands for religion against Secularism, there are many Secularists who would declare themselves Conservatives.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH ACT.

THE Public Health Bill has become law, and there is now no part of England where there is not some sanitary authority possessing, and legally bound to exercise, a large variety of powers. How numerous these powers are is scarcely perhaps suspected by the opponents of the measure. Though they are all already in existence, they have hitherto been obscured by their distribution over several bodies, and by the fact that many of them have only been operative in places where a majority of the ratepayers have deliberately adopted the Act creating them. In future both these sources of weakness will be removed. There will be but one sanitary authority in each district, whether in town or country, and the powers of these authorities will, subject to the division into urban and rural authorities, be in all respects identical. Until now the inhabitant of one town may have heard of the satisfactory sanitary state of another town, and may have found upon inquiry that this state was the result of sanitary measures which might be taken with equal success in his own neighbourhood. But the discovery has in all probability done him no good. The town whose condition he envies has turned out to be governed by a local Act, or to have voluntarily placed itself under the provisions of a public Act the adoption of which is optional. Hereafter the action of one sanitary authority will be something more than an example to others. It will be an illustration of what can be done by a judicious use of powers which every authority possesses and can be made to exercise.

It is of great importance that there should be no unnecessary delay in carrying out the promise lately given by Mr. STANFELD to publish an edition of the sanitary laws which shall be in effect a code for popular use. There is nothing to prevent the existing Acts on the subject of public health from being so arranged as to show clearly to the sanitary authorities themselves what they have power to do, and to the ratepayers what the sanitary authorities may be called upon to do. The latter object is the more important of the two. There is no fear that any sanitary authority which is anxious to do its duty will have any difficulty worth speaking of in finding out its duty. But there is great fear that many sanitary authorities will be content to remain in ignorance of their duty unless their attention is unmistakably called to it. If the new edition of the Acts is sufficiently popular in its treatment of the subject-matter, any ratepayer of ordinary intelligence ought to be able to point out to the authority having jurisdiction in the district in which he lives that they are bound to do this or that. For this purpose, however, a mere arrangement of the statutes will not be enough. There are many persons who seem to labour under a congenital inability to understand an Act of Parliament. When the same statements are put into different, and in itself perhaps less intelligible, language, they have no difficulty in taking them in. It is the presence of technicalities that confounds them. To meet this not uncommon case every division of the subject should be prefaced by a studiously un lawyer-like version of the provisions contained in the following statutes. The less anything is explained by reference to some former or subsequent part of the introduction the less danger there will be of misunderstanding. Any amount of repetition should be tolerated which helps on the primary object of making the men who elect the sanitary authorities thoroughly aware of what they can insist upon these authorities doing after they have elected them. With the same purpose of putting every part of sanitary law in the clearest possible light, it would be well to publish the rural and the urban codes in separate volumes. It is true that much of the contents will be common to both, but if a full code is to be only part of the code to which he has to refer is applicable to his own case, he may perversely rest his demand on the wrong part, and be deterred from again taking any trouble in the matter by hearing from the sanitary authorities that they do not come under the statute to which he has referred them. Since every ratepayer must be under the jurisdiction either of an urban or of a rural sanitary authority, there will be no difficulty in treating the statutes which deal with each as a distinct body of law. In this way every one will know which volume he wants, and be sure of finding in it nothing but what he wants.

When the Local Government Board has thus done its part, a large measure of responsibility will devolve upon all who, either as electors or representatives, are concerned in carrying out the new sanitary system. It is essential to remember that no amount of Public Health Acts can remedy the sanitary deficiencies of the country unless the persons for whose benefit the law has been made take some trouble in administering it or seeing it administered. Many of those on whose behalf the intervention of the sanitary authorities most needs to be invoked will never invoke it for themselves. Either they do not care about being healthy, or they are afraid that they will offend their superiors if they are known to care about it. In this case the appeal to the authorities must be made for them. People who have until now been vaguely lamenting the unsavoury condition of this or that cottage ought not to rest satisfied in future until they have laid the case before the proper officials, and, if they are immovable, before the Local Government Board. There will be no difficulty in ascertaining by the help of the manual which will by that time have been published, whether the law provides for the particular case; and in the event of its being found to do so, all that will be required will be such a stock of patience as will outlast the delays and difficulties which, under the best possible system, it will be in the power of unwilling authorities to interpose. It would greatly help the working of the new Act if a few influential people in each village or in each district of a town would form themselves into an amateur Committee of Health, and send in a report to the Board of Guardians or to the Town Council of the sanitary evils which most immediately call for attention. Clergymen and doctors are naturally marked out for this work by their acquaintance with the houses in which the poor live, and by the consequent duty which devolves upon them of doing what they can to make these houses habitable. After all, however, the efficiency of the new sanitary system must largely depend upon the character of the persons to whom its administration is committed. So long as the Boards of Guardians have been only concerned with the relief of the poor, a great number of ratepayers have felt no interest in the elections, and have usually abstained from voting. There will no longer be any excuse for this sort of apathy. Every ratepayer will have a share in choosing the authorities to whose care the health of the district will be committed, and if he neglects to exert himself to choose them wisely, he will have no one but himself to thank for any shortcomings in sanitary administration. Such a display of zeal as was seen in the first election of the School Boards would go far to make any further legislation on this subject a work of supererogation.

To the return of a satisfactory representative body there must go not only good constituencies but good candidates. The electors can but make their choice from among the list of names submitted to them, and if this list happens to contain few or no men possessing solid qualifications for the post which they seek, the choice will necessarily be a bad one. This evil will in a great measure be met if men of standing and character in each district will put themselves forward as candidates for seats on Boards of Guardians. In many cases they do so, and do it successfully, even now. But in still more they hold themselves apart, from a natural dislike to the persons with whom they would be brought into association in the event of their being elected. They have been to blame for this abstention all along, because they have been neglecting opportunities sometimes of ameliorating the condition of paupers, sometimes of lessening the amount of pauperism. But pauperism does not concern every village, and almost every house, in the way in which sanitary matters concern them; and if influential persons show the same indifference to the larger question that they have too often shown to the lesser, their conduct will merit far stronger condemnation. In every Poor Law union and in every town there ought to be a committee of sanitary reformers, whose business it shall be to induce proper candidates to put themselves forward, and, if necessary, to defray the expense of returning them. By this means every election would at least be conducted in case of need, and every voter who preferred disease and present economy to health and ultimate economy would do so with his eyes open. Under an active propaganda such as has been indicated, the number of those who evinced such a preference would yearly grow smaller.

MR. CHILDERS.

THE few men who are left at the Clubs have this week been provided with a little mild political gossip. It was rumoured that the LORD CHANCELLOR had sent in his resignation, and that Mr. CHILDERS was about to return to the Cabinet. The one event had been for some time anticipated, and, as they say in the City, discounted; and the other excited neither interest nor surprise. It was natural that Mr. CHILDERS should be taken back into the Cabinet if there happened to be room in it for another Minister, and if his health was sufficiently restored; but it was difficult to feel any enthusiasm on the subject. The favourite who has disappointed his backers does not disappear from the Calendar, but his subsequent career as a steadygoing "plater" is at the best rather respectable than glorious. Nobody doubts that Mr. CHILDERS has good stuff in him as an official, but it is known that he is not the great horse he was once thought to be. It appears that the LORD CHANCELLOR's retirement is at any rate put off for the present, and some of his friends have seized the opportunity of protesting against the cruelty of spreading a report which, as they say, must painfully remind him of his many disqualifications, mental and physical, for the position he occupies. Lord HATHERLEY will probably not face the fatigues of another Session, but his health is happily not in such a condition that he cannot carry on the routine business of the office until Sir R. PALMER has finished his duties at Geneva. Lord HATHERLEY has failed so conspicuously as a law reformer that it is perhaps natural to expect something better from his successor; but the new Lord Chancellor, if he has any designs in this direction, will find himself somewhat embarrassed by the recent declarations of the law officers in the House of Commons that the law is perfect, and that in any case it is none of their business to mend it. Although the rumour with regard to the LORD CHANCELLOR has proved to be premature, that with regard to Mr. CHILDERS has been confirmed. Mr. CHILDERS, it is announced, will succeed Lord DUFFERIN as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, with a seat in the Cabinet. The popular notion of the Chancellor of the Duchy is that he helps the Privy Seal to do nothing; but it has been officially explained that the Privy Seal does a good deal of miscellaneous work for other Ministers; and Lord DUFFERIN once described his office as that of a Ministerial man-of-all-work, who ran messages and did odd jobs for the Government. Whether it is absolutely necessary to have a couple of supernumeraries in the Cabinet we cannot pretend to say, but it may be presumed that Mr. GLADSTONE thinks it is; and it would be a pity that he should not obtain all the assistance he requires in the discharge of his responsible duties. Mr. CHILDERS began his official career at Mr. GLADSTONE's feet, and it is understood that he still looks up to him with the pious veneration and gushing faith of earlier years. Even if there is not much actual work for the Chancellor of the Duchy to do, it will probably be a comfort to the Premier to have his company in the Cabinet; and it would be churlish to grudge a hard-worked Minister the small indulgence of a sympathetic and confiding colleague. There is no reason to suppose that Mr. CHILDERS will not be able to provide himself with occupation, but no harm will be done as long as he does not get in other people's way.

It is possible that, if the Chancellorship of the Duchy were to be tested by the principles on which Mr. CHILDERS proceeded in his reductions at the Admiralty, it might be difficult to justify its maintenance as an important political office; and it may occur to some of the discharged clerks and dockyard labourers that there is an odd kind of poetical justice in Mr. CHILDERS, who abolished so many places, having to be provided with a sinecure in order to return to public life. There can be no doubt that many of the objects he sought to accomplish at the Admiralty were in themselves sound and reasonable, but he committed the great mistakes of taking too much upon himself personally, of neglecting or rashly overruling professional advice, and of attempting to hurry through reforms which inflicted great hardship on individuals and shook the stability of the service, and which should have been spread over a series of years. He was in such violent haste that he failed to do justice even to his own plans; and the fine theory of Ministerial responsibility with which he started broke down as soon as it was seriously tested. His administration at the Admiralty will always be known as the administration of the phantom Board. It is impossible to imagine anything more delicate or difficult than the exercise of authority by a Parliamentary official over professional experts. Mr. CHILDERS's management of the navy left human nature too much out of account. It is not enough for a Minister to come to a right decision as to what should be done; he must also take care that it shall be done in such a way as not to ruffle professional susceptibilities, and introduce sulkiness and dissatisfaction into the service. The experts are apt to be prejudiced and headstrong; they naturally look at everything from their own point of view, and find it difficult to understand why any broad considerations of public policy should be allowed to interfere with what they think right. A Minister who put himself unreservedly in the hands of his professional advisers would no doubt soon find himself committed to proceedings which it would be hopeless to attempt to justify in Parliament. On the other hand, a Minister will never be able to make anything of a service which is sulky and out of temper, and fancies it is not being treated with proper respect. The difficulty is how to humour and conciliate officials, and at the same time to keep them well in hand; and it was here that Mr. CHILDERS so utterly broke down. He got into difficulties on every side, with naval, civil, and scientific officers, all round. He had to learn that it was not enough to determine merely what was the right thing to be done, but that there is a right and a wrong way of doing right things. Whether he has learned this lesson sufficiently remains to be seen; but for the present at least he will have no opportunity of repeating the errors which produced such unhappy results when he was formerly in office. Mr. GOSCHEN has undone much of his predecessor's rash and inconsiderate work, has restored the authority of the professional officers of the Admiralty, and soothed the irritation of the service. If Mr. CHILDERS is wise, he will now content himself with office-work and the examination of accounts, and let alone the management of men.

The return of Mr. CHILDERS to the Cabinet may be regarded as destitute of political significance. It has been his ambition to be an administrator rather than a politician; and he has never taken a prominent position on party questions. His Radicalism can hardly be said to have gone much beyond a keen desire for economical administration; and he lately signalized his independence by opposing some portions of the Ballot Bill, a measure which his Australian experience probably led him to regard without much enthusiasm. It has been stated that a place in the Cabinet would have been reserved for Mr. BRIGHT if there had been any prospect of his being able to accept it; but his health is unfortunately still precarious, and his disinclination for office would seem to have been confirmed by his experience of its anxieties. The bitter dogmatism which he displayed in his recent speech could find a natural vent only in an independent and unofficial position. Assuming it to be necessary that another Minister should be added to the Cabinet, it is difficult to see who except Mr. CHILDERS could have been chosen to fill the vacancy, even apart from Mr. CHILDERS's irresistible claims as a former colleague who had been obliged to quit office by ill health. On the other hand, if it had been determined that the Chancellorship should not carry with it a seat in the Cabinet, it is almost equally difficult to imagine where the PREMIER could have looked for a suitable candidate. The young men below the gangway seem to have given themselves up to priggish humour and pedantic crotchets, and each of them aspires to be a leader on his own account, while men like Mr. BOUVIER, although they sit behind the Government, and vote with it pretty steadily, are uneasy and distrustful. As far as one can judge at present, the rising crop of statesmen is not a very promising one; and we should perhaps be thankful for those we have got, such as they are.

LECTURING IN AMERICA.

WE are apt to think, and on the whole with some reason, that America is a dull country. It has undoubtedly many solid advantages. The labourer who is transferred from a European dietary to a systematic consumption of three meals of meat daily need look no further for happiness, though of course he has also the advantage of becoming one of the multitudinous sovereigns of his adopted country. But for the more educated classes it must be admitted that many pleasures which give grace and refinement to European life are wanting. If any proof were needed, it would be found in the readiness of the higher class of Americans to entertain themselves. A lover of any form of art is worse off in New York or Boston than at many third-rate European towns.

When, however, we descend a degree or two in the social scale, the disadvantage is not so clearly on the same side. What kind of amusements are open, for example, to a middle-class Englishman in any town outside of London? He may enjoy himself socially, and we need not inquire too closely whether social enjoyment is not associated in his mind with the consumption of strong drink. At any rate the catalogue of pleasures is speedily exhausted. For music he probably cares nothing, and he has few opportunities of gratifying his taste if he possesses one. Every now and then he has the excitement of a cricket-match, a review of Volunteers, or a cattle-show. In the intervals, and especially in the evenings, it is to be feared that he is terribly bored. His love of home enjoyments, on which he sometimes prides himself, means chiefly a habit of going to sleep by the domestic hearth as soon as he has finished his day's work. However, as it is supposed that all capacity for intellectual pleasure is not quite dead within him, some energetic persons try to entice him from the bosom of his family by the promise of one of those lively entertainments known as popular lectures. Everybody who has attended one, and still more everybody who has been unlucky enough to give one, must feel that the mere fact that popular lectures exist casts a melancholy light upon our national habits. They help us to understand the prevailing French superstition as to the frequency of suicide in England. If these are the bright places in our lives, what must be the gloom of their usual monotony? The dismal green baize table, with the inevitable tumbler and decanter of water, is enough to strike a chill into the most buoyant spirits. As a rule the performance is only too suitable to the scenery. The wretched lecturer who descants, like Sir Barnes Newcombe, on the poetry of the affections, or describes a trip to the Holy Land, or discourses on the life and writings of Dr. Watts, feels himself instinctively sinking to the level of his audience. He utters, even in his own despite, the most feeble of platitudes, and hits off the most attenuated jokes; he tags the most commonplace of morals to his discourse; and feels himself to be as much humiliated by the patient effort of his audience to be amused as by the well-meant applause of the respectable persons on the platform who serve, a little too obtrusively, as leaders of the claque. It is a melancholy performance at the best, and on escaping from his position, and having made the regular vow that he will never make such a fool of himself in future, the lecturer perhaps reflects that there is something almost pathetic in the eagerness with which his audience have been feeding themselves on the mere dry husks of intellectual pleasure. Few things are more touching in their way than to see the poor regarding as luxuries what to the rich is mere refuse to be rejected with contempt; and it is perhaps as sad a sight when the luxuries belong to the intellect as when they are material.

In America, however, the system of which we have only a pale reflection in England flourishes with far greater vigour. Externally a country town in America is duller than a country town in Europe. The total absence of anything picturesque in its barren rectangular streets is depressing to the imagination; nor are the manners and customs of the inhabitants calculated superficially to dispel the illusion. It must, however, be admitted that they are in some sense more vivacious than their rivals. Lecturing is to them a serious affair, and not, as generally in England, an attempt on the part of the educated to force some sort of intellectual pleasure upon their inferiors. To all appearance, Americans really like to hear a lady or gentleman discoursing upon things in general, and take some pains to get it done as well as possible. We will not venture to decide whether this taste shows that their lives are generally duller than ours, that lecturing stands out as a bright spot against the ordinary routine of affairs, or that their intellectual appetites are really keener. At any rate, the lecturing business which for a time seemed to be declining is now once more improving, and we have before us a publication called the Lecture Magazine, printed in Boston, which gives some notion of the extent to which it is carried on. This Magazine is the organ of an agency which keeps a large staff of lecturers in readiness. Country associations write up to it to give orders, and the agency is ready to supply any number of lecturers, to say nothing of "orators" for the Fourth of July, "Decoration Day," and other festivities, together with vocal and instrumental music. You may order the whole apparatus of an enthusiastic meeting as conveniently as you may order a wedding breakfast from a London confectioner. The Magazine is simply a trade list, setting forth the attractions of the various ladies and gentlemen employed for this purpose. There are, it seems, from sixty to seventy persons all ready to deliver themselves on a vast variety of subjects, from Shakespeare to the musical glasses, and from metaphysics down to ventriloquism. Some of the names are already known to us. Mr. Sumner and General Butler are both on the list, though it appears that their public duties may possibly absorb their energies during the approaching season. Then we have Mr. John B. Gough the Temperance orator, Mr. Joaquin Miller the poet, Mr. Eliot Hart the humorist, Mr. Collyer, an eloquent and well-known Unitarian preacher, and Mr. George MacDonald of England. Several, indeed, of the most distinguished performers are countrymen of our own, whose labours in this capacity are not so highly esteemed here as beyond the Atlantic. The subjects, as far as supposed, take the widest possible range. There are, however, two or three departments in which the Americans seem to be especially to delight. One characteristic variety of lectures is that which ranges upon personality. One gentleman descends upon "growing with Shakespeare"; two or three others descend upon to my about Diogenes; another is ready to discourse upon "Spargen and his work," or upon "Mitchell, soldier, philanthropist, and astronomer"; whilst a lady describes from personal observation the "or-like game" of Mr. Charles Reade. Then we have lectures which we dimly guess to be something of the Nine Hymns variety. "Man revealed by music" and "the negative illusion" suggest more exalted mysticism, though the same gentleman rather descends into the familiar by promising a "spickspan new lecture not named yet." Of course, too, there are plenty of gentlemen ready to prove by various illustrations that the world is advancing to the millennium, and that it will get there more rapidly in proportion as it follows the lead of the United States. Colonel Higginson, for example, explains that the "aristocracy of the dollar" is gradually being substituted in America for the aristocracy of birth, and that it is a very much better thing. He "graphically and tersely portrays" the weakness of the latter institution in Europe, and shows that it leads inevitably to "insanity and idiocy." In America, on the other hand, the dollar stands "for all that is most desirable in moral and material progress." Nevertheless, Americans do not worship the dollar, though we should almost have inferred from the Colonel's eloquence that it was the best thing they could do; and they are perfectly capable of distinguishing between its right and its wrong. He showed in fact a "genuine belief in the people," instead of a "cold cynicism"; and displayed thereby the "consummate tact of the Yankee, combined with the logic and elegant phraseology of Greece and Rome." Persons who require some excitement may find it in a certain debate between the Rev. Dr. Fulton and the Rev. Dr. Haven. These two gentlemen are prepared to perambulate the country like a couple of professional prizefighters, having a series of sparring matches on the question of woman's suffrage. Dr. Fulton "announces great truths in short sentences, and hurls them" at his antagonist with, as we regret to say, a slight nasal twang. Dr. Haven is "bluff, jocos, severe, and devout"; he speaks so quickly that he stammers through earnestness; but we fear, from the comparative obscurity in which his character is left, that he is intended chiefly as Dr. Fulton's chopping-block. By way of contrast, the admirers of humour rather than eloquence may engage Mrs. Lott Hough, who has an excellent lecture called "Popping the Question," which is an essay on the modes of courtship employed by different nations, and shows Mrs. Hough's skill in talking "Irish, German, Down-East Yankee, and other dialects." Or from this refined performance we may descend to the lecture of "Oliver Optic," who has published eight hundred stories in newspapers, besides forty volumes of books, since 1852. Of these forty books it seems that at least half a million copies have been sold; and yet we fear that their fame has scarcely reached England. We are glad, however, to know that Mr. Adams—to use his real name—has abandoned the "blood and thunder" style of romance for boys, and tries to make them "admire good characters and condemn bad ones."

Here, it must be admitted, there is a wide enough field of choice; and it would seem that the demand is sufficient to induce many Americans to take up lecturing as a profitable profession. We confess that we do not personally desire an introduction of the system into England. In spite of all the attractions offered, we fear that we would rather read than hear the best lectures ever delivered, and that we would much rather neither read nor hear the great majority. And yet we must confess that the prevalence of the taste is on the whole creditable to the country. The absurdity of many of the lectures, the vulgarity of others, the flattery of popular vanity, and a number of other faults which might be mentioned, are bad enough; but, on the whole, the greatest of misfortunes is the sheer unadulterated sluggishness of mind which makes even such mild intellectual dissipation impossible, not because the audience are above it, but because they are below it; and Americans might plausibly urge that, if they are dull even in their amusements, they at least show more impatience of dullness than we do. Let us hope that when the provincial mind is stirred to emulation in England, it will show as great an appetite for knowledge, and be able to gratify it with materials of a superior order.

DR. DÖLLINGER ON UNIVERSITIES.

THE festival observed last week at Munich, with every circumstance of royal and popular solemnity, to celebrate the four hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the University, has naturally been regarded in Germany as an event of national interest. The University, originally founded at Ingolstadt by Duke Albert in 1472, transferred in the beginning of the present century to Landshut, and then, twenty-six years later, to Munich, by King Louis, is one of the oldest and still one of the most important of the German Universities—the most important probably of those in Southern and Catholic Germany. And although the festival was of a strictly ecclesiastical and not ecclesiastical character, it no doubt derived some additional significance from the fact of Bavaria being the recognised headquarters of the religious movement which is just now dividing the Roman Catholic Church, and from the venerable leader of that movement, Dr. Dollinger, having been called by an almost unanimous vote of his colleagues to fill the office of Rector Magnificus on the occasion. On the various circumstances which marked the week, and which bear a considerable family likeness to the programme of a Grand Commemoration at Oxford, we need not dwell. They have been fully reported in the German papers, and a brief record appeared in the telegraphic summary of our own daily press. But Dr. Dollinger's speech, which seems to have been received with continuous and enthusiastic applause from all his hearers, young and old alike, deserves a fuller notice. It was of course to be expected that he would say something of the antecedents and distinctions of the University which he was there to represent, and of which he has for so many years been a conspicuous ornament. But he did more than this. He took the opportunity to give what in less experienced hands might have been a mere superficial sketch, while in reality it contains a vivid and critical appreciation of the origin and growth of University education in Europe. It is a subject on which few men are so well qualified to speak, and he handled it with that depth and accuracy of learning, that intellectual grasp and breadth of moral sympathy, and that ardent but intelligent patriotism which will at once be recognised as characteristic of the speaker by all who are familiar with him personally or through his writings. We cannot do more here than reproduce the salient points of a discourse which occupied nearly two hours in delivery, and which well deserves to be read in full by those who are in a position to study it for themselves.

Dr. Dollinger begins by referring to the first consolidation of national unity a thousand years ago under Louis the German, and its revival last year in the new German Empire. Since then the University of Munich has been the first to celebrate its anniversary, which thus attains a sort of national importance, and the more so as the different German Universities are already united, and there is a frequent interchange of professors and students among them. The corporate idea which was so powerful in the middle ages, but was wholly wanting under the old governments, whether democratic or Imperial, of Greece and Rome, could alone make possible the foundation of Universities as independent communities, with their own rights and privileges, bound together by a community of interests between teachers and taught. Among such institutions the University of Paris for a long time stood supreme, and Paris became, far more than Rome, the intellectual metropolis of Western Europe. It was a common saying that, as Italy had the universities and Germany the imperial, France had the studium. Far different in character were the Italian Universities, which began to be founded in the twelfth century, but never approached the theological and literary eminence of Paris and Oxford; their aim was practical, and the studies principally cultivated were jurisprudence and medicine. Their origin and system were of a casual and purely democratic kind, without any recognized authority and position in Church or State. Two or three professors of canon and civil law and medicine combined to form a University, and students gradually gathered round them, but its prosperity was at best fluctuating and uncertain. Leo X. founded the Sapienza with eighty-eight professors, but a few years later Clement VII. diverted the endowments to other objects, and its days of prosperity were gone for ever. The teachers at these Universities had no corporate status or dignity, and were looked on simply as paid agents for the supply of a marketable commodity; there was no genius loci, as at Oxford, no sense of pride in belonging to a great institution either among the teachers or the taught. Bologna, however, has an historical importance as the birthplace and chief home of the allied sciences of Roman civil law and canon law, which exercised so large an influence on the development of the Papal autocracy; Alexander III., Innocent III., and Innocent IV., the great founders of the system, had taught or studied there. There, too, the German Emperors learnt lessons of absolutism derived from the maxims of the old Roman Empire which they were supposed to inherit, and openly proclaimed their superiority to law. Paris, however, asserted a more direct influence than the Italian Universities on the national life of Germany, through the crowds of students who flocked thither hither as yet no Universities of their own, and who brought back with them the French spirit and language on their return. But even where the curriculum was a very narrow one, and the entire absence of any historical and critical sense left unbounded room for the dominance of fiction and forgeries. Two men, in Germany and England, made the first attempt to break the ice; Albert the Great, who has been not improperly called the Humboldt of his age, and Roger Bacon, both of whom laboured to introduce the study of natural science, while Roger Bacon also paved the way for the cultivation of Greek literature.

And now the time was come for Germany to take her part in the academic life of Europe. The ancient Universities of Paris, Oxford, Cambridge, and Bologna own no founder and no assignable date of institution—"they were a natural growth." But it was the princes, secular and spiritual, who in the middle of the fourteenth century began to establish Universities in Germany, and the municipal authorities afterwards followed their example. The first was founded at Prague in 1348 by Charles IV., and is said to have numbered 40,000 students by the end of the century; but the quarrels between the Czech and German students, which have lasted down to our own day, soon made an end of its prosperity. In the same century were founded the Universities of Vienna, Heidelberg, Cologne, and Erfurt, all of which were originally to a great degree ecclesiastical institutions, and suggested by the revenues of Church benefices. They often had no other than six professors of canon law. But the great reform of the anti-Pope evoked a spirit of reform throughout the Church, and the German Universities, following in the wake of Babel, threw themselves into the movement of which Gerson and D'Ailly were the recognized leaders, and were all united in proclaiming the superiority of Councils to Popes. But all hope of an effective reform was shattered by the desertion of Frederick III. to the Papal party, and he forced the University of Vienna, by the threat of withdrawing its endowments, to renounce the Council of Baele. Meanwhile a distinct but cognate movement had been originated at Oxford by Wicliff, and was taken up at Prague by Huss with greater immediate success, while a third University, that of Wittenberg, eventually gave it the form in which it has exercised so momentous an influence on the subsequent history of the Church. The Universities, too, in Germany rather than in Italy, became the nurseries of that revival of classical literature which, however little such an alliance was intended or acknowledged on either side, materially aided the progress of the Reformation.

Three more German Universities, at Greifswald, Freiburg, and Baele, were founded shortly before Ingoldstadt (in 1472), and Tübingen a little later. Paris was the common mother of them all, and Ingoldstadt borrowed its statutes from Vienna, which had received them from Paris. It was a dark period in the political life of Germany; but for a time, from 1494 to 1518, Ingoldstadt gained celebrity for its classical teaching under Conrad Celtes, Locher, and Reuchlin, and the historian Aventin was its most distinguished ornament. The number of students, however, was not large. Then came the Reformation, of which Wittenberg was the centre, and the new Universities of Marburg, Königsthum, Jena, Altdorf, and Helmstadt, were founded for its promotion, while Leipsic, Rostock, Greifswald, and Heidelberg joined the movement. Prague and Vienna, which adhered to the old faith, were almost deserted, and Ingoldstadt became, and continued for two centuries, one of the chief strongholds of Catholicism; there, as at all the German Universities, Catholic or Protestant, theology overshadowed every other faculty. It is curious that at a period of such intense theological energy throughout Europe, Paris, which had long been "the Queen in that region to whose decisions every one submitted," entered on her period of decline. But the causes of decay were external, and are not difficult to explain. The place itself, which was now the constant scene of civil strife and bloodshed, was most unfavourable for learning. But, more than that, the immediate neighbourhood of a Court which claimed supreme control over the minds and consciences, as well as the lives, of its subjects, made all freedom of writing and teaching impossible. Thus in 1624 a Royal decree forbade on pain of death any divergence from Aristotelian doctrines on physical and metaphysical subjects, and Louis XIV. would have instantly lodged in the Bastille any professor who contradicted his opinions. It is not wonderful then that during the seventeenth century Paris lost nine out of her forty colleges, or that, while two-thirds of the most distinguished German writers belong to the Universities, scarcely a single name eminent in French literature since 1660 is connected with the Parisian or any other French University. Enforced subscription to arbitrary professions of faith completed the work of degradation, and when at last the University fell with the destruction of her property, the event was hardly noticed, nor has any French Government since the Revolution thought of restoring it—etiam pariete ruinæ. Louvain, which had long been a flourishing University almost fit to compete with Paris, was strangled under a similar system of coercion, and her one great scholar in the last century, Van Espen, had to fly for his life when an old man of eighty-two. Leyden, on the other hand, founded by the Prince of Orange, and with far smaller resources, has produced a long line of illustrious scholars, and known no period of decay; while the Spanish and Portuguese Universities, which once stood so high, have suffered a total and tragical eclipse. But with the eighteenth century the German Universities received a new lease of life. The great reaction which began with the foundation of Halle and culminated in the foundation of the Universities of Berlin and Bonn, also brought about the removal of the Bavarian University, first from Ingoldstadt to Landshut in 1800, and thence in 1826 by King Louis to the capital.

We cannot follow Dr. Döllinger through the long catalogue of illustrious philosophers, linguists, historians, and divines who have adorned his alma mater, and who naturally find honourable and appreciative mention on such an occasion. It includes Schelling, Bader, Savigny, Feuerbach, Stahl, Windischmann, Sailer, Möhler, and many other memorable, though less widely celebrated, names. When he comes in conclusion to dwell on the present and future of his country, he points, as might be expected, with pardonable pride to the bright prospect opened before her through the restoration of political unity, and to the mission assigned by general consent to the Germans of enriching other nations out of the fulness of their scientific and literary wealth; though it must be remembered that in former ages they have learnt much successively from Italy, from France, and from England. He trusts that the single-minded and unwearied pursuit of truth for its own sake will always continue to be a distinction of Germany, and that she will avoid that vicious centralisation which, in intellectual culture as in other matters, has proved the ruin of France. On one important point he earnestly commends the example of the English Universities to the imitation of his own, where he thinks that the College system would supply a manifest and serious defect. And no less earnest is his caution against the danger of sensualism and materialism incident to a widespread cultivation of the natural sciences, especially among the half-educated, which would inevitably prove the harbinger of national decay. Against that danger the Universities, if only they are true to their high position and duties, will provide a sure defence. "Let us then," are the concluding words of the discourse, "continue to labour indefatigably, in a pure scientific spirit and with loyal self-devotion, to build up the one temple of truth. That will be an imperishable monument, surviving all changes of fortune, of the honour and greatness of Germany."

TOURIST TALK.

IT is a white day for the tourist when he first finds himself in a spot out of the reach of tourists. If it is not an unpatriotic sentiment, we may say that it is a white day when he first finds himself out of the reach of his own tongue. We do not mean when he falls in with a really intelligent native who pays the stranger the compliment of speaking to him as a guest in his own tongue, instead of requiring the guest to speak the tongue of the host. We mean only that confused babble of our own tongue, broken up and mingled with half a dozen other tongues, which besets the ear of the traveller as long as the necessities of geography drive him to abide within eyeshot and earshot of the tourist. We need hardly stop now to draw the marked distinction between the two classes—between the traveller who has a rational object in his travelling and the tourist who has no rational object in his touring. It is pleasant to get away from crowded haunts and huge hotels—in short, from the generally cosmopolite form of being—into places which the sightseeing crowd has not yet learned to infest, and where the land and its people, their ways, their tongue, and their buildings may be studied without let or hindrance. In the great hotel, in the place of fashionable resort, you are hardly a human creature. You are not a man, but only No. 235, treated no doubt, like all other numbers, with stately civility, but not entering into any kind of human relation with any body. But go out of the beaten track into the regions which Cook's tourists have not yet invaded, and besides the pleasures of quiet you can find less pretentious houses of entertainment, providing lodging and food, which, though they cost much less, are to the unsophisticated mind quite as good as anything to be had in the more stately palaces of Köln and Geneva. You are a man, and, as a man, somewhat of a brother. You are not a mere number, but a creature standing in a human relation to everybody, from the landlord to the boots. In short, you have to deal with a landlord, and not with a lessee or a proprietor or a manager of a company; you are not in an establishment, but in an inn. And, what is specially precious to travellers who wish to keep their heads clear for the subject of their travels, the foul practice of shutting up every possible window, which seems to reach its height in picturesque parts like Wiesbaden and Schwalbach, is far less rampant in places where the minds and the noses of men seem to be less perverted. In these lowlier quarters one is never hindered from opening a window for oneself. Nay, instead of the merciless savages who in more polite quarters seem to make it their chief business to shut up every crevice by which the least aniff of the breath of life can smuggle itself in, we have even known a discreet waiter open a window of his own accord, with the besitting comment that fresh air is a good thing. The painful fact is that happy regions of this kind are daily growing smaller; the tourist is ever annexing some fresh territory, and whatever he annexes he corrupts. He turns up in times and places where no one would have looked for him. One might have thought that Switzerland in the month of November was perfectly safe. Yet we believe that we put on record at the time that a genuine specimen of the British tourist was seen in that month between Bern and Luzern. It was he who, on being told of the meeting of the Federal Assembly—which his Swiss Times forgot to mention—supposed, with an unlucky conception of the most decorous Parliament in the world, that the Republicans must be "much more free-and-easy than we are." But after all, in this tourist some good thing was found; he did know that Switzerland is a Republic; he did not, like Chief Justice Whiteide, look on it as a confederation of small kingdoms. But the traveller whose fate constrains him to face the tourist on his own ground and in his own seasons hears more marvellous things than this. Let us conceive the inquirer standing on the hills above Heidelberg and trying to find out whether he really can, as he has been told, see the towers of Speier in the distance. It is something to know whether, in the desolation of 1689, the burning minster and the burning palace could be seen at a single glance—watchfires, like those from Troy to Argos, to tell the Most Christian King what glorious havoc was doing. Another stand-by, seeing somebody looking at something, kindly offers the help of a spy-glass. One good turn deserves another, and the Tourist cannot well help saying that it is Speier for which he is looking. He is rewarded by learning what kind of idea the genuine British tourist has of the city which should at least be dear to him as the place—a second Antioch—where the name Protestant was first heard. "Speier—ah! there is a town there; it is famous for the —" There was once an Oxford story of a convert, and orthodox—some might think a Romanising—divine, who was known to stand up after dinner glass in hand, and announce that "the invariable tendency of Protestantism is to —" something no doubt very dangerous, but what it might be was hidden from mankind by the sudden gulping down of a glass of port. So our tourist got no farther than the fact that, as Protestantism had an invariable tendency to something, so the city which, though not Protestant, gave birth to Protestantism, was famous for something which was lost by a sudden pause—unprompted, we are bound to say, by port or liquor of any kind—between the article and its substantive. Only a faint ejaculation followed—"Miss Somebody went there"—leaving the traveller with the vague impression that the unknown Miss, who at least went to see the city which was famous for something, had the more inquiring spirit of the tourist.

But greater things still may be met with. Let the traveller be on the line between Frankfort and Aschaffenburg. He is musing perhaps on the appearance of Josephus Augustus, Pater Patriæ, and the rest of it, in his wig and breeches in the Römer. Or he is musing on the daring of the Frankfort poet, whoever he was, who took the glibly-running line,

Urbs Aquisensis, urbs regalis, and changed it into such a limping cadence as—

Francofurdensis urbs regalis.

Or, as he nears Aschaffenburg, he is trying whether he can remember, or whether he ever knew, why Lambert of Hersfeld was so long called Lambert of Aschaffenburg, and further whether the minister of Aschaffenburg was regular or secular. Meanwhile his carriage is boarded by companions whose thoughts run on quite different matters. Enter the British papa, comfortable and self-complacent, at the head of his household. What will the moralist say if the traveller confesses that he shrouded himself, as it were—or, to use another metaphor, decked himself in peacocks' feathers—by answering some trivial remark in such High-Dutch as he could muster? The small—we hope harmless—trick succeeded, and the tourist household began to discuss things past and present after their own fashion. They had been at Coblenz; they had been at Trier—they called it Trier, and not Trèves, thereby awakening hopes which were disappointed—and Trier was pronounced to be a very interesting city, with the drawback that it was not blessed with a single good café. But as a man, and that man not a Briton but a Romance-speaking Swiss, once declared with some scorn that "la chose la plus intéressante à Ravenne est le Pinet," so the chief thing which had struck our tourists was some attempt at being funny on the part of the vergers of the Cathedral when, it seems, they had, with genuine tourist impertinence, been trying to find out whether he really believed in the Holy Coat or not. From Trier and the church discourse turned to Coblenz and the army. A tale was told of brutal insolence on the part of a German officer towards a civilian of his own nation, which we forbear telling, because very likely it is not true, and because the beauty of the story lies in the comments, which are of exactly the same value whether the story be true or false. The British father remarked that "the Prussians seem to treat the Germans at Coblenz like a conquered people." A daughter, evidently with a certain glimmering of facts, at least as compared with her parent, put in, "But there are as many Germans in the army as there are Prussians." Then, after some less distinct sayings, came the general agreement of the family circle, "But the Prussians have done so much for the Germans that they must put up with a good deal from their hands"—the particular story told being just the kind of thing with which no people ought to put up at the hands either of strangers or of countrymen. Now what kind of people can these be who cross the sea and go a long way into strange lands, and yet, neither before they set out nor while they are on their touring, find out anything better than this about the history and geography of the lands through which they are passing? Do they fairly represent the great British public and its literary representative, the general reader? Does Mr. Reeve, for instance, believe that to oppose Prussians to Germans is a logical division, like opposing either Prussians or Germans to Frenchmen or Spaniards? Was the Times in this state of mind when, not so many years ago, it told us, as the last piece of news, that Prussia had just joined the Zollverein? If any of these personages were evil entreated by natives, say of Yorkshire or of Devonshire, would they say that Yorkshiremen or Devonshiremen dealt with the English as with a conquered people? If they would not, the one alternative conjecture to which we are driven is one somewhat farfetched. The British public is, perhaps excusably, misled by the contrast between the maps of the last century, which show only a small Prussia lying outside a large Germany, and the maps from 1815 to 1866, which show Prussia increased by a large slice of the Germany of the earlier map. Perhaps indeed the general reader and his literary purveyors may look on the Prussian conquerors of Germany as being still the awful Paynim dogs on whom the Teutonic knights made war, speakers of verbs in mi and worshippers of Perkune the God of Thunder. What if the Holy Coat, about which the British father was merry with the vergers, should be displaced in favour of some heathen fetish? What if the minister of Köln should be finished only to be dedicated to some idol brought from a land yet further east than that from which Sir Walter Scott so kindly imported Zernebeck for the worship of our own forefathers?

Perhaps, however, we may have to put up with a simpler explanation. It is evident that Messrs. Bradshaw and Co., who, as we conjecture, are great authorities with the tourist world, are of this remarkable way of thinking as regards Germans and Prussians, or rather of a way of thinking yet more remarkable. A glimpse at the work of the great practical geographers revealed to us a still more wonderful notion of logical division than that of our tourist in Frankland. They give their readers the time-tables of the three classes of "German Railways," "Prussian Railways," and "Hessische [sic] Railways." If "Hessische," why not also "Preuss- sische" it might be unbecoming in us to ask. But the division makes it not unlikely that some traveller who is lucky in his company may some day come in for a Hessian, as well as a Prussian, conquest of Germany. Such a theory might sound hard on the nearest approach that Germany can show to autochthonous or aborigines, on those Obatli who boast that they, alone of all the Teutonic tribes, have ever since stayed in the place where history first shows them. But supposing that an officer of any kind in the service of the Grand Duke of Hessen should deal with a citizen of Mainz as badly as the Prussian officer is said to have dealt with the citizen of Coblenz, what comment could the British tourist make on the fact, except that "the Hessians treated the Germans like a conquered people"?

One note more of Tourist Talk. The description of the offence committed, or said to have been committed, at Coblenz was accompanied by a further statement that from Coblenz to some other point on the Rhine was a "very pleasant ride." Now if the journey was made either by the railway or by the slower process of the Imperial post, far be it from us to complain of its being spoken of as a "ride." To turn to our old-fashioned standard on such points, we find that righteous Joseph and wicked Ahab and the mixed character Jehu, with his friend Jehonadab, are all recorded to have "ridden" in chariots. But if the discourse was rightly reported to us, the ride was done on board a Rhine steamer. Such a flight at once raises the British tourist to the level of Icelandic scalds and Old-English chroniclers. We commend this new form of an ancient metaphor to Mr. Brown, author of Vindex. And we cannot help suggesting that, in memory of such a metaphor, one of the inland horses of the wave, one of the "yð-hengestas" of the great German river, should for the future bear, instead of the names of human and living princes, the more attractive title of the Hippopotamus.

THE IRISH VOTE.

THE Keogh debate sputtered itself out in the small hours of yesterday morning, and the advocates of priestly intimidation have the satisfaction of knowing that Mr. Justice Keogh's judgment has been sustained by a large majority in the House of Commons. There is no reason to suppose, however, that the Home Rulers and the clerical party, who are just now in alliance, will fail to extract political capital from this subject for use at the elections; and they have not lost sight of the fact that there is a large body of Irish Roman Catholic voters on this side of St. George's Channel. Everybody knows what the Irish vote means in the great towns of the United States; and it is not improbable that before long we may see something like it established in our own country. We are now beginning to realize some of the consequences of Mr. Disraeli's Reform Act. At first its operation was naturally slow and gradual, and to those who looked only at the surface it seemed as if the leap in the dark had been not much of a descent after all, and solid ground had been soon and safely reached. In point of fact, the classes who were suddenly invested with supreme power have only been learning by degrees the extent of their authority, and the best means of turning it to account; or rather, perhaps, it would be more correct to say that skilful agitators and wire-pullers have been discovering the value of the weapon so temptingly placed at their disposal, and have been making their arrangements accordingly. It is stated that on Monday Archbishop Manning, supported by fifteen priests, presided at a meeting in London, which he had convened for the purpose of forming an Association for the registration of Roman Catholic voters, and at which it was arranged that the priest of each "mission" station should be chairman of an election committee. The Irish Home Rule Association has also had a meeting at Manchester as a bid for the Irish vote. The speakers were not men of mark, and the speeches threw very little light on the objects of the Association; but it was made abundantly clear that an attempt would be made to organize the Irish of the large towns into a compact voting power, which would be under the direction of leaders, and could be used as occasion required. Mr. Kenrick, who appears to be an agent of the Home Rule Association, and who had just returned from a tour of political inspection, assured his countrymen that in the great constituencies they could always turn the balance of parties if they exerted themselves, and the result of his calculations was that "in the great strongholds of what was called Liberalism in England, in all the large towns, the Irishmen could dictate to the present Ministry, or any other Ministry who should be candidates at the next elections." In the Midlands, in the West Riding, and in Lancashire the Irish had, he said, enormous influence if they would only use it in concert. In every large town there ought to be an Irish party which should belong neither to the Liberals nor to the Conservatives, but should support whichever side offered the best terms. This is not perhaps a very pleasant prospect, especially when it is remembered what have been the results of the Irish vote in America; but it is obvious that the Irish have the same right as other people to make the most of their voting power, and nothing can be more legitimate, in a sense, than the proposed combination. The Home Rulers have been accused of being only Fenians in disguise, and the Fenian proclivities of the Irish population of Manchester are sufficiently notorious. But it is clearly something gained that Fenians, if there are any left, should unite for the purpose of sending members to represent them.

in Parliament, and to argue in favour of their peculiar views, instead of shooting down policemen in the streets, and getting up another attack on Chester Castle. The worst thing about Fenianism was its violence; take away the violence, and, however foolish and impracticable, it is only a lawful form of agitation like the Teetotalers' Alliance, the Liberation Society, or the league of hysterical females who insist upon the unrestricted propagation of disease. Sir George Bowyer, who presided at the meeting, and who will not be suspected of Fenian sympathies, though it may perhaps be assumed that a Knight of Malta would not engage in a movement which did not promise well for the Pope, observed that they had come to reason with their fellow-citizens quietly and in the most logical manner. He added that they demanded Home Rule as a right, and would have it, which sounds rather like "No compulsion, only you must"; but perhaps this was only an oratorical flourish. The resolutions which were passed were strictly peaceful; they called for the establishment of "a native Parliament of Ireland"—meaning, we suppose, in Ireland—as an Imperial necessity, pledging the meeting to support only candidates who would vote for Home Rule, and expressing satisfaction at the recent action of Irish constituencies in this respect. Professor Galbraith explained that what the Home Rule Association aimed at was a federal union between Ireland and the rest of the empire, Ireland having the management of her own internal affairs, while the Imperial Parliament continued to regulate all questions of Imperial policy, such as defence, colonies, and foreign affairs. He disclaimed, on the part of the Association, the presumption of proposing a cut and dried Constitution; and some commotion was caused by a succeeding speaker, who invited the Home Rulers to state candidly what they were driving at. Professor Galbraith declared that they had nothing to conceal; but it would obviously not be worth while to revolutionize the Constitution if the practical result is to be nothing more than a slight rearrangement of parochial details.

This is really the gist of the whole question. To establish in Dublin a Parliament of two Houses which should be only a kind of large Vestry and Local Board of Works, would be to revive old traditions which have lost their meaning, and to open the door for endless confusion and squabbling as to the proper limits of local jurisdiction, and the relations between the local authorities and the Imperial Government. Such an assembly as the Home Rulers profess to want would not be a Parliament in the ordinary sense of the word, and to call it a Parliament would only be misleading and mischievous. It is not unnatural that Irishmen should desire that Dublin should be the capital of the Empire, and that Parliament should meet there instead of in London; but as the Imperial Government must fix its seat somewhere, and cannot be in several places at once, the choice of the capital must be determined by considerations of general convenience. Short of establishing the Sovereign and Parliament on the banks of the Liffey, nothing would satisfy those who indulge in sentimental rhapsodies about Ireland being a subject kingdom governed by an alien race from a foreign capital. There can be no doubt that Parliament is every year getting to be more overwhelmed with work, and that there is a great deal of local business, not merely Irish, but English and Scotch business, which is sadly neglected. Whether any means can be devised of relieving Parliament of some of its work, and giving wider powers to local bodies, is a subject which may be usefully considered by the Government during the recess. But this, as we have said, is not exclusively an Irish grievance; it is an inconvenience which presses quite as hardly on Englishmen and Scotchmen. Sir George Bowyer thinks that an Irish Parliament should be specially established to discuss such matters as the conduct of Mr. Justice Keogh, and no doubt such a Parliament as Sir George and his clerical friends have in view might be trusted to make very short work with any judge who dared to enforce the law against the priests—that is, if any law were left which could be enforced against them. It is possible to conceive a Parliament more usefully employed than in revising judicial decisions in a spirit of political or religious partisanship. Mr. Martin announced that the Irish were grievously wronged because so many of them were "compelled to leave the land they loved, and to come to England to earn an honest livelihood by honest hard work." It has generally been supposed that they are attracted hither by the prospect of higher wages and better fare, and it can hardly be the honesty of the livelihood thus placed within their reach to which Mr. Martin objects. The assertion that "England has never given a fair chance to Ireland" is disproved by Mr. Martin's own admissions, and by the number of Irishmen in the military and civil services. On the basis of population, the Irish have by far the largest share of public employments, though it would no doubt be better for them if they were less anxious to be provided for by the State. Mr. Sullivan of the Nation professed to believe that the religious differences of Irishmen were entirely due to the machinations of "the minions and miscreants of Dublin Castle"; and there is, no doubt, equally good reason to suppose that these miscreants are also responsible for the resistance which has been offered by the Roman Catholic gentry of Galway to the political intimidation of the priesthood. For the present there is an alliance between the priests and the patricians, but the success of their combination would be the beginning of discord.

One of the resolutions passed at the meeting proclaimed that until there was a native Parliament in Dublin "no permanent contentment or prosperity can be expected in Ireland." The Irish may be obstinate and impenetrable in their discontent, but it would appear that they are unable to resist the incalculable advances of national prosperity. The Lord Lieutenant, who has just opened two new docks at Belfast, states that the savings of the country have during the last five years been increasing at the rate of a million per annum, and the expenditure by about half as much. Under the Land Act no less than 80,000*l.* was advanced in 1870 to July to purchase holdings; while in 1871 and 1872, 82,500*l.* was advanced for improvements in land, and more than half of it for buildings. At the same time drunkenness and crime were decreasing. A Report has been issued by the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland which also contains some very striking evidence. The Inspector for Carlow reports that labourers' wages have increased to nearly double what they were twelve years ago. From Tipperary and Clare there is a similar report. Labourers can now command not only good wages, but improved dwellings, and the Inspector anticipates that "the difficulty of getting labourers, even at fifty per cent. advance on the rate of wages paid ten or twelve years since, unless suitable habitations are provided for them, will increase every year." Mr. Prendergast, Inspector for the North-Western District, says that he finds more attention paid everywhere to the question of improved dwellings and offices for farmers and labourers. "The improvement in all newly constructed dwellings is accompanied," he adds, "by an equally marked change in dress, furniture, and food among the farming classes; and in the smaller towns supported altogether by the agricultural population there are now permanent shops with meat and bread, where such supplies were only to be procured once a week on market-days when I first acted for the Board in this part of Ireland. The consumption of tea, coffee, and sugar is so much increased in the farming districts that a great portion of labourers' wages is expended on them, and shops with modern imported articles of dress are now well supported in the same towns and villages where no such things were seen prior to the potato failure." New banks have been established for the farmers. The breed of live stock of all kinds—cattle, sheep, pigs, and poultry—has vastly improved. The prices of all farming produce, especially of the butter, pigs, eggs, and poultry sold by the small farmers, have risen considerably, and "the use of money is better understood by the rural population." These reports are in accordance with other testimony; and the prosperity of the country will be still further increased if the Government see their way to take up the railways, and improve the means of transit. The quiet progress of Ireland is the best antidote, as well as the most conclusive answer, to the wild projects of the Home Rule agitators.

THE COMING AUTUMN MANŒUVRES.

THE second of those peace campaigns the institution of which marks an important change in our military system will begin in a few days, and already some of the troops which are to take part in the mimic struggle on Salisbury Plain are marching to their destination. This is, therefore, a fitting moment for considering what we are about to attempt, and what results we may hope to obtain. We are entitled to anticipate a considerable improvement on the operations which took place last autumn in the neighbourhood of Aldershot. Then every one was new to peace manœuvres, which were tried on that occasion for the first time in this country. Some little anxiety naturally prevailed as to how the civil population of the district selected might like the unusual military intrusion, nor was there much confidence in the power of the comparatively new Control Department to accomplish the work of transport and supply under conditions so new to it. The rules by which commanders and troops were to be bound were also to be put into practice for the first time, and it was impossible to predict whether or not they would be found applicable to the circumstances of the case. We had, in short, no previous experience of our own to guide us, and consequently moved with hesitating footsteps by the uncertain light of theory, or at best of vicarious practice. Now it is quite different. Last year's experiment, if it did nothing else, discovered our defects, and showed us pretty conclusively what we could not do. The rules of the game were tested, and materials for a revised edition of them collected. Officers and men learnt what was expected of them, and to a certain extent loosened the trammels of the barrack-yard, or at least made some progress towards distinguishing between spirit and mere form. Since then nearly twelve months have passed over our heads, and we have had time to digest our experience. The interval has also been profitably employed in pondering over the numerous lectures, magazine articles, and books to which our first attempt at rehearsing for war gave birth.

There still exists considerable diversity of opinion as to what our aim in these peace manœuvres should be. According to one school of critics we did not attempt enough last year; according to another we attempted too much. In our opinion the truth lies between the two extremes. One school holds that peace manœuvres ought to resemble war in every particular, with the single exception that in the latter wounds are inflicted, and not in the former. The advocates of this principle contend that the two rival commanders should be seated face to face in the arena, untrammelled with directions, and manfully told that such or such a place is their objective point. According to them, a consistent and connected campaign should be carried out, a retreating army harassed, a distant line pushed, night attacks undertaken, and all the minor operations of war practised, such as interrupting convoys and cutting off patrols. Unless, say these ardent gentlemen, some such system be adopted, the thing will be a sham, and no real benefit can accrue. On the other hand, the disciples of the opposite school argue as follows:—You cannot practise strategy in peace manoeuvres because of the obvious expense, nor tactics because of the dissipation of the moral element, which moral element cannot exist in the absence of danger. To attempt tactics under such necessarily unreal conditions is to commit an absurdity. You ought not to push a beaten enemy, for the practice of demoralization is dangerous training for troops, and if you intercept convoys, there is the risk of the contending parties coming to blows. The real profit of the campaign will therefore consist in the lessons afforded in organization and administration, in the art of moving, supplying, and encamping troops. There is much to be said in favour of these views. It is certain that a connected campaign and a consistent series of strategical movements carried out to the end are impossible for economic, if for no other, reasons. At the same time, however, we see no objection to allowing the rival generals at the commencement of the campaign to make use of their strategical skill with a view to bringing the two armies in contact in the most advantageous manner. The practice would be valuable, and the outlay need not be excessive. When once the armies were in presence, it would evidently be necessary to give a fresh "general idea" at the close of each day's work. As to tactics, it would be idle to pretend that without actual wounds and death anything more than a feeble imitation of a real battle can be accomplished. Still, with a little experience, both umpires and commanding officers might be able to form a conjecture as to what would be the result in war were troops brought into contact under such or such conditions.

It is urged, however, that nothing is to be learnt from tactics practised under unreal conditions, and that the lessons thus imparted will only be misleading. Yet we do not see that the practice of peace manoeuvres is incompatible with the correction of theory by practice on every available occasion; and if we are not to attempt to impart lessons in tactics during our autumn campaigns, how is the education of officers and men to be secured? Are we to put off learning till we go into battle? or are we to content ourselves with blindly adopting the Prussian system? To this last alternative there are several grave objections. Prussian tactics were not fairly tested in the late war—the first occasion on which breech-loader was pitted against breech-loader—for nothing could have been worse than the training, handling, and organization of even the old Imperial army. Many of our most experienced officers also maintain that if we copy the Prussian tactics too exactly, we shall be deliberately casting away certain advantages which are peculiar to ourselves, and which are due to the special qualities of the British soldier. In regard to pressing a defeated enemy, there cannot among thoughtful soldiers be any doubt as to the folly of such a proceeding in peace manoeuvres. A hurried retreat when the retreating troops are utterly free from the dejection caused by the fear of death or capture cannot possibly be anything but a most transparent sham. Besides, it is apt to engender unwholesome habits and notions, just as the practice of making cavalry pull up or open out when they charge squares is detrimental to real efficiency. When once a battle has been decided, the chief umpire ought to cast down his truncheon and declare the proceedings closed for the day. Defeat should never be allowed to develop itself into a theoretical annihilation or rout. The cutting off of convoys is equally objectionable. It might lead to real fighting, and would certainly be productive of bad blood, inconvenience, and expense. But it is not clear that the same arguments apply to the carrying off of detachments. We require practice in the minor operations of war, and there can be no more difficulty in deciding when a troop of dragoons has been taken prisoner than there has been found to be in determining when a battalion has been captured in action. For instance, a troop of cavalry returning from a reconnaissance finds itself followed by a squadron of the enemy's horsemen. Galloping down a road lined with hedges on each side, the troop suddenly comes in sight of a bridge, and discovers that it is held by another hostile squadron. In such a case, surrender would in war be inevitable. The benefits to be derived from experience in organization and administration are certainly great, but only on the condition that our efficiency in these things is tested to a certain extent as it would be in war; otherwise what is the object of supplementing Aldershot expeditions by autumn manoeuvres? Besides, unless there be a little realism in the operations, the interest and energy of all ranks cannot but flag, and officers and men will look on the campaign as no better than an unpleasant and prolonged sort of drill. The most cautious of those who have occasionally warned us against attempting or expecting too much in this matter will, we doubt not, freely acknowledge, that, within the limits of the practically possible, we cannot make our operations on Salisbury Plain too closely resemble those which would take place in real war. The more faithful the imitation, the more valuable will be the instruction imparted. If we reduced the campaign to a series of military punishments from camp to camp, the whole affair would be tame, a retrograde step would be taken, and the military enthusiasm, not of the army alone, but of the whole nation, would experience an injurious check. Such a result is much to be deprecated, and it would be worth while to expend a considerable sum and to put the Government to considerable inconvenience to avert it.

On the other hand, it is important to ascertain, before it is too late, what is possible, and not to strive after that which either can never be properly accomplished or, if accomplished, would be positively harmful. Colonel Chenevix has given us some valuable counsel on these points, and it would be well were the disciples of the more ardent school calmly to consider his advice, instead of each man mounting his hobby and rushing wildly off into baseless and fanciful theories. Thoughtless exaggeration can only serve as an excuse for the authorities to do less than that which they now propose to attempt. Even, however, should the contending armies be restrained from coming to close quarters with each other, there are several matters which the forthcoming manoeuvres ought to solve for us, and of which a solution is urgently required. At present our outpost system is very unsatisfactory. The directions in the "Field Exercise" and "Queen's Regulations" are vague and incomplete, as might have been gathered from the unfortunate exhibition which took place last year. A committee of able officers have recently compiled a handbook on the subject, and its contents are to be put into practice in the approaching campaign. Then again there is the question of the tactical organization and distribution of troops. We have arrived at absolutely no decision on these points, yet that the old system requires change is admitted by most authorities. Ere two months shall have passed away, the thoughtful members of the profession ought to have data for deciding what should be the number and strength of the companies of a battalion, of the battalions of a brigade, of the brigades of a division. Many officers think that we might with advantage definitively adopt the demi-brigade, corresponding to the regiment in Continental armies. We tried this experiment last year, but not a word, good or bad, has since been said about it. We are in a perfect mental chaos as to how we should distribute and employ the cavalry. Hitherto we have been content to lump them together and make as little use of them as possible. By the close of the campaign some new principles on this head will no doubt have been developed. Our artillery have obtained rank and independence, but independence requires regulating in order to prevent it from degenerating into licence. Then there is the very important question, What is the best fighting dress for our soldiers? A month's hard work ought to supply an answer. Indeed there is no lack of matters requiring the elucidation which experience alone can give. Altogether it will be the fault of the authorities if we do not derive much benefit from our second autumn manoeuvres. The amount of profit to be obtained depends upon a careful distinction being observed between that which might be done at a sham fight, and that which could not be done in war. Unless that distinction be observed, and full weight be given to moral considerations, we may have a smart, active, showy peace campaign, but it will be no real training for actual hostilities.

TWO LIBEL CASES.

TWO actions for libel have been tried lately at the Guildford Assizes, and in both cases the defendant has escaped an adverse verdict. It may be useful to observe that circumstances may not always be equally favourable to the defence, and that, even if it be successful, it involves trouble, anxiety, and expense, which are perhaps an adequate punishment for publishing that which may have been written under natural irritation. In one of these cases, Mr. Leonard Edmunds sued the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph for damages for publishing a Minute of the Lords of the Treasury relating to his litigation with the Crown. "My Lords" were reasonably angry that Mr. Edmunds should owe a large sum of money to the Crown which they probably did not expect that he would pay, and, like some other angry persons, they felt called upon to "offer a few remarks," which might conveniently have been suppressed. If A. finds that B. has got into his debt and is unable to pay him, it is not unusual, although it is unsafe, for A. to say that B. has "robbed" him. We all understand that A. does not really mean to impute a felony to B., but if he wrote and published that B. had robbed him, he might find himself under the disagreeable necessity of appearing at his own expense in a court of law. If he were lucky he might obtain a verdict, but the more probable result would be a verdict against him, with very minute damages, which would leave him to pay his own costs.

The circumstances out of which the action against the Daily Telegraph arose are only too familiar to us all. Mr. Edmunds held during many years the office of Clerk of the Patents, and thus became accountable to the Crown for a large sum of money. He alleges that the neglect to bring his accounts to audit did not rest with him, and that if these accounts were correctly taken, the balance would be in his favour. He paid over a sum of 7,000*l.* and upwards, and challenged litigation as to any further claims of the Crown against him. An information was filed by the Attorney-General in Chancery, and after an elaborate argument before Vice-Chancellor the late Sir G. M. Giffard, two principal points were decided against Mr. Edmunds. But this able judge accompanied his adverse judgment with a very distinct declaration that no imputation rested on the character of Mr. Edmunds. It is indeed difficult to see any difference between this and other cases where a litigant has made claims which he fails to support. According to a statute quoted by Mr. Baron Martin at the trial, it was the duty of Mr. Edmunds not to wait for any process of audit, but to pay over the balance in his hands every three months, making suit at the same time to the correctness of his accounts. For a long period Mr. Edmunds neither made up accounts nor paid over balances, but if he had done so he would probably have proceeded upon that view of his rights and duties which his counsel unsuccessfully asserted in the Court of Chancery. That view has been declared by an eminent judge to be erroneous, but Mr. Edmunds can hardly be accused of moral turpitude in entertaining it. The Vice-Chancellor gave no costs against Mr. Edmunds, and this fact declares more forcibly than words that he did not consider his conduct liable to censure. The judgment did not, however, finally settle all disputed points, and Mr. Edmunds addressed to the Treasury a proposal for arbitration between himself and the Crown, which was accepted. Two eminent members of the Bar were appointed arbitrators, and they performed their duty with all the care and impartiality that might be expected. They found that a sum of 8,000*l.* was due from Mr. Edmunds to the Crown beyond the sum of 7,000*l.* which he had paid over, and they recommended that the Crown should allow him certain sums to which he was not legally entitled, and which would reduce the amount payable by him to about 6,500*l.* The award was a dry legal document, pronouncing no opinion favourable or otherwise upon Mr. Edmunds's conduct; but when it reached the Treasury "my Lords" unfortunately felt called upon to offer a few remarks upon it, which were printed and transmitted by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury to the newspapers. The author of the Minute thus produced appears to have attempted, with very moderate success, an imitation of the style of a leading article. If the award of the arbitrators had been sent with an explanatory statement of facts, without comment, to the Daily Telegraph, the resources of that journal would have sufficed to produce a "stinger" on the conduct of Mr. Edmunds without the help of an official scribe, and these resources would doubtless have been made available on the smallest hint from the "whip" of a Liberal Administration. There is an old proverb against keeping a dog and barking yourself, which appears applicable to the conduct of the Treasury on this occasion. They were, however, fully entitled to vindicate the character of their solicitor, Mr. Greenwood, who had been attacked by Mr. Edmunds, and also to promulgate to the Civil Service a rule forbidding the practice which Mr. Edmunds had adopted of making to himself an allowance in accounts, which he was not entitled to. But they should have stopped here, and not commented to the ready writers of the press, who know their own business better than the Treasury can teach it. To call Mr. Edmunds "a public defaulter," and say that he had put his hand into the till, was merely coarse vituperation. This offensive phrase refers to the very matter in respect of which the arbitrators recommended that Mr. Edmunds should be allowed the deduction which he had actually made from the money in his hands. The writer of this unpleasant passage probably stood alone in admiration of his own work, and was unaware that a journalist would have operated much more neatly upon the character of Mr. Edmunds. The Minute bore the initials of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Lowe, and Mr. Stansfeld, who were all brought down to Guildford as witnesses, but, much to the disappointment of a crowded Court, were not examined. It would have been interesting to hear whether Mr. Gladstone was aware of the contents of the Minute which he initialled, and how he reconciled the portions challenged as libellous with the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Giffard which was delivered in the previous year, and which covered the entire moral ground. The result of the trial was a verdict for the defendant, which was perhaps helped by the folly of the plaintiff in charging with misconduct everybody who had ever been concerned against him. There are actions pending against two other newspapers which may perhaps be tried hereafter. If the plaintiff could be induced to behave discreetly, he might possibly obtain a verdict in his favour from another jury under the direction of another judge. But it is difficult to believe that he would obtain substantial damages. He doubtless thinks that he could prove that which he asserts, namely, that he owes nothing to the Crown; but any jury would probably accept the award as conclusive against him on this point, and would consider that the Lords of the Treasury had only stated facts in an offensive manner. It may have been wrong to compose this Minute, and more wrong on the part of the Treasury to publish it, and yet the result of the trial need not excite disapprobation or regret.

In the other case the litigants were clergymen, and the alleged libel referred to the solemnization of the marriage of a divorced woman by one of them in the church of the other. It was contained in a letter which was written under circumstances of excitement, and might properly have been thrown into the fire instead of being forwarded to its destination; but nevertheless the jury found a verdict in this case also for the defendant, and as he will probably have to bear his own costs, he will be sufficiently punished for what was clearly an indiscretion. The plaintiff, Mr. McDonnell, who was acting as curate of Lower Norwood, called upon Mr. Kempe, rector of St. James's, Piccadilly, and asked his permission to solemnize at that church a marriage between two persons residing in the parish. Mr. Kempe gave his permission, and on the appointed day the parties appeared at the church and produced a licence which showed that the intended wife had been divorced. The intended husband had been co-respondent with her in the divorce suit. The clerk showed the licence to Mr. Kempe, who thereupon became excited, and complained in strong language of the proposed "desecration" of his church. But after reference to the licence he became satisfied that he could not prevent the marriage, and permitted it to proceed. On the same day he wrote a letter to the Bishop of Winchester, who was Mr. McDonnell's diocesan, and after truly stating the facts of the case, he added his own inference from them in a passage which formed the alleged libel. He stated in substance that Mr. McDonnell had practised concealment, and had entrapped him into giving his consent to a marriage which he strongly disapproved. Now it is true that Mr. McDonnell when he called upon Mr. Kempe did not mention the peculiar position of the parties to the proposed marriage, and it may be said that he concealed that which he did not reveal. But if Mr. Kempe had been told that the woman had been divorced, and had thereupon objected, as he certainly would, to her being married in his church, he would have found on inquiry that his objection would be unavailing. If he refused to perform the ceremony, any other clergyman qualified to officiate in the diocese might perform it; and Mr. Kempe did not dispute, and the judge at the trial held, that Mr. McDonnell was so qualified. Mr. Kempe had the parties before him on the morning appointed for the marriage, and he knew the facts and looked into the law, and allowed the marriage to proceed. How then could he say that he had been "entrapped" into giving his consent? If he was "entrapped" into giving his consent on a previous day, he had full opportunity to revoke that consent on the day of the marriage. But, either with or without his consent, the parties were legally entitled to be married. It appears, therefore, that taking the words used by Mr. Kempe in their ordinary sense, they expressed an inference which he was not justified in drawing from the facts which he had before stated. In this view of the letter to the Bishop of Winchester it contained a libel, but when we come to consider what damage was done to the plaintiff by the libel, it is obvious to remark that the Bishop did that which might be expected from him—that is, he formed his own judgment upon the facts brought to his knowledge, and in the result he inhibited Mr. McDonnell from doing duty within his diocese. It is hardly possible to doubt that the Bishop would have arrived at the same conclusion if the passage alleged to be libellous had been omitted from Mr. Kempe's letter. If this view be adopted, it seems to follow that the damages, assuming that there was a libel, ought to have been nominal. There was, however, a further complaint, which, not having been inserted in the declaration, the jury were told that they ought not to consider. Besides writing a letter to the Bishop, Mr. Kempe sent a copy of his letter to the Bishop to the managers of the Curates' Augmentation Fund, and an allowance which Mr. McDonnell received from that fund was thereupon withdrawn. How far the managers of the Fund may have been influenced by the alleged libel we do not know, but it appears that, as Mr. McDonnell must have ceased to act as curate of Lower Norwood upon the Bishop's inhibition, his allowance from the Augmentation Fund must have been thereby also terminated. Thus Mr. McDonnell could hardly have got beyond nominal damages upon the most full and favourable view of his case. Happily there are two sides to every question, and many people probably think, although we do not think, that he has been refused justice. The very fact that he has been inhibited by the Bishop of Winchester may be in some quarters a recommendation. His litigation, although unsuccessful, may prove to have profitably ventilated his grievances, and thus the money which he has spent in law may not have been thrown away. We cannot say the same of the time which the judge and jury devoted to the case.

HOLIDAY PERILS AT HOME AND ABROAD.

IF travelling abroad is as dangerous as it would seem to be from recent correspondence in the papers, and if travellers have a proper regard for the interests of their families, the Accidental Death Insurance Company should be doing a tremendous business. There always has been more danger attendant on foreign travel, according to nervous tourists and disinterested innkeepers, than thoughtless people are apt to fancy. It is true that foreign railway companies have not, as a rule, adopted our spirited excursion system, which results in such dramatic and disastrous catastrophes. It is also true that from the nature of things it is next to impossible to upset an antediluvian diligence, and that even in the mountains the instinct of the horses induces them to keep to the roads instead of flying Pegasus-like over the precipices. But there are other perils than those inseparable everywhere from road or rail. If they rarely condense themselves into a well-authenticated paragraph, they have always loomed in the distance with a vague delicious horror. Picturesque mediævalism still survives in imaginations stimulated by novelty of scene. Brigands are more common than is generally supposed, nor need you go so far to find them as the classic precincts of Athens or the blessed Patrimony of St. Peter. If you show a romantic turn for adventure, the sharp boots of the hotel, the red-nosed and voluble conductor of the diligences, or the oldest inhabitant of the village of your sojourn, will provide you a brigand anywhere upon a mountain frontier at a moment's notice. As each little bath in the Pyrenees summons its bear in the neighbouring forest among the attractions of its summer, and as each guide exerts himself to make clear to your dazzled vision the hazards slipping upon the neighbouring hills, so diligences and victuaries have been stopped season after season even on the

Iran and the Adige for the benefit of those who knew Italy to be the land of brigands as of lezzaroni. More formidable than the brigands were the epidemic pestilences that walked by noonday, and were so loudly deplored in every journal of the country save those of the particular place which they were decimating. A coincidence occurred somewhere, say at Nice, between a virulent case of typhoid fever and a letter to the Times from a keen-scented traveller in search of grievances, who had stumbled upon drains and open gutters. The unavailing subject was forthwith ventilated thoroughly. The return of post brought a shower of confirmatory communications from the doomed place by fathers of families whose affections took the alarm. If the landlords were ill advised enough to rush into the controversy, they were overwhelmed with circumstantial evidence from relatives bereaved or dreading a bereavement. The panic spread and the exodus became general. Travellers coming westward were warned at Mentone, those with their faces eastward were shocked by the startling news at Cannes. They held their breath as they hurried through the plague-stricken city—we are talking of days before railways—and wrote home letters from Marseilles or Genoa recording their heartfelt gratitude for a miraculous deliverance, and advertising incidentally to the cool heroism that had carried them through. Perhaps, after all, the mortality that emptied the hotels and tested the courage which responded so nobly to the call was not very serious. Rumour and the representations of interested rivals may have magnified a hundredfold some half-dozen sporadic cases of typhoid and gastric fever. And such we should have supposed was the case with those novel dangers to which we referred at the outset, had the gossip about them appeared a few weeks later. But the admission of long-winded letters into the daily journals during the crush of work that precedes the prorogation of Parliament is a symptom so significant that one is half inclined to believe there must be something in it. It is a grave reflection for persons intending to go abroad if life has all of a sudden become so exceedingly precarious in their favourite Swiss recreation ground.

Accidents in the high Alps have of course no terrors for ordinary tourists. People court a certain risk if they choose to leave beaten paths and to pick their way along invisible notches on ice slopes, or to balance themselves on the brink of yawning crevasses. But nowadays it would seem that ordinary mountain villages are become as perilous of access as the Jardin at Chamounix, to say the least of it. One melancholy accident happened at Tarnap, in the Engadine. A pair of horses took fright on a steep descent; two ladies were precipitated over the precipice with the wagon into which they were buttoned, and the driver only saved himself from following by nimbly leaping off at the last moment. Carriage accidents will happen, even on level ground, and had horses taken fright in Piccadilly, and dashed the contents of an open phaeton against the railings by Cambridge House, no one would have dreamed of generalizing from the fact and preaching to foreigners upon the unquestionable dangers of the London streets. But this mishap occurred in a wilder country, had undoubtedly more of the dramatic element in it, and was far better fitted to strike the impressionable fancy. So an Englishman staying at the place seems to have welcomed the painful excitement that came to break the monotony of his sojourn, and straightway started on a reconnoitring expedition to the fatal spot. Every one must have remarked how facts with which we have always been familiar may be made to strike us of a sudden like absolute novelties. It was borne in upon this Englishman, musing much and deeply, that the Engadine is a jumble of mountains, and that the roads to a wild mountain village are environed by dangers which you may escape on the routes of the Low Countries. Forthwith he embodies this original idea in a letter, and promptly forwards it to the journals as a warning to intending travellers. Time presses; multitudes every day are arranging the plans that may lead them to Switzerland or the Tyrol. So he discharges his conscience by urging every one to stay away until the Swiss mountaineers shall have taken more stringent precautions for the safety of their guests. We know the proverb about Rome and the Romans, and if a man decides to go to Tarnap, he should be prepared to travel to it by the roads that have carried people in safety from time immemorial. As a matter of fact, we gather from a letter written by the resident English chaplain there that those roads are neither more nor less dangerous than most others in the Alps. We can only wish that our well-meaning but nervous countryman were well out of the scrape into which his audacious rashness has run him. We trust he may retrace his road in safety, although we tremble for him when we remember the leagues of hill and the depths of precipices that lie between him and the nearest railway. But we do not think that old ladies who admire Swiss scenery need be greatly scared by his pictures of the country. So far as our experience goes, tragical carriage accidents are not of much more frequent occurrence there than the appearance of bears in summer in the Lower Pyrenees, or of brigand chieftains in the Italian Alps. What is worse is that, according to our latest intelligence, the cities are becoming almost more perilous than the remote Alpine districts. It is bad enough to face the chance of sudden destruction overtaking you on a pleasure drive; but the prospect of brutal assassination is still more repugnant to the feelings. We used to fancy that although the medieval Swiss made bloodshed and fighting everyday matters of business, and although their modern descendants were somewhat given to pillaging when they did the honours to the stranger as guides, couriers, and hotelkeepers, yet the people generally were as peaceful and honest as need be. Now, however, we are warned, if we do venture ourselves in their capital, never to stir abroad after nightfall, as if respectable Berne were a city in the Pacific mining States. But, after all, this is only another case of rash generalization from a particular mishap to sweeping conclusions. An unfortunate Englishman who had been passing the evening with a friend was picked up next morning shattered and mutilated at the foot of an open-air stair-case. He had either fallen down or been flung down, and it may be that the balance of evidence is in favour of the more sinister alternative. But should we expect a sensible decrease in the numbers of visitors to London on account of the many violent deaths that are never accounted for; because unclaimed bodies of well-dressed women are every now and then found floating in the canal and the river; because gangs of garotters used to patrol our suburbs before their industry was checked by a generous application of the cat? There is a large class of travelling Englishmen who go about searching for the motes in their neighbours' eyes, and grumbling at them in a way that is alike offensive and ridiculous, considering the many conspicuous beams which they might easily find at home. So long as they are contented to growl at harmless eccentricities of national custom we can afford to smile; but it is difficult to keep one's temper when they do their best to injure an unoffending country by shrieking as if they were hurt when they are only frightened.

Were these grumblers to go out with our masses on a popular holiday, they might have reason for lifting up their voices against the risks to which holiday-makers expose themselves. The memorable New Cross accident which shook the nerves and spines of a trainful of licensed victuallers, and swallowed the best part of a great Company's half-yearly dividend, is an example of the perils of our excursion trains. People are penned up in superannuated rolling-stock, and are launched recklessly behind broken-winded engines to run the gauntlet of the ordinary traffic. The chances of disaster are, however, a recognized incident of railway travelling; and the passengers, or their surviving relatives, have their remedy, such as it is, in actions at law, and may insure themselves besides, all things considered, on wonderfully reasonable terms. But not a holiday passes without a number of lives being wantonly hazarded, lives which we presume are worth something to their owners, if not to society; and if these festive occasions do not appreciably swell the returns of mortality, it can only be that a special Providence watches over our excursionists. When they go pleasureing in winter in a frost, young men and maidens crowd on the most treacherous ice, and skate and slide by choice within the limits marked "dangerous." In summer time, of course, they go up the river and down to the sea. They bathe in contempt of tides, currents, and submerged weeds, and desert themselves just within their depth as if they had been bred to the water like mermen or South Sea islanders. They hire a miniature pleasure yacht for a party, and overcrowd it as if it were a free box at the theatre. They leave the boatmen behind, to economize money and available space. They make fast the sheet like Claude Hulo, and, like him, they play the fiddle or petits jeux innocents. A puff of wind takes them all unawares, and they furnish materials for the penny-a-liners. It is wonderful that river accidents are not even commoner than they are, and a sensible article which appeared the other day in the Times called attention to the way in which holiday-makers lay themselves out for them. In a maritime nation like our own, every cockney fancies himself a mariner born. Accordingly oarsmen who have no idea of trimming a boat, who pull on Mr. Bouncer's principle of putting their oars in deep and bringing them out with a jerk, who catch far more crabs than the anglers in the ponds do gudgeon, hire the crankiest craft they can find, and make themselves as much at home in them as a bear in a washing-tub. They put out among lighters, and racing eight-oars, and yawning screw-launches, and swift above-bridge steamers. Had they all the river to themselves they would find it hard enough to keep afloat, for their oars have a tendency to fly up in the air, instead of establishing a leverage in the water, while steamers go recklessly ahead, overweighted with their human freight, as if they were bent on running down a fleet of hostile war canoes. Our metropolitan coroners have no sinécures at any time, but it can only be by a sort of miracle that a national holiday does not provide them with double occupation. Alarmists might do some good were they to set themselves to teach their countrymen prudence. When they might employ their special gifts in so fertile a field at home, it is a pity they should waste them in a country so barren as Switzerland.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

THE Annual Report of the Commissioners in Lunacy derives special interest from the proposal lately made to subject habitual drunkards to restraint and treatment similar to that which is now applied to lunatics. The number of lunatics now under supervision of the Commissioners is about 58,000, and there seems never to be an end to the demands for increased accommodation. But if an attempt were made to bring habitual drunkards under treatment, there must be separate asylums, and a fresh body of Commissioners, and an entirely new and necessarily costly organization. The lunatic asylums are full, and even overcrowded, and if they were not, it would be inexpedient to place habitual drunkards among lunatics. The plan of placing habitual drunkards in confinement has been seriously advocated, but we have no expectation that Parliament will embark on an undertaking of great magnitude which would provoke violent suspicion and dislike. The anxious care with which the Commissioners in Lunacy watch against the possibility of abuse of the powers of keepers of asylums is by no means superfluous, and if another large class of patients were brought under similar treatment, it would require to be supervised with equal diligence. The attention of the Commissioners is bestowed alike upon questions of medico-legal science and details of domestic management, and if the ladies of England claimed a share in the labours of this Commission, it would be difficult to deny their superior capacity for some of the duties which devolve upon the Commissioners. The Report upon the Somerset County Asylum expresses the wish that, as this asylum has now been brought by judicious exertions to a level with some of the best, "it will not remain behind even the best by serving such a sufficient dinner as we saw yesterday without a table-cloth." The culinary arrangements of these asylums are always carefully inspected by the Commissioners, who are almost equally attentive to what may be called their æsthetic aspect. We are told that the Somerset Asylum has been improved by the introduction of suitable domestic furniture, flowers, plants, stuffed birds, and pictures, as well as by cheerful colouring and painting of the walls. It is one of the duties of the Commissioners to visit the kitchens and dining-halls and examine and taste the food, and we think that they would perform this duty with more ease and confidence if they were allowed to take their wives with them on their journeys of inspection. The Commissioners do not grasp this subject with the vigour and determination that could be desired, and there is an unsatisfactory hesitation in the expression of their opinions upon domestic matters. "The food seemed to be well cooked." If the reporting Commissioners had had their wives with them, they might have boldly declared in Hamlet's words that they knew not "seems." We observe, however, that in another case they venture to say positively that "the mutton was too large and too fat to be satisfactory." Every man is, or thinks himself, a judge of meat when it appears on table, but the processes of preparing it are to the masculine mind an almost impenetrable mystery. The anxiety of the Commissioners for the amusement and gratification of the patients may appear excessive, and sometimes slightly ludicrous, but they doubtless proceed upon a sound principle. They say that the more pleasing and cheerful the wards and gardens are made by a supply of simple objects of decoration, the more orderly and contented will the patients become, and the less will be the waste and destruction. The report from every asylum is that mechanical restraint is rare, and in some there has been none during the period comprised in the report. "An ample supply of books, periodicals, and newspapers" exists almost everywhere. Mirrors and framed prints are plentiful, and in some asylums there is a hot-house where flowering plants are prepared for transmission to the various rooms occupied by patients. Some of the county asylums take boarders from other counties, and some receive parish patients, who of course contribute adequately to the expence of maintenance. We hear much in these reports of "associated amusements," which we believe means amusements in which patients of both sexes partake. The Commissioners had recommended the enlargement of the table in the general dining-room of the private division of an asylum, "so as to admit of the association of a certain number of ladies with the gentlemen"; but the manager explained to them that, in existing circumstances, and with the present staff of attendants, this proposal could not be carried out. This reference to the present staff of attendants is significant that the amenities of social intercourse, although generally maintained at the table of the general dining-room, may require a reserve of power for their support. The staff of attendants, while diligently handing plates, ought to observe and be prepared to check any eccentricities of behaviour among the company. But if the means of restraint are ready, the use of them may be to a very great extent avoided. Employment, amusement, and a system of rewards for orderly behaviour are the principal means of preserving discipline in these establishments. In some asylums all the patients who are in good health have beer at dinner, while in others it is given as an encouragement for good conduct. Dancing is frequently mentioned as one of the amusements of the patients, and on glancing over the pages of the Report, we observed the word "polka," which, however, on examining the passage where it occurred, turned out to have no reference to dancing, but to be a term of art signifying a jacket of peculiar construction sometimes used for purposes of restraint. This was certainly disappointing, but these Reports present on the whole a very agreeable picture. The patients do not, as a rule, murder either each other or their keepers, and they are kept from violence without mechanical restraint.

The contrast has been often dwelt upon between the present and the old system of treating lunatics, and it would be well if all the claims that are made on behalf of the nineteenth century to credit for progress were as well founded as this. Experience of the modern method of gentle management proves from year to year more satisfactorily its utility. Thus the Commissioners say in reference to the Rainhill Asylum that the favourable report which they now make upon it is due to the attention given to the employment of the patients, and to the other important subject of recreation and exercise out of doors. There is a fair supply of books in the wards; the provision of occasional amusements there, and of cricket, croquet, and other field games, is good; and the wants of the worst class of women patients have been lately considered by the construction in the grounds of a sort of circus of hobby-horses, which seems to answer very well the combined purposes of entertainment and bodily exercise. The Commissioners have not to complain

But oh! But oh!
The hobby-horse is forgot.

There are perhaps women to be found outside the walls of lunatic asylums for whom a provision of entertainment and bodily exercise, by hobby-horses or otherwise, would be welcome. It is indeed wonderful that the energetic ladies who have invaded all the other provinces of man's dominion have allowed him hitherto almost exclusive possession of athletic sports. This, however, will not long continue. Already girls learn to swim and attempt to row, and there is in London at least one professor of what are called "musical gymnastics," which are, as we suppose, an attempt to do for the upper part of the body what dancing does, or might do, for the lower part. The Commissioners have discerned an important truth when they perceive the importance of exercise for women among themselves. But they perceive also, and declare likewise their opinion, that "associated amusements" are necessary to the welfare of the patients; and this observation, too, might be extended into the world which lies beyond the walls of these asylums. These amusements had not been so regular at Rainhill as they thought desirable. "There has been a picnic to Knowsley lately, in which two hundred of both sexes took part; but we think there should be for the season, at least once weekly, something corresponding to the regular winter dances or concert." Nearly the same practice prevails, with varieties of detail, in all the asylums visited by the Commissioners, and we cannot help remarking that the practice deserves attention by those sour fanatics who forbid amusements, and especially those in which both sexes combine, and thereby often produce among those who listen to them a state of mind bordering upon insanity.

The number of patients in the Criminal Asylum at Broadmoor in November last was 494, of whom 84 were women. It perhaps throws light upon certain judicial and semi-judicial proceedings to be told that at the time of the Commissioners' visit twenty-six inmates were reported to be sane, among whom were ten women who had committed the gravest crime known to the law. The means and opportunities of recreation and outdoor exercise have been enlarged at Broadmoor as everywhere else, and "greater attention is given to this important subject." A large number of the male patients are reported to be troublesome and disorderly, but it is added that the medical staff necessary for their supervision has been incomplete. Want of space is also mentioned as accounting for some observed imperfections in the treatment, and in all parts of the country there seems to be nearly the same demand for enlargement of buildings and improvement of fittings and furniture. Generally speaking, it is good economy to render hospitals of every kind as complete as possible in all respects, so that cures may be effected in them rapidly. It is manifest that almost any outlay that will render lunatics tractable ought to be incurred; and it may be inferred from this Report that the large sums expended in building asylums all over the country have been expended usefully. This may be satisfactory to ratepayers, who are certain to be called upon for further contributions towards the same object.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

THE opinion we expressed a year ago that these annual International Exhibitions must deteriorate in quality and lose attraction with loss of novelty is confirmed by the second experiment. In making the interminable circuit of Galleries, "Quadrants," and Annexes it is hard to believe the statement in the "Official Guide," that "the winnowing process has been busy separating the grain from the husk." Certainly the Picture Galleries, to which we will first direct attention, have less good wheat for the garner than chaff for the burning. A large proportion of the works are on sale for the simple reason that they are unsaleable; some, having made the tour of Europe in vain quest of honours, now seek refuge and reward in these capacious Galleries. It is charming to see how pictures rescued from the garret or the cellar keep each other in countenance, how after years of solitude and oblivion they rejoice in the appreciative sympathy of pleasure-seeking crowds. It must indeed be no slight consolation for a monster creation such as "Les États-Unis d'Amérique," by M. Yvon, to find itself removed from the hostile criticism of Paris to be the wondering delight of multitudes intent on nothing more serious than making a holiday. It becomes indeed pleasantly apparent how perfectly on rapport are the pictures with the people. It is a curious fact that International Exhibitions are greatly frequented by the illiterate classes; between the visitors to the Royal Academy and the idlers at the Kensington bazaar there is a marked contrast in rank, training, and manners. Accordingly the observations which one hears among the International pictures are about on a mental par with the talk in a collection of wax-work. Her Majesty's Commissioners are wise in their generation; they know that to raise the taste of the public is a hard and tedious task, and therefore they adopt the easier course of lowering art. Such would seem to be the explanation of the acknowledged fact that in art the present Exhibition is falling off from its predecessors. We need scarcely dwell on the injury done to art by placing second-rate wares under the protection of the flags of all nations. Modern jewellers who make and and the effect which can now boast of international rank and recognition. But just as corporate bodies are said to have no conscience, so International Commissions are without taste and knowledge. The only principle acted upon with undeviating pertinacity is that bad art and good art shall be placed on terms of absolute equality.

The English pictures and drawings may be broadly divided into two classes. The first and vastly the larger division consists of works which, though executed years ago, still hang on the gallery walls. When we consider the acidity with which what is good is brought up, this want of success speaks volumes. The vindictiveness of rejected addresses only makes matters worse. For example, in the somewhat analogous case of pictures rejected by hanging committees, whenever an indignation exhibition in London or Paris has been got up by the sufferers, the pictures themselves sufficiently explain the fate they have suffered. It is even so in the works before us; a more melancholy sight than this bringing above ground of what ought to be decently dead and buried can scarcely be imagined. Such an exhibition, even in the interest of the artists, is a mistake. But over and above these accumulated failures, there is a second class—choice loans from collectors whose names are some guarantee for excellence. Thus in these spacious and well-lit Galleries it is possible to take a pleasant retrospective view of our English school. Here, for instance, are seen to advantage pictures which in past years in the Academy have been the talk of the town; such, for example, as "Ophelia" (1450), by Mr. Millais, R.A.; "The Tailor's Shop, 1792" (343), by Mr. Elmore, R.A.; and "Charles II.'s Last Sunday" (455), by Mr. Frith, R.A. The chief novelty is a cartoon by Mr. Leighton, R.A., "Art applied to War" (157). This "study for a wall painting, produced to decorate a lunette in the South Kensington Museum," is in Mr. Leighton's learned manner; perhaps a few of the handsome legs might be advantageously spared; tight leggings like those of Oinabae in the famed picture of the "Procession" are here multiplied to admiration. The imposing composition of figures and architectural background may recall Ghirlandajo's frescoes in San Maria Novella, Florence.

Having met, and hoping again to meet, with better opportunities of sketching the contemporary schools of the Continent, we shall dwell only on points which may possess novelty or special interest. The French pictures need not detain us for a moment; the French Government has kindly contributed a large number of bulky works which they do not want; so liberal is its patronage of being talent, that it always has on hand a surplus of second-rate products which can well be spared from time to time for International Exhibitions. The importations from Baden, Bavaria, Austria, North Germany, Spain, and Italy are neither numerous nor rare. Persons possessing even a slight acquaintance with the art of these countries will not care to waste time among mediocre efforts; the majority of the painters have never been heard of. On the other hand, such well-known artists as Knabach, Floty, and Max in Bavaria, Menzel, Knusa, Vautier, and Achonbach in Prussia, are one and all absentees. Indeed so hard up for materials do Her Majesty's Commissioners seem to have been, that they actually rob the Kensington Museum to supply the pressing needs of the International Galleries.

Belgium as usual makes praiseworthy efforts; indeed, with the exception of Russia, no nation has done herself more justice. The remark were perhaps ungracious that she has nothing new to show. How indeed is it possible that a nation can every year bring forth fresh genius! The arts differ from manufactures in that they cannot be multiplied under pressure. A good picture, however, is scarcely worse for having been seen oft and again; some of the works from Brussels and Antwerp may be old acquaintances; so too are pictures of which we never tire by Rubens and Quintin Matsys. We gladly cross the sea to visit the old masters; the living painters kindly come to us. That the Belgian Galleries at Kensington are scarcely below the usual mark will be understood when we enumerate among the contributors the following well-accredited painters; MM. Guffens, Swerts, Van Lerius, Robert, Wauters, De Groux, Boeset, and Stroobant. The Belgian school of landscape—second to none in Europe—may be fairly judged by charming and characteristic specimens of the leading masters, such as Fourmois, Kindermans, De Schampheleer, Van Lappen, De Haan, and Robbe. The collection would have greater lustre could we add the names of M. Alfred Stevens and M. Willems. Belgium, once the battle-field of Europe, is now a peaceful neutral land where art thrives while war may rage around. Belgian painters are persistent; when they cannot create they compile; what they do not possess they borrow. They owe much to France, somewhat to Germany, and yet perhaps most of all to their own ancestry and nationality. In this gallery we find ourselves among the descendants or disciples of Van Dyck, Rubens, Teniers, Terburg, and Paul Potter.

The present display of Russian pictures has only been twice equalled in Western Europe. In London in 1862, and in Paris in 1867, the compositions were larger and of more national import. But a class of works for which Russia has hitherto obtained little credit, comprising landscapes, domestic scenes, and genre generally, is now brought to the knowledge of the untravelled Englishman almost for the first time. We may begin with a novelty in the way of material—a wax-painting on coarse-grained canvas; the fabric shows through the pigments, and thus the surface approaches in texture fresco or mosaic. It may be objected that the effect is misty and opaque; the material evidently does not lend itself kindly to subtle relations of light and colour. But the fault is as much with the manipulator as with the method. We have seen the ancient process of wax-painting revived with better success in Paris and Munich, and Mr. Arzmetz at University Hall escapes the defects apparent in the Russian experiment. The picture is a fair example of the vigorous naturalistic style which takes strong hold of the North of Europe. A prominent Russian tale, "Elisa of Mouron and Nightingale the Robber" (1538), here gives M. W. P. Wereschtsagin an opportunity for display of action and character; the treatment has the breadth and downright directness which belong alike to the schools of Russia and of Scandinavia.

The history of the Russian school is brought down to the present day. Men of the older generation, the contemporaries, and certainly not the inferior, of English painters of half a century ago, such as Carl Brullov, Theodore Braun, Alexander Ivanoff, who sustain in the Hermitage and at Moscow the renown of Russia for high art, are naturally absent from Kensington. But living artists held in great esteem, such as the famous landscape-painter, MM. Alvasovski, Bogoluboff, and Lagoria, and the well-reputed genre painters, M. Peroff, M. Makowald, and Baron M. P. Clodt, give assurance that Russia does not lag behind other nations in the study of life and nature. It would take long to recount the personal history of the more prominent painters in St. Petersburg; how as boys they came from afar, sometimes from the shores of Finland, sometimes from the Ural mountains, from the Crimea, or from the Caspian, or even from the remote regions of Siberia; how, prompted by talent and ambition, or tempted by Imperial patronage, youths of promise make their way to St. Petersburg, and enter the Academy of Arts on the banks of the Neva; how from students they become pensioners, how they are then sent at the cost of the Government to pursue their studies in Paris, Düsseldorf, Munich, or Rome; and how finally the most successful return to St. Petersburg, and become professors in the Academy where once they had entered as unknown students, and receive from the Church and the State national commissions. An educational system thus deliberately organized and richly subsidized may serve to explain the amazing art products which the traveller encounters in St. Petersburg—products which in minor and fragmentary portions from time to time find their way to Paris and London.

Whenever we are in the presence of Russian art we have to moot the question of originality. Thus it may be doubted whether that brave battle-piece, "The Assault of Gounib" (1676), by M. Grouzinski, would have existed at all had there been no great battle-painters in Paris and Munich. But though Russian artists may owe much to Horace Vernet, Bellangé, Protais, and Adam, still they would seem to bring to the delineation of war a courageous spirit and a strong hand. Some of the best reputed battle-painters in Russia have themselves fought sword in hand. Russian art seldom lacks manliness and nerve. These pictures from St. Petersburg transport the spectator to remote regions, to races removed beyond the pale of civilization. Take, for example, "Opium Eaters at Tashkent" (1690), by M. W. W. Wereschtsagin; here are Tartars, a people who dwell in perpetual misère and misery; mark well their physiognomies, their broken-down frames clothed in rags; see how they squat on the ground in stupor or slumber, in reverie or delirium, as the drug clouds the sense or thrills the nerves with intoxicating pain and pleasure. The scene is all the more terrible because unflinchingly true; the drawing is accurate, the execution firm, the touch keen and unrelenting. This artist, who pleads as M. Gérôme on horrors, realizes a revolting scene, "After Victory" (1680); the dead lie in blood outside the ramparts, and a comrade standing by lights his pipe. Such callous brutality is emphatically Russian. With equal mastery does the same painter depict a bleeding head cut off from a helmsman, held up Medusa-like by a Muscovite soldier exulting in his prize.

In St. Petersburg we made notes of some twenty or more painters who addict themselves to domestic incidents, rustic scenes, and genre generally. But, as a rule, styles and subjects are less strictly defined in Russia than in countries wherein the arts have been long and firmly established. Thus in St. Petersburg we find that the same men will practise historic painting, portrait painting, and genre painting. Sometimes it is necessity which drives an artist into this diversity. That the Russians have strong naturalistic power is seen even in the limited collection before us. Take as an example a "Roman Beggar" (1671), by M. Tschistiakoff. How unlike is this roughly-handled figure, with its dull and dense colours, to the dress models that delight our Western students! This version of Italian mendicancy shares nobility with the "Banished Lord" of Reynolds. We are reminded, too, of the words of Fuseli, that even a beggar from the hands of Michael Angelo is stamped with grandeur. This Russian school already possesses a pedigree extending over a period of rather more than a century; we are already among men of the second or third generation; thus M. Brullov, who contributes a work of characteristic power and breadth, "Rest in the Harvest Field" (1670), is of the family of Carl Brullov, who won a European reputation by "The Last Day of Pompeii." Again, M. W. Peroff, who contributes "The Bird-catcher" (1536), is doubtless a kinsman of M. Basil Peroff, an artist who, born in Siberia, made for himself a name in Paris by a scene never to be forgotten, "Un Enterrement de Village." For the most part, however, Russian painters are waiting in art treatment; they lack delicacy and subtlety both in conception and execution; in short, they evince an obtuse æsthetic sense. Such would seem to be no unjust verdict on one of the most remarkable products of the school, "The Butter Week (Carnival) at the Admiralty Place, St. Petersburg" (1669), by M. Makowski, a work engraved in the illustrated newspaper of St. Petersburg, of which much has been heard. This crowded composition was the hard work of two years; the Emperor rewarded the painter with the sum of 1,200*l.*, a price deemed handsome in St. Petersburg. Russian artists, with few exceptions, are poorly paid; they have hitherto laboured almost of necessity for the home market. Thus this picture, though amazingly clever, would have little chance of a high price in England; the colour is repellent, the execution is somewhat uncouth, the figures and incidents are not over-refined. And yet for reading of character, for telling of story, for realism, for truth to climate, costume, and physiognomy, there is not a more striking work in these International Galleries; the picture, in fact, is thoroughly Russian, and for that very reason lies beyond the pale of Western art and Western sympathy.

Russian landscapes merit more space than we can afford. Here are brilliant scenes by the renowned M. Aivazovski, sometimes called the Russian Turner. Yet "A View on the South Coast of the Crimea" (1672), and other like studies—if studies they can be called—are vague as visions, unsubstantial as shadows; the painter never condescends to detail, he stands aloof from literal truth. But Aivazovski's pictures, or rather scene paintings, have a charm uncommon in the Russian school—the colour is lovely. We first made the acquaintance of this wayward genius in the Hermitage, where an incoherent extravagance, "The Creation of the World," ranks among the wonders of art. The painter's phantoms of sea, sky, clouds, vapours, abound in palaces; the labour expended is trivial, the price demanded exorbitant. The artist naturally has amassed a fortune; he lives pleasantly in the land he loves to paint; his imagination is of the South, romantic, fervid; his home is in the garden of Russia, the Crimea. The Empire of the Czar will not remain behind older nations in landscape art; we may be sure that, whatever imitation can compass, Muscovites will accomplish. Scenes depicted by Lagorio, Ducker, Wasieloff, and Bogoluboff do not pertain to the infancy of art. Yet maturity of style in landscape, as in figure painting, is greatly due to foreign study. Russian art extends our knowledge of physical geography by faithful transcripts from actual localities, by views taken for instance in the Caucasus. Russian painters, as we have said, are pioneers; they have much to tell and teach; they see around them a territory boundless in extent; they deal with a semi-barbarism, a semi-civilization which is eminently pictorial; and thus they have before them a future which can scarcely fail to expand with the undeveloped resources of the Empire.

RACING IN SUSSEX.

AS a fashionable pic-nic, as an opportunity for wearing fine dresses and eating large luncheons in the midst of beautiful scenery, Goodwood was as much appreciated this year as ever; but, from a racing point of view, there was no diminution of the blight that falls more and more every year over so many once famous meetings. Even in those races usually considered the most popular, the Stewards' and Chesterfield Cups, there was a great falling off on this occasion, only twenty-eight horses starting for the former and twenty for the latter, as against thirty-nine and twenty-eight in 1871. As a set-off, indeed, there were sixteen runners for the Goodwood Stakes; but, with few exceptions, they were of the most moderate quality. For the old-established weight-for-age races the fields were, as a rule, most insignificant, there being five runners for the Gratwicke Stakes, five for the Ham, five for the Lavant, two for the Findon, two for the Goodwood Derby, three for the Drawing Room, two for the Molecomb, and two for the Annesley Stakes. Many of these also were foregone conclusions, and were won so easily as to be productive of little interest or excitement; Cantinière, for instance (twice), and Somerset winning their engagements without even the show of a struggle. On the first day, after Alaric, with Fordham up—his first mount, we fancy, since Stockbridge—had won the Craven Stakes, and the rich Gratwicke and Ham Stakes had fallen respectively to the moderate Silvester and Wild Myrtle, the twenty-eight numbers were hoisted for the Stewards' Cup. The field, besides being numerically weak, was hardly so representative as usual of the best speed in the country, as a glance at the names of the thirty-eight who took part in it last year will show. On public form, the race seemed a positive gift to Auton if he was fit and well, for he had only 19 lbs. more to carry than last year, when he won, beating a far better field, with quite two stone in hand. It is possible that, having since been trained for long-distance races, he has lost much of his fine speed, for last week he seemed outpaced from the very start, and could never get anywhere near the front. Among the horses whose names are most familiarly known in connexion with races of this description were Oxonian, Blenheim, Botherton, Fisherman, Sir Robert Walpole, and Pitchfork. The race was won as easily this year as last, although not by so far a distance; for Oxonian took the lead, kept it the whole way, and cantered in first five lengths ahead of all his antagonists. With such a queer-tempered animal as Fisherman in the field, there were of course plenty of false starts, but the delay was happily not so great as in former years. The winner, who carried the top weight of 8 st. 12 lbs., and was consequently comparatively disregarded, the preference being given to his stable companion Pitchfork, has always had a great reputation for speed, and won the Portland Plate at Doncaster two years ago. But he is an uncertain horse, and has more often disappointed than gratified his supporters. Like Taraban, his courage is more artificial than natural, and a bottle of whisky, it is said, was required last week to screw up his spirits to the starting point. The only antagonist that looked formidable at any part of the race was Blenheim, who got up to Oxonian for a moment at the distance, but died away afterwards. And the mere fact of Landmark, a moderate three-year-old, running third, is conclusive testimony to the poor quality of the beaten horses. In the Lavant Stakes Cantinière pursued her victorious career, beating Silver Ring, Tourbillon, King George, and Ragusa in a canter. Silver Ring is a filly of no mean pretensions, and later in the week disposed of Wild Myrtle, herself a winner, with the greatest ease. King George and Tourbillon are also winners, and Ragusa enrolled herself among the victorious band before the end of the meeting, so that virtually Cantinière was meeting, and giving weight away to, a field of winning horses. But Lord Ailesbury's splendid daughter of Stockwell, who has all Achievement's grace of motion and ease of action, with considerably more size and substance, played with her opponents just as she pleased. It is the greatest possible misfortune that she should be a roarer, for, if as sound in wind as in limb, the three-year-old prizes would apparently be at her mercy. It is a treat to see her galloping, but she gallops with her mouth wide open, and it is too likely that we are now seeing the best of her. Despite her infirmity, Cantinière must be considered as one of the crowning triumphs of that splendid horse Stockwell, whose son Blair Athol has lately fetched the highest price ever given for a stallion. The beautiful Flower of Dorset presented 9 lbs. to Glenaveena in the Hainaker Stakes, and beat her cleverly, Siluria, whose form has gone off wonderfully since her Chester victory, never getting near the leading pair. And then one of the old-established long-distance races was fought out in the old-fashioned manner. Field Marshal and Ripponden came to the post for the Annesley Stakes over the severest four-mile course (it is really two furlongs less) in England. Of the two Ripponden was in much better condition, but nevertheless Field Marshal boldly forced the pace, and went off at an excellent speed, which he maintained all through. At the half-mile post Ripponden came up to Mr. Bowe's horse, and his superior speed and condition ought then to have ensured him the victory; but the steel was fairly taken out of him, and as they passed the enclosure, both covered with sweat and much distressed, Ripponden was quite unable to improve his position. Then the superior staying powers of Field Marshal availed him, and, in Fordham's hands, he won a most punishing race by a length and a half, Ripponden dying away to nothing at the finish.

On Wednesday Prince Charlie reappeared, and had to beat Bethnal Green over a mile and a quarter course. Considering the nature of the epidemic that has struck down nearly all Sir Joseph Hawley's horses, it was a matter of surprise to see Bethnal Green in such excellent condition; and he galloped as hard and as fast as he could, but never could get out of the way of Prince Charlie, who stuck to him without seeming to be doing more than canter in a long-striding, swinging style, but who, when let out, covered so much more ground in each stride than Bethnal Green as to pass him at pleasure and win, as we think, with plenty of weight in hand. Then Cantinière fulfilled her second engagement and—as easily as ever—beat the high-priced Cobham. Still there is a future for Cobham, who galloped well, and he will have many opportunities of distinguishing himself without always having to beat, or rather to be beaten by, a Cantinière. Sixteen runners were telegraphed for the Goodwood Stakes, and, had the merits of the competitors been equal to their number, it might have been an interesting race. But, take them altogether, they were a most moderate lot—Spennithorne, the winner of the Northumberland Plate, and Kingcraft, a Derby winner, being the conspicuous exceptions. Paganini, old and patched up, Falkland, also past his best day, and Finesse, well known at the Curragh in Queen's Plate courses, were among the remainder. A Derby winner, five years old, sound and perfectly fit, and weighted at only 8 st. 2 lbs., ought to have had the race at his mercy; but Kingcraft displayed his usual softness, or faintness of heart, or whatever his weakness is, and, directly he came within hearing of the shouts of the multitude, refused to race a yard further. Till then he was going well within himself, and had only Spennithorne to beat to secure the victory. Spennithorne, as it was, made nearly the whole of the running and won easily at the finish by three lengths, and so, for the second year running, the Northumberland Plate winner carried off the Goodwood Stakes also. William Day furnished the second in the almost unmentioned Richmond, and Kingcraft, on sufficient notice, obtained the third place. But his performance was so bad as to make him unworthy to be trusted in any race, no matter how lenient the weights. In the Bognor Stakes Drummond disposed of Flower of Dorset with ridiculous ease; but still a five-furlong course and the Leger course are not at all the same thing, and we fail to see why he should have in consequence been made such a favourite for the great Doncaster race. Still, if, as is currently reported, Queen's Messenger has broken down, that race will be left to the care of such indifferent company that anything might be made a favourite.

The third day's racing was perhaps more genuinely interesting on account of King of the Forest's reappearance after his long absence from the Turf than for the sake of the Cup itself, despite the antagonism of Favonius and Albert Victor. Even the laziest of racemen bestirred themselves and attempted to catch the early trains in order to see Mr. Merry's famous horse either break down or win, for the third year in succession, the Bentinck Memorial, and thereby secure the accumulated deductions from the stakes that now amount to nearly one thousand pounds, and are only awarded to that horse who as a two, a three, or a four-year-old succeeds in carrying off this race. Dalmacardoch and Ripponden were coloured on the card, but—perhaps out of courtesy to a gallant but luckless opponent—were withdrawn, and only Touques opposed the game son of Scottish Chief and Lioness. King of the Forest looked as if he had been doing only gentle and easy work, and, as far as condition went, was quite unfit for a journey over the severe Queen's Plate course; while Touques, though only a moderate mare, was perfectly fit. She made the running as fast as she could, and for three parts of the distance held a lead of nearly a dozen lengths. Then King of the Forest, who was ridden most tenderly and artistically by Cannon, came up to the leader, and after being most gently handled down the hill—where it was a mere toss-up whether he broke down or not—took the lead for the first time, and, Touques being too exhausted to raise a gallop, cantered in a winner by two lengths. He was never extended at any part of the race, not even in the last quarter of a mile; indeed, to have called on him to gallop at full speed would in all probability have ensured his downfall; and we have never seen greater judgment on the part of a jockey, or that prime requisite of a fine horseman—patience—exemplified better than in this race. After Somerset had beaten FitzJames, his solitary opponent in the Molecomb Stakes, in a canter, the numbers were hoisted for the Cup. Corisande did not run, being reserved for the Queen's Plate on the Friday, and the field was composed of Favonius, Albert Victor, Barford, Verdure, and Bothwell. The race was regarded as a foregone conclusion either for Favonius or Albert Victor, and, according to the Ascot running, the latter had deservedly the preference. Verdure was started to make the running, and right well did she accomplish her mission. In these days of pottering over the greater part and of galloping over the last half or quarter mile of long races, it is a relief to see a Cup race strongly run from end to end. Verdure took such a lead from the very first that there was no chance for a laggard, and for a mile and a half she went along at a rare pace. Then Albert Victor and Barford appeared in front, and for a moment Favonius seemed shut out. But directly he was brought round the outside a marvellous change took place in the character of the race, and having once got on terms with Albert Victor (who himself had already disposed of Barford), he settled Mr. Cartwright's horse in a moment, and, the latter not having an effort left in him, won by ten lengths—the easiest victory we ever saw in a Cup race run as Cup races should be. The reversal of the Ascot running was complete, and must have somewhat surprised those who at Ascot jumped to the conclusion that Albert Victor ought to have been the winner of last year's Derby. The balance of evidence is quite against such a theory, and we have since had additional proof, in Albert Victor's race at Brighton for the Cup, which Barford as nearly as possible snatched from him, that his Ascot running was rather too good to be true as a criterion of his usual average form. The two-year-old Bentinck Memorial was won easily by Silver Ring, her defeat of Wild Myrtle showing collaterally the immeasurable excellence of Cantinière; and Protomartyr, by beating Patriarch and Simon, foreshadowed his success the following week in the Brighton Stakes.

Of the seven races decided on the last day of the Goodwood week we need only notice two, the Queen's Plate and the Chesterfield Cup. Corisande and Dutch Skater contested the first, and Tortoise and Savoir Faire joined in for the sake of a little amusement. They walked and trotted for half a mile, and then Corisande made the running, instead of waiting, as at Ascot, and in consequence was beaten. Twenty ran for the Chesterfield Cup, including Prince Charlie, Digby Grand, Oxonian, Napolitain, Silvester, Mornington, and Hannah. The flag fell to a very bad start, and Napolitain—third this year in the Chester Cup—got all the best of it, and won from start to finish. Luey Sutton, a stable companion of Digby Grand, was second, and Prince Charlie, who finished very gamely and made up a great deal of ground at the end, was third. Whether that is good enough for the St. Leger we do not know; but, at any rate, he became nearly first favourite for that race when the Chesterfield Cup was over, and certainly, in such a poor field as we may expect to see next month at Doncaster, Prince Charlie's splendid speed ought to bring him home, despite his infirmity, amongst the first three.

The second half of the Sussex fortnight commenced under favourable auspices at Brighton, and the fields were fairly large, though there were few events of more than transitory importance. Protomartyr won the Brighton Stakes from Dalmacardoch and Manille, and Drummond frightened away all competitors in the Champagne Stakes, and on the second day won the Sussex Cup from Bank Note and Perfume. The Brighton Cup was left to Albert Victor, Barford, and Verdure, but all three had too vivid a remembrance of their severe race at Goodwood to attempt a repetition of it. They trotted and cantered, therefore, more than half the way, and it resolved itself consequently into a six-furlong race. Barford and Albert Victor made a close finish of it, Mr. Cartwright's horse just winning by a short head. As a Cup race, or as affording any proof of the relative staying powers and speed of the competitors, this event may be wholly neglected.

The pleasant Lewes gathering, on one of the most attractive courses in England, is an appropriate wind-up to the Sussex fortnight; but we are of course unable to say anything of the various events decided there.

REVIEWS.

EVANS'S STONE IMPLEMENTS OF GREAT BRITAIN.*

MR. EVANS'S carefully compiled and exhaustive work on the ancient stone implements, weapons, and ornaments of Great Britain fully sustains the high reputation of the writer. The critical skill displayed in the treatment of his materials is not less conspicuous than the industry which he has brought to bear upon them, or the wealth of opportunities which the study of years has placed at his command. In limiting the scope of his survey to the prehistoric remains of the British Isles, his judgment has probably been influenced by the immensity of the field opened by any attempt at a cosmopolitan treatment of the subject. At the same time he has shown that his knowledge and research, far from being restricted to the insular class of objects, include the widest range of prehistoric antiquity, enabling him to illustrate his immediate argument by analogies from every quarter of the globe, as well as by the light of every cognate science. He has not shrunk from the task of bringing his personal experience to bear upon the subject, having taken lessons in the art from the flint-knappers of Suffolk, who to this day, our readers may be surprised to learn, export tons of flints for old-pattern guns, or as "strike-a-lights," chiefly to the East and to Brazil. Mr. Evans goes minutely into the process of manufacture, making it abundantly clear how, even in the absence of metallic tools, the mystery of flaking and chipping from the flint core is to be effected. By dexterous blows from a rounded pebble flakes could, he found, be produced which it was impossible to distinguish from those made with a hammer of bronze or iron. He has accumulated from his reading abundant notices of the early knowledge and use of flints as the source of fire, from the well-known passages in Pliny and Virgil to the latest reports of voyagers and ethnologists. Classical evidence and the multifarious relics of early art which fill our museums combine to prove the identity in point of manufacture and usage at some time or other which prevailed among mankind all the world over, whether from the independent development of a common instinct, or from ancestral use spreading from a common centre. There is scarce a nook or corner of the earth which has been heedfully explored where weapons or tools of stone approximately like in type have not been found. Not that even identity of form or material is to be taken to indicate identity of age. On the contrary, nothing is more clear than that the various periods of stone manufacture overlap each other in time, some of the most primitive processes remaining actually in use among savage tribes in our day.

It is, in fact, largely due to the observations of voyagers among the most out of the way of these rude races, that an understanding of the use, the fitting, and the fabrication of many a puzzling object of early date has been obtained. From Australia, from Mexico, from Peru, from the Esquimaux and the banks of the Indus and the Mahanuddy, we have descriptions varying in detail, but all illustrative of the traditional ingenuity with which man thus supplied a universal want. But for the light thus borrowed from the observation and experience of our own day, it would have been scarcely possible to determine, otherwise than by the barest conjecture, the various modes of hafting the celts and other implements of stone, which is doubtless the question that most exercises the mind of those who gaze for the first time upon the multitudinous objects of the kind upon the shelves of our museums. The instances of early instruments, of whatever period, being found with their handles still attached to them are of extreme rarity. No more than two instances of the sort were till lately known to Mr. Evans as recorded in this country. One was that of the hatchet found in the Solway Moss near Longtown, now in the British Museum, the haft unfortunately much broken and decayed, the recent process of preserving or restoring the desiccated fibre by means of an alum solution not having been available at the time of its discovery. In the second instance, that of a celt found near Trannore, Cheshire, now in the Mayer Museum at Liverpool, though the greater part of the wood had perished, enough remained to show that the handle had held the stone in a slightly oblique position, similar to that given in a woodcut by Mr. Evans of a find from county Monaghan in the Royal Irish Academy. Among the more recent examples adduced and figured by our author is one from a peat deposit which once formed the bed of a small tarn in Cumberland. Here the end of the wooden handle through which the celt is driven is recurved in a curious fashion at the head, possibly with the view of steadying the butt end of the celt. Singularly enough, a similar form is given to the handle in the rude outline of a hatchet engraved on the underside of the roof-stone of a dolmen known as La Table des Marchands, near Locmariaquer, Brittany. Not unlike this were one or two other specimens from Ireland; and some of the hatchets from the Swiss Lake dwellings, as that from Robenhausem, the haft formed of ant, show much the same character as these club-like handles still in use far from India in Southern and Central Africa. A rude one obtained from the Indians of the Rio Pira, Texas, shows a rough lump of trachyte, unground and but slightly chipped, driven into a club-like haft of some native wood. The copper or bronze axes of the Mexicans were hafted in a similar manner, or, when more elaborately shaped, bound to the shaft by thongs of animal sinew or vegetable fibre. Such an example is that said to be the axe of Montezuma II. in the Ambros Museum, Vienna. Often the celt was forced or bound into a socket of deer horn, a form less common among English examples than on the continent of Europe, especially in France. One formed of a tine of red deer is said to have been found with human remains and early pottery at Cookshot Hill in Wyckwood Forest. A fragment of deer horn apparently pierced for this purpose was met with in a barrow at Scarborough, and one somewhat similar in the Thames at Kew. A highly ornamented mount, the shaft-curved grotesquely in the form of a human head, the blade of stone inserted in the mouth, is engraved by Mr. Evans, called tsawisch or tsawisch by the native artists of Nootka Sound. Sculpures in which the blade is set edge-fashion at a right or even an acute angle with the shaft, unknown apparently in Great Britain, are brought forward from the Swiss Lake dwellings and parts of Germany, together with modern antitypes from New Caledonia, New Zealand, and Australia. One of the most curious is a rude adze in use among the Schilum or Clalam Indians, near Puget's Sound, to hollow out their canoes. A strong resinous glue is employed by the Australian natives for securing the head of the implement to the haft, and is thought by our author to have been in use in Scandinavia in prehistoric times; as was bitumen, it would appear, among the dwellers by the Swiss Lakes. Experience of existing usages among uncivilized races has contributed no less to our knowledge of the various purposes to which implements of equally rude periods in the past were intended to apply; an admirable summary of which is put together from the most authentic sources by Mr. Evans. Besides their use as weapons of attack and defence we can picture to ourselves those head stone instruments serving for cutting down timber, scooping out canoes, dressing posts for huts, grubbing up roots, preparing firewood, killing animals and scraping their flesh from the bones, not to speak of agricultural uses manifold in number, or even mining the chalk in pursuit of the raw material of similar implements.

As regards the date to be assigned either to the Stone Age as a whole, or to any of the subsidiary periods which it has been decided to mark by the distribution of these stone relics into the Neolithic and Palæolithic class, Mr. Evans is too cautious and critical an antiquary to speak in other than tentative and approximate terms. In his concluding chapter on the antiquity of the River Drift he has connected with great ability the proofs derived from the geological study of the British Isles with those yielded by the artificially formed objects themselves. The researches of Sir Charles Lyell, Mr. Prestwich, and others, upon the progress and effects of fluvial action have a new significance when blended with careful observations of the heights and depths or other conditions of distribution or deposit under which these vestiges of man's presence are found. By the aid of a hypothetical case Mr. Evans places before the reader's mind a picture of the gradual changes of surface which may be conceived to have led to a state of things identical with that actually found to exist. Looking at the contours of valley basins with regard to the rivers which flow through them, it is in the power of a practised geologist to predict almost with certainty where deposits of drift yielding palæolithic implements are to be found. No portion of his work is more marked with ability or more pregnant with germs of scientific progress in a line of ever-increasing interest. An equation involving so many unknown quantities as that of the antiquity of man is, as our author justly observes, incapable of solution. Nor is it within the range of the British Islands that the chief elements of proof are to be met with. Still from many quarters a converging light is to be thrown upon the problem. What we may call the inferior limit of the series of ages may be in part fixed by the evidence of metal tools having been used not only in striking upon bones of the mastodon and other now extinct mammals, but in etched figures of the mastodon itself, obviously by a contemporary artist. To the antiquity thus gained for the Metal Age we have to add the long range of the Neolithic or polished stone period, and beyond this the still more vague Palæolithic series running back into the Glacial epoch, into the excavation of existing valleys and gradual accumulation of river drifts. Such periods as two thousand years is ridiculously small, our author may well say, for the Neolithic and bronze periods. And beyond this there is an immense gap between the River Drift and surface-stone periods, so far as any intermediate forms of implements are concerned. Were we, in defiance of probability, to date back the use of the polished implements only two thousand years before our historical notices of this country, and allow ourselves an additional four thousand years at the very least for the valley excavation, we should then but get to the latest of River Drift fabrics. Beyond this an unfathomable depth of time lies before us. The irresistible conclusion is that, "owing to the wasting agency of rain, frost, and rivers, there must have been a vast change in the superficial features of the country since the time when those who fashioned the flint implements found in the high level gravels were joint occupants of the land with the mammoth and rhinoceros, and the other departed members of the Quaternary fauna."

The antiquity, then, that must be assigned to the implements in the highest beds of River Drift may be represented (1) by the period requisite for the excavation of the valleys to their present depth; plus (2), the period necessary for the drying out and immigration of a large part of the Quaternary or Post-Glacial fauna; and the coming in of the Prehistoric; plus (3), the Palæolithic Stone Period; plus (4), the Bronze, Iron, and Historic Periods, which three latter in this country occupy a space of probably not less than three thousand years.

Mr. Evans has been fortunate in engaging the services of a wood-carver who has shown singular skill in the representation of the various objects of stone, to the number of nearly five hundred, which illustrate the volume. Not only the form, but the texture, of the material is set before the eye with praiseworthy distinctness, the flaking or cleavage of the flint being exceptionally well marked. This is an invaluable quality for those who have to study a book of this class at a distance from any adequate collection of examples. Beyond doubt, however, the most satisfactory and efficient use to be made of such a work is to take it as a companion to the thorough and systematic study of some such full and well organized series as the Christy or Mayer collection. As a manual and guide comprising the latest and most authentic accumulation of facts, joined to the most critical and cautious estimate of the conclusions to which they lead, Mr. Evans's work will mark an era in the history of this department of archaeology.

ANDRÉ-MARIE AMPÈRE.*

THE fame of André-Marie Ampère has penetrated deeply into English life, though narrowly in proportion to its depth. He is known chiefly as the discoverer of the identity of the magnetic and electric forces; he is acknowledged to have been as much the author of modern telegraphy as Sir Humphry Davy and Thomas Wedgwood of modern photography—in each case the power being demonstrated and recorded, though the practice was not worked out; his name strikes on the ear as that of a servant of no common order; but nevertheless one of the most ardent and universal students of this century is scarcely known at all to the generality of Englishmen. An admirable sketch of his character by M. Sainte-Beuve appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes, in 1837, the year after Ampère's death; but it has been reserved for the work before us to lift the veil from the most interesting parts of his youthful history.

André-Marie Ampère was born at Lyons, of respectable citizen parents, in 1775. He showed from earliest boyhood an insatiable thirst for knowledge; mathematics and geometry taking the lead in his inclinations. While still feeble from the effects of an early illness, the boy made calculations with no other appliance than little bits of biscuit. He read all he could lay hands on; the "Encyclopédie" from beginning to end. He received no instruction, and was subjected to no discipline; indeed method or stimulus would have been alike misplaced for one who voluntarily outran all customary goals. Such quiet guidance and help as was necessary on his ardent course was supplied by his father, who, as we shall see, was a man of no ordinary type. Finding that his son cared less for classical than for scientific studies, he let him follow his own bent; and when the boy, then only eleven years of age, was struck with passionate consternation on discovering that the works of Euler and others were written in a language he had not acquired, his father acted as interpreter. Ampère used to say that there were three events which developed his mind—his perusal of the "Eloge" of Descartes, by M. Thomas; his first communion; and the tidings of the taking of the Bastille. In this triad of causes, curiously significant in their range and differences, pointing equally in strongly divergent directions, to love of knowledge, respect for religion, and ardour for liberty, we find the true measure of his mind. Ampère, like the great thinkers who preceded him—Laplace, Lagrange, Laplace, Cuvier—was born to search into the laws of natural phenomena, to stop and ponder, to separate and systematize, where others dawdle or hurry past. In certain respects, however, he stood alone. His compeers in science were men of shrewdness, deliberation, and judgment in the common affairs of life; the idea that inspired them was subordinate to control, subordinate to themselves. With Ampère the idea was sole master. He was for the time like one possessed; like an eager child who has set his heart on one object, and will bear no hindrance till he attain it. Every pursuit in turn was a passion; he saw and heard nothing else till he had, as it were, run it down; or, rather, till it had driven him to the uttermost limits of human thought. Ambition and self-interest had no part in him except when invoked for one dearer than self, and then they responded but clumsily, however willingly, to the call. That power of taking care of himself, and of what peculiarly belonged to himself—his own discoveries—with which most scientific votaries are respectably endowed, was totally lacking in Ampère. Anybody could help himself to anything he had. For those who were bent on picking his brains he was "un peu ouvert." "A toute heure il dimittait tout, et ne pensait pas qu'on dût en ménager rien." This absence of the usually mingled motives, of the alloy which renders the precious metal more available for utilitarian purposes, shows the mind of this remarkable man as unaided is seldom seen; unguarded by the ordinary egotisms, inexperienced in the commonest precautions, stupid and slow in what all the world knows—full, in short, of foolish and deficient ideas, yet these so pure and genuine that there was involuntary veneration in the very smile they rained.

* Journal de Correspondance de André-Marie Ampère. Publié par Madame H. G. Paris: Hachet et Cie. 1870.

Such being the nature of the lad—the over-sensitive surface on which the lights and shadows of life were destined to fall with peculiar intensity—we turn with the more interest to those early days which budded and flowered, faded and withered, with idyllic freshness and pathos. A devoted friend has given them to the world. M. Barthélemy de St-Hilaire, in the work entitled Les deux Ampères, has published the posthumous writings of Ampère, edited and supplemented by his only son, Jean-Jacques; but to Madame Henriette Chevreux, the editor of the work before us, we owe the preliminary notice of the father, who proudly predicted what the son has sought piously to preserve, and thus we are presented with the touching and inseparable group of “Les trois Ampères.”

Jean-Jacques Ampère, the father of the great savant, was, as we have said, a respectable citizen of Lyons, where, in the year 1793, he filled the office of “juge de paix.” During the excesses which distracted the city he stood foremost on the side of order, and when it was entered by the revolutionary party after the siege, he was among the first to be thrown into prison. A few of his letters addressed to his wife, the mother of André-Marie, and dated from his cell, which have survived, serve to swell the great cry of the innocent which went up at that time. There are few more touching records of the heroism and fortitude which the Revolution developed in its victims, and of the piety, patriotism, and domestic affections which it outraged. On the 17th October, 1793, the prisoner addressed a series of instructions to his wife. After giving an account of his property, liabilities, and debts—the latter amounting only to a few francs and sous, but recorded with as much exactness as if they had involved tens of thousands—he adds:—

Il s'en faut de beaucoup, ma très-chère amie, que je te laisse riche, et même une aisance ordinaire; tu ne peux l'imputer à ma mauvaise conduite, ni à aucune dissipation; ma plus grande dépense a été l'achat des livres et des instruments de géométrie dont notre fils ne pouvait se passer pour son instruction; mais cette dépense même était une sage économie, puisqu'il n'a jamais eu d'autres maîtres que lui-même.

We then read a modest record of the sacrifices made by those of small fortunes and simple habits in the vain effort to avert that overthrow of all society which finally exacted their blood, and the letter thus concludes:—

Je n'eus jamais que le goût et la passion de mes devoirs; je n'ai ni repentir ni remords, et je suis toujours digne de toi. Je t'embrasse, et tout ce qui nous est cher, du fond de mon cœur.

Jean-Jacques Ampère, époux, père, ami, et citoyen toujours fidèle.

A month later his last letter was written:—

J'ai reçu, mon cher ange, ton billet consolateur; il a versé un baume vivant sur les plaies morales que fait à mon âme le regret d'être méconnu par mes concitoyens. . . . Je desirais que ma mort soit le sceau d'une réconciliation générale entre tous nos frères; je la pardonne à ceux qui s'en réjouissent, à ceux qui l'ont provoquée et à ceux qui l'ont ordonnée.

Si, du séjour de l'éternité où notre chère fille m'a précédé, il m'était donné de me occuper des choses d'ici-bas, tu serais, ainsi que mes chers enfants, l'objet de mes soins et de ma complaisance. Pourrais-ils jouir d'un meilleur sort que leur père, et avoir toujours devant les yeux la crainte de Dieu, cette crainte salutaire qui opère en nous l'innocence et la justice, malgré la fragilité de notre nature. . . . Ne parle pas à ma Josephine (a young daughter) du malheur de son père; fais en sorte qu'elle ignore. Quant à mon fils, il n'y a rien que je n'attende de lui. . . . Adieu, tendre amie.

A few hours after these lines were penned Jean-Jacques Ampère mounted the scaffold.

On the son of his tender care—then but eighteen years of age—this blow fell with overwhelming force. For fully a year the brain lay dormant; his state was almost idiotic, and he spent his time for the chief part out of doors, listlessly scraping together little heaps of earth. The first thing that roused him effectually was the study of botany. Rousseau's letters on the subject had fallen into his hands, and he threw himself into the novel pursuit with all the ardour and the exactness which were his chief characteristics. Next came a fit of classic enthusiasm inspired by a collection of Latin poets. The long coveted knowledge of Latin was soon mastered, and the heart-stricken lad roamed about the country with his hands full of plants, murmuring verses by Horace, like one spell-bound. He was now thoroughly infected with the passion for classic poetry. The years from 1795 to 1797 were all poetical, as those which preceded them had been all given to abstract science. He threw out at this time an exuberance of poetical compositions—tragedies, songs, madrigals, poems on the natural sciences, an epic on Columbus—all showing, as might be expected, more facility and fertility than sense of art. He also mastered Greek, and modern languages, studied physiology, chemistry, philosophy—what did that mind not study which, twenty years later, conceived and executed a new classification of the whole cycle of sciences? To all this intellectual activity was added the moral and manly work of earning daily bread. Installed in Lyons, he gave lessons in mathematics and chemistry, and as the duty of teaching others occupied him during the principal hours of the day, he rose at four in the morning for the luxury of teaching himself.

We now approach the sweet May time of his life, not altogether smoothly run, but unclouded for a brief space in its pure and holy dawn. There is nothing sensational in Ampère's first and only love; he had not even felt the temptation of “chance dantes,” though he had begun to know the yearning for something beyond learning to satisfy his heart. Ampère's mother lived on her own little property at Poliénieux, near Lyons, and at the close of his laborious weeks he would spend his Sundays with her. On his way lay the village of St. Germain-au-Mont-d'Or, where he occasionally halted to visit an aunt. Close by, in St. Germain, lived a family of the name of Carron—excellent people, the father in business, with a son and three daughters, the youngest of whom was named Julie. True as the language is which seeks to say more than the lover can express, we forbear to quote Ampère's explication on the “angelic soul seen in the serenity of her blue eyes, and the candour which shines from her forehead.” We know Julie perfectly well without Ampère's help. She was one of those demure, modest, self-possessed, and sensible little women, generally pretty, and always without a grain of romance, who commit certain havoc with young hearts of Ampère's stamp. She had already slain one man of science. An older savant, a ready-made professor, of the name of Dumas, had already sighed for her in vain. But Julie cannot accustom herself to the idea of quitting her family, at any rate for M. Dumas, and writes him little formal, decorous letters to that effect. However unlike the current English ideas regarding Frenchwomen, Julie was in truth a true type of a large class of young French girls, who never leave their mother's side till they marry. Family affections are still peculiarly strong in France. At that time they had been drawn closer still by those unexampled trials which reached all more or less. So the coast was clear—we are now in the year 1796—and Ampère entered the lists, with all the timidity proper to his age, and with all the maladroitness proper to himself. From this time he indites a series of “Confessions”—how unlike those by Rousseau we need not say. On the fly-leaf he wrote the word “Amorum,” and within are noted the discovery of a new law and the observations on new phenomena. A few specimens of this journal will suffice. The diet is too pure for the world to bear much of it:—

Dimanche, 10 avril. Je l'ai vue pour la première fois.

Samuel, 10 août. Je suis allé chez elle; on m'y a prêté le Nouvelles Mœurs de Soreau.

Samuel, 3 septembre. Je suis allé rendre le Nouvel. Je suis resté un instant seul avec elle.

Samuel, 17 septembre. Je portai des livres, et commençai à ouvrir mon cœur.

Lundi, 19 septembre 1796. J'achevai de m'expliquer; j'en rapportai de faillies espérances, et la défense d'y revenir avant le retour de sa mère.

Lundi, 26 septembre. Je la trouvai seule dans le jardin, sans oser lui parler.

Lundi, 6 octobre. Je me trouvais seul avec elle, sans oser lui parler; on me donna les premiers boutons-rimés.

Mardi, 9 novembre. Je reparlai. Julie me dit de venir moins souvent.

Samuel, 12 novembre. Mme. Carron était sortie; je dis quelques mots à Julie, qui me rembourra bien [Anglicé, shut him up] et partit. Elise [her sister] me dit de passer l'hiver sans plus parler.

This kind of thing continues through all its pretty and imbecile phases. Ampère has many “a shutting up.” He never knows when to take leave, and has sometimes to be told twice. Pretending to look at some vignettes which lay before her, he kneels down at her feet, and is reproved by the mother. Nevertheless Julie does not let him go. In due time the splendid prizes of a patient lover fall to his share. Twice he holds her hand to help her over a stile; occasionally she takes a seat by him and speaks to him; and once the climax of his bliss is reached by a gentle blow from her hand upon his wrist. His success is now certain. Of course he writes verses, which we spare the reader, though they are really pretty. And, better still, he seeks to cultivate her mind, and gives her (and her sister) lessons in arithmetic and Italian. For all that, Julie and her family have not the slightest conception of the order of mind with which they are dealing. As the suit advanced, the Carron family began to consider the state of life in which Ampère could hope to maintain a wife, and proposed one which they considered suitable to his mathematical propensities:—

Le soir (19 novembre 1797), me trouvant seul avec Julie, elle me parla de mes projets, comme y prenant beaucoup de part; Mme. Carron vint se mêler à cet entretien, et elles firent toutes deux l'éloge de l'état d'agent de change.

He proposes, on his part, to engage more regularly in a course of lessons, but she treats this with disfavour, and replies, “J'aimerais mieux voir M. Ampère dans le commerce.”

This pre-conjugal state lasts three years. In August 1799 Julie Carron became Julie Ampère, one of the happiest and wisest of little wives, and quite satisfied to be maintained by the strange devices which her husband preferred to commerce. The next great event was the birth of their only child, Jean-Jacques, which completed the measure of Ampère's happiness. For a short time the young people lacked nothing but more worldly prosperity. Ampère's lessons in chemistry, mathematics, Latin, Italian, to any one who would learn, provided but a scanty pittance. Julie's health, which began to fail soon after the birth of her child, required all his exertions. On this account he accepted the appointment of Professor of Physics and Chemistry at the school of Bourg, twelve leagues from Lyons, even though it involved the separation from his wife, who was forbidden to accompany him. Previous poverty rendered a certain salary of even less than mille sous too tempting an offer to be refused. Their separation gives rise to a correspondence rivalled as a reflex of tender hopes and fears, of petty details and lofty aspirations. Both are seen as in a mirror; Ampère ever blundering, confessing, musing, divining, always working; Julie gently chiding, guiding, and cheering, and working too; both so economical! His now, in her language “mon fils,” she in his “mon bienfaitrice.” These terms represent very much the footing on which they continued until Ampère's sun of happiness sank into Julie's early grave.

Meanwhile Ampère is buried in his duties at Bourg, arranging his machines, giving lectures, but as unfit as a child to live alone.

Julie is perpetually anxious that he should not forget his meals, and that he should appear decently dressed. He destroys his blue stockings and his new pantalons with what Julie calls "ce maudit acide qui brûle tout." He confesses that he has used part of his linen for stoppers to his chemical instruments; he unsews the lining of his coat for some unheard-of purpose. Julie reproves, and sends him an apron. Then their little money matters are touching in their simple scale. He supplies her monthly, now with seven louis, now with six, keeping only a few francs and sous for his own current purposes. The young people's letters and packets go by the carrier—the twelve leagues in ten hours—all sorts of machines, cylinders, retorts, thermometers, barometers, chemicals, salts, bottles of ink, or of wine, sausages and cheeses, with newly repaired gilets, or patched culottes—all pass pêle-mêle backwards and forwards, and not always safely. "Le baromètre et le thermomètre [writes Julie] sont sortis cassés de l'étui. Cet accident me fait encore plus trouver que la physique est une sottise chose." This little ebullition is well excused by the trials which "la physique" in this form entailed on poor Julie, who, ill as she was, and much worse than she let André know, had enough to do to execute its extraordinary commissions, cheer its anxieties, and repair its damages.

Through all this domestic dialogue are heard from time to time the simple but dignified tones of such deep thought as few human brains have had the power to sustain:—

Il y a sept ans, ma Julie, je m'étais proposé un problème de mon invention, que je n'avais pu résoudre directement, mais dont j'avais découvert, par hasard, une solution dont je connaissais la justesse sans pouvoir la démontrer. Cela me revenait souvent dans l'esprit; j'ai cherché vingt fois sans succès cette solution directe. Depuis quelques jours mon idée me suivait partout; enfin, je ne sais comment, je viens de la trouver, avec une foule de considérations curieuses et nouvelles sur la théorie des probabilités. Comme je crois qu'il y aura peu de mathématiciens en France qui puissent résoudre ce problème en moins de temps, je ne doute pas que sa publication dans une brochure d'une vingtaine de pages ne me soit un bon moyen de parvenir à une chaire de mathématiques. Ce petit ouvrage d'algèbre pure, où l'on n'a besoin d'aucune figure, sera rédigé après demain.

And again:—

J'ai fait hier une importante découverte sur la théorie du jeu, en parvenant à résoudre un problème plus difficile encore que le précédent. Je travaille à l'insérer dans le même ouvrage, ce qui ne le grossira pas beaucoup, parce que j'ai fait un nouveau commencement plus court que l'ancien. Je suis sûr qu'il me vaudra une place au Lycée, car dans l'état où il est à présent, il n'y a guère de mathématiciens en France (je le répète) capables d'en faire un pareil. Je te dis cela comme je le pense, pour que tu ne le dises à personne.

Thus arose his work entitled Considérations sur la Théorie du Jeu—a subject attempted by Buffon and others, but never, it is acknowledged, so solved before. At first Ampère is tormented lest the idée should not be strictly original, lest any other head should have anticipated him—a fear soon dissipated; then he is excruciated by a misprint in his calculations—an oversight soon corrected; but both together quite sufficient to involve the birth of this tough offspring in throes which the little wife is very unfairly required to share. But as all this clears off he begins to realize the pride of his achievement. With all his modesty Ampère did not undervalue the travail of his brain. Nor did he allow his judgment to be awayed as to the mode of bringing out his work. One of the official examiners to whom he submitted it urged his reducing it to the level of a larger number of minds by giving examples in figures of his algebraic formula. This he stoutly resists:—"Jo lui ferai des exemples, mais je persiste à imprimer mon ouvrage tel qu'il est; ces exemples lui donneraient l'air d'un ouvrage d'écolier." It is true the little folio did not sell, and whoever has seen it would have been astonished if it had.

Meanwhile the French Republic—in other words, Bonaparte—had offered a reward of 60,000 francs for a discovery in electricity and galvanism comparable to those made by Volta and Franklin. Ampère longs to obtain it, but while labouring all day, in and out of school, for absolute necessities, has no leisure to develop what already lay embryonic in his mind. Our own Davy, three years younger even than Ampère, carried off the prize. His utmost ambition now was a professorship "de Lycée," and, if possible, at Lyons, where all his heart centred. New regulations were then making with regard to scientific appointments which opened a larger field:—

Il y aura au moins vingt-deux à quarante Lycées. Mettons quarante; ce sont quarante professeurs de mathématiques et physique à choisir en France. Le gouvernement nommera sur un tableau formé par trois membres de l'Institut d'après les examens et les informations qu'ils auront prises. Il faut absolument que je sois sur ce tableau un des quarante premiers, ou pour les mathématiques ou pour la physique. Mon espérance est de me faire distinguer en parlant également des deux sciences. J'entreprendrai à tout cela mes petites découvertes.

The fruition of all this labour and anxiety was at hand. His "Mémoire sur le Jeu" had been sent to the Institut, and unanimously pronounced a work that could only have proceeded from "une tête forte." The official inspectors also had pronounced his pupils to be forwarder than any others they had examined:—

Je suis sûr du Lycée, et mon succès doit te satisfaire. Je ne suis plus en peine de la fortune de mon fils, mais bien de la manière dont nous vivrons jusqu'à ce que je gagne davantage. Je sens combien il faut économiser l'argent, et encore plus mon temps, qui est ma seule ressource pour parvenir à une grande réputation. Tu regarderas tout cela comme des rêveries, mais je t'assure qu'il n'en est rien; tu verras si mes augures sont trompés. Ce n'est plus la réussite qui m'inquiète, mais la santé de mon ami.

Would that his Julie could have seen the fulfilment of his auguries, and of infinitely more; but the young wife's state had become more and more critical. She writes:—

Ah! la santé est si précieuse que, si je possédais des richesses, pour obtenir

ce bien-là je les sacrifierais toutes! Mais il faut se soumettre, espérer dans l'avenir, prendre patience. Prends-la donc aussi, cette patience, mon fils, et ne te fagote pas comme tu le fais par tes calculs; car se guérir n'est pas un problème qui puisse se résoudre, et nous aurions beau vouloir y parvenir si le Maître de notre être veut que nous soyons ainsi. . . . Mon ami, nous sommes faits l'un pour l'autre; si je me portais bien, nous serions trop heureux.

But we must close the sad story. Julie's letters cease, and her sister writes in her stead. Ampère, now professor at Lyons, resumes in his last anxieties the same form of journal which had given us his first hopes:—"17 avril, dimanche. Je reviens de Bourg pour ne plus quitter ma Julie." Then "Julie bien malade," "Julie plus malade." Then symptoms, prescriptions, further medical advice. Finally, a touching passage poured forth in the furnace of intense solicitude:—

M'ôtez-vous tout bonheur sur cette terre? Vous en êtes le maître, ô mon Dieu! mes crimes m'ont mérité ce châtiment, mais peut-être écoutez-vous encore la voix de vos miséricordes. Multa flagella peccatoris; sperantem autem in Domino misericordia circumdabit. J'espère en vous, ô mon Dieu; mais je serai soumis à votre arrêt, quel qu'il soit: j'essaye de résister à la mort.

O Seigneur! Dieu de miséricorde! daignes-tu réunir dans le ciel à ce que vous m'aviez permis d'aimer sur la terre.

We must here take leave of Ampère. He is still remembered in Parisian circles (he died in 1836) as the absent, dreaming savant who remained more versed in the secrets of the universe than in the commonest affairs of men; but till this volume appeared, few men suspected the exquisitely tender and emotional side of the learned, simple, and untidy old man, who to the last wanted his Julie to chide, to guide, to cheer, and to understand him.

POLYGAMY IN UTAH.*

A GENUINE description of Mormon life as seen from within ought to be a very curious book. We have had plenty of such hasty sketches as can be put together by a flying tourist, and some of them have been curiously favourable to the system. In some cases we may set down the complacency with which a degrading institution is thus regarded to the amiable desire of the traveller to stifle the propensities of respectable readers at home.

A preference of polygamy to Christianity is piquant in its way, as would be a preference of Mahomedanism to Christianity, or a justification of cannibalism or infanticide. Such little eccentricities are generally regarded as venial, and we need not look too narrowly into the alleged justification. Another class of travellers, again, were probably surprised at discovering that the Mormons had neither horns nor hoofs, but in all external matters resembled industrious emigrants of the ordinary type; and, by a natural rebound, they praised extravagantly a system which was not openly revolting to a casual observer. No such verdicts could be good for much; for it is plain that to form any trustworthy judgment it is necessary to have an intimate experience of Mormon life as seen from within. Mrs. Stenhouse, the writer of the book before us, certainly possesses that qualification. She was for more than twenty years the wife of a Mormon missionary, and during the greater part of that period she was a resident in Utah, where her husband edited a newspaper after having concluded his apostolic labours. She had therefore every opportunity of becoming thoroughly acquainted with the working of the system, and, but for one or two considerations, we should be ready to attach a corresponding weight to her testimony. The drawbacks to it are, in the first place, that as Mr. and Mrs. Stenhouse have become apostates from the Mormon faith, we must in fairness make due allowance for her regarding all belonging to it through a certain veil of prejudice. On the whole, indeed, she seems to speak dispassionately enough, and makes no special calls upon our credulity. But it must be added that the book, which comes to us adorned with illustrations of very small artistic merit from an American artist, has the outward appearance of a catchpenny production, and may be intended to take advantage of the feeling which has recently been excited by the prosecution of Brigham Young. Even those who would defend such an interference of the Federal Government on grounds of abstract justice must admit that the motives of some of the persons who actually stirred in the matter were of a questionable kind; and as this book is apparently intended to come more or less in aid of their action, it is liable to a shade of the same suspicion. We know absolutely nothing of Mr. and Mrs. Stenhouse beyond what we learn from this book; but though we agree with them in detesting polygamy, we cannot forget that these particular polygamists have just now pretty good reason to protest against the weapons used against them.

Taking the book with these reserves, we may admit that it gives some information which is significant enough, if not by itself decisive of the point. The story of Mrs. Stenhouse's own adventures is a simple one. Brought up in Jersey as a Baptist, she became teacher of English at a French school in Brittany. She returned after a few years to find that her parents had become Mormons; and she speedily followed their example, under the influence of a young Mormon elder to whom she was married a few months later. He was sent to Italy, and afterwards to Switzerland, as a missionary, and perhaps the most really curious part of the book is the brief notice of his position there. It is at any rate a proof that there is some genuine faith in at least the younger disciples of Mormonism. The missionaries, it seems, receive no pay what-

ver. Mr. Stenhouse started, in implicit obedience to the commands of the Church, to live in a foreign country the language of which he did not know, and with no particular means of support except the vague prospect of making converts and drawing contributions from them. It would be difficult to imagine a human being more out of place than a young Englishman of the Dissenting irreligious class suddenly drafted into Italy in the hope of converting the natives to Mormonism. What arguments he used, or what was his success there, does not appear; but in Switzerland, after being reduced to the borders of starvation whilst attempting to learn the language, he succeeded in gradually founding a branch of the Mormon Church. Are we to set this down to the contagious power of all genuine belief, or to the amazing gullibility of the human race, or to the fact that a good many of the Swiss have an eye to America, and might regard Mr. Stenhouse in the secular light of an emigration agent? Probably all these influences had some share in the result; and, if Mrs. Stenhouse's account be accurate, it would appear that the zeal of some of the converts led them to sacrifice considerable pecuniary advantages in order to make the dreary journey—for this was long before the days of the Pacific Railway—across the plains of the great West. After a time Mr. and Mrs. Stenhouse followed their converts. She had already become aware that polygamy was practised at Utah, and had been compelled, much against her will, to convey this piece of information to the wife of one of the converts, who naturally exclaimed, "Quelle religion d'animaux!" and agreed to join Mrs. Stenhouse in opposing the reduction of the theory to practice. After some years spent at Salt Lake City, Mrs. Stenhouse discovered that, in her own case at least, this was not so easy. An intimation was conveyed to Mr. Stenhouse that he ought to take another wife. The person designated for the post was "very pretty and very youthful." Mr. Stenhouse began to pay his addresses, assuring his first wife that it was a very "painful task." He seemed, however, as she observes, "to hear it remarkably well, and went at it with a zeal that was perfectly astonishing to me, who knew, from what he said, how painful it was to him." Ultimately, he married not only this young lady, but another; and Mrs. Stenhouse became the senior wife of three, and, as a very natural consequence, a convert from Mormonism. She took to studying the "revelation on marriage" originally communicated to Joseph Smith; she would still have preferred, as she declares, to find that her religion was true, to finding that it was false. Her study, however, convinced her that this doctrine at least was not of divine origin; and to doubt one doctrine, in this as in some other cases, was to doubt all. She speedily became convinced of the imposture, and we can easily believe that the logical process so simply described has been followed to the same conclusion by a good many other Mormon wives. Presently Mr. Stenhouse's faith was shaken by a similar, though different, argument. He was ready, as it would seem, to believe it to be his duty to take any number of wives; but Brigham Young put him to a severe test. For some reason or other the prophet ordered him to give up publishing his newspaper at Salt Lake City, and to move to Ogden. Now Ogden—a place with whose fame we are not well acquainted—is, it seems, ill calculated to support a newspaper. In short, the intimation meant that Mr. Stenhouse was to be removed. Therefore he too began to see the error of his ways, and before long gave up his allegiance to the prophet. The removal of the lady and gentleman from Salt Lake City and the publication of this book have been the remoter consequences of their conversion.

If it be asked what light Mrs. Stenhouse's revelations throw upon polygamy, assuming them to be accurate, we can only say that they tell us little more than we should have anticipated for ourselves. Various advantages have been claimed for polygamy by the disinterested advocates of whom we have spoken, and especially in relation to the position of a new colony. They scarcely deserve a serious answer; and, on the whole, one consideration is enough to dispose of them. People at Salt Lake City are pretty much like the class from which they have been drawn in the old countries. They are not, as a rule, possessed of much refinement, and are perhaps inclined to accept without active disgust some consequences of their system which we should regard with very different feelings. To that fact it must be attributed that polygamy has not produced more palpably objectionable results. Still any married woman in any class of life may easily imagine the effect upon her happiness of her husband taking to himself half-a-dozen concubines. Various melancholy stories are told by Mrs. Stenhouse of base deceptions practised by Mormon preachers on their female converts in Europe, and of the miseries which followed when their victims were cut off by vast deserts from the possibility of escape to the outer world. The railway has changed all that, and has doomed polygamy. For, in fact, the system comes to nothing more than licensing a vast amount of brutality and sensuality. The details of the petty miseries which follow are easily conceivable—the jealousy between the rival wives, the attempt of one lady to monopolize a husband by giving him good dinners, and of another to appeal to his compassion by giving him bad dinners (Mrs. Stenhouse thinks, we dare say with justice, that the first plan generally succeeds best), the hardship of seeing a husband's affections usurped by a prettier and younger woman, the breaking up of the family system, the brutal tone encouraged amongst the younger part of the male population, and generally the feminine slavery and masculine demoralization which naturally ensue. One story is rather quaint, and gives a notion of the spirit of feminine intrigue which survives under these altered conditions. A woman applied to a Mormon bishop, and asked his advice for her daughter. The daughter was in love with a married man and refused the addresses of a bachelor. What was she to do? Go to the married man, replied the bishop, and tell him that it is his duty to marry your daughter. The mother smiled and blushed, and replied, "Bishop, thou art the man," and the lady presently became No. 6 or 7 of the episcopal harem. This opens some new suggestions for novelists, but as a picture of common life we may say that Mrs. Stenhouse's account is revolting enough, and all the more so because the grievances which she describes are for the most part commonplace rather than melodramatic. After all, the fact that polygamy is degrading and brutal is not very surprising, but perhaps Mrs. Stenhouse's account may enable people to realize it a little more distinctly than before. We may remark, in reference to one point sometimes noticed, that in Utah the census gives 44,121 males to 42,665 females. Though the disproportion is not so great as in most newly settled countries, there are still more men than women, and we may infer that polygamy is a comparatively rare luxury even in Utah.

Perhaps, as already intimated, the religious aspect of the question is the most really curious. We are so much accustomed to speak of Mormonism as a palpable imposture that it is curious to find even a convert from the system speaking of its adherents as frequently moved by the most genuine and ardent faith in a heap of rubbish which is simply disgusting to an educated mind. Various reflections might be suggested, but at present we are content to remark that, in spite of Captain Burton and Mr. Hepworth Dixon, we see no reason to believe that polygamy in Utah differs from what might have been inferred from a priori speculation.

THE CHURCH OF UTRECHT.*

(Second Notice.)

WE have seen that the interruption of communion between the Church of Utrecht and the Holy See dates from the arbitrary deposition of Archbishop Cudde, which the authorities, both ecclesiastical and civil, in Holland refused to recognise. This was several years before the appearance of the bull Unigenitus, which is often erroneously represented as the cause of the quarrel; and the charges against Cudde were so frivolous that they broke down under the investigation of a very hostile Commission appointed to try the case at Rome. It was not, however, till thirteen years after his death that the vacancy of the see was filled up; and this long interregnum, during which the field was left open for the machinations of the Romanizing and Jesuit party among the clergy, was, to say the least, a grave strategical blunder, and is probably the main cause of a comparatively small fraction of the 300,000 Roman Catholics of Holland having remained faithful to their ancient native hierarchy. During the vacancy, the Nunciature in Cologne, inspired of course by the Jesuits, assumed the superintendence of ecclesiastical affairs in Holland, and everything was done to oust and discredit the national clergy, and replace them by Jesuit or Gesuitanti priests. Not that these high-handed measures were tacitly acquiesced in. Several learned works, like the Datuna Sacra of Van Heussen, and the treatise of Van Erkels on Canon Law, were published in defence of the rights of the persecuted community, and a solemn appeal was made to a future General Council, based on the precedents of Church history. The Paris Sorbonne, the highest theological authority of the day, acknowledged the justice of the position taken up by the Utrecht Church, and its rights were maintained in public theological discussions at the Universities of Paris and Vienna, and supported by the home Government. But the want of regular episcopal ministrations—for the whole see was now vacant—had become a grave practical difficulty, though the immediate needs of the moment were supplied through the kindness of Luke Fagan, an Irish prelate, afterwards Archbishop of Dublin, and three French bishops, acting with the full sanction of the Cardinal-Archbishop of Paris, who administered confirmation at different times in Holland. Later on, another French prelate, Varlet, titular Bishop of Babylon, who had been employed in missionary labours in America, discharged similar good offices, and, after the Jesuits had brought about his deposition on the flimsiest pretexts, he settled in Holland, and was thus enabled, when the time came, to impart consecration to Cornelius Steenoven, who was at length, in 1723, elected by the Chapter of Utrecht as their Archbishop.

Steenoven at once announced his election at Rome and sent in his profession of faith, and an official statement was also addressed to all Catholic bishops, to the Cardinals, the German Chapters, and the Universities. Innocent XIV. made no reply to the communication, but after his death a brief of excommunication was published by the nuncio at Brussels in the name of the Conclave against the "heretics and schismatics at Utrecht and their adherents." A fresh missive, requesting his sanction and blessing, was despatched to the new Pope, Benedict XIII., who also left it unanswered. And so at last in October 1724, after obtaining formal opinions in favour of the regularity of the election from the Universities of Louvain and Paris, and the opinion of the great canonist Van Espen, as to the sufficiency of one bishop for performing the ceremony, Steenoven was consecrated by Bishop Varlet on October 15, 1724. He wrote at once to the Pope, who replied by a bull of excommunication replete with invective and menace. On his death, in the following April, desperate attempts were made by the Court of Rome to prevent the election of a successor, and they even engaged the Doge of Venice to bring his influence to bear on the Protestant Government, which very properly declined to interfere. Accordingly in May 1725 Barchinon Wuytlers was elected to the see, and received letters of sympathy from all parts of the Church, but was answered by the Pope in a bull full of abuse and misstatements, to which the Chapter made a formal reply. Varlet consecrated him September 30, 1725. During his eight years' episcopate the Theological Summary of Amersfoort was founded, and many learned works were written in vindication of the Church of Utrecht, which also found zealous champions among the French clergy and in the universities of Belgium, Germany, and North Italy. Meanwhile the suffragan sees of Haarlem and Deventer had not been filled up, and it was therefore the more fortunate that Varlet's life was prolonged to a great age, so that he was able to consecrate two more Archbishops of Utrecht in succession—Theodore van der Croon in 1733, and Meindaerts in 1736—a strange attempt made through the Portuguese ambassador to get possession of his person and carry him away having happily miscarried. Two bulls were fulminated at the head of Meindaerts, the first from the deathbed of Clement XII., the second by Benedict XIV., who, on receiving the formal notice of his consecration, denounced him as "a child of unrighteousness, a degenerate son, a crafty wolf," with other polite epithets and many curses. In 1742 Bishop Varlet died, and the pressing necessity thus created for providing against the extinction of the episcopate was met by the appointment and consecration of De Hock to the see of Haarlem; and some years later, in 1758, the see of Deventer was also filled up, both with the sanction of the Government. Several attempts were now made to mediate between the Utrecht Church and the Court of Rome, and abundant evidence of the orthodoxy of the former was produced; but Rome insisted on a subscription to the bull Unigenitus, which the bishops could not conscientiously agree to, besides that it was forbidden by the Government. Nicolini, a Florentine nobleman who had interested himself much in the matter, was obliged at length to confess that "peace was impossible so long as the Jesuits, the enemies of God and of princes, survived."

In 1763 an important step was taken by the Utrecht hierarchy in summoning a Provincial Synod, the first held since 1565, just after the establishment of the archiepiscopate. The three bishops and nineteen deputies of the clergy were present, and five points were decided. The Nicene Creed and Creed of Pius IV., and the Expositio Doctrinae, sent to Benedict XIV., were set forth as containing the faith of the Church; certain opinions of the Protestant Le Clerc, and others of the Jesuits Hardouin and Borruget, were condemned; the Amor Patriæ of Neercassel, already referred to, was sanctioned and recommended; the Jesuit doctrines of rebellion and tyrannicide were condemned, and certain disciplinary matters settled. These decisions, according to the writer in the Catholic Tübinger Quartalschrift, produced a deep impression in the Church generally as to the orthodoxy of the inculcated communion and the exclusive responsibility of the Jesuits for its isolation from Rome. And even at Rome this feeling was openly expressed; the Acts of the Synod were approved by the Inquisition and Cardinals, and Clement XIII. agreed with their judgment; and though the Jesuits contrived to frustrate all attempts at a reconciliation, they could not for some time elicit from the Pope any formal condemnation of the Synod. It was not till two years afterwards that they succeeded in procuring a Papal decree declaring the Synod null and void, and characterizing its members as obstinate sons of perdition, perverse, godless, blind, &c. &c. Clement XIII. also issued the customary bull of excommunication three years later against Van Nieuwenhuyzen, the successor of Meindaerts in 1768. But next year he was himself succeeded by Clement XIV., who suppressed the Jesuit order, and would undoubtedly, had he lived longer, have come to terms with their much-enduring victims at Utrecht. He had indeed intimated as much, and a special ambassador, Count Dupas de Bellegarde, was sent from Utrecht, and the day for his audience with the Pope had been fixed. But the day before Clement was seized with the illness—whether due to natural causes or to poison must probably now remain for ever uncertain—from which he never recovered. His successor, Pius VI., was of the opposite school, and issued two violent bulls against the new Bishop of Haarlem, whose appointment was announced to him in 1778, besides publicly commencing a mendacious history of the Church of Utrecht by an ex-Jesuit, Mozzi. But the brave little Church still held its own through the revolutionary storms at the end of the eighteenth century. In 1797 James van Rhyn succeeded Nieuwenhuyzen, and received the usual anathemas from Pius VII.; but the subjection of Holland to France involved his Church in the most serious peril it had yet encountered since the separation from Rome. Louis Napoleon, the new King, was persuaded by his confessor that the "schismatical" hierarchy should be suffered to die out by forbidding any new appointments, and when shortly afterwards, in June 1808, the Archbishop of Utrecht died suddenly a few days after a very suspicious visit from a strange priest, and, according to the testimony of his physicians, of poison, the King refused permission for the election of a successor. Two years later the Bishop of Haarlem died, and the aged Bishop of Deventer, the sole remaining member of the hierarchy, was brought to death's door from a fall into the water, but eventually recovered. That same year, however, the King found it necessary to abdicate, and the Emperor Napoleon, who was engaged at that time in a quarrel with Rome, was disposed to look favourably on the claims of the protesting Church, but his ill-omened Russian campaign prevented his taking any steps in the matter. It was not till after the fall of Napoleon and the proclamation of the freedom of Holland in 1814 that the crisis was tided over and a successor to Van Rhyn elected, after a three years' vacancy of the see, in the person of Van Os, President of the Seminary and Vicar-General, who was consecrated on the 24th of April of that year, just a month before Pius VII.'s triumphant entry into Rome, where his first act was to revive the Jesuit order, forty-one years after its suppression by Ganganeli. A few years more and its last surviving members would have been dead, and the revival impossible.

The third period of the history of the Church of Utrecht opens with the consecration of Van Os, but there were still grave difficulties to contend with. William I., King of Holland and Belgium, united by the Treaty of Vienna, was anxious to break off all the traditions of the old republican Government, and therefore to get rid of the national episcopate; and the see of Haarlem was kept vacant for five years, till at last the Archbishop himself filled it up without the Royal sanction. This time the Court of Rome omitted the customary malediction, but found means to induce the Government to refuse its recognition to the new bishop, and did its utmost also to attain its ends by the creation of an Ultramontane literature in Holland, and the foundation of a special brotherhood pledged to the destruction of the obnoxious communion. When Leo XII. sent a nuncio to Holland, the bishops came to the Hague to wait upon him, but were not admitted. In 1825 Van Os was succeeded by Van Santen, and the Government this time compromised matters by acknowledging him as Archbishop ad, but not of, Utrecht. Both he and the new Bishop of Deventer received their excommunicatory greetings from Leo XII., and a joint declaration against the validity of these bulls was issued by the Archbishop and his suffragans, addressed to all the archbishops, bishops, and clergy of the Catholic Church. Shortly afterwards followed what seems to have been the first and last instance of any conciliatory overtures on the part of Rome. Mgr. Capaccini, whose liberality, statesmanship, and honesty are highly commended by Bunsen, was sent to hold an interview with the Archbishop of Utrecht. A detailed record of their conversation has been preserved, and is quoted by Professor Nippold; and a very instructive document it is, and well deserving careful perusal. The one point at which Capaccini laboured was to induce the Archbishop to sign the notorious formulary of Alexander VII., condemning the five propositions ascribed to Jansen as contained in the Augustinus and "en unicus auctoritas," which he at first represented as a "triviality" and "a mere form." The Archbishop replied that forms have a meaning, and that, being convinced by a careful perusal of the Augustinus that the condemned propositions were not to be found there, he could not conscientiously swear that they were, on the authority of the Pope, for no authority of Pope or Church could alter facts; whereupon Capaccini tried to shake his resolution by a very "wonderful parable." Suppose, he said, a child who had been forbidden by his father to look into a certain room had seen through the keyhole that it had a green table-cloth, and had been afterwards told to sign an inventory describing the cloth as red, he would be bound to do so; for he could not make any use of the knowledge gained by an act of disobedience; nor would this involve any untruthfulness, because he ought to assume that he had been deceived by some optical delusion. In the same way it was wrong for any one to read Jansen's book after it had been condemned, and it was the duty of any one who had read it to assume that he was mistaken if he could not discover what the Pope declared to be contained there. However, neither this ingenious argument, nor the reiterated but somewhat inconsistent assurance that the whole thing was a mere form, could move the Archbishop to violate his conscience. "A drop of ink, and in two seconds all is settled," said Capaccini. "I cannot call God to witness that I believe what I do not believe," replied Van Santen, and so, with many maledictions from the foiled and indignant diplomatist, he went his way, and the breach was not healed. The Opposition bishops of the present day have been more accommodating in going through the "mere form" of subscribing to Papal infallibility, while the German, like the Dutch, Old Catholics have preferred to use language as the expression and not the disguise of thought.

The rest of the tale must be compressed into a few words. In 1853 Pius IX. introduced a Papal hierarchy into Holland, Utrecht and Haarlem being purposely selected as two of the sees. The legitimate bishops addressed an official protest to the Pope, briefly recounting the true state of the case, and requested the Government not to recognize the intrusive hierarchy; and this request was so far successful that their own titles as bishops of their respective sees were again formally acknowledged. Three years later they again made a joint protest against the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, and set forth in a weighty and learned treatise the absence of Scriptural or traditional authority for the definition. Van Santen died in 1858, and was succeeded by Henry Loos, who was consecrated in September of that year, and still holds the see of Utrecht. The present Bishop of Haarlem was consecrated in 1865, when he addressed an earnest and successful appeal for the restoration of communion with the Holy See to Pius IX., who in return "condemned and annulled" all his power this new election of "unlawful bishops."

directed to the Catholics of Holland. And so matters continue to this day. What gives an additional interest to this community which has so manfully held its position against terrible odds and under such various assaults of violence and fraud for one hundred and seventy years, is the solid learning and profound spirit of piety in its prelates and pastors which has gained them universal sympathy and respect, as well from Catholics as Protestants, beyond their own pale. Professor Nippold, their latest historian, and an advanced Protestant, admits that they are "Catholic to the backbone both in doctrine and worship," but cannot repress his hearty admiration of the pure morality which pervades their whole system of faith and practice. In a supplementary section he gives us the correspondence of the present Archbishop with the German Old Catholics, previously to his agreeing to come and confirm for them, which contains abundant proof, if any were needed, of the strict orthodoxy, in a Roman Catholic sense, of the Church which Rome so haughtily repudiates. The Archbishop required of his petitioners a formal proof of their genuine Catholicity, signified by their assent to the Creed of Pius IV., before consenting to act for them, and the more so because a similar application had formerly been made to Utrecht by the followers of Ronge, "who usurped the name of Catholics." He expresses himself as uniting in their desire for a reform of the Church, but not, as in the days of Luther, wrought in defiance of legitimate authority, which "would be only a second edition of the so-called Reformation." Undoubtedly, as Nippold observes, it is the conservative side of the Old Catholic movement that will receive support from Utrecht. But this is not the place to speculate on the future of the double revolt against Roman autocracy now in progress within the pale of the Roman Catholic Church. It is enough to have called attention to an episode in ecclesiastical history which stands alone in the past, and which is only now beginning, after nearly two centuries of forced but not ofttimes isolation, to mingle in the common stream of the religious life of the present.

THE CHANSON DE ROLAND.*

M. LÉON GAUTIER'S new edition of the Chanson de Roland is a work which reflects the greatest credit upon French erudition, and which deserves a much more detailed notice than we can bestow upon it in the space at our disposal. We shall endeavour, however, to enumerate briefly its principal merits.

"La France possède, depuis plus de huit siècles, une Épopée religieuse et nationale." Such are the first words of our author's introduction; he repudiates in the distinctest manner the well-known saying so often (erroneously) ascribed to Voltaire, "Les Français n'ont pas la tête épique"; and he attempts to show that the Chanson de Roland combines all the qualities which characterize the true epic poem. Already in a previous work, as yet unfinished (Les Épopées françaises), M. Léon Gautier had enumerated the various qualities of the old chansons de geste, especially those which belong to what is called the cycle of Charlemagne; he had described their importance from the threefold point of view of history, philology, and literature, and had proved how and why he deemed them superior to the metrical romances which have for their subject the exploits of King Arthur. But the numerous works comprised under the general title "La geste du roi" are not all of equal worth; and from the long list, which includes such poems as "Alicamps," "Huon de Bordeaux," "L'arçue la Duchesse," &c., the Chanson de Roland stands out pre-eminently by qualities which ought to secure for it a distinguished place side by side with the Iliad and the Hamayana, and very far above so artificial a poem as the Æneid. We are inclined to think that M. Gautier has taken too little notice of the question of style, which, after all, is a very important one in a literary production; and there is no doubt that the diction of Homer, Dante, and Milton has contributed largely to immortalise their respective poems, while for the same reason the Chanson de Roland in its original form must ever address itself to a relatively limited circle of readers. In other respects it can fairly be compared with the great epics that are so familiar to us; Roland himself has much of the character of Achilles about him, Charlemagne is as wise as the ἀνὴρ ἀνδρῶν ἀρχαῖος, the Duke Naimue reminds us of Nestor, and the subject of the poem appealed to the national feelings of the old Franks quite as much as the siege of Troy did to the patriotism of the Greeks.

Another interesting question connected with the work before us refers to its origin. M. Gautier has sifted it with the utmost care, and he has no difficulty in proving that the spirit of the old chansons de geste, including the Chanson de Roland, the military and political atmosphere by which, so to say, they are surrounded, and the general ideas they represent, betray a Germanic origin. As M. Gaston Paris remarks (Revue critique, June 13, 1868), "L'épopée française, c'est l'esprit germanique dans une forme romane." There is a wide difference between this opinion and the absurd system of Dr. Hugo Mayer (Abhandlung über Roland), who, maintaining that the French metrical gestes derive immediately and materially from the Scandinavian and Teutonic traditions, would fain make us believe that "the French legend of Roland is nothing else but a modified version of a myth relating to the ancient god Hrafnir or Rolden."

It can be proved that during the course of the ninth and tenth centuries the story of Rouessour was widely circulated throughout France; wandering jongleurs already went from castle to castle, from town to town, singing how the King Marculd concluded with the traitor Ganelon that infamous bargain which the patriotism of the middle ages compared to the agreement made by Judas with the Pharisees of old; they then described in glowing colours the great Charlemagne avenging the catastrophe of his nephew upon the Saracens, whom he cut to pieces, and upon Ganelon, whom he condemned to an ignominious death. But as far we have nothing to deal with except oral traditions; the important thing is to know by what process the Chanson de Roland has reached us in the shape it now assumes in the editions of M. Gidel, M. Francisque Michel, and finally of M. Léon Gautier. Here two different theories meet us; the one maintained by M. Paul Meyer, who thinks that the various gestes were written down immediately from traditions, sometimes contemporaneous, sometimes remote; the other, upheld by M. Gautier, M. Guizot, and M. Gaston Paris, who suppose that each legend, before it was embodied in a metrical romance, found utterance in a series of short popular songs or ballads, to which our author gives, for convenience sake, the name of contes. These various contes, subsequently revised, polished, and corrected, were put together and harmonised so as to form one artistic whole, whilst at the same time each episode could, and most probably would, be sung separately, according to the taste of the audience before which the jongleur had to display his narrative talents. We ought to say here that M. Gautier does not think that the "rhapsodies" were actually soldered together in the original form which they affected at first; but rather that it was their spirit and essence which the trouvères reproduced when composing the chansons de geste. "Nos premiers épiques," he observes, "n'ont pas eue de développement matériellement, des cantilènes préexistantes. Ils se sont seulement inspirés de ces chants populaires; ils en ont seulement empruntés les éléments traditionnels et légendaires; ils n'en ont pris que les idées, l'esprit, la vie. Ils ont trouvé le reste." Without entering here into the details of the argument by which M. Gautier supports his view of the contes theory, we must say that it appears to us extremely probable, and that a poem like the Chanson de Roland could scarcely belong to the class of compositions of which Holgiarius, Bishop of Meaux, in the ninth century said, "Carmina publicum iuncta rusticatam per omnium peno volitabat ora."

The MS. of the Chanson de Roland may be divided into two classes. The first comprises two old codices giving the original text of the poem, and preserved, the one in the Bodleian Library (Digby, 23), the other in the library of St. Mark at Venice. Notwithstanding a great many omissions and blunders ascribable to the ignorance of the copyist, the Bodleian MS. is the better of the two; the Venice MS., transcribed by a man who has Italianised the French poem in a deplorable fashion, gives us only the first 3,682 lines of the primitive geste. After that portion of the work, we find a reproduction of one of the numerous résumés which circulated from the thirteenth century downwards, and which contained arrangements, amplifications, and other modifications of the original poem. These résumés, to the number of six, constitute the second class or family of MSS. They cannot of course claim the same authority as those we have previously described; but they often supply excellent readings, and are of much use in helping M. Gautier to fill conjecturally several lacunæ existing in the Bodleian and Venice codices. These corrections have been printed in italics in the supplement to the present edition.

We shall not stop to notice our editor's remarks on the versification of the Chanson de Roland, and the excellent résumé he gives us of the rules of prosody which governed mediæval French. Passing from the structure of each line to the general character of the stanzas or lignes, as they are called, we observe certain of these stanzas where the same ideas are repeated, nearly in identical words, although with different assonances; e.g. the dialogue between Marculd and Ganelon (st. xl, xli, xlii), the descriptions of Durandal (st. clxxii, clxxiii, clxxiv), &c. Here again various opinions have been propounded to explain these repetitions. M. Fauriel imagined that the scribe, having under his eyes several readings, instead of selecting the best, copied them all in succession, without taking the trouble to make a choice. M. G. Paris is inclined to believe that the different redactions of the same stanza generally correspond to different historical traditions; thus the two following lines of the stanza cxxxix.—

Ami Rollant, jo m'en irai en France;
Cum jo serai a Lotu en ma cambre—seem to be in contradiction with the introductory lines of stanza cxxxix:—

Ami Rollant, prezous, juventes bele,
Cum jo serai ad Ais en ma cambre.

M. Gaston Paris (Histoire poétique de Charlemagne) sees in the former of these couplets a Capetian, and in the latter a Carolingian, origin. Speaking generally, it is impossible to offer a solution applicable to all the instances of what M. Gautier calls réductions similaires. Some apparent repetitions are really developments of an idea the importance of which well justified a certain copie fundi; in other cases M. Gaston Paris seems to have found out the true answer to the objections raised by critics; finally, with reference to the passages just quoted, it is absolutely unnecessary that we should admit the hypothesis of a twofold redaction arising out of political or dynastic circumstances.

Que d'invençables! [M. Gautier exclame.] Et n'y a-t-il pas une explication cent fois plus naturelle? Dans ce passage de notre poème, Charles pense à son retour en France; il passera d'abord à Laon avant d'arriver à Aix, et, dans ces deux villes, on verra successivement s'inscrire auprès de lui de Roland, son neveu, qui est mort. Voilà qui est simple et vrai!

It is well known that the authorship of the Chanson de Roland is a point which has never been satisfactorily explained. With the usual rashness which characterizes his conclusions, M. Génin ascribed the composition of the poem to a trouvère of the name of Théroutde or Thuroid; but his only evidence for so doing was the last line—from which it is impossible to do more than affirm that the "geste" in question was either composed by a poet called Thuroid, or merely sung by a jongleur, or even only transcribed by a humble copyist bearing that name. If, however, the real Simon Pure cannot be positively identified, it is easier, on the other hand, to determine of what country he was the native; and this M. Gautier has done in the most ingenious and, to our mind, satisfactory manner. The Oxford MS. is written in the Anglo-Norman dialect, and thus at the beginning of our inquiry we find ourselves in possession of a fact which we must not neglect, although it should not be made too much of, for the person who transcribed the MS. might have thrown into his own language the original with which he had to deal. But we have to notice, further, that throughout the whole poem constant stress is laid upon the festival of Saint Michel du Péril. On that anniversary Charlemagne holds a solemn rejoicing to celebrate the submission of the King Marsile and the conclusion of the war; at the moment of Roland's death an earthquake occurs, which is felt from "Saint-Michel del Peril josqu'à Reims"; finally, the last angel who visits the hero in his dying moments is "Saint Michel del Peril." Now this name immediately suggests St. Michael's Mount in the Avranches district of Normandy, where the Bollandist historians tell us that St. Aubert, eleventh Bishop of Avranches, complying with a direction given to him by the Archangel, built a church "in monte Tumba . . . ad montem Sancti Michaelis de periculo maris." From these circumstances we are justified in believing, with M. Léon Gautier, that the author of the Chanson de Roland probably belonged by birth to that part of Normandy whither pilgrims during the whole mediæval epoch flocked assiduously for the purpose of imploring the protection of St. Michael upon travellers who stood "in peril of the sea."

The geste of Roncevaux soon obtained a popularity which it deserved both from a literary and an historical point of view, and unfortunately this popularity led to the composition of a great amount of rubbish. Let us name, for instance, the well-known chronicle ascribed to Archbishop Turpin. A praiseworthy desire of exalting the character of Roland induced the author, or rather the authors, of this wretched trash to compose their narrative, but they altered completely the portrait of the hero, and made it a downright caricature. "Roland was a Christian," says M. Gautier; "the pseudo-Turpin transforms him into a schoolman. He argues, speechifies, symbolizes, and subtilizes; how much I preferred him when he was dealing with his sword those heavy blows which were more opportune and more useful! He says off by heart the treatise De Trinitate; I like better to see him in the thick of the fight, his arms red with blood. Then we find him offering up a prayer which extends over two pages; he pleased me more when he prayed in two words, holding out naively to God the glove of his right hand. He was thus a soldier, a Christian soldier; the pseudo-Turpin has transformed him into a churchwarden."

M. Gaston Paris, whom we have already had occasion to quote, wrote some years ago an excellent Latin essay on the Chronicle we are now discussing, and M. Gautier gives us a short résumé of it. The favour with which this wretched compilation was received appears from the fact that as many as fifty MS. copies of it are enumerated by M. Potthast in his Bibliotheca Historica; twenty of these codices are preserved amongst the collections of the Paris National Library. It is ascertained now that the Chronicle is the work of two authors, the former of whom lived about the middle of the eleventh century, whilst the latter wrote his portion of the narrative between the years 1109 and 1119. In reading the first five chapters we are struck by the circumstance that the anonymous author is thoroughly acquainted with Spain, and even with the history of the Saracens; the only French hero he introduces is Charlemagne; the sole object he has in view is the glory of the national saint of the Spaniards, St. James of Compostella; he never pretends to be the Archbishop Turpin, whom he only names once and in the third person. The writer of the last twenty-seven chapters, on the contrary, is a Frenchman; he borrows largely from the various chansons de geste the absurd tales which he would fain make us accept as history, and his principal aim is evidently to amuse his readers. From considerations which we cannot stop to develop here, it seems probable to M. Gautier that the author of the second part of the pseudo-Turpin was a clerk belonging to the diocese of Guy of Burgundy, Bishop of Vienne, in France, towards the beginning of the eleventh century, and whose brother Raymond was Earl of Galicia. Whilst on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. James of Compostella in the train of the prelate, he no doubt found the MS. containing the first five chapters of the Chronicle, and tacked his own nonsense on to them. At any rate, as M. Gautier observes, all the literary documents of the middle ages which treat of Roland and Roncevaux may be divided into two families, according as they follow the fables of the pseudo-Turpin or the legend of the chanson de geste.

The alterations introduced into the history of Charlemagne's nephew by the chroniclers of whom we have been speaking bear upon the substance of the narrative; we have said nothing of another class of modifications made in the style of the poem, and which are essentially literary in their character. We hope to examine these on a future occasion, when we may have an opportunity of pointing out more fully the merits of the Oxford MS., and of showing how we depend upon it for determining the primitive text of the celebrated chanson.

PLANCHÉ'S RECOLLECTIONS.*

WE have here two goodly octavo volumes full of amusing and often instructive gossip. And if no one can gossip more pleasantly, certainly few have a better right to gossip than Mr. J. R. Planché, who, if he has not exactly led a life of adventure, has experienced much and known many persons about which and whom it is difficult to talk without affording entertainment to a large class of readers. It may be fairly said that in the pages of his autobiography Mr. Planché comes before the public in four distinct characters. First, he is an accomplished man of the world, seventy-six years of age, who from youth has been familiar with the stage and mixed with the best literary and theatrical society. Secondly, he has been one of the most prolific dramatists of his day, having originated a species of drama with respect to which he has remained altogether without a rival. Thirdly, he is a distinguished archaeologist, having profited early by the instructions of Dr. Meyrick, and devoted himself especially to the study of costume. Fourthly, he has held for nearly twenty years the rank of Rouge Croix Pourl'Étoile in the Heralds' College, and has consequently paid official visits to foreign Courts when some potentate has been invested with the Order of the Garter. A gentleman who can be placed under so many categories, and who, like Mr. Planché, is blessed with either a very retentive memory or a very capacious note-book, has assuredly much to tell.

He was born in Old Burlington Street on the 27th of February, 1796. Both his parents, though born in London, were the children of French Protestant refugees, and he was originally intended to pursue his father's vocation of watch-making. This plan failing, he was articulated to a bookseller, under whose rule his theatrical propensities were soon developed. He acted at amateur theatres, and, with the view of creating for himself an original part, wrote a burlesque of the old Bombastes Furiosæ school, entitled Amoroso, King of Little Britain. Falling into the hands of Mr. Harley, this piece, to the surprise of its author, found its way to the boards of Drury Lane Theatre, where it was performed by an excellent company, with great success, in April 1818, being the first of upwards of a hundred and fifty acted works from the same prolific pen. By this success Mr. Planché did not gain a shilling, but it encouraged him to become a regular writer for the stage, and in August 1820 his melodrama, The Vampire; or, the Bride of the Isles, the first piece which gained him a permanent reputation, was brought out at the Lyceum, with Mr. T. P. Cooke as the Monster—a part in which the celebrated actor, who had not yet commenced his nautical career, afterwards created a swore in Paris. To sustain his character for accuracy of costume, Mr. Planché anxiously reveals the fact, that in the French drama from which his own was adapted a superstition peculiar to Eastern Europe had been transferred to the Highlands of Scotland, where it was totally unknown. In vain did he exhort the manager of the Lyceum to correct the absurdity. Scotch music was desired, Scotch dresses were in stock, so, in spite of all remonstrance, the Vampire, Scotch in France, remained Scotch in the London Strand.

In 1822 Mr. Planché was introduced to Mr. Charles Kemble, who had just succeeded to the management of Covent Garden, to which theatre he attached himself for six seasons. Here he produced his first opera, Maid Marian, to which Bishop composed the music, and which affords him the opportunity of making a remark on the relations between the novelist and the stage. The opera was based on a novel by Mr. Peacock, the property of a bookseller of Bond Street, who threatened to prevent its performance as an infringement of copyright. Thus was raised a vexed question concerning which opinions vary even at the present day. Mr. Planché considers that a drama based on a novel is an advertisement of the latter, for which the novelist or his publisher ought to be rather grateful than otherwise. To show that he is not singular, he cites the instance of Sir Walter Scott, who encouraged the dramatic adaptation of his own works, and records the fact that after the success of Maid Marian he had piles of novels sent to him both by authors and publishers for that very purpose. The free-trade argument is thus formulated. The author is especially on the safe side; for if the adaptation is good, and the piece successful, he has the chief glory and a brisk sale for his book; whereas, if it fails, the dramatist is the sufferer in purse as well as in reputation. On the other side are urged the cases of the novelist who wishes to dramatize his own novels and of him who does not wish to see them dramatized.

at all. These cases, Mr. Planché contends, are so very exceptional that they prove the rule; but he considers that the permission of the novelist should be "courteously entreated" before his work is touched.

That reformation of theatrical costume which honourably distinguishes modern managements clearly originated with Mr. Planché, who, through all his theatrical vicissitudes, has been true to the core as an archaeologist. John Kemble had abolished the half-dig of Brutus and the gold-laced suit of Macbeth, which his predecessors had tolerated; but his improvements were based upon no defined principle, and so long as a costume was not after the fashion of the actual age, he did not think it mattered much to what particular reign or country it belonged. Thus the whole series of acted Shakspearian plays the scene of which is laid in England, King Lear and Henry VIII. both included, were dressed in habits of the Elizabethan era. Mr. Planché, though at this time rather a sentimental than an erudite archaeologist, felt that there was something wrong in such arrangements, and fortunately made the acquaintance of Dr. (afterwards Sir Samuel) Meyrick, who had just published his Armour. Here began the real antiquarian education of Mr. Planché, and let us add of Covent Garden Theatre, where, in 1823, King John was revived under the gratuitous superintendence of the enthusiastic young reformer with immense success. Of the allegation that this reform in the article of costume has caused a subjugation of the drama to its accessories, Mr. Planché is well aware, and he grasps the difficulty with a firm hand. If it is understood that in a dramatic performance, as in a dramatic reading, the costume of a period is not to be shown, then by all means let the performers wear modern evening dresses; on the other hand, if there is to be some show of costume, let the representation be correct. To Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's opinion, that the era to which a piece belongs may be sufficiently indicated by certain conventional types of costume, though this is also the opinion of Mrs. Siddons, Mr. Planché is decidedly opposed, shrewdly asking what conventional costume should be selected for the leading personages in King John. To us it appears that Mr. Planché is in the right. The question between correctness and incorrectness of costume is by no means to be identified with the question between sufficient and excessive decoration. If all the characters in King John were clad in Chinese dresses, a pageant of crushing splendour might be the result; and glaring inaccuracy would thus perpetuate the evil of which excessive accuracy is, according to some, the supposed root.

It must, however, be borne in mind that Mr. Planché, now a herald by profession, was always one at heart; and when he reminds us that on the Lord Mayor's Day of 1824 his adaptation of old Rowley's comedy, A Woman Never Vexed, was produced at Covent Garden with the Lord Mayor's Show as an appropriate pageant, we suspect that the boundary between sufficient and excessive decoration was passed, and that the future Rouge Croix got the better of the dramatist, though doubtless City magnificence as it existed in the time of Henry VI. was copied to a nicety. One circumstance connected with the production of this play is very curious. Though in five acts it was performed without a prologue, and this was considered such a daring innovation that the terrified stage-manager predicted a demolition of the benches. Even by the middle-aged playgoer that conventional address to the audience which, totally distinct from the explanatory prologues of Euripides and Plautus, and closely corresponding to the preliminary speech of Terence, was expected by our fathers as a matter of course, is now an institution so totally forgotten that the very word "prologue" has changed its signification, and denotes a first act from which the second is separated by a considerable lapse of time. A pageant representing the Coronation of Charles X. on the 29th of May, 1825, must have been a job after Mr. Planché's own heart, for he went professionally to Rheims to make the drawings of the dresses and decorations, and witnessed all the ill-omened splendours of the occasion. The imitative Coronation took place at Covent Garden in the following July.

By writing the libretto for Oberon, the subject of which had been chosen by C. M. von Weber himself, and which was produced at Covent Garden in 1826, Mr. Planché took a position as a writer of English opera which circumstances prevented him from turning to due account. One of the most painful chapters in his book is that which contains the correspondence between him and Mendelssohn-Bartoldy. The great composer wanted to compose an opera for the English stage, and was pleased with Mr. Planché's undertaking to write the libretto, pleased also with the chosen subject, the "Siege of Calais." But when the book was in progress all sorts of objections were made, which friends will attribute to excessive refinement, and foes to unaccountable caprice, unless indeed the latter accept Mr. Planché's explanation that the musician, who stood pre-eminent in all the departments of his art except the dramatic, feared to enter into competition with operatic favourites. We shall not express an opinion on a controversy which perhaps will be hotly discussed on both sides; but we cannot help owning that the correspondence between the composer and the librettist strongly reminds us of the conduct of Julia towards the sempstress, described by Fathom in Sheridan Knowles's Remouillage. The letters begin with 1838, and continue far into 1839, belonging to a period when, under the management of Mr. Bunn, the music of opera was constantly wedded to the most trashy verse that ever disgraced the stage of a civilized country. The written records of English opera, if Mr.

Planché had improved his position as a typical dramatist, would have been far different from those which we now possess.

In December 1829 Mr. Planché was elected a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and in the following February the Garrick Club was opened with a dinner, at which the Duke of Sussex presided, while the general company included the majority of the principal dramatists and actors then living. A most important event in the life of our dramatist was the opening of the Olympic Theatre in January 1831, by Madame Vestris. Here, with the burlesque Olympic Break, in the composition of which Mr. Planché was assisted by the late Mr. Charles Dance, commenced that series of pieces with which, in the history of the drama, his name will be chiefly associated. It was by writing a burlesque of the Bombastes school—that is to say, a bewigged mock tragedy—that he commenced his career; it was by following in the path indicated by Midas, and dramatising the myth of Pandora, that he became the originator of modern extravaganzas. Every Christmas was signalized by a mythological burlesque from the same hands, until Greece was changed for Fairyland, and Mr. Planché, rummaging out an adaptation of a French piece based on Perrault's well-known tale, and entitled Riquet à la Houppe, brought it out in 1836 at the Olympic. When Madame Vestris, having quitted Wynd Street, became the manager of Covent Garden, she found pantomime indispensable, and Mr. Planché's fairy pieces, which he now wrote alone, were produced not at Easter, but at Christmas. The list of them continues through a subsequent engagement of Madame Vestris and Mr. Charles Mathews at the Haymarket, and their management of the Lyceum, which commenced in 1847, and terminates at the Olympic, under the management of Mr. Wigan, which began in 1853. Perrault exhausted, the plots were chiefly taken from the stories of the Countess d'Aulnoy; and it is worthy of note that the gradually developed picture which is now known everywhere as a "transformation scene" was first exhibited at the Lyceum in 1849, not in a pantomime, but in Mr. Planché's Christmas piece, the Island of Jewels, the painter being Mr. William Everley. The technical word, "transformation scene" we should observe, was first applied to this description of picture when it was transferred from burlesque to pantomime, and refers not to the changes which it comprises, but to the circumstance that it is shown at that point of the pantomime when the characters of the introduction are supposed to be transformed into those of the harlequinade.

A few years ago burlesque became so serious a nuisance that we may seem to pay Mr. Planché a doubtful compliment by tracing it to him as its origin. But here is a case in which the father is by no means to be visited with the sins of his children. Mr. Planché wrote fanciful pieces, interspersed with music, for the employment of real artists—Madame Vestris, Mr. Charles Mathews, Mr. J. Bland, Miss Priscilla Horton, Mr. F. Robson—and is wholly irresponsible for the grotesque dances, the slang, and the exhibition of talentless beauty, which have wrought such mischief to the stage. If we may judge him by his works, his mind naturally takes two directions—one that of mediæval archaeology, and the other that of the courtly fairyland depicted by Madame d'Aulnoy, whose tales he has carefully edited. His profundity in folklore, in that species of learning which dates from the labours of the Brothers Grimm, we should be disposed to doubt; but that particular aspect which belongs to fairies, when they appear not as objects of popular belief, but as good subjects for fanciful tales such as graceful ladies may write, has for him a peculiar fascination. His comedies and farces are mostly adaptations, but his farces fantastiques, with the exception of the first, are completely his own, and there is more poetry than fun in his treatment of a chosen material. He has even tried to extend the domain of the fanciful drama beyond its ordinary limits; he has tried to introduce the French revue, the speaking harlequin, familiar to Paris in the days of Louis XIV., and the comedy of Aristophanes; and though in these innovations he has not been very successful, they serve to illustrate a marked idiosyncrasy. The vulgar and the sensual are abhorrent to his nature, but to the free play of fancy he would set no bounds.

The account of Mr. Planché's visits to foreign Courts in his heraldic capacity is perhaps the least interesting portion of his work. It is necessarily too brief to afford much instruction, and is about as amusing as a Court Circular. For his merits as an archaeologist, save when connected with the theatre, we must refer to his other publications, but we would not let the fact be ignored that the conversion of the Tower of London from a storehouse of palpable lies into a respectable Museum is the result of his industry and zeal. To the portions of his book which will chiefly interest the general reader we have scarcely adverted at all, simply because we know not how to deal with them. So many and so good are the anecdotes he relates, that two or three could not be taken from the rest by any process more critical than the toss of a halfpenny. We will only state that he is perfectly familiar with stories already in print, and scrupulously avoids beaten ground. That nothing may be wanting to the attraction of his volumes, they are adorned with several facsimiles of quaint sketches by Thackeray, Alfred Crowquill, and Maclean. Nay, one thing is wanting. While engaged on the work of pictorial illustration, Mr. Planché might have given us the portrait of himself.

MY GARDEN.*

IN one sense this may be called a great book, in another a small one. It is great in that its author has endeavoured, so to speak, to catch Nature, animate and inanimate, in a trap of some seven acres and a half, and to chronicle all its everyday features and operations with a sort of Boswellian fidelity; it is small, in that these seven and a half acres are the little corner of Beddington Park and of Wallington Hamlet in Surrey, whereof Mr. Smee is the possessor, and to which he is wont to repair from the closer atmosphere of the City; so that, perhaps not unnaturally, his account of "my garden" is one of the most egotistically written productions we ever remember to have set eyes upon. A facile and fluent pen, which seldom stings its course for doubtful syntax or to verify quotations, enables him to go off at score when he is describing such features of his variously-disposed nutshell as the fern-glan (p. 40), which reads for all the world like a paragraph of one of George Robins's advertisements; the pear-tree walk which consists of two hundred kinds of pears; the Alpinery, a feature more successful in its idea than in its name; or the croquet-ground, which is an oblong with rounded corners, "selected" as most croquet-grounds would be were it feasible, "for the partial shade which noble elms afforded from the sun in the afternoon, a time at which this game is usually played," and which hardly needs for its clearer conception the engraving which shows how in "my garden" we stick our hoops—much as other people do. The author views his little paradise through his own magnifying-glass, and dignifies all his hobbies by the most high-sounding names, as may be seen by the ascription of the epithet "crystal" to a very mild waterfall at the boundary of his garden, which flows to Mr. Smee's eye "like a sheet of glass" under a singularly prosaic and cookney bridge. In truth the records of "my garden," while meritoriously minute, are strangely out of proportion to their commonplace character. A royal octavo volume of above six hundred pages is devoted to the history of what Mr. Smee's "angulus iste" has been, we had almost said, since the Flood, and of what his own hands and taste and ingenuity have made it.

It would be unbecomingly to deny that amidst the vast quantity of "small beer" chronicled in these six hundred pages there are a few shrewd suggestions, and here and there a bit of practical experience. The danger is that these will escape notice in so bulky a volume; but it is some consolation that, on whatever branch of horticulture one may wish to dwell, there is some little book that tells all that is needed much better and more pleasantly. Roses, for example, may be studied far more satisfactorily in Mr. Hole's "Little Book"; trees and shrubs in Grigor on Arboriculture; "fungi" in Badham or Berkeley; and Alpine plants in Mr. William Robinson's work on the subject. And the total of information which the keenest inquirer could extract from the mass of matter congested into Mr. Smee's book would, we are certain, be found infinitesimally small, as regards value and novelty, in comparison with that contained in the just published half-yearly volume of the new gardening paper, the Garden, published by Mr. Robinson. What we do gather from Mr. Smee's account of his garden, with its valuable accessories of good printing and wonderfully good illustrations, is sorely marred by a pretentiousness which divers literary blemishes show to be hollow, and by rash experiments on the patience of the ordinary reader. His style savours strongly of grandiloquence, qualified by an affectation which calls vegetables "vegetals," and by occasional slipshod—e.g., where he says "his garden is an experimental garden, designed to obtain information." No doubt it is very fine to controvert the theory of the parent plant becoming worn out, as in the case of Ribston and Golden Pippins, by the instance of the Jargonelle, which Mr. Smee tells us has "been propagated from the time of the Romans in the past, and so may be continued till that indefinite period when the New Zealander of the future may be supposed to swallow up the English, as the Americans now do the Indians." Yet it were to be wished that one who would have himself thought an authority upon the horticultural literature of the Romans had taken the trouble to impress his readers a little more with the accuracy of his research as to the mention of fruits, flowers, and herbs by the most familiar Augustan poets, and with the soundness of his acquaintance with the Latin language. Mr. Smee contents himself with citing Horace's opinion of the digestibility of lettuce as from "Satira IV.," and his mention of "chicorea levesque malva" as from Ode 31. Would he be surprised to learn that Horace wrote more than one book of Satires, and several books of Odes? In p. 131 he betrays a graver ignorance of the classics in quoting, as from Virgil, this passage about "apium," or parsley, which he prints so as to convince us that he takes it for an hexameter—

Apium igitur inter herbas coronarias memorandum est.

And in p. 413 he cites, as from the works of Virgil, the lyric line, "Dispicit nectis phyllis coronas," which a fourth-form boy might have told him came from Horace. But this is not so damaging a proof of want of scholarship as the use in p. 356 of a hybrid compound which will dismay the merest tire in the Latin and Greek languages. When Mr. Smee takes upon him to discuss the edibility of fungi he might legitimately call Agaricus-cyren "mycorrhiza," but he has hit upon a more recondite and uncommon substitute. Having read of "anthropophagus," and knowing that "fungi" is the genitive singular of fungus, he has moulded a compound, as he thinks, out of the Latin and the Greek upon a misconceived analogy, and literally printed the word "surgi-pophagista."

We cannot find much in the details which the author of My Garden sets down from his experience to compensate for literary blundering and bad taste. We look, for instance, at the chapter on "Grafting," and fail to find any new light upon the subject, or anything to show that he has studied the handy French treatise of M. Baltet, or the papers upon the same subject in the Garden. In the chapter on "Principles of Gardening" there is a great deal of philosophizing at second-hand, with just one or two such matters of fact as that at Florence "rotten wood" takes the place of peat for rhododendrons and azaleas; that "the best mode of supplying needful food to plants is to use the excreta of animals"; and that "yet many so water asparagus or cabbage-beds with a solution of putrid animal matter that these vegetables may become offensive." Perhaps the clearest case of incapacity to discern what is worth chronicling, and what not, is to be found in the chapter on "Gardening Tools." The tools used in My Garden, and engraved, no doubt, at some expense in its pages, are one and all familiar to the merest novice in gardening. The spud, the drainer's spade, and the pickaxe, figured in p. 57, are implements seen every day in all parts of the country. Does Mr. Smee really think that in any garden—letting alone "my garden"—a wheelbarrow and a handbarrow can be dispensed with? Or need he have enriched his pages with an engraving of Green's "Mowing-machine," seeing that it figures in each of the hundred and one circulars which fill the post-bags of all possible buyers and readers of Mr. Smee's work? Under the head of Glass-houses and Structures, bathos is reached in a description and drawing of the common square iron-framed hand-glass (fig. 90); and for our own part we fail to see anything new, except the name, in the cheap glass structure, lowered, drained, and water-level permitting, four and a half feet into the ground, which he calls "the Poor Men's House." At a time when owners of walled gardens have been reduced to despair by their oft-mocked hopes of wall-fruit, we are loth to accept in full Mr. Smee's discouraging experience as to Orchard Houses, although his calculations of the relative value and labour of wall and orchard-house fruit-growing are entitled to the credit of seasonableness, as is his suggestion that paraffin oil-lamps are likely to be found a useful anti-frost agent in glass houses. It is disappointing too, or would be were the weight of authority on his side, to find the author of My Garden depreciating the "cordon" "as an idle vanity unworthy of scientific horticulture," "as a fanciful conceit rather than a practically useful contrivance"; but we may console ourselves by learning that this is the testimony of one who admits that "he has seen trees so trained covered with fine fruit in France"; and of one, too, so "dispar sibi" that in the same page in which he sneers at the cordon he justifies forcing the "early Juneating apple in a pot, to be shown at the end of May," on the ground that "though a vanity, many vanities which pass for pleasures are more stupid." It is characteristic of the author that his own plans are never quite "vanities," at least in his own judgment. Else we might have thought he would have foregone the pleasure of recording his plan for protecting the pear-crops in spring—a grand conception, no doubt, had it been suffered to come to the birth:—

I once [he writes] thought of trying an experiment by covering my pyramids with cushions. For this purpose I went to a large manufacturer, but could not agree upon a reasonable price. On a sudden the vendor said, "I beg your pardon, sir, but what possibly can be your object in wanting to buy so many cushions?" "To cover my fruit trees," was the reply. Whereupon the dexterity of the manufacturer was great, as he declared that their use for such an object would cast a lasting ridicule upon the article and injure its sale.

It is not wonderful that a writer who holds this stillborn project worth recording should equally enjoy telling us that the "solanum anthropophagorum," one of the capsicum tribe, is used by the savages as a relish and digestive condiment for human flesh, which is cruder when plain roast or boiled; that he plants a little "absinthe" in his garden, in order to point out to his friends in England the danger of introducing into this country a drug so extensively pernicious in France; and that "rhubarb is very much used in London for champagne at balls. It is, however, not wholesome, and frequently disagrees with the stomach." "Persons," he adds, "should always be on their guard against rhubarb." We should think so, especially at supper-parties. This sort of garrulosity pervades the whole book. In a section on the worms of "my garden" Mr. Smee thinks it worth while to tell us "that at night after a fall of rain, the lob-worm or moth-worm comes to the surface, but leaves the end of its tail in its hole, and on the slightest noise rapidly withdraws." In another very short one about "Locusts," it is recorded that "we have locusts in our lakes. I have not determined the species, but one kind is possibly the 'horrida pinaria.'" As to salmon-fry, which have so little connexion with "my garden" or its worms, that he had to go to Scotland to see them on their pilgrimages from the sea to the sea, Mr. Smee takes the form of writing that upon the local magistracy. He is informed, "as undoubtedly certainly that the Herfordshire magistrates like them for trout-ponds, and therefore cannot judge accurately between salmon-fry and the fry of other fish." In fact, there is so much nonsense and self-indulgent book-making about the work that the good ideas in it are almost and another. One such is that of cultivating pyramids instead of standard rose-trees (p. 273); another that of rearing swans to devour the all-consuming water-weed Anacharis—a useful notion, borrowed from Erasmus Owen (p. 342). Another is, that lady-birds should be encouraged as allies in the destruction of the enormously prolific pest of "aphides" (p. 429); and another, that a piece of sulphur as big as a bean burnt once a week in the fruit-room is the best preservative against the oidium, or fungus, so destructive of kept fruit (p. 367). The drawback to this last is the smell of sulphur which clings to the fruit thus guarded. We have also one or two bits of curious natural history, such as that of the caddis-worm's cleverness in house-building (pp. 480-1), and the like. But the foolish egotism of the work sorely detracts from its merits, even as a compilation; and to originality it has not the ghost of a pretence. Superficial readers may dip into it, and fancy they see another Gilbert White, though minus his discrimination and tact. Ladies and children may not object to it for its pretty pictures, though amongst these are too many mill-wheels and mill-dams, and though the figures of apples and pears drawn to one-third of their diameter and uncoloured are of no manner of use. Practical people will seek, and find, everything they are likely to want in treatises of less pretension and more solid value.

THOMAS ON THE DEATH-WARRANT OF CHARLES I.

IN an interesting pamphlet, reprinted for private circulation, with corrections, from Notes and Queries, Mr. Thomas has examined the official narrative of the trial of Charles I. by the light of the original warrant, which, though familiar by facsimile since 1750, appears to have escaped the scrutiny of our best historians. As to this document being the one under which the King suffered no doubt can exist. "It came from the possession of Colonel Hacker, one of the three officers to whom it was addressed, when he was arrested in 1660, and by whom it was produced before the House of Lords, where it has ever since remained." We have heard of the custodian of a valuable collection of coins in Dublin remarking in answer to an inquiring visitor, "Faith, they're all in a bag"; but the Assistant Librarian of the House of Lords has already shown his sense of the value which documents, like other relics, derive from inspection. Readers of Macaulay will remember his recognition of Mr. Thoms's services in connexion with the original MS. of the Comprehension Bill, the progressive modifications of which were deciphered under the cancellations; nor have we forgotten the share he took in unearthing for the Ritual Commission the supposed lost MS. Prayer Book. Mr. Thoms's natural indisposition to believe anything except on good evidence, doubly sharpened by contact with pretended centenarians and not-doubted Princesses, is free from that proneness to overstate one's case which the habitual exercise of doubt begets in the minds of most literary sceptics.

The authorized report of the King's trial, entitled the True Copy of the Journal of the High Court of Justice for the Trial of King Charles I., was compiled by Phelps, the Clerk to the Commissioners, who had just before his appointment succeeded Elving as Clerk to the House of Commons. Phelps's minutes of their proceedings, which Nelson published in 1683, and which are reprinted in the State Trials, were produced before the House of Commons by an order of the 9th February, 1649, on the same day that "An Act for restraining and preventing the printing and publishing of the passages and proceedings of the High Court of Justice" was introduced. They commence on the 8th of January, 1649, with the first meeting of the Commissioners appointed under the second Ordinance for the trial of the King, and extend to their last meeting on the 30th, the morning of the execution. The history of the first Ordinance, which originated in a Resolution of the House of Commons of the 26th of December, and was rejected on January 3rd by the Lords, without a division, in a House of only twelve peers, does not require notice. The Commons, upon learning its rejection, determined, with closed doors, to dispense with the assistance of the other Chamber. Mr. Thoms's account of what followed, which is obviously taken from the introduction to the report in the State Trials, differs materially from the Commons Journals:—"On January 4. Master Garland presented to the House of Commons a new Ordinance for erecting a High Court of Justice for the trial of the King (the Lords having rejected the former one), which Ordinance was read a first, second, and third time, assented to and passed the same day; and it was ordered that no copy be delivered" (p. 4). The facts are briefly these:—The "new" Ordinance—probably the first one revived, for Rushworth describes it as an "expedient in substance like the former"—was prepared on the 3rd by a Committee who reported it during the same sitting to the House; it was then read a first and second time and referred to another Committee of twenty-four, to meet that afternoon in the Speaker's Chamber. On the 4th their report was received, and the Ordinance ordered to be engrossed, but the Clerk was forbidden to deliver any copies. The order for its engrossment appears to have been repeated the next day. On the 5th it was read a third time and passed. Two days later, on another entry missing, it was again read a third time; and, as if some lingering doubt still remained as to its validity, a special resolution was passed "that it be enacted for law." The number of Commissioners, fixed in the first Ordinance at 150, was now reduced to 115, and a comparison of the two lists might yield some interesting results. The same number of twenty was retained. Not half of the whole number ever attended at one sitting; but without speculating on the probable consequences had the remainder not confined their opposition to staying away, it is enough to note that the dissent of Downes alone, though finally overcome since his name appears on the warrant, sufficed to cause an adjournment of the Court on the 27th. Out of the fifty-three Commissioners who met for the first time on January 8, only thirty-seven are found to have signed the warrant fixing the 10th for the first meeting of the High Court. The trial actually began on the 20th in Westminster Hall before sixty-seven Commissioners, fifty-seven of whom had met earlier in the day in the Painted Chamber. Seventy were present on the 22nd, when the King repeated his refusal to plead, and seventy-one on the next day in Westminster Hall; Mr. Thoms's sixty-three is incorrect, that being the number present in the morning in the Painted Chamber when the King's default was recorded. After spending two days in privately examining witnesses "or abundant, for the further satisfaction of themselves," the Commissioners determined on Thursday, the 25th, to "proceed to sentence, and ordered a draught to be prepared, with a blank for the manner of the death." Sixty-two were present the next day when the draft sentence was agreed to and ordered to be engrossed; it was finally confirmed on the following morning in the presence of sixty-eight. Two of these, James Fennington and John Brown, do not appear to have proceeded with the rest to Westminster Hall, where sentence was pronounced; but the addition of Tho. Challoner made the total sixty-seven. After this, the Commissioners returned to the Painted Chamber, and appointed a Committee of five to make preparations for the execution. On Monday, the 29th, they met again to the number of forty-eight, and Phelps has thus recorded the proceedings on that morning:—

Upon Report made from the Committee for considering the Time and Place of the execution of the Judgment against the King, that the said Committee have resolved That the open street before Whitehall in a fit place, and that the said Committee conceive it fit that the King be there executed the morrow, the King having already notice thereof. The Court approved thereof, and ordered a Warrant to be drawn up for that purpose. Which said Warrant was accordingly drawn and agreed unto, and ordered to be engrossed; which was done, and signed and sealed accordingly.

The accuracy of this official minute Mr. Thoms impugns. A copy of the warrant follows, which we must reproduce, with italics to mark the blanks and erasures in the original:—

At the high Court of Justice for the trying and judgments of Charles Stuart King of England January XXIXth Anno Dñi 1649.

Whereas Charles Stuart King of England is and standeth convicted attainted and condemned of High Treason and other high Crimes And sentence upon Saturday last a pronounced against him by this Court to be put to death by the severing of his head from his body Of w<sup>ch</sup> sentence execution yet remaineth to be done These are therefore to will and require you to see the said sentence executed In the open Streets before Whitehall upon the morrow being the Thirtieth day of this instant Month of January between the hours of Ten in the morning and Five in the afternoon of the said day wth full effect And for so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant And these are to require All Officers and Souldiers and other the good people of this Nation to be assistings unto You in this service Given under our Hands and Seales

To Colonel Francis Hacker, Colonel Huncks and Lieutenant Colonel Phayre and to every of them.

Arranged in seven columns below follow the names of fifty-nine Commissioners, with seals attached; and, as we are in the region of doubt, we might suggest an examination of the seals, to ascertain whether they correspond with the signatures. The genuineness of the latter is not disputed, and the firm handwriting of Richd. Ingoldsbay, which Mr. Thoms has tested by other autographs of his in the Public Record Office, simply disproves Clarendon's story of Cromwell's having forcibly guided his pen.

The result of Mr. Thoms's investigations into the original warrant is to lead him to believe that it was not wholly signed on the 29th as the official statement records. "On the day of sentence," he says, "whatever that day was—and I am inclined to believe it was intended to sentence the King on the 26th and execute him on the 27th—opinions were probably divided, and the execution consequently postponed, until a larger number of signatures to the warrant for it had been obtained." The negative part of his criticism is unquestionably very strong. The existence of erasures on a document of such importance is sufficiently startling. The very date, the sixteenth, is superscribed, as are also the names of the three officers to whom the warrant is addressed, and "in a different hand." The words "to every," which are wrongly printed in italics, are in reality part of the original; but this circumstance is unimportant beyond showing that the warrant was addressed, before these erasures were made, to more than two. Again, while the official record gives a list of only forty-eight Commissioners at the meeting when the warrant purports to have been signed, the latter contains no less than fifty-nine signatures. This difference is further increased by the absence of the signatures of Alder, Aubrey, Lisle, and Love, all of whom were present on the 29th, and the omission of the two last is the more remarkable, since they were both members of the Committee, with Ineson, Harrison, Marten, and Boyd, which prepared the draft sentence on the 25th. Of these fifteen signers, not recorded as present on the 29th, the names of Danvers and Mauleverer occur seventh and tenth: John Moore, the next absentee on that day whose name appears, does not sign till forty-third. Had the forty-four signatures, out of the forty-eight Commissioners who are recorded as present on the 29th, been written consecutively, it might be conjectured that the remaining fifteen found on the warrant were picked up after the meeting that morning in the Painted Chamber, when, as Wayte stated in his evidence, "they were labouring to get hands for the King's execution at the door of the House"; but the interposition of Danvers and Mauleverer so early in the list discredits at once this theory and the official statement which supports it. Ingoldesby, whose name appears thirty-fourth on the list, was never present before the 29th; and unless therefore a blank had been left for his signature, it is clear that from his name to the end was clean parchment on that morning. Heveningham, who gave evidence that he protested "at the time of sealing," was not present on the 29th, when the warrant is stated to have been "signed and sealed"; but he attended the meeting on the 26th, when the sentence was agreed to; and from this Mr. Thoms not unreasonably infers that the work of signing and sealing, however partial, had commenced on that day—the utmost, as we understand, that he desires to establish. It is no disparagement of Mr. Thoms's inference to confess that it is less conclusive than his contradiction. The absence of A. on a given Monday, when a document bearing his name is officially stated to have been signed, operates of necessity more strongly to disprove that statement than the bare fact, however plain, of his attendance four days before to prove his having signed on the Friday. There is other evidence, however, to support this inference. Mr. Thoms has omitted to notice that, of the sixty-two Commissioners present on the 26th, no fewer than fifty-two have left their names on the warrant. That all of them actually signed on that day, though probably their assent was then obtained, is obviously not the case; since Sir J. Bouchier, one of the seven not then present but whose names appear on the warrant, signed as early as eighth in the list—a circumstance which goes to show that not more than seven signatures could have been attached that day, if, as we assume, the columns were filled in vertical order. The confession of Garland at his trial—the story of whose spitting in the King's face rests, by the way, on the evidence of only one witness, and, if credited at the time, would probably have ensured his execution—that he signed the warrant on the "day of sentence," would seem to refer to the 27th, the day when sentence was pronounced, rather than the 26th, when it was agreed on; but whatever the "day of sentence" was, it was certainly not the 29th.

The blank left for the day of execution, which Mr. Thoms conjectures was intended, from its size, to have been supplied by the word "twenty-seventh" instead of "thirtieth," shows that the engrosser, when he wrote the warrant, did not know what day "the morrow" would represent. The Committee appointed to arrange the time and place of the execution did not meet until after sentence was pronounced on the 27th. According to the official statement they recommended "the morrow" for the execution, and the warrant contains the same expression. But were those the ipsissima verba of their Report? If so, we must understand them to apply to the Monday—Sunday being considered a die non—unless it is assumed that the Sunday was intended, or that the phrase was suited to the 29th when the Report was adopted. If the process of signing, as Mr. Thoms supposes, had commenced on the 26th, the warrant must have been engrossed for signature before the Committee, according to Phelps, recommended the very expression it contains. Assuming Phelps's statement to be literally taken from the Report, did that Report take the words "the morrow" from the warrant, previously written, or did the warrant, as it should do, embody the actual terms of the Report? On the whole, it seems pretty clear that the warrant, at whatever time it first received signatures, was never wholly signed on one and the same day. We are inclined to think that the process of autograph-hunting began almost from the first. Tradition points to the Chantry Chapel in St. Stephen's Cloister and Chalonier's house in Clerkenwell as places where it was signed. Chalonier, at any rate, was not present on the 29th, though his name appears on the warrant. Mr. Thoms does not suggest that the Commissioners employed their pens on this document while keeping their fast on the 28th in the Chapel at Whitehall. But Whitlocks, in his Journal of January 26th, makes one statement, which we look to Notes and Queries to explain. "I met," he says, "with Mr. Prideaux and others at Mr. Lisle's house, about the Ordinance for settling the Court of Justice, and then it was drawn." Among the many reflections, however, which this "historic doubt" suggests, not the least curious is this, that an original document of such importance should have remained unnoticed, in spite of its accessibility, for more than two hundred years after the event for which it formed the sole authority occurred.

THE VICAR'S DAUGHTER.

DR. MACDONALD was never a strong writer, even in the beginning of his work and when his powers were freshest; but we did not expect to see him sink into such feeble glibness as his last two books have displayed. Wyffrid Cumbermède was gentle enough, but the Vicar's Daughter is a step below.

The Vicar's Daughter. An Autobiographical Story. By George MacDonald, F.R.S. 3 vols. London: Tinsley Brothers.

The one dealt at any rate with the outward semblance of a man, but when we come to the autobiography of a self-conscious, gushing young woman made up of sentimentality and platitudes, we go down into depths of bathos where every trace of manly feeling and common sense is lost, and where the only marvel is how even Dr. MacDonald, the high priest of literary effeminacy as he is, could have so entirely abandoned all masculine instinct and healthy perception of life. We grant him good intention in the work, and the desire to benefit the world by his preaching—the novels are essentially sermons in disguise; we grant him purity and delicacy; but when we have said this, we have said all we can in his praise. As an artist he is almost below criticism, having indeed laid aside every characteristic of the artist that he may indulge himself with less restraint in the slipshod which he prefers to careful creation. There is something also to our mind repulsive in the idea of a man writing as a woman; unless he takes up such a healthful breezy subject as Kate Country or the like. But the case is different when a man travesties himself as a weak-backed, hysterical young woman; a young woman who lets you know when she is going to have a baby, and when she has her baby, and what she feels when she has it—for, thanks to chloroform, Dr. MacDonald can be both imaginative and circumstantial in his description of his vicarious confinement, without fear of matronly ridicule; a young woman who gushes about her father, and the publisher "Mr. S.," and her husband "the great big huge brown bear," and who prattles to the public about her first dinner-party, when her cook, who somewhat paradoxically "has a genius for cooking," boils the sirloin and roasts the fowls; a young woman whose piety so interpenetrates her soul and body, that she says she seems to know God better for ever after, because her father, seeing her exhausted with the heat when in "an interesting condition," sets open a gate in the garden to give her more air. When a man condescends to trash of this kind it is time for him to lay aside his pen and find another occupation which may brace him up into something like normal masculinity again.

Before we go into a discussion of the story we would enter our protest once more against Dr. MacDonald's obtrusive piety. For as much reverence as we have for true religion, for the religion which makes men and women faithful, strong, and earnest, so much dislike do we feel for the pitiful maudlinisms which Dr. MacDonald offers to the world as piety. One of his two main theorems is the translation into eternal life of the soul of every bird and fish and animal that exists, as he propounded it in Wyffrid Cumbermède; or, as he puts it here, "When the cat kills the bird—as I have seen happen so often in our poor little London garden—God yet saves his bird from his cat." The second is his belief in the continual interposition of God in human affairs, so that everything comes about by the direct action, the arbitrary will, and distinct design of the Almighty, with the optimistic corollary that everything works for our good—our temporal good, as we understand it. To him there is no spiritual mystery over which to ponder in mute perplexity. God's laws, God's ways, His will, and His works are as the four corners of a map whereon Dr. MacDonald can trace to a line the solution of the most tremendous problems which bewilder man. He knows things that are hidden from the rest of the world and not set forth in the Bible, as, for instance, this same individual immortality of the birds and beasts. By the by, he does not say how far down he goes in the scale, and whether he includes sponges and corals and sea-anemones in his world to come, whether he gives the benefit of a doubt to the sensitive plant and the various fly-catchers of the vegetable kingdom. Such philosophy as his is always conveniently vague. A flourish of misty phrases does duty for a creed that would vanish into nothingness if stated with scientific exactness or argued logically. But then Dr. MacDonald would no doubt plead that he does not study scientific exactness or logic. He goes on the line of the heart, of feeling, of moral conviction; he abjures objective truth altogether, or scorns it as materialism; and certainly it is not half so sweet and pretty as the belief that when a cat eats a bird, God Almighty as the Father of the Universe looks on and snatches up the soul of the bird to eternal glory in heaven, the cat being bound to follow after when her time comes at the hands of cruel dogs or the makers of mutton-pies. If Dr. MacDonald finds comfort in such a phantasy of the mind, and in his belief in perpetual Divine manipulation of human affairs, no man need wish to disturb him; but a little more reticence, in dealing with these grave subjects, a little less gushing familiarity with the name of Deity, would, as it seems to us, both express more real reverence and prove less distressing to his readers.

The story of the Vicar's Daughter is very slight. It can scarcely be said to have a plot at all, being rather the weak prettiness of the sentimental young lady of whom we had a glimpse in the Seaboard Parish, Ethelwyn Walton, than a real story with a good central idea as its backbone. The introductory chapter is perhaps the richest in Dr. MacDonald's petshop of tales. The opening sentence strikes the keynote:—"I think that is the way my father would begin"; a phrase both faulty in grammar and full of the author's odd stumbling clumsiness which pervades the book. Then comes a paragraph on Mr. S., of whom, as Mrs. Fennel's husband is supposed to say, "the Vicar's Daughter is not like any other person." We never meet with better, for he is to find of great worth, but is never grateful at the abundance without cause, and at least he never says anything, although it makes a good deal of the types again after they are once set up. The next book published in the magazine was a novel, and it was in justice to him, a necessary consequence of his piety.

the why the Mamma T. should be left out, or even the printer's error, Mamma T., and for ourselves, being inclined to give every one his due, we would make a point of finding out the name of the poor little hard-worked devil, and give him too a niche in the Temple of Fame. Encouraged then by Mr. S., by her father, and by the "great big, huge brown bear," her husband, but confessing that she was "much afraid of writing nonsense"—what a pity it is that she is not always a deterring influence!—Ethelwyn Walton Percivale undertakes her task. After she has got out of the little entanglement of shyness and persuasion which makes up the first chapter, and after Mr. Blackstone has "burst into one of his splendid roars of laughter—for if ever a man could laugh like a Christian who believed the world was in a fair way after all, this was Mr. Blackstone"—Mrs. Percivale begins her narrative. We give the following extract to show the pretence of simplicity which Dr. MacDonald has adopted as his distinctive; the girlish references to her father, the meek wife's submission to her husband, and the insinuating colloquialisms, all being as essential to Dr. MacDonald's "later manner" as a love quarrel is to Mr. Thelpe, or as reiteration was to Mr. Dickens:—

I hope no one will think I try to write like my father, for that would be to go against what he always made a great point of—that nobody whatever should imitate any other person whatever, but in modesty and humility allow the seed that God had sown in her to grow. He said all imitation tended to breed and distort the plant, if it even allowed the seed to germinate at all; and if I do write like him, it will be because I cannot help it.

I will just tell how The Seaboard Parish ends, and perhaps that will put into my head how I ought to begin. I see my father does mention that I had then been Mrs. Percivale for many years. Not so very many though—five or six, if I remember rightly, and that is three or four years ago. Yes, I have been married nine years. I may as well say a word as to how it came about, and if Percivale doesn't like it, the remedy lies in his pen. I shall be far more thankful to have anything struck out on suspicion than remain on sufferance.

After our return home from Kilhaven, my father and mother had a good many talks about me and Percivale, and sometimes they took different sides. I will give a shadow of one of these conversations. I think ladies can write fully as natural talk as gentlemen can, though the bits between mayn't be so good.

After this we have an account of her marriage with the brown bear, when she cries as soon as she wakes on the wedding day, or, as she phrases it, "I confess the first thing I did when I knew myself the next morning was to have a good cry," and does not get up to dress, but lies and stares at the queer old crows on the chintz curtains, &c., &c. Then comes her "interesting condition," when she feels the heat, and is annoyed by a certain street cry; then the description of her confinement; and then the progress of her recovery, marked by stages, the first of which is that she begins to wash and dress her baby, and the second that she begins to order the dinners. Then ensue little tiffs and misunderstandings, as of old. For indeed, for such a pious and conscientious young person, Ethelwyn Walton Percivale is marvellously capacious and irritable. But as all her tempers end in her "having a good cry" as she nestles into her husband's arms, or flings herself at his feet with lavish peccavits, not much harm comes of them; and the amatory expectation, flavoured with fancy piety, is served out as generously as before.

The most wonderful person of the book is Miss Marion Clare, a charming and accomplished young lady who lives in a by-street off Tottenham Court Road among roughs and loose women whom she soothes into sobriety and domestic virtue, chiefly, as it would seem, by singing and playing to them, and by whom she is called "granma," and nothing else. We have been told ever since we were schoolboys writing round-hand that music hath charms to soothe the savage breast; but we somehow have not much faith in the most finely-modulated chords and syncopations as reformatory agents for London roughs. If a piano and a violin could settle the question, and act as stopgaps against our grim prisons, what a blessing it would be! We might educate a few grannies like Miss Clare, and settle them about the low and lawless districts at the cost of a few pounds, to the saving of many thousands. It would please classical scholars, too, to have their favourite myths vindicated as wholesome and practical teaching; and Orpheus, as a female City missionary, would be a charming embodiment of the old-world story. But we fear that the stern realities of poverty and ignorance and drunken vice are not to be touched by any such pinnacles as a story out of the Apocryphal Gospels, and discussion more or less profane thereon; or even by the presence of a granma like Miss Clare, with her pianoforte and her pleasant voice; nor do we think that our nineteenth-century apostle is to be found in Dr. George MacDonald, or in any of his impersonations.

The third volume, where the poor little vein, so thin from the beginning, has run quite into sand before the required amount of copy had been supplied, is too painful for earnest criticism. We would instance the chapter called "Child Nonsense" as about the most miserable exhibition known to us of a feeble intellect, strained beyond its measure. Never strong, Dr. MacDonald is here feeble; and the chapter reads more like the utterance of a child than anything else. The end, too, is unique in its way.

We are not sure to any about myself or my people. We live in hope of the day of trial.

When I was going to write—this was, but was attracted by the following conversation between two of my children—Ernest, eight, and Freddy, five.

Ernest. You're nobody; I'm nobody; we are all nobody, compared to mamma.
Freddy (shrilly). Yes; I am somebody.
Ernest. You're nothing; I'm nothing; we are all nothing in mamma's presence.
Freddy. But Ernest, every thing is some thing; so I must be something.
Ernest. Yes, Freddy, but you're no thing; so you're nothing. You're nothing to mamma.
Freddy. But I'm mamma's.

After this, we are not afraid that the most sophisticated of readers will accuse us of being too severe on the author of The Vicar's Daughter.

THE PONTEFRACT ELECTION.

THE interest of the Pontefract contest lay almost exclusively in its being the first experiment of the Ballot in a Parliamentary election. The struggle was between Mr. CHILDETS and Lord POLLINGTON, and Mr. CHILDETS was returned by a majority of eighty. In the election of 1868 Mr. CHILDETS was returned by a majority of only thirteen over the Conservative candidate, and this time his majority is much larger. But this is no very great cause of congratulation either for him or his party. Mr. CHILDETS is a known man, Lord POLLINGTON an utterly unknown one. Mr. CHILDETS was seeking re-election on resuming office after illness, and there are many voters in every constituency who do not much like opposing a member who vacates his seat in order to hold an official prize which he may be thought to have fairly won; and this feeling was certain to be heightened at Pontefract by the consideration that the real reason of Mr. CHILDETS's having to seek re-election was that his health had for a time broken down. Lord POLLINGTON, too, was a very weak candidate. It appeared that, in deference to his father's wishes, he some time ago resolved to avenge a slight put upon his father by the late Lord DENBY, and agreed never to appear as a supporter of Lord DENBY's Government. Having, however, a wish for some form of political activity, he offered first to join Mr. CHILDETS in opposing the Conservative candidate at Pontefract, and, on his proposal not being welcomed, asked Mr. CHILDETS for an introduction to the Liberal Whip, and solicited Mr. CHILDETS to get him something to do under a Liberal Government. Now he has come forward to oppose Mr. CHILDETS on the very scene where he had offered himself as an ally, and has announced himself as the champion of Conservatism. There is not much credit in beating such a candidate, but, as the result of the voting appeared at one time doubtful, Mr. CHILDETS naturally expressed himself very well pleased with the position he had won; and as he is undoubtedly a man of energy and ability, it is satisfactory, in spite of his chequered career at the Admiralty, that the Cabinet is not to be deprived of such aid as he can give it. If the election had been held under the old system, there would have been no more to say. Mr. CHILDETS would have been re-elected, but he would have been re-elected in a manner that would have made it doubtful whether at a general election he could hold his seat against a well-chosen Conservative candidate. The significance of the Pontefract election would have been shrouded in the general uncertainty and mystery which overhang the issues of the next general election. But the Pontefract election has been conducted, not under the old, but under the new, system; and the details connected with it are of considerable importance, showing how the Ballot is likely to work.

So far as one election can be taken as a test—and it obviously can only be so taken to a very limited degree—the general result may be said to be that the Ballot Act does produce the broader consequences expected to flow from it, but that practical difficulties worthy of serious attention were discovered in working its machinery. The one great merit of the measure was that it promised to put a stop to the noise and disorders of elections. This promise was entirely fulfilled at Pontefract. Nothing could have been duller than the nomination day, and nothing could have been duller than the election day. There was no turmoil, no drunkenness, no noisy and rowdy sets, no street mobs. Those dreadful scenes which appear on the eve of every election to foul the ears and minds of simple people with distinctions on the Contagious Diseases Act fitted through Pontefract, and did not disappear without some beating. The Ballot Act, it is clear, on trial to address the mob from the balcony of their houses, and of course the mob directed its attention to it.

pleased. But the election itself was in the highest degree orderly. The process of voting was about as safe and as wearisome as that of going to ask for left luggage at a cloak-room. In the next place, the voting was really secret. The voters did as they were bid, folded up their papers, and did not attempt to show them before folding them up to the agents or any one else. Pontefract was not perhaps a place where there was likely to be much intimidation, but it has in its day been notorious for bribery. That there was no bribery this time is more than any one can say positively; but the general impression appears to have been that not a farthing was spent in buying or corrupting voters, and in a little place like Pontefract, although details may not be known, there is generally a very correct suspicion when money is going about. It is quite true that this election took place suddenly, that there was no organization to meet it, and that party feeling does not appear to run very high in Pontefract, the borough seeming to cling to the natural, if illogical, persuasion that the best and pleasantest plan is to have one member from each of the two great parties, and so avoid the bitterness of great victories and great defeats. The example of such a borough may be a fallacious one; and it does not follow that, if there was no bribery or intimidation at Pontefract under the Ballot Act, this will be the case in constituencies of a different cast and character. Still the admirers of the Ballot may justly say that the first election held under the Act has been an election at which perfect order prevailed; the voters punctually obeyed the directions of the presiding officers, and, according to general belief, no illegal influences were brought to bear upon them. On the other hand, the history of the election seems to confirm the anticipations of those who predicted that the Ballot, by making politics uninteresting, would lead to abstention from voting. At the last general election Mr. CHILDETS polled 913 and Major WATERHOUSE, the other sitting member, polled 900. This time Mr. CHILDETS polled 658 and Lord POLLINGTON polled 578. Here, again, it may be unsafe to lay too much stress on the results of a single election held under special circumstances. If the election had been by open voting, the numbers of those who went to the poll would probably have been much less than they were at a time when so stirring a question as the fate of the Irish Church excited the minds of men. Mr. CHILDETS has been in office since then, and has made many mistakes; and there are always voters who think more of a man's mistakes than of his services. Lord POLLINGTON, on the other hand, was scarcely the man to stir up much enthusiasm in the breasts of his newly-found friends the Conservatives. Still the total abstention was very large, and may be accepted as an indication of the effects of the Ballot in one direction with as little or as much hesitation as the good order, the submissiveness of the voters, and the absence of corrupt influences may be accepted as indicative of its effects in another direction.

The mechanical difficulties of carrying out the Act appear to be very considerable, and here there can be no doubt as to the value of the example of Pontefract; for if these difficulties were great in a borough where little more than twelve hundred electors voted, they may be confidently expected to be still more serious in larger constituencies. The first difficulty is that of finding proper polling-places. The schoolrooms were freely put in requisition; but, in the first place, schoolrooms are not as a rule so constructed as to be at all suited for polling-places, and, in the next place, they are not dispersed enough to afford convenience to voters. Schools are founded in the centres of population, and denominations like to keep close watch on each other. While, therefore, the use of schoolrooms enables more voters to vote at the same time, it does not afford fresh facilities to voters in outlying districts. The Act also provides that the agents of voters

Exception may reasonably be taken to the passage in the Speech which is intended to record the result of the late dispute with the United States. The controversy has been composed, if composed is the proper phrase, not "by a spontaneous declaration of the Arbitrators," but by the withdrawal of the Indirect Claims on the part of the American Government. It is in many ways inaccurate to assert that the declaration of the Arbitrators was consistent with the words of the Speech from the Throne at the beginning of the Session. HER MAJESTY was advised to announce that she dissented from the proposal of submitting the Claims to the Geneva Tribunal because they were not included in the reference provided by the Treaty; and the statement was again and again reiterated in the most positive terms by the Ministers in both Houses. If the controversy had been settled by any declaration of the Arbitrators, the Americans would have achieved the formal triumph of which they have in fact erroneously boasted. The intimation that the Arbitrators, in common with the rest of mankind, regarded the claims as intrinsically absurd, inadmissible, and extortionate, was addressed exclusively to the American agents. Lord TEMERLEY, representing the English Government, properly declined to say anything in answer to the preliminary statement; nor was any step towards the arbitration taken by the English agent until the Government of the United States had, on grounds which concerned itself alone, announced its intention of desisting from the further prosecution of the obnoxious demands. The Arbitrators had expressly guarded themselves against the assumption that they expressed any opinion on the question, which was alone at issue between the belligerent Powers, whether the presentation of the Indirect Claims was covered by the terms of the Treaty of Washington. It is unfortunate that on a point which now concerns the national honour, with full notice of the misrepresentations and misapprehensions which prevail in the United States, the Government should have maintained the inaccurate habit of using inaccurate and slovenly language. It is also premature to "reflect with satisfaction that the subjects" "with which the Treaty has dealt are no longer before our eyes," "as to a perfect agreement between our kindred nations."

It would perhaps be hypercritical to inquire whether the differentiation of archaic desires can, in the words of the Quarterly Review, be properly relinquished; yet it would seem that, at least, it was a duty to strengthen the Government's devotion.

Until the various arbitrations in progress are completed, and until the awards which are to be made have been fully studied, it is rash to assume that either party will find fresh cause for offence in the results of litigation, or Mr. Farn discovered that the reference of a disputed question to arbitration was, after all, afterwards, strove to make it, a new source of irritation.

The announcement that negotiations with France on the Commercial Treaty are still in progress will have been received with surprise, though not with dissatisfaction. It is simultaneously reported that the French Ambassador in England has lately forwarded to his Government despatches on the subject; and, according to the Speech, the French Government has intimated to England a desire for further communications. Until it is known whether the President has modified the opinions which he held a few months ago, it will be impossible to judge whether any practical result is likely to follow from the renewal of negotiations. Since that time the supremacy of M. THIERS over the Assembly has been more definitely and conclusively asserted, and his latest victory over the majority was won on the kindred question of the tax on raw materials, which necessarily involves the protection by import duties of completed fabrics. M. THIERS seems never to have distinctly understood the impossibility of an intelligible compromise between his own fixed belief and the doctrines which must be applied to commercial legislation by any English Government. It is the unalterable conviction of the President that the importation from abroad of commodities which can be produced at home is injurious to the industry, and therefore, as he assumes, to the prosperity, of France. His abandonment of the commercial policy of the Empire has been determined wholly by his preference for a protective system; and the portions of the agreed tariff of 1860 which he is willing on certain terms to maintain would involve, according to his consistent view, a sacrifice to be only made for an adequate consideration. He is nevertheless ready, on political and even on economical grounds, to renew some articles of the Treaty on condition that England shall continue to admit French goods on liberal terms. The Treaty of 1860 was anomalous because it was partly founded on the fiction that the cheap purchase of foreign commodities was not a benefit to the consumer, but a concession to the vendor. Mr. COOPER and the Emperor NAPOLEON conspired to cheat the French people for their own benefit, and English industry derived an advantage from the partial relaxation of the protective system in France. There were grave objections to the restrictions which were imposed by the Treaty on the fiscal freedom and independence of England, and it would be a serious error to continue a theoretically vicious system on less favourable conditions than those of the Treaty. Nevertheless the English Government is perfectly justified in keeping the negotiation open to the last; and the firmness which Lord GRANVILLE has hitherto shown in adhering to sound principles entitles him to the confidence of the trading community.

If the Speech had been delivered at the beginning and not at the end of a Session, some member might probably have inquired why a negotiation with France should have been opened for the purpose of discouraging the Slave Trade on the East Coast of Africa. Any measures which may be adopted for the purpose would be employed more efficiently by England alone than in concert with a Government which has never affected to share English enthusiasm for the suppression of the slave trade. It is quite unnecessary to invite the aid of a partner who, in virtue of his common action and interest, will claim a veto on any act which may be proposed in pursuance of the stipulated policy. The English Government has probably determined to give effect to Dr. LIVINGSTONE's recommendations by applying pressure to the slave-trading Sultan of ZAMBEZI. It is of course useless to appeal to the humanity of a barbarous potentate who makes a large profit on the slaves; but hope and fear supply motives which operate even on African kings. A competent agent acquainted with the country may not perhaps be able to convince the SULTAN that a legitimate traffic in goods would be more profitable than a percentage on slave flesh; but he might intimate that the English Government was resolved to put an end to the slave trade, and that it might be expedient for the Zambesi ruler to make the best of a bargain should which he would not be allowed to exercise discretion. The protest against interference with the slave trade which are founded on the possible risk and certain expense of the proceeding deserve no respect or sympathy. It is bad enough that vulgar cupidity and contempt should have been allowed for many years to prevent the continuance of Pelay expeditions, and that consequently petty marauding States will probably complete the discomfiture which had during three centuries been gloriously pursued by a succession of gallant English adventurers. The greatest moral and political Power may fairly consider that its moral obligations bear some proportion to its opportunities. If, according to Dr. LIVINGSTONE's opinion, half a continent can be saved from anarchy and extreme barbarism by the interference of England, it would be an unworthy abandonment of duty to grudge the expenditure for the purpose of a little money, or even of a few willing lives.

ITALY.

RUMOUR does not spare the Pope more than it spares the humblest men, and the foolish sayings which are attributed to the Supreme Pontiff, and flashed over Europe, may represent rather what he is thought capable of saying than what he has said. Unless, however, he has been misled, the Pope recently communicated with the French Government to congratulate it on the success of its new loan; and as the Pope is not as other men are, but knows the causes of things, and can trace the secret threads of existence, he must needs explain after his own fashion how it happened that the subscriptions to the loan had been so numerous and so large. The solution of this success which of all others appeared most probable to the Pope, or rather that which he with a divine intuition perceived to be the true one, was that the loan had been specially blessed for the sake of M. DE GOULARD, the French Minister of Finance, and that M. DE GOULARD had won this blessing for his country by declining to be Minister at the Court of the King of ISRAEL. He had not wished to go to Rome as the bearer of common courtesies to the robber of the Church, and therefore, although his Government had immediately supplied his place, and his refusal did not in the slightest degree affect the policy of France, yet he had wrought a good work, which in the fulness of time bore its appointed fruit, and caused France to make a vast addition to her National Debt in the handsomest possible way. What makes this quaint fancy of the Pope, whether rightly or wrongly attributed to him, worth a passing remark, is that what may be termed its exact opposite seems conspicuously true. The French loan has gone off very well because there is a salutary lull in French politics, and because the French are believed to have had enough for the moment of trouble at home and abroad. One chief symptom of this policy of good sense has been the conduct of the French Government towards Italy. It has withstood the temptation to proclaim itself the friend of the Pope; it has acquiesced in the extinction of the Temporal Power; it has thrown a wet blanket on the ardour of bishops and on the devotion of the Right, and M. THIERS has recently, in order to obtain the concurrence of Italy in his financial schemes, taken an opportunity of recording that there is nothing to stand in the way of an intimate alliance between Italy and France. It was just possible that France might have seemed to wish to keep open such an amount of grievance as the extinction of the Temporal Power might have caused her. She might have been willing and able to make Italy uneasy, so as at least to take something of the sweetness of success away from Italy, and to suggest that things at Rome would be different soon. There can be no doubt that a large number of Frenchmen, and possibly M. DE GOULARD among them, might have thought such a course agreeable to their wounded vanity or piety; but their views did not prevail, and had they prevailed, the loan could not have been floated except with immense difficulty. Had Europe seen France cold and hostile and bitter towards Italy, keeping quiet for the present, but preparing for future acts of aggression and interference, the loan would have commanded a war price. M. THIERS, by his ostentatiously pacific policy as regards the enemies of the Pope, has saved many millions to the pockets of those whom he governs.

The successful floating of the French loan may thus be said to be the sign of Italy being left to herself to pursue the path which, with much courage, good luck, and freedom from scruple, she marked out as that on which, at any cost, she was resolved to enter. Peace without has been answered by peace within. Italy is on excellent terms with Austria, and on the very best terms with Germany; and as to France, the condition of French prosperity is to leave Italy alone. In Spain the gallantry and nobleness of character, and the conspicuous adherence of the son of Victor EMANUEL to constitutional freedom, not only assure an ally for Italy, but cast a ray of light over the throne of the family from which AMADEO has come. Things are going well with Italy. There has scarcely been an incident in Italian history this year, and Italy is enjoying the proverbial happiness of a people whose annals are a blank. The financial difficulties of the country are, indeed, not yet over, and the bright day when the Budget is to be balanced is postponed from year to year. Italy, in fact, is very much in the position of Turkey, and is illustrating the cost at which in these days a new nation seeks to establish itself, and to rise into the position of an independent Power. It has, in the first place, to pay for coming into existence, for beginning a new era in administration, for gaining a footing as a great community, and for advertising itself as having commenced business on an imposing scale. It has then to pay for keeping itself alive, for an army disproportioned to its evident wants, and for schemes of public utility commenced before the country is prepared to make them lucrative. It goes ahead at a great pace, and bleeds and sweats under the process. The really astonishing thing is that Italy should have got on so well under such tremendous difficulties. It has a Government which is respected, and a Sovereign who is admired and liked. It has a very respectable army, which is at least animated with a newborn confidence, and which, if it would not like to measure swords with Germany, thinks itself capable of meeting France in arms. This army is used as a vehicle of order and education, and every year a certain number of disciplined and well-taught men are returned from this gigantic school of training to the ranks of the civil community. The taxes are very heavy, but are cheerfully and willingly paid; and nothing could be so conducive to the interests of French finance as the certainty, if it could be attained, that the poor Frenchman would respond to the calls of his country with as much alacrity and fortitude as are exhibited by the poor Italian. But, quiet and prosperous as Italy in other respects is, its quietude and prosperity are nowhere so conspicuous as in the stormy region of ecclesiastical affairs. After Sedan it was not a difficult operation to seize on the remainder of the POPE's possessions. But it seemed one thing to occupy Rome, and another to hold it without paying dearly for the audacity of the attempt. Italy was not fortified by any religious enthusiasm against Rome. It never questioned the spiritual pretensions of the POPE, and was as completely indifferent to the announcement of the dogma of infallibility as if it had been announced that the circle had been squared in the Vatican. It opposed the Temporal Power very much as, in the countries of Spanish origin, the Liberal party has opposed the concentration of vast and unprofitable wealth in the hands of ecclesiastics. In those countries the spoliation of the Church has given rise to senseless wars, revolutions, and plots. The Liberal party has for the most part won, but it has won by the hair of its head. It is a very remarkable thing that in Italy the party of reaction should not be able to show itself, and that the vast majority of Italians should be persuaded that, in lifting up their hands against the Church, they have done the right thing, and should persevere in doing as they have done with an air of confident and affable good-humour. The Italian Parliament is an orderly, respectable body, full of family men, of moneyed men, of men in good provincial positions. It is almost as far from being what is known as a Red Assembly as the English House of Commons, and certainly we might look in vain to English history for a parallel to the calmness and unanimity with which the Italian Parliament has passed through an epoch of transition specially fitted to divide and agitate the hearts of men.

The success of the Italian Government and Parliament appears peculiarly conspicuous when attention is directed to the position of its chief opponents. The clerical party is of course its sworn foe, and the Republican party is so far opposed to it that it would like to alter altogether the character of the triumph that has been won. It might have been thought that, especially at Rome, where the clerical party has been in possession of absolute power for centuries, great trouble might have arisen as soon as that opening for clerical intrigues or boldness was given which necessarily attends the working of free institutions. Again, it was to the Republican party that the occupation of Rome was mainly due, for the Republicans, often at the hazard of their lives, kept alive the cry of "Rome or Death!" when the voices of Constitutionalists sounded a much humbler strain. It might have been thought that the harvest would have fallen to those who sowed it, and that in Rome a Liberal would have been a Republican. Both these very natural expectations have recently been falsified by events. An election for municipal and provincial officials has just been held in Rome, to which great interest has been attached. It was the first occasion on which the clerical party, with the express sanction of the POPE, gave up the policy of abstention and fairly tried its strength with its adversaries in an electoral contest. It was thought wise to meet the enemy on his chosen battlefield, and to show that if the clergy could not at once recover the spoils of the Church they could at least hamper the daily administration of affairs, and beard the Government by opposing to it a little host of adverse officials. The Republicans kept aloof from the other adversaries of the clergy, had their own candidates, and, proclaiming their separation from the rest of Italy, voted on a perfectly distinct ticket. The voting took place on the 4th of this month, and the clerical party bore testimony to the perfect impartiality and decorum with which the proceedings were conducted. Many incidents occurred that thrilled the hearts of spectators. Agents of the old Papal police came up and voted at polling-places presided over by victims of the tyranny of which they had been the instruments. Papal gendarmes—a tribe peculiarly obnoxious to the Roman populace—voted and departed in peace. The only disturbance to be regretted was that of a warder of one of the prisons under the present Government, who fell, as it is guessed, by the blow of a ruffian who had conceived a grudge against him while in confinement. The clerical journals asserted that the man was murdered because he was erroneously thought to be on the side of the priests; but at any rate, as a matter of fact, not a hair of any one belonging to the clerical party was injured, and the ecclesiastics worked hard and did their best. As for the Republicans, they seem to have been regarded with a sort of amiable contempt. They had few voters to bring up, and were left entirely to themselves. The result was that the candidates proposed by the Central Liberal Committee representing the cause of the Government were all elected by an overwhelming majority. In itself the election was not very important, but it was looked on as a test of the strength of parties where parties adverse to the Government might be expected to be strong; and the result therefore may be accepted as very significant of the present state of Italian politics.

LORD RUSSELL'S HEPTARCHY.

IT is impossible not to sympathize with Lord Russell's successful efforts to provide amusement for his later years. At the end of the Session it has suddenly occurred to him both to write a letter to the Times and to announce for the winter a pamphlet which will pleasantly occupy his autumn leisure. His object is a reformation of Parliamentary arrangements, distributed into two suggestions of unequal boldness. The change of the close of the financial year from March 31 to June 30 would scarcely amount to a revolution; but Lord Russell in his last paragraph adds a proposal of a kind which was once thought paradoxical, for restoring the Heptarchy, or rather for applying the traditional division into seven to the United Kingdom. The grievances which he desires to remedy are the alleged stoppage of business till the middle or end of July, the delay of Supply till the month of August, the cost and uncertainty of Private Bills, and, above all, the supposed loss of health by the Ministers, by "the excellent SPEAKER," and by private members of Parliament. Lord Russell was formerly during several Sessions leader of the House of Commons, in which he sat for forty years; but it is difficult, even on his authority, to accept the proposition that a formal change in the dates of the financial accounts would either greatly facilitate legislation or perceptibly prolong the precious lives of Mr. AYRTON and Mr. WHALLEY. As Lord Russell admits, the greater part of the Supplies are discussed and voted after March 31. The conduct of business might in theory be more symmetrical if the House completed its financial functions before the close of the financial year, but the change would be entirely nominal. It is true that "the Estimates of the year and the taxes to be voted, though they occupy much time in the House of Commons, very rarely meet with any comment in the House of Lords. The increase of the Income-tax last year from fourpence to sixpence did not, as far as I recollect, provoke a single observation in the House of Lords." Before Lord Russell, in just recognition of his public services, obtained a seat in the car of the House of Lords balloon, he was one of the most zealous sticklers for the exclusive claim of the House of Commons to the control of taxation. It is natural that from his present exalted position he should discern less distinctly the terrestrial objects which once engrossed his attention. He was a member of the Ministry which was defeated on the motion of Lord MONTAGUE in the matter of repealing the paper duty, and it is not recorded that Lord JOHN RUSSELL then complained that the House of Lords had been too chary of interference with finance. There might have been some satisfaction, though there would have been little use, in discussing Mr. Low's Budget in the House of Lords; and Lord Russell had the opportunity, if he had thought it worth while, of raising a question, and of remarking that the Budget of 1871 was one of the worst on record, and that the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER had himself condemned his own project of increasing the Income-tax. As nothing would have come of such a discussion, it was conveniently omitted; and the same causes would produce similar results even if the financial year were to extend to June, instead of ending with March.

It is possible that some readjustment of the order of business might be advantageous; but the whole amount of work to be done could not be reduced by any inversion of times and seasons. The House of Commons always contrives to pack into the Session both its financial votes and a certain amount of legislation. The number of important Bills which have been passed in the present year proves that there is no urgent need of additional facilities for legislation. No change in the beginning or end of the financial year would correct Mr. GLADSTONE's unaccountable custom of forcing Mr. GRANT DUFF to expound the Indian Budget in the absence of the great body of members, on the eve of the prorogation. The health of the excellent SPEAKER would be benefited at the expense of the constitution of the Chairman of Committees by the dedication of a larger portion of the Session to Committee of Supply; but private members and "the hard-worked official servants of the Crown" would still have to do their work sooner or later. It is remarkable that the only grievance which, according to Lord Russell, affects the House of Lords, is the practical exclusion of the Peers from any active control over financial policy. As he justly observes, "legislative Bills are discussed in the House of Lords, and amendments are often made." Thus the legislative Bill for the Ballot was discussed by Lord Russell himself, on the remarkable assumption that it would, if it had been passed in former times, have inflicted a penalty on any elector who might have boasted of having voted for the benevolent WILBERFORCE or for the virtuous ROMILLY. A legislative Assembly which never discussed legislative Bills would indeed be an anomalous institution. An Assembly which should discuss money votes which it cannot constitutionally or safely modify might incur the risk of descending to the level of a debating society.

Having disposed in half a dozen sentences of public business, of legislation, and of finance, Lord Russell proceeds to state that "the question of local legislation is one too large to be disposed of in the present letter." He will accordingly "endeavour in the course of the winter to explain in a pamphlet the course which he thinks might be taken to the satisfaction of the nation at large." Since the time when, according to a legend which has almost passed into history, Lord JOHN RUSSELL assumed the command of the Channel Fleet, he has not more strikingly displayed that happy boldness which is one of his well-known characteristics. Of the whole subject of private legislation Lord RUSSELL is as ignorant as of navigation; and it may be presumed that he attaches no distinct meaning to what he calls "the hazards of Private Bills." To the political consequences of the stupendous machinery which he proposes to provide for local legislation he has apparently paid no attention. "It appears to me," he says, "that if Ireland were to be allowed to elect a representative Assembly for each of its four provinces of Leinster, Ulster, Munster, and Connaught, and if Scotland were in a similar manner divided into Lowlands and Highlands, having for each province a representative Assembly, the local wants of Ireland and Scotland might be better provided for than at present." As it appears that England is to content itself with Parliament as its Representative Assembly, the new Heptarchy will possess exactly seven centres of local legislation; and, after all, by far the greater number of Private Bills will still be submitted to Parliament. The excellent SPEAKER and the hard-worked official members never sit on Select Committees on Private Bills; but the small minority of private members which, through the vicious arrangements of the Standing Order Committee, transacts all the private business of the House, will still be exposed to the risks which Lord RUSSELL proposes to remove or alleviate. Mr. BUTT and the supporters of Home Rule ought to receive with gratitude the plethora of concessions which Lord RUSSELL offers in answer to their reclamations. They ask for one Irish Representative Assembly, and they are told to be content and satisfied with four Parliaments, which will assuredly not confine themselves to the consideration of Private Bills. It is satisfactory to know from the speeches of Irish members on Sir ROWLAND BLANCKENHASTET's motion, that the four Wittenagemotes, though they might probably differ from one another on all other questions, would be unanimous in passing Bills for the purchase of the Irish railways by the Imperial Government. As they would by their first measure have almost exhausted the functions which they would have been created to discharge, they would afterwards have sufficient leisure for the discussion of political questions, including the repudiation of the control of the Imperial Parliament.

The Connaught Assembly would not fail to correct on behalf of the priests and bishops any failure of justice which may have impaired their supremacy over the Galway electors; and if the Orangemen succeeded in obtaining a majority in Ulster, the annual closing of the gates of Derry would probably become a ceremony of legal obligation. The two little Scotch Parliaments would probably, in a more moderate and practical spirit, confine their attention to local jobs; but some conflict of jurisdiction might arise between them in the consideration of Railway Bills. Both the North British and the Caledonian Railway systems extend from the English Border beyond the Highland line; and there might be some inconvenience in submitting questions in which either Company was concerned to two independent legislative bodies. It is strange that it should not have occurred to Lord RUSSELL to reflect that the extraordinary schemes which he recommends would, if they are now admissible, have been equally expedient in the days of his political activity. No position commands more general respect than that of a retired veteran who employs the authority acquired by experience and public services in moderating the conflicts of parties, or in discharging duties which others have neglected in consequence of political or personal motives. Lord RUSSELL undertook a task which well became him when, during the progress of the Alabama negotiations, he proposed to confirm the suspected resolution of the Government by an expression of the opinion of the House of Lords. Even the reminiscences which he enumerated in explanation of his vote in favour of optional secrecy of election were listened to with deference, if not with conviction. Hasty suggestions of wild and indefinite changes in the Constitution are not entitled to equal respect. It is true that little mischief can ensue from the proposal of creating half a dozen provincial Parliaments, because the project is not likely to be taken into consideration; but it is a disappointment when old experience attains to the reverse of a prophetic strain. It may be hoped that the time is distant at which biographical critics will discuss with freedom Lord RUSSELL's long and conspicuous career. Their task will be more agreeable if they are enabled to record the passage from an ambitious youth and an active maturity into the mellow wisdom which is properly associated with age.

FRANCE IN RETREAT.

THE French people are condemned to take a political holiday. It comes natural to individual politicians to have three or four months of vacation every year; but it is a novelty in the case of a whole nation. Last year at this time there was a general cessation from politics all over France, but it was the cessation of absolute exhaustion. A country which has only just come out of a foreign and a civil war, following hard on each other's heels, has no strength to spare for discussion. But this year there has been a breathing-space, and though Frenchmen have not even now shown any decided interest in politics, exciting debates have taken place in the Assembly, and important hints have been dropped by the PRESIDENT. The Session which has lately closed has had far more of a political character than the Session of 1871. The Executive has more and more identified itself with the Republic, and though M. THIERS is still the elect of the whole Assembly, something very like a monarchical Opposition has grown up against him. Consequently the natural occupation for Frenchmen during the autumn would be to fight over again the battles of the spring and summer, and to prepare themselves to fight the battles of the coming winter. Nothing of the sort, it seems, is likely to take place. The one of both the great parties apparently is to leave politics alone. As regards the Monarchists, they may naturally feel some alarm at the results of their recent essays in the opposite direction. They have been taking, or rather announcing that they soon intended to take, some decided action. Unfortunately the announcement fell exceedingly flat. The persons who were to have been startled by it accepted it with dis-trossing indifference. Its only effect on M. THIERS was to make him more outspoken in favour of the Republic. Its only effect on the Republicans was to put them on better terms with M. THIERS. Until the visit of the delegates of the Right to the PRESIDENT, the Conservatives had had the credit of being a united body, while the Republicans had been supposed to be too reckless and passionate ever to lose an opportunity of damaging their own cause. The interview between the Right and M. THIERS showed that both these beliefs were delusions. The Conservative majority began quarrelling among themselves; the Republican minority took the occasion of strengthening in every possible way the links which bind them to the PRESIDENT. If M. THIERS is a more decided Republican than he was when he took office, the fact is due in part to the action of the majority in the Assembly. The logic of events has done much to convert him; but the want of logic of the Right has done something. It would argue more than human blindness on the part of the Monarchists if they did not see that of late they have only made their position worse every time that they have tried to improve it. Accordingly, the chief occupation of the journals which represent their views is to cut jokes at the honours paid to M. THIERS by the newspaper Correspondents who hang about his doorstep at Trouville. The devotion, the ingenuity, and the perseverance of these gentlemen are so striking, that there is every chance of their giving the monarchical organs ample employment throughout the recess.

It is rather early perhaps to speak with equal confidence of the way in which the Republicans mean to spend the time between this and November. They are a rising party, and they may find it harder to keep their tongues and their tempers in order. The continued existence of the present Assembly naturally acts on them as a constant irritant. It no longer, they say, represents France; indeed its great motive for clinging to life is its own conviction that it does not represent France. To the great majority of the deputies a dissolution would be, politically speaking, an execution, and it is because they know this that they are so determined to postpone a dissolution to the latest possible moment. Why, the more hot-headed Republicans may ask themselves, should we submit to be governed by a set of old women chosen at random to ratify whatever terms of peace could be got, longing to act in direct defiance of the wishes of the nation, and only prevented from doing so by their own stupid cowardice? There is a very good answer to the question, but it is one which men who ask it in this temper are not unlikely to miss. And if they do miss it, there is nothing to prevent them from beginning a campaign in favour of a dissolution during these very holidays. No French Government is altogether without the means of stopping inconvenient discussions, but it would be difficult to do more than discourage a peaceable agitation in favour of an appeal to the country. Happily for the interests of the party, a Republican is open to the same seasonable distractions as other men. He has a liver, and he must go and drink the waters, or he has a vineyard, and the vintage is approaching. Revolutionists of an extreme type may disregard these proprieties—they have indeed lamentably disregarded them on some former occasions—but at present such revolutionists of an extreme type as have not been shot are either in prison or in hiding. There is reason to suppose, therefore, that the Republicans will at all events not be in a hurry to stomp the country against the Assembly, and in the interval there are several considerations in favour of doing nothing which are likely to occur to them. In the first place, M. THIERS has promised that he will not lend himself to any such movement for a dissolution. In ordinary cases, of course, this would go for nothing, because the Government for the time being rarely does lend itself to movements of this sort. But in this case it goes for a good deal. The Republicans have the wit, seemingly, to see that M. THIERS is the best card in their hand, that he has already done more for them than they possibly could have done for themselves, that to alienate him from them in ever so small a degree would be the greatest blunder they could commit. If M. THIERS wishes to keep the present Assembly in being, it is impossible for him not to feel annoyed with any party that is strenuously labouring to get rid of it, and annoyance is often only the prelude to alienation. It is conceivable, of course, that M. THIERS may really be in favour of a dissolution, and that his promise not to further it is only a sacrifice to executive propriety. But though it is conceivable, it is in the highest degree improbable. If a general election were held this autumn, the result would no doubt show that M. THIERS's popularity is greater than ever. But though the new Assembly would come to Versailles pledged to support him, it might not submit to his control in the way that the present Assembly does. The candidates would have been forced to declare their views on a variety of questions, and on many of these their views would probably be opposed to those of M. THIERS. Theories of what was due to their constituents, or, more accurately perhaps, of what their constituents were likely to think due to them, would come in to complicate their calculations, and the result might be that M. THIERS would occasionally find himself in a minority. The existing Assembly has on the whole a prudent horror of unknown evils, and so long as M. THIERS is willing to work with it, it will be willing to work with M. THIERS. A Republican of ordinary common sense may see all this for himself, and if he does see it, he will not be inclined to take M. THIERS's promise to discourage the cry for a dissolution in any but its most obvious sense.

In the second place, the Republicans have reasons of their own—besides those that grow out of their relations with M. THIERS—for not being as anxious as they profess to be to send the Assembly about its business. After all, it is doing a very necessary, but a very thankless, work. Its principal function in life is to vote new taxes, and to sanction such arrangements as the Government finds it convenient to make with the Army of Occupation. It is difficult to believe that when the Republican leaders take confidential counsel with one another, their attitude towards the Assembly is not of the "rather 'you than we' order. The money has to be raised, and the German troops have to be provided for; but, except during the momentary excitement of subscribing for a loan, there is no popularity to be gained by either process. On the whole, therefore, the Republican party may well feel glad that the work has fallen to the lot of a monarchical Assembly, and that their own share of it will be to criticize hereafter the manner in which it has been done. There never was a case in which the strength of a political party was more plainly to sit still, and to all appearance M. GAMBETTA, notwithstanding occasional outbursts of excitement, thoroughly sees this. He has applied himself with commendable prudence to disarm the hostility of the peasantry, and even of the clergy, and it is altogether to his interest that the interval during which this conciliatory process can best be carried on should not be brought to a premature end. M. THIERS's unmistakable leaning towards Republicanism is a sufficient warrant that no attempt at a monarchical coup d'état will be made by the Assembly, and this assurance leaves the Republicans nothing to do but to float up with the tide.

RAILWAY AMALGAMATION.

THOSE who take an interest in railway affairs will remember that at the beginning of the present year Bills were deposited for some large amalgamations, of which the most important were the London and North-Western with the Lancashire and Yorkshire, and the Midland with the Glasgow and South-Western. A partial union of the Great Western and the broad-gauge lines beyond it with the London and South-Western would have applied only to the competing portions of their respective systems. The amalgamation of the North-Western railways would have been opposed by the Midland, by the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, and perhaps by some of the Scotch railways. The Midland scheme would have been opposed by the London and North-Western, by the Caledonian, and most strenuously by the North British; but it would of course have been possible for the amalgamating Companies to make such concessions to their neighbours as to buy off their opposition. In 1863 the scheme of amalgamation between the Great Western and the West Midland was opposed by the London and North-Western and the Midland, down to the commencement of the inquiry before the Select Committee; but at the last moment the dispute was compromised by agreements between the respective Companies, which were afterwards appended as Schedules to the Act. The London and North-Western amalgamation of the present year would also have been opposed by some of the trading communities which might have suffered from the extinction of competition, and the towns on the North British system would have objected to the anticipated diversion of traffic by the Midland amalgamation from the East to the West of Scotland. The combination of the Devonshire Companies would perhaps have been opposed, for the sake of obtaining conditions, by the Midland; but within their own district they would have been exempt from the interference of rivals, and the take-bitants of the West of England would have had to choose between acquiescence in the establishment of a monopoly and a costly opposition which would probably have been unavailing. There was every reason to expect that, if all or any of the great Companies were amalgamated, their example would in a subsequent Session be followed by other Companies; and it was thought expedient to refer the preliminary question whether amalgamation was generally desirable to a Joint Committee of both Houses. Parliament was not disposed to listen to a warning that either there was no general principle which applied to different amalgamations, or that it was so entirely subordinate to considerations of detail as to be practically useless. Some Companies ought to be amalgamated; other Companies ought not to be amalgamated; and the special issue in each instance can only be tried to advantage by an inquiry in the nature of litigation. The Joint Committee included many able members, and it received information from witnesses of the highest authority; but there could be no hostile cross-examination; and judges can never fully discharge their functions without the aid of advocates. No contrivance which has hitherto been invented for the elimination of practical truth is to be compared to the conflict between two adverse parties before a competent umpire.

The fulness of the investigation instituted by the Joint Committee caused the unavoidable postponement of the proposed amalgamations. The result is not to be regretted, as there was, even if the schemes were in themselves expedient, no urgent need for legislation. It happened that the Midland could not have effected a physical junction with the Glasgow and South-Western until the completion of the Settle and Carlisle line, which is still in course of construction. It was also well that a Committee appointed on the assumption that some general theory of amalgamation was possible should satisfy itself of the truth of the sound proposition enunciated in the fourth paragraph of its recommendations, that "it is impossible to lay down any general rules determining the limits or the character of future amalgamations." It matters little that the appointment of the Committee is in one sense retrospectively condemned by the admission that the general rules which it was to frame cannot possibly be determined. EPIMENIDES the Cretan, notwithstanding the reflex operation of his celebrated dogma on his own character, was thought by ST. PAUL and others to have contributed to the store of human knowledge when he affirmed that all Cretans were liars. The Report, more especially in its negative portions, is the more creditable to the good sense of the Committee because it is evident that some or all of the members have been induced by fuller knowledge to abandon strong prepossessions. Their clear and accurate narrative of former efforts to regulate railway enterprise by general legislation or by administrative interference is a record of the triumph of experience over premature theories. Again and again Parliament has tried to constitute Boards which should control on conjectural grounds the extension of railways; and as often Parliamentary Committees, after ascertaining the material facts in each particular case, have wisely refused to listen to arbitrary official recommendations. The Reports of the Board of Trade in 1845 and 1846, under the presidency of Lord DALHOUSIE, afforded the most striking illustration of the inutility or mischievous tendency of attempts to regulate railway enterprise by one-sided inquiry, by guess, and in some instances by backstairs influence. As the Committee remark in their Report, it is curious to see by the light of subsequent experience the strange conclusions at which such men as Lord DALHOUSIE and his colleagues arrived. The members of the Committee were probably not aware that it was impossible for Lord DALHOUSIE himself to examine all the schemes of the time; and that some of the proceedings which were taken in his name were tainted with suspicion. Of the value of the suggestions of his Board it is enough to say that it reported against the scheme of the Great Northern Railway, and against the amalgamation of the Grand Junction Railway with the Liverpool and Manchester. Sir ROBERT PEEL never displayed sounder judgment than when, in opposition to popular prejudice, he decided on remitting questions of railway policy, as before, to Select Committees which would decide according to argument and evidence, instead of by favour or in accordance with preconceived theories. The various experiments of preliminary inquiry, and the preposterous scheme of submitting questions of engineering and estimate to the Referees, have successively failed; and the Reports of Commissioners and Committees have been valuable in proportion to the strictness with which they confined themselves to recommendations founded on the results of experience.

The Joint Committee nevertheless still hankers after some permanent authority which shall advise and guide Parliament on matters of railway legislation. The function which all former Boards and Commissions have proved utterly incompetent to discharge is to be but a secondary and incidental attribute of a judicial and administrative tribunal to be constituted for a different and more legitimate purpose. There is every reason to expect that, if such a Court is hereafter established, it will be fully occupied without wasting its time and the time of Committees in giving advice to bodies which will on the particular question be better informed than itself. It is true that some ingenuity would be required to emulate the inefficiency of the Board of Trade in all matters of the kind. By a Standing Order of the House of Commons, the Board is required to report on the expediency of every proposed level crossing. It was probably known to Parliament, as to the rest of mankind, that level crossings often involve danger, but that in some cases it is more convenient for the public, especially when the traffic consists of heavy loads, to cross the rails on a level than to ascend and descend the gradients of a bridge and its approaches. It might have been supposed that even the Board of Trade was capable of discharging the simple duty of inquiring into the circumstances of each proposed crossing, for the purpose of assisting the Committee; yet for several years the Board has, almost without exception, reported against every plan for a level crossing; and consequently Committees are compelled to undertake the inquiry for themselves, with the result, in at least one half of the plans which are laid before them, of overruling the recommendations of the Board. The principal duty of the proposed tribunal is to be the adjudication of the numerous questions which are now by agreement, or in accordance with the provisions of Acts of Parliament, referred to arbitration. The only objection to the plan is the probable inability of any single tribunal to dispose of the laborious business which is now transacted by many independent arbitrators. It will be impossible to shorten or to cheapen the investigation of details which must be separately examined. The only objection which is urged in the Report against arbitrations is that they are tedious and expensive; and both objections will apply to the same process before a new Tribunal. There will, however, be an advantage in the transfer to the Court of the jurisdiction which is at present vested in the Common Pleas. The public interest is not represented in railway arbitrations; and experience shows that it cannot be adequately protected by a Court of Law. The compulsory through rates which the Committee recommend will occasion much unavoidable litigation. There seems to be less reason for the proposal of a permanent Joint Committee of both Houses, to which schemes of amalgamation are to be referred. The second trial, which is at least as much required when the policy of amalgamations is under consideration. The Joint Committee which issues the Report was exceptionally strong, but it would have been unnecessarily and inconveniently numerous if it had been substituted for an ordinary Select Committee; and the approval of a Bill by the members of the House of Commons who belonged to the Joint Committee, and after an independent inquiry by Lord DERBY, Lord SALISBURY, and their colleagues of the Upper House, would have commanded greater confidence and given fuller satisfaction than the result of any single inquiry. The examination of the other conclusions of the Committee will be conveniently reserved for a future occasion.

DENOMINATIONALISM AND THE WESLEYANS.

THE signment of an education which shall be at once religious and unsectarian, after dying, or seeming to die, a natural death in every other Nonconformist communion, has been revived in the Wesleyan Conference. Its new advocates have at least the merit of frankness. When unsectarian education was a popular watchword, those who used it obstinately shut their eyes to the fact that to insist upon the Bible being read in schools maintained out of public money is as much a violation of religious equality, as regards Roman Catholics and High Churchmen, as to insist upon the Church Catechism being taught in schools supported out of public money would be as regards Dissenters. Those who have supported Mr. ANTUN's resolution in the Wesleyan Conference are quite indifferent to this identity. They avow that their object in demanding unsectarian schools is in the highest degree sectarian. They are willing to forego the teaching of Methodism, but their object in so doing is to strike a side blow at Romanism and Ritualism. One of the speakers objected to see the education of a large portion of the nation left in the hands of the Church of England, on the ground that its tendency is "wholly Romeward." Another repudiated the Denominational system as being favourable beyond all others to Ultramontane claims. And in replying, at the end of the debate, Mr. ARTHUR characterized the issue he had raised as giving the Conference the choice between the Bible and Popery. The supporters of the resolution were more impregnable on the theoretical than on the practical grievance. If a man says that his conscience is afflicted because a school in which the doctrine of the Church of England or of the Church of Rome is taught to Anglican or Roman Catholic children receives a grant of public money in respect of the secular instruction given, we know of no answer that can be made to him. When the doctor in Martin Chuzzlewit could not find out where Mr. NADGETT's liver was wrong, Mr. NADGETT observed "that it was his own liver, and he hoped he ought to 'know.' It is the same with Mr. ARTHUR's conscience. It is his own—happily for society—and he must be supposed to know when it is out of order. It is when these gentlemen try to make out that the Conscience Clause affords no protection to Wesleyan children that they break down utterly. It may be true, as Mr. HOLLAND says, that it is impossible for poor men in rural districts to obtain equal religious rights under a Conscience Clause, or, as Mr. AULAY says, that many clergymen will pay no more attention to the Conscience Clause than they pay to some of the clauses in the Thirty-nine Articles. But if it is true, surely some evidence of it can be produced. There is a department of the Government charged, among other things, with administering this very clause, and there is a large staff of inspectors, of all forms of religious belief, part of whose work is to see that it is rigorously administered. It is strange under these circumstances that no case of religious oppression should have been brought forward, that no Wesleyan parent should have been independent enough to appeal to the Inspector, that no Wesleyan minister should have complained to the Education Department of the wrong sustained by parents who did not dare to complain for themselves. Among all the poor Wesleyans living in rural districts who are denied the benefit of the Conscience Clause, it might have been thought that some one case of hardship would have come to light in the two years that have passed since the Education Act became law. It does not appear, however, that any such case has been alleged. The speakers in the Conference knew of none, or, if they did, they chose to hold their tongues about it. Those who clamour for a change in the law, without giving any proof beyond their own assertion that the law as it stands is inoperative, have no right to be surprised if their tactics excite more suspicion than sympathy.

As the resolution was put aside in favour of an amendment reserving the controversy for the consideration of a Committee to be elected by the whole Wesleyan body, there is no means of knowing whether Mr. ARTHUR's views do or do not predominate in the Conference. As far as argument goes, his resolution was very effectually pulled to pieces. Mr. ARTHUR in effect calls upon the Wesleyans to merge their own Denominational schools in unsectarian schools—schools, that is, where the Bible is read, but not explained—to be provided by the several School Boards. It was pointed out by several speakers that, at most, the Wesleyans could only bind themselves. They "might merge their own schools in a national 'system,' but they could not 'compel the Church of England or the Church of Rome to merge theirs.'" To retire from the field of religious education would be merely to assist the Church of England in maintaining and extending its religious power. Nor was it only on grounds peculiar to their own denomination that many of the Methodist ministers protested against Mr. ARTHUR's proposal. They objected to the injustice of the idea as much as to the evil consequences involved in it. They admitted that a Roman Catholic might have a conscience, and that, if he had, that conscience ought to be respected. But if it is uncertain how far these views would command the assent of a majority of the Conference, it is still more uncertain how far they will command the assent of a majority of the Methodist body. Until now Wesleyans have usually been ranked among the Denominationalists. It is possible, however, that they are Denominationalists rather from habit than from conviction, and in this case the result of the controversy which has just been opened may entirely change the opinion hitherto entertained of them. So far as regards the secular party is wholly unrepresented in the Conference. Those who do not wish public money to be given to Denominational schools are anxious that it should be given to schools in which the Bible is read and its meaning left to take its chance. If the dividing line throughout the Methodist connexion should prove to coincide with the dividing line in the Conference, the result of the coming discussion may possibly be to reinforce the unsectarian, as opposed to the secular, party in the country, and ultimately in Parliament.

With this possibility before them it would be well if the Denominational party would consider their future policy with somewhat less of the temper of men who are putting off their armour. The real enemy they have to fear is not secularism, but unsectarianism. The triumph of secularism would only mean the exclusion of religion from school hours, and from the list of subjects taught by the schoolmaster. It would not mean the exclusion of the clergy or their representatives from the school buildings. Whatever is now taught in a voluntary Denominational school might then be taught in a public and secular school. The only difference would be that it would be taught at a different hour and by a different teacher. The triumph of unsectarianism would mean much more than this. It would carry with it the doctrine that the reading of the Bible is a sufficient measure of religious instruction for elementary schools. Consequently, voluntary teachers of anything more than this would be told to provide their own schoolrooms, and catch children how they can. The theory of secular education as held in this country does not shut out the view that education without religion is incomplete; it simply seeks to find a compromise by which those who find they can agree upon secular instruction may work together amicably, notwithstanding their inability to agree upon religious instruction. The theory of unsectarian education is far more exclusive, and far more aggressive. It first degrades the Bible into a fetish, and then excommunicates all who will not join in worshipping the bare letter. But though it has of late fallen into discredit, and has been given up by many of those who formerly held it, there is no certainty that it may not rise again. That it is illogical and inconsistent is not necessarily a great disadvantage to it in England. It appeals to the unreasoning Protestantism which still characterizes the English middle class; it saves the scruples of those tender consciences who, so long as they can escape supporting schools in which other people's religion is taught, see no objection to other people being made to support schools in which their own religion is read; it sets free the funds that have hitherto gone to support British Schools; it has, in short, many practical recommendations which may give it renewed popularity among Dissenters, supposing that a return to it enables them to attack Denominationalism with the unexpected reinforcement of a large Wesleyan contingent. The present tendency of the Denominationalist party is to over-indulgence in a very natural sense of triumph. They have beaten the Secularists all along the line. In Parliament and in the elections for the School Boards they have won a conspicuous success. If the unsectarian party is as completely crushed as it has of late appeared to be, the Denominationalist victory may be undisturbed. But if it turns out, as is certainly possible, that the battle with unsectarianism is still to be fought, Denominationalists may yet see cause to regret that, while it was in their power to make terms with the Secularists, they refused even to consider whether the difference between them was fundamental or only superficial.

MR. WHALLEY.

IT is not impossible that Mr. WHALLEY, or somebody like him, may one day become a serious Parliamentary question. There are limits to the patience of a popular assembly, and when those limits are reached there is apt to be an explosion. It is an extremely delicate and difficult question to say what means can be taken of checking a member of a public body who habitually disregards not only the temper and convenience of his associates, but the rules under which they have agreed to transact their business, and even the formal decisions of the President. The House of Commons has never at any time been without its bores and drolls; and unfortunately the bores—the dull, sour, fussy fellows with annual motions and pet crotchets—seem to be sadly on the increase. Hitherto there has been a disposition to class Mr. WHALLEY among the drolls, and to consider his vagaries amusing; and perhaps nothing could give one a more striking idea of the prevailing dreariness of Parliamentary life. A little shrub makes a show in the desert, and the House of Commons is thankful for very small mercies in the way of fun. No doubt the member for Peterborough presents a type of the rafter which has its humorous side—the type of one who gives himself up to a pet antipathy, who is perpetually harping on and haunted by it, who discovers traces of it in the most unlikely places, and, whatever subject may be started for discussion, never fails to bring it round to the same old point. Mr. WHALLEY's grotesque earnestness and vehemence, his simple faith in himself and in the infallibility of his own judgment, the calm way in which he sets aside everything that does not chime with his preconceived opinions, so that an argument or assertion may be repeated ten or twenty times without producing the slightest effect; the prosaic extravagance of his manner and diction, and, above all, the sort of good-humoured politeness with which he indulges in imputations and contradictions of the most offensive kind, are peculiarities that are ludicrous enough in their way; but it might be supposed that at the end of ten or twelve years the House would be rather tired of laughing at them. We cannot help suspecting that what was most amusing to members was not so much Mr. WHALLEY's oddities as the pretext they afforded for farcical displays on their own part, such as the chorus of "Sing, sing," and a running commentary of interjections. It may be doubted, however, whether this sort of fun is calculated to maintain the dignity of the assembly, and whether, in any case, it has not been rather overdone. The House is now perhaps paying the penalty of its own levity. Last Session there were various indications that the eccentricities which had previously amused the House were getting to be rather past a joke, and might one day lead to a serious interruption of business. The Parliamentary machine is in some respects of extremely delicate construction, and a very little grit might disturb its action. No reasonable person supposes that the Speaker never by any chance makes a mistake, but it is essential to the discipline of the House that his decisions should be received with respectful acquiescence.

The last moments of the House of Commons at the close of the Session appear to have been spent in a vain endeavour on the part of the SPEAKER and other members to restrain the irrepressible loquacity of the member for Peterborough, and to persuade him to submit to the rules of the House. It is easy to call a member to order, but what is to be done if he will not be orderly when called upon? Nothing can exceed the gracious urbanity of Mr. WHALLEY's frank defiance of law and order. He accepts in the most polite and pleasant manner the interruptions of the House, but goes on all the same. It seems to have occurred to him on Saturday last that the time for putting questions would be a good opportunity for delivering himself of a speech on the dangerous number of Roman Catholic magistrates in Ireland, and he was not to be deterred by any of the small conventionalities which are supposed to regulate the proceedings of Parliament. It would perhaps have been equally to the purpose if he had called attention to the excessive number of Roman Catholics of all classes in that country. As the great majority of the Irish people are Roman Catholics, it would appear to be not unnatural or unreasonable that the adherents of this Church should be represented in the magistracy. But Mr. WHALLEY is as much above such commonplace reasoning as he is above the ordinary rules of the House. Calls to order only made him more courteously vehement, and when the SPEAKER remarked that the honourable member was not putting a question, but debating, Mr. WHALLEY insisted upon arguing that he was not debating, but "merely pointing out." Turning to the subject of the TICHBORNE Claimant, Mr. WHALLEY next raised a question which he had repeatedly brought before the House, as to the right of the Claimant to demand that the Government should provide him with adequate means for conducting his defence. The friends of the Claimant appear to be under the impression that it is the duty of the Government to appoint a kind of roving commission to go up and down the world seeking for the survivors of the Bella, and that the prosecution may be conveniently postponed until one at least of those mysterious persons has been discovered in the flesh. It is easy to conceive that to the Claimant himself nothing should appear more natural or desirable than this course of procedure. Some day it may perhaps be understood that it is the proper function of the State, not to prosecute, but to defend all persons charged with criminal offences, but the established practice has hitherto been the other way. To Mr. WHALLEY's inquiries, Mr. WINTERTHAM replied with judicious brevity that, if the Claimant had any statutory rights in this respect, he could enforce them in the ordinary manner in the ordinary courts, but it was not the business of the House to interpret statutes or to offer opinions in such cases. It may be reasonably assumed that the Claimant's legal advisers will not neglect to take advantage of whatever assistance he is entitled to claim from the Crown; but the money which is now being spent on "demonstrations" might be more profitably applied in endeavouring to secure the presence of those "material witnesses" who appear to be still missing.

What Mr. BRIGHT once said in his haste of the House of Lords may be said at leisure concerning a considerable section of the House of Commons. Even the most enthusiastic admirers of that institution will admit that it contains many members who are not very wise; and Mr. WHALLEY certainly does not stand alone in the oddity or absurdity of his opinions. He is clearly entitled, if he chooses, to devote himself to tracking the POPE and the Jesuits through all their stratagems and disguises, and establishing the identity of TOM CASTRO and ROGER TICHBORNE. The difficulty of dealing with Mr. WHALLEY arises, not from the eccentricity of his opinions, but from his ingenuous disregard of the etiquette of debate and the rules of public business. Being incapable of conceiving that he himself is liable to error, he is necessarily obliged to account for any difference of opinion on a question of order by assuming that it is the Speaker who has blundered. It will be observed that the arch-enemy of the Jesuits claims for himself to the fullest extent the infallibility he denies to the POPE. Nor is there anything singular to this state of mind; it is common to a great many excellent people; only it is awkward to find it pushed to an extreme in regard to the elementary rules of public discussion. Even Mr. WHALLEY might be expected to see that it would be impossible to carry on a debate if it were to be allowed to branch off every few minutes into a controversy on some point of order; and the only way in which this can be prevented is by making the Speaker absolute on all such matters. One of these days Mr. WHALLEY may hear himself "named" by the Speaker, and we should then perhaps have a solution of the mystery as to what would happen in that terrible event. If any gentle process of painless extinction could be applied to refractory members, it would greatly simplify the proceedings of Parliament. The clôture runs counter to our instincts and traditions, but it is only by conciliation and compromise that the necessity for a severe measure of this kind can be obviated. Mr. WHALLEY is not the only offender in this way, though his extravagant demeanour makes his offences more glaring. We have taken him merely as an extreme example of what, we fear, is an increasing danger to the good order and decorum of Parliamentary habits. It is not enough that the decisions of the Speaker should be promptly and scrupulously obeyed, and that unseemly wrangling on points of order should be avoided; but something is also due to the temper and convenience of the House at large, even in cases where the member who is addressing it has by the rules a perfect right to claim a hearing. A contest between a growling or howling House and a struggling orator is not a pretty spectacle; and there is a point, more readily understood than defined, at which a member should refrain from forcing himself upon an unwilling auditory. It would be well if the constituencies at the next elections would pay some attention to the manners as well as the opinions of candidates.

DR. CARPENTER AT BRIGHTON.

THE British Association may fairly be congratulated on its sustained and even growing devotion to the serious study and advancement of science. Among the signs of this enhanced sense of what is implied in the design and organization of the Society's annual gatherings is the choice which has now for some years past been made of its President from among the professional or practical workers in the field of science rather than the dilettante ranks of the peerage or baronetage. The difficulty of carrying into practice this stricter theory of choice lies of course in the limited area within which the process of selection must needs be exercised. An annual drain of this nature must ere long, it is to be feared, exhaust the supply of men of first-rate eminence in science or philosophy, or of men likely to rivet the attention of a mixed audience by such an encyclopædic survey of the whole domain of nature as the members, whether professional or amateur, look for from the lips of their President. The essay of some specialist, however eminent, directed to the history or the analysis of what forms his little world of ideas, may seem tame and lifeless work to those whose particular hobby is debarré from air and exercise. Not only may old rivalries or new shapes of jealousy lead to personal passages of arms between illustrious savants who may seize the opportunity of a temporary occupation of the chair, but occasion may be taken to run a tilt at the pretensions or the value of all other branches of scientific pursuit. We may have some distinguished botanist whose darling labours have been stigmatized as the attaching of "barbarous bignonia to foreign weeds," ready with his not less sarcastic or alliterative fling at the pride of the comparative anatomist or paleontologist in sorting ready skeletons, or grubbing among refuse gravels. The best that we can hope for is that personal animosity and scientific rivalry may find at least a yearly truce, and that whether organic or inorganic nature, the secrets of animal or vegetable life, mechanical physics, or the ultimate elements of force and matter, find a mouthpiece in the annual tenant of the chair, turn and turn about may be the accepted rule. Cuius in sua arte credendum is a maxim which, without denying to the hearer the right of wakeful and critical intelligence, and without betraying the lecturer into dogmatic and dictatorial airs, should prepare the way to a good mutual understanding between the speaker and his audience.

There might have been some misgiving lest, by its choice of President on the occasion of the present meeting at Brighton, the Association had committed itself to the infliction of a diatribe upon a somewhat worn topic with which the name of its temporary head has of late years specially connected itself among scientific circles. It must have been in consequence with a feeling of relief and a stirring of new curiosity that the associated members heard Dr. Carpenter unfold his subject of discourse at the Pavilion on Wednesday evening last. The minds of his hearers were not, it appeared, to be sunk in deep-sea soundings, and bewildered by groping for the primary or ultimate germs of life in organisms at work miles below the rays of day. After but a passing reference to the newly organized expedition for the purpose of deep-sea sounding under Government authority, and in charge of Professor Wyville Thomson, the lecturer declared it to be his intention to launch forth upon what may be a yet wider and more unfathomable sea of investigation, albeit a sea that for long ages it has been sought to sound or to exhaust. Instead of opening up new accumulations of scientific knowledge, or announcing any addition of importance to the specific facts proper to his own branch of discovery, what he proposed to himself was an inquiry into the logical grounds of knowledge in general, a scrutiny of the depths to which the mind goes down in its search for the ultimate founts of reason and proof. With predecessors of his in the chair it has been the habit to discourse upon some aspect of nature in her relation to man. It was Dr. Carpenter's object to take up the opposite side of the inquiry—to treat of man as the interpreter of nature. He would speak of the mental processes by which are formed those fundamental conceptions of matter and force, of cause and effect, of law and order, which furnish the basis of all scientific reasoning, constituting the prima philosophia of Bacon. There seems to Dr. Carpenter to be abroad in the world at the present time a great deal of what he cannot but regard as fallacious and misleading philosophy—"oppositions of science falsely so called." There are those who set up their own conceptions of the orderly sequence which they discern in the phenomena of nature as fixed and determinate laws by which those phenomena not only are, but always have been, and always must be, invariably governed. And he has little difficulty in making it clear that such persons are in reality guilty of the same logical fallacy and the same intellectual arrogance which they themselves join in condemning in the systems of the ancients. They do but place themselves in antagonism to those real philosophers who, like Kepler, are ready to give up a darling system the moment it proves itself inconsistent with the facts disclosed by observation, or who, with Schiller, define the real philosopher as one who always loves truth better than his system, or who, above all, with a greater still, combining the truest philosophy with the deepest humility, see in the proudest efforts of the intellect nothing beyond the picking up a few shells on the shore of the vast ocean of truth. There must have been few among Dr. Carpenter's hearers who did not go thoroughly along with him in his denunciation of these heretics to science. The only difficulty must have been, as each looked round upon the assembled representatives of philosophy, to say on whom were the vials of scientific wrath meant to be emptied, or who was to fit the cap to his own head. That many a real or would-be leader of thought in his specific province of natural study may look upon his own scheme as the sole or the truest exponent of nature, we have no manner of doubt. That many a professor, with the class around a professor, may regard the conclusions or definitions which form the current coin of study as coming from the sterling mint of nature herself, and by no further increase of circulation or more delicate assay to undergo loss in value, we may equally concede. The question is, what savant, entitled to the name, but—tacitly at least—has ever held his most prized discoveries or theories subject to deterioration from such causes as the enlargement of the currency of ideas or the more searching processes which await them in the alembic of experiment or observation? A certain order of nature is, Dr. Carpenter warns us, "worshipped as a God" by the class of interpreters whose doctrine he calls in question. It may be replied that the rites of this dreaded deity are performed in secrecy so profound, or by worshippers so infrequent or so obscure, as to form little cause of terror or misgiving for the votaries of a purer creed.

There is much in Dr. Carpenter's exposition of the logic of nature which is true even to triteness. What may be asked is, what does it add to the existing edifice of thought and criticism? That even in the most exact of physical sciences, taking for the moment astronomy to be such, we cannot take a step without translating the phenomena of nature into intellectual representations of nature, is a truth so obvious that it scarcely needed to be enforced by comparison with the parallel modes of interpretation employed by the artist and the poet. Whatever be the phase or mood which nature presents to contemplation, whether it be to the eye of the painter, the poet, or the philosopher that she poses for the while, it must be through the mind or the personal sense that the phenomena which she throws off or presents must pass, and it is into forms of human consciousness that they all resolve themselves under analysis. So geology, to take another instance from Dr. Carpenter, has been from first to last the reflection of the minds by which its study has been directed. Still, every true geologist will hold what is most accepted in opinion or most venerable in name subject to modification or reversal at the voice of one new authenticated fact. The advocates of "intuitive beliefs," of experience as the sole source of knowledge, or of common sense as the ultimate and fundamental ground of appeal, are at no real variance in this particular matter, nor do we see that much is gained to Dr. Carpenter's cause by bringing in those well-known distinctions of thought, whether in combination or antagonism, in rebuke of what he deems the most besetting fault in the philosophy of our day. Our belief in the uniformity of nature must ever underlie every process of physical experiment or speculation, just as the trustworthiness of our faculties must lie at the basis of every mental operation, being as much implied in the denial as in the assertion of their truth. But what is the ground of conviction in either case? Dr. Carpenter evidently thinks he has made a step when he has laid it down that "this confident anticipation is not justified by any absolute necessity of nature, but arises entirely out of our belief in her uniformity." We know out of what arises the power of opium to set people asleep, according to the scholastic formula. We should hardly have expected the President of a meeting like that at Brighton to halt on his way to make a point like this. Nor is it altogether consistent with his opening reprobation of substituting man's conceptions of nature for nature herself, that we find him resting with satisfaction in the conclusion that "to each man of science nature is what he individually believes her to be." Is it the whole result of his indignant censure of the puffed-up and egotistic school of the day that scientific truth is no more than what each man of science throweth?

There is more force and consistency in the later stage of Dr. Carpenter's reasoning, in which he traces our reliance upon the trustworthiness of common sense and scientific inference alike, not to any one set of experiences, but to our unconscious coordination of the whole aggregate of our experiences—"to our reliance, not on the conclusiveness of any one train of reasoning, but on the convergence of all our lines of thought towards this one centre." More forcible and progressive still is his remark, in the spirit, if not in the language, of Darwin, that "the intellectual intuitions of any one generation are the embodied experiences of the previous race." We are carried a step onward, or we should say, historically speaking, a step backward, toward the prime and ultimate origin of the belief in question. But what if the absolute and original form of this belief lies really as far off and as low down in the order of things as the origin of life, or the primary impulse of motion? What if, in the earliest dawn of consciousness, we take our belief to nature, at least as much, as truly, and to the full, as we draw it from her? What if we have here but one more instance or verification of that great law of unity or mutual interworking which, in the earnest peroration of this address, is spoken of as operating through the limitless extent and variety of the universe; alike in the inorganic or unconscious agencies of matter, and in the operations of organic, vital, and conscious force? Infinite and inexhaustible as are the "possibilities" which nature may have in store for man, her minister or interpreter, it is ever in the direction of harmony and unity that their joint action rightly tends. It is to Mind, as the address ends with saying, that "both the deep-seated instincts of man and the profoundest researches of philosophy alike point as the one and only source of power." Nor need we fear but that the laws of mind are ultimately in truth the same—in nature, man, and God. To speak of the formulas which from time to time embody man's empirical ideas of nature, of God, or of himself, as "laws" mechanical and self-acting, excluding or rendering unnecessary the power which alone can give them effect, is to exalt the mind of man to the exclusion or disparagement of the co-ordinate, or rather over-ruling, power, upon which both nature and man depend. Such may be the tendency of a narrow and hard, but not of a numerous or influential, sect of the philosophy of our day. Though modern science, "as seeking exclusively the order of nature," separates itself more and more widely from theology, "which seeks its cause," there is room and hope for the working of a higher and more comprehensive school, which may have for its task and its glory the correlation of laws or truths which as yet seem to have neither common measure nor design. Philosophy and religion may build up side by side the proofs of that stupendous whole of many parts contemplated by the poet, Whose body Nature is, and God the soul.

LARNTHAL.

WE feel, as the Quakers say, a concern lest we should be reproached for inconsistency. After speaking our mind pretty freely as to the sayings and doings of the British tourist and the delight of the genuine traveller on first getting beyond his range, we may seem to be cutting our own throat if we call attention to a region of high houses and wide streets which we suspect that the British tourist does not often make his way. Near the districts which he does frequent there often lie other districts of high attraction in every way which the real traveller has all to himself. Hardly an English name is to be seen in the list of strangers; not a word of English, or of any tongue but the language of the country, is to be heard among those whom the traveller comes across. Such districts one would, if one could, keep hidden from the general public and reveal their being to those only who are worthy. But unluckily we know of no system of freemasonry by which we can pass on knowledge to the one class without at least putting it in the way of the other class. Our only hope is that, by a happy instinct which they not uncommonly display, they may read our invitation as a warning and keep themselves off of their own free will. We will venture then to suggest to those who set out from home with some reasonable object before them, be it history or antiquities or geology or natural history or the study of men and manners, that a region rich in more than one of these ways at once, and from which tourists seem hitherto to have had the grace to keep quite away, may be found within easy reach of another region where tourists, and classes much worse than tourists, do greatly abound. At no great distance from the Nassau watering-places, at no great distance from some of the most hackneyed points on the Rhine, lies the upper part of the beautiful valley of Lahn, one of the most picturesque regions of the old Frankland, a district fully answering in all points to the description which we have just given. We are half afraid to talk about it, for fear Mr. Cook should at once go and "open it up" to the British public. Still we cannot withstand the temptation of saying somewhat about so beautiful and so historic a region, and of pointing out what there is to be seen there to those who are worthy to enjoy it.

The banks of the Lahn have lately been brought into more notice than usual by reason of the festival held in those parts in honour of the famous Minister Von Stein, the second founder of the power of Prussia. And one of the picturesque towns of the district is familiar by name at least to every devotee of Goethe. For was it not in the free Imperial city of Wetzlar that Lötchen out the ever-memorable bread and butter for her brothers and sisters while Dr. Goethe was practising the law of the Empire before the Reichskammergericht? And in another part of the town the curious may still be shown the very house in which the luckless wight who bore the strange name of Jerusalem committed the rash act of shooting himself. We confess that our sympathies are more deeply awakened by the memory of Von Stein than by the memory of Lötchen; but, better than either, we like to carry our thoughts back to days before either the Minister or the poet, to days before there was either a Reichskammergericht to plead before or a kingdom of Prussia to set up again, and when there was no danger of a free Baron of the Empire being swallowed up either by a French Republic or by a Duchy of Nassau. We pass along the picturesque valley with its ranges of hills on either side, and the level of the plain itself broken by isolated rocks. Each island peak, each rocky promontory jutting over the river, has its own legend, its own living memorial in the shape of town, or castle, or church, or monastery. Amöneburg is still fragrant with the memory of St. Boniface. The basaltic rocks of Gleiberg and Felsberg are still crowned by their ruined towers. But some spots demand a longer stay and a longer notice, and among them the three towns of Marburg, Wetzlar, and Limburg, with what we may look on as its dependency of Dietkirchen, may fairly claim the first place. Each of these towns stands nobly over the river; each is rich in its surviving ancient buildings; Marburg especially has a double source of attraction in the possession at once of a church and of a castle of the highest interest. Wetzlar, besides its picturesque site and the hill-fort which looks down upon it, has a church which has gone through some of the strangest changes of any building in existence. At Limburg almost the whole interest gathers round one single building—the now cathedral church. And no better proof can there be to show how much may be done by the choice of a majestic site and by that variety of outline in which the German architect surpassed all others, when we see so small a church as this, on a scale far below that of Wells or Hereford, standing forth as a rival of the general effect at once of Lincoln and of Durham. The church is finished with seven towers, a plan designed at Winchester and half carried out at Leam, but which here at Limburg, as at Rouen, appears in its full perfection. Its south side rises like Lincoln over the city at its foot, while to the north and east the church and its attendant buildings crown, like those at Durham, the rocks which overhang the river. The whole pile as seen from the bridge, the east end as seen from the foot of the precipice on which it stands, are really among the greatest triumphs of the art of architectural grouping. At the first sight of Limburg there is perhaps a certain feeling of disappointment as the eye first takes in its small position. We have heard of the seven towers, we have seen them in engravings, and we are apt instinctively to conceive that the church which is crowned with such a diadem must be one to take its place among the great churches of Christendom. But this feeling soon passes away and we are left to admire without drawbacks the ever-shifting outlines of a building which must be nearly the most picturesque even among the picturesque churches of Germany. Its satellite Dietkirchen stands on a site not unlike its own. Its east end, almost hidden by a crowd of surrounding buildings, crowns the rocks above the Lahn just like its more lonely neighbour. As the chief church of a city Dietkirchen might, at least in Germany, be looked down upon; but in England its two bold western towers, both Romanesque, but not exactly alike, would be unique in any except churches of the higher rank; and, standing as it does on the outskirts of a mere village, and placed on one of the most picturesque of sites, it is a building which would call to itself no small share of attention in any part of the world.

Setting aside Dietkirchen as a village, the three towns have each of them a character of its own conformable to its own peculiar history. Marburg was the dwelling-place of a temporal prince; its steep is therefore crowned, not by an episcopal church or an episcopal palace, but by the castle of the Landgraves. The great church of St. Elizabeth, the church of Conrad of Marburg, stands at the foot of the height and not on its summit. Limburg, for some centuries at least, was the possession, if not the dwelling-place, of an ecclesiastical prince, of the Primate who was also Arch-Chancellor of Gaul. It was neither an Imperial city nor the capital of a temporal principality. The ecclesiastical element is therefore predominant. The minster and its attendant buildings sit side by side as a stronghold on a rock; but there is nothing like the gorgeous display of temporal magnificence which we see in the episcopal palaces of Trier and Würzburg. Wetzlar had neither spiritual nor temporal lord; a free city of the Empire, the peer of Köln and Frankfurt, she had no King but Caesar, and no smaller potentate might enthrone himself as a master within her gates. A little way beyond them she had her Melvoisin, her evil neighbour, in the shape of the fortress crowning the hill which soars above her; but within her gates the objects to be studied are her gates and towers themselves, and the picturesque winding streets climbing up the hill crowned by the minster and the open space around it. It was only in the latest age of the Empire that Wetzlar became a chief seat of such Imperial power as still was left, when such causes as were reserved unto the hearing of Augustus, or of those by whom Augustus was directly represented, were decided—or at least argued—within her walls, and when a poet who survived the Empire held, or might have held, a brief at Caesar's judgment-seat. But the character of an Imperial city is impressed on Wetzlar from the beginning. Marburg is a city of princes; Limburg is mainly ecclesiastical; Wetzlar, small as it is, is every stone of it, a city of Emperors.

Of the four churches which we have brought together, Dietkirchen and Wetzlar are the only two which retain any portions of unmingled Romanesque. The internal look of Dietkirchen, with its plain square piers and arches, and the single round arch of its triforium, is, as so often happens in Germany, unworthy of the expectations which are aroused by the picturesque effort of its site and its towers. At Wetzlar the Romanesque part is of very small extent, but it is of the highest possible value; it consists of the original west front of the church, which has been preserved in a strange way through the very fact of its being destined to destruction. The whole church, from the west wall eastward, has been rebuilt, and it is now, both physically and theologically, divided into two, being parted asunder between the two prevalent religions. The nave, a fair example of what the Germans call a Hallenkirche, one with the nave and aisles of equal height like Bristol Cathedral, and containing some fine geometrical windows, is used for Protestant worship. The Catholics keep possession of the choir, and the two parts are divided by a most stately roodloft. This choir, contrary to all German custom, is lower than the nave, and the work is of earlier date, the windows showing tracery in its rudimental form. It is plain that the work of rebuilding began from the east, and that, as the builders got westward, their ideas enlarged, and they made their nave on a grander scale than their choir. When they came, a generation or two later, to design their west front, their ideas enlarged again, and they planned a magnificent facade with two lofty towers, and a stately double portal between them. The west wall was now to be advanced considerably to the west, and the length of the nave was to be increased by two bays. To this plan of course the original west front was to give way, but the builders had the discretion not to pull down till they had built up, and, as they never finished building up, they never altogether finished pulling down. The new west front was begun, its walls were carried up to a certain height all round, and its southern tower was finished as much as many other Continental towers are finished—that is, it is complete as a square tower, but lacks the crown of its spire or octagon. But the central compartment got no higher than the portal, and of the northern tower nothing but a mere stump was built. Meanwhile the ancient front was touched only so far as was needed for the building of the southern tower and its junction with the nave on that side. This involved the destruction of the southern tower of the old front, but left the northern tower and the great central doorway. The church therefore has now two imperfect fronts, one behind the other—the southern tower of the later, and the northern tower of the earlier front, being in a comparatively finished state. Thus, from our point of view, we trust it may always remain; we could not wish to see the church enlarged and the later front finished at the sacrifice of the precious relics of Romanesque work which lurk behind. The northern tower is one of those which in England we should be inclined to set very early, but which in Germany are often late in the eleventh century, or early in the twelfth. But the central doorway, double, and divided by a shaft, is one of the noblest examples of the style. The whole is rich with ornament bold and massive, but thoroughly appropriate, while the central front carries us back to Speyer and Gelnhausen, and to the lands from which Speier and Gelnhausen drew their models. As becomes an Imperial city, the capital of the one single column in the whole building assumes what we may perhaps venture to call the Imperial form.

In chronological order Limburg comes next. The church, raised in modern times to cathedral rank, is throughout a perfect example of the German transitional style; the stage where, outside at least, the general look and feeling is still Romanesque, but where nearly every arch is pointed. The details of the west front show plainly that it belongs to the thirteenth century, but as far as the general outline and finish of its towers go, it might have belonged to the eleventh. Within, the piers, though their arches are pointed, retain the square massiveness of the Romanesque, but the upper portions are later, and, in idea at least, much more advanced. Limburg, indeed, has some points of likeness to Laon in internal treatment as well as in external outline. Both have the same double triforium, making a fourfold instead of threefold division of the height; but at Limburg, as so often in Germany, the lower triforium forms a real gallery designed from the beginning. The internal treatment of the central octagon is most skillfully managed, and the whole inside has an appearance of dignity which might have been thought hard to reach in a church on so small a scale.

Marburg is, on every ground, one of the most famous churches of Germany. Its connexion with the history of St. Elizabeth and with the early days of the Teutonic Order, its wealth in tombs, pictures, and other ornaments, the shrine of the sainted princess herself among them, combine with its singular perfection as an example of the earlier German Gothic style to make it one of the most typical churches of the land. All of a single date, except no doubt the finish of the two slightly unequal towers, the building gains as an artistic study what it loses as a matter of architectural history. In Marburg there is nothing to be spelled out, as at Wetzlar; there is a work, perfect in its own kind, to be studied and rated at its true value. It is a thoroughly German church, a Hallenkirche with apsidal transepts; no one could for a moment take it for a French or an English building. The merits of the arrangement, the equal height of the nave and its aisles, as compared with the several stages of internal elevation with which we are more familiar, is fairly a question of taste. It may perhaps be said that, at least as we see it at Marburg and Wetzlar, it gains in lightness but loses in dignity. The treatment of the piers and arches at Marburg is most successful; that of the windows and the external treatment generally strikes us as less so. We cannot blame its designers for not choosing the heavy roof which seems to crush so many churches of this type, as the choirs of the two great churches of Nürnberg. But surely the arrangement of Wetzlar, where each bay of the aisle is gabled and contains a single large window, is better than that of Marburg, where the gables are hipped, and the whole circuit of the outside is cut up into two ranges of small windows. Even in the apses, the special German arrangement, the tall narrow windows, so glorious at Aachen, and which may fairly stand their ground as an alternative arrangement beside the circling chapels of France and the great east windows of England, is at Marburg forsaken. To us it seems that two or more ranges of windows, unless they really mark two constructive stages of the building, sin against the first law of reality. The arcade, triforium, and clerestory are properly marked by three ranges of windows, because they are three real stages of the building; here at Marburg, the whole height of the church forms but one stage, and it should therefore have but one range of windows. In Romanesque apses and transept fronts we indeed see several ranges of windows one above the other, and the effect is thoroughly good. But why? Because, though they do not mark any actual constructive ranges in the apses and transept fronts themselves, they are continuations of real constructive ranges in other parts of the building. Also in Romanesque, a style without tracery, windows must ever be small, and a window of the height of those at Aachen or Wetzlar would be impossible. It struck us at the first glance, and we still think, after weighing the matter, that the arrangement of the windows is a fault throughout the beautiful church.

We have no room left to speak of the castle of Marburg. We will therefore only say that it is no mere ruin, no mere predatory fortress. It is a well preserved mediæval secular building, worthy of the site on which it stands, and of the church on which it looks down. Its vaulted halls, its chapel, its windows, the architectural details throughout the building, deserve real artistic study, and not mere picturesque admiration.

GROUSE, POLITICS, AND PROSPERITY.

NOW that the Twelfth of August is marked with a white stone by the fortunate people who can afford to enjoy it, it is curious to remember from what very recent times the great shooting festival dates its origin. Fashion has done much for it, and atone more, until at last the masses who never share in it have come to regard it as a national institution. Naturally, as July is followed by August, the Session goes out as the grouse comes in, nor dare the most autocratic of popular Ministers dream of prolonging legislation beyond the morning of the 10th. Grouse, as is known, wait for no man, and if you do not shoot them early in their season, they will not attend your leisure at the end. The harshest and least sympathetic critics feel that it is idle to protest against the precipitancy that condemns many a promising measure to an untimely fate. The hardest-working Englishman believes in holidays, seldom as he may enjoy one; field sports are understood to be a grand specific for cobwebs on the brain, and the moors are believed to be a more bracing school for our public men than the stables. We grumble at national blunders and shortcomings, but in our most hearts we feel an honest pride in the rough-and-ready statesmanship, soldiery, and diplomacy that always pull us through somehow. We are perpetually coming to grief in matters of detail. We go on committing laches to which our generous consciences hasten to plead half guilty, hinting in advance our readiness to pay down millions by way of atonement if needful. We organize expeditions regardless of expense to avenge ourselves on some remote potentate who, secure in almost impregnable fastnesses, having taken umbrage at the negligence of a Foreign-Office clerk, has shown his displeasure by locking up a missionary and a traveller. We are always crying out about economy; and we keep up the most costly army in the world, which we loudly declare to be the most inefficient. But somehow the army, like our other institutions, has generally done its work, although it may be in an expensive fashion. We have had a succession of incompetent Ministers at home—witness philippics of the Opposition and leading articles passim. We have sent out diplomatists to be overreached and bamboozled by their shrewder rivals, and the result of it all is that England has attained her present highly satisfactory position of power and prosperity, while her purse seems to fill the faster for the perpetual waste.

We believe in the national pluck, vigour, and resources, and, above all, in the system of training that develops them. We have our theory as to why our somewhat haphazard statesmanship and strategy should have yielded results so brilliant. Our governing classes and the men who give an impulse to the commerce that fills the Treasury to overflowing have always gone to school in the open air, and we know that it is not the boy who pores over his books in playtime and prides himself on the propriety of his well-brushed jacket that makes the most conspicuous figure in after life. We do not say that there are not advantages in passing one's holidays as Continental generals and statesmen do. You go to your country house with chestfuls of books, blue, green, or yellow, and master after an early dinner an enormous amount of knowledge that may one day prove useful. You associate with kindred spirits at the waters, and discuss by the Brunton of a morning, or on the Casino terrace of an afternoon, subtle questions of campaigns, political and military. No doubt you have your reward. Knowledge of a certain kind can only come with assiduous study, and must always have its value. Of course you are less likely to bring to grief the country for whose destinies you are responsible if you have forecast and discussed in advance each conceivable contingency. But the other system has its advantages too, especially when contemporary politics are full of surprises, and pregnant with unlooked-for emergencies. A Minister startled by a telegram reaching him at his shooting-box finds his nerves already strung to deal with the difficulty that has risen of a sudden in his path. His first fresh, clear, courageous instinct ought to be worth hours of dull Cabinet deliberation. When is a great engineer more likely to strike out his most brilliant and original conceptions than when his brain is still working from habit in the accustomed grooves in the innocent intoxication of the breezy air of the mountains, possibly dashed with a suspicion of brine from the neighbouring ocean? The rank and file of Parliament in their degree profit by the regimen that invigorates their leaders, and the millionaires of industry and commerce temper their spirits for the cool daring speculations which have made the fortunes of England together with their own.

We do not exactly mean to say that the grouse are the guardian spirit of England. England flourished when the grouse was as rare in English markets as the bustard, and a thorough English Minister like Sir Robert Walpole freshened himself and his vigorous policy on his Norfolk partridge ground. But the moor and the hill, scarcely known in those more easy-going days, administer to our more jaded and effete civilization the stronger tonic which it requires. We remarked at the outset on the very recent date of the great festival which is now so popular. Even at the beginning of this century the Highland lairds had but the faintest glimmerings of the treasure they possessed in their barren mountains. A Highland gentleman shot, and made his keeper shoot, and his household was sated with game in the season, as it had been with salmon some fifty years earlier still. If a stray traveller ventured into those melancholy wilds, and chose to bring his gun with him, he might have a turn on the moors almost anywhere for the asking. In any case he found game everywhere on the inn tables, although there might be no beef, and only salted mutton. The host, by understanding with the functionary who combined the keepership with a variety of other avocations, might always send a gun upon the hill, if he desired to supply his larder. Those days should have been the golden age of the grouse, when an occasional flint single-barrel was the only weapon they had to dread. It is true that, as even the animal creation has never been exempt from the primal curse, it was not all so bright with them then as it might seem now in the retrospect. Their winged and four-footed enemies flourished and multiplied as they have never done since. Eagles, hawks and kites, ravens, crows and magpies, foxes, wild cats, marten cats, polecats, stoats, and weasels, harboured undisturbed in coony and corm, and were little molested in their nightly flights and patrols. But at least there were no organized massacres in the early weeks of the season, when whole flocks of innocents, kicked up by single birds, fell fast to the deadly roll of quick-shooting, quick-loading central fires, as men shot against each other to top the paragraphs in the papers. Now fashion and science conspire against the birds. The remoteness which formerly was their best safeguard has become a thing of the past, now that Highland railways and swift steamers have established communications with the great Southern network of lines. They are scrupulously preserved from illicit raids, and their natural enemies are rigorously proscribed everywhere beyond the limits of the deer forests. But they are only preserved as the calf is cherished and fattened for the knife of the butcher. They fall in late August as pigeons at Hurlingham, or autumn leaves in Vallambrosa, and, useful in death as beautiful in life, they play no insignificant part in contributing to the greatness and prosperity of England.

It may be prejudice, but we believe there is no sport like grouse-shooting for the tolerably active man, well advanced past middle age. Even if he have the head, he has neither the limbs nor the wind left him to clear Alpine crevasses, to grind his way up interminable moraines, to scale ice-walls, and balance himself on giddy ridges. He may be no seaman, and may object to having his enfeebled constitution renovated by internal revolution as he is rocked on the heaving billows. Even if foxes came in with grouse, he may have lost as much in nerve as he has gained in weight. Low-country shooting is not to be despised, but it becomes rather a strain than otherwise when you must labour over the turnip drills while the languid air lies heavily on the flat between the hedgerows. Comparatively few men past fifty are sufficiently certain of their aim to care for the long break-neck stalk, now crawling in the ice-cold brook, now running like the animal they are after, on the vague chance of missing a deer with a shaking hand. But every one who has the money and the time can find grouse-shooting suitable to him. If he cares for heavy bags and easy walking, there are the great barren tablelands stretching away on the level, or rolling slightly on the rise towards the low ridge that bounds the horizon. If he likes fair but not excessive exercise, he may select his lodge in some valley among those uplands where the fitful puffs of air change into a cooling breeze as you saunter by easy zigzags up the gentle ascents. But if you really desire the sport in perfection, you must rent your moor among the wild hills on the Northern watershed, where, rising from the zone of the grouse to that of the ptarmigan, you may feast your eyes on each bare-scalped Pegasus in the glorious panorama, embracing everything in its scope from the yellow corn-fields in the remote lowlands to the grey distant haze that rests on the green rollers of the Atlantic. What a life-inspiring change from Pall Mall pavements, and close Committee-rooms looking over the lead-coloured Thames, provided you don't draw too freely on your pluck, and risk doing yourself irreparable injury in the first excitement of your intoxication! You have beats of a dozen or fifteen miles as the crow flies, where you go meandering after your dogs up hill and down corry, over rocks and precipices, now leaping from stone to stone in a half-dried torrent bed, now scrambling with hands and knees and painfully drawn breath up some rugged natural corridor. Birds are in plenty, although not in superabundance; all of them already well grown and strong upon the wing, save here and there a second covey of "cheepers" which you spare with their anxious parents in charitable contempt. Each corner that you turn opens up some fresh enchanting prospect, as different from the bricks and mortar among which you have been vegetating through the early summer as is the mountain breeze from the tainted atmosphere within the bills of mortality in the normal playgrounds of epidemics. Here are the remains of a blasted pine wood on a sheltered slope, and lower down a group of graceful birches—a notorious spot for black game—feathering down on a stretch of soft emerald turf by the rivulet. There is a wide barren plain, redeemed from utter solitude by a single shepherd's shieling, stretching away to where the sheer walls of rock drop into the deep blue lake that lies sleeping at their feet. Then comes the mid-day meal, when you make your frugal repast by some diamond of the desert, to be followed by the well-earned siesta, when you sink back as the extinguished cigar falls from your lips, and dream dreams of the worries that are past—dreams that are followed by awakening to the delightful reality. We know not whether grouse may not be doomed, as outraging the communistic tendencies of an age which denounces the reserving of special recreations for the plutocracy, but we are sure there is a great deal to be said for their careful preservation on national and material, as well as selfish and sentimental, grounds.

POETRY AND SEWAGE.

WE have all read much in prose and verse about the Tweed and its tributary streams, but it has not perhaps occurred to us to consider those rivers in the necessary, but unromantic, point of view of drainage outfalls. The Commission on the Pollution of Rivers has lately published a description of the basin of the Tweed which may scarcely harmonize with some other descriptions of the same locality with which we are familiar. The poets call a river clear or pure just as they call a man strong or a woman fair:—

Sweet Teviot, on thy silver side
The glaring half-fires blime no more;
No longer steel-clad warriors ride
Along thy wild and willowed shore

This river has long ceased to deserve to be called "sweet." Indeed, it has become so great a nuisance that nobody would ride upon its banks who could possibly reach his destination another way. The Teviot is polluted by town sewage, liquid refuse from woollen manufactories, dye-works, and tanyards, and also by cinders and spent bark. People who dwell upon a river's bank seem to expect that it will carry away, not only all the liquid filth which they choose to pour into it, but any quantity of solid refuse as well. No doubt a river can put away a good deal, and probably nobody ever explored a deep hole by diving without finding an old pot or kettle at the bottom of it. But, still, there is a limit to the capacity of every stream, and the entire sewage of Hawick, combined with cinders, broken crockery, pots, and kettles, seems to be rather too much for the Teviot. That bold moss-trooper William of Deloraine would have done much to serve the Lady of Branksome, but we question whether he would not have hesitated to ford the modern Teviot below Hawick. Let us hear a description of the Tweed just below the confluence of the Galawater, and close to Melrose, to which place Deloraine was sent. A resident at Melrose told the Commissioners that in his time the Tweed has always been filthy when the river is low, but of late years it has become much worse, and in summer-time now the stench of it is odious, and the colour of the water very bad. On Saturday afternoons it comes down blue, red, and green, with masses of woollen stuff floating on it. There is a weir at Melrose, which creates a great pool, in which this stuff settles. The result is that the bed of this pool has become perfectly filthy, so that if a dog goes into it he comes out just as if he had escaped from a dye-vat. The Galawater has the credit of bringing most of this impurity into the Tweed, and indeed that unfortunate little stream seems to be perfectly overwhelmed with nastiness. The Commissioners call it "the dirtiest of the affluents" of the Tweed. There is another stream, even more thoroughly consecrated to poetry, which has hitherto enjoyed a better fate:—

What's Yarrow but a river bare,
That glides the dark hills under?

Well, we are glad to say that it is still not much else. Woollen manufactories, dye works, paper mills, have not yet been established along its banks. But it is destined to share the fate of its sister rivers, and if you wish to see it in pristine purity, you had better not delay your visit. Its holms are green and its stream is sweet; but some enterprising capitalist will doubtless soon reduce it to the condition of the Galawater or the Teviot:—

Oh! swiftly can speed my dapple grey steed,
Which drinks of the Teviot stream;

and it may be hoped that there are still fast horses in Buccleugh's country, although they may have a difficulty to find clear water. Some of the manufacturers boldly asserted that it was not they who polluted the rivers, but the farmers with their lime and manure and sheep-wash; but analysis was against this theory. Sheep-washing lasts only a few days, but wool-washing goes on all the year. By a curious fatality the Leader, which Wodsworth has associated so closely with the Galawater, is almost unpolluted, but nobody can tell how long it will remain so. The nuisance, however, may in time become unbearable. Every manufacturer requires pure water for his work, and if the stream which flows past his door has been polluted, he must fetch clear water from elsewhere. It would seem to be almost as cheap to leave the streams as nature made them, and to dispose of refuse otherwise than in their channels. It would be vain to ask commercial people to consider the poetical or the picturesque, but it really deserves attention that, if the natural beauty of this district be destroyed, tourists from America and England will cease to visit it, and then the hotels and railways will become unprofitable. It will, at any rate, be necessary to amend the quotations of the guide-books:—

If thou wouldst view fair Melrose aight,
Go visit it by the pale moonlight,
But do not go on Saturday night;

because the stink of the Tweed will poison you. The river spirit who complained that

Tears of an imprudent maiden
Mix with my polluted stream, has doubtless been long since improved away from the banks of the Teviot, but if he remained there, he would know by this time what pollution really means. He was, we think, disposed to put "rather too fine a point on it" to suit this district in modern times. The Ale, through which Deloraine rode, remains hitherto uncontaminated, but the Jed, which like the Ale is a tributary of the Teviot, has been reduced to the condition of a sewer. We do not know whether the water spirit would find any maidens' tears in the Jed, but he would certainly find there town sewage and liquid refuse from woollen manufactories, dye works, tanyards, skinners, slaughter-houses, gas works, and sheep-dip manufactories.

The Clyde, which is laden with filth beyond computation before it joins the sea, is, in its upper reaches, and for more than two-thirds of its course, one of the most beautiful of Scottish rivers. Its waters pleasant upland pastoral valleys, traverses rich and fertile lowland landscapes, falls through abrupt and rocky wooded defiles, and furnishes, in one portion of its course, some of the finest river scenery in the island. Nowhere is there a greater contrast than that which exists between the unpolluted waters which come down to Lanark, or even as far as Hamilton, and the foul and stinking fluid to which they have been changed not twenty miles beyond that point. The Commissioners from whom we are quoting grow positively eloquent in describing the nastiness of the Clyde. Within the space of a few miles, they say, river pollution is exhibited in almost all its forms, and may be witnessed in every degree of intensity. This change, which takes place so rapidly as the river passes certain points, has nearly all arisen within living recollection. It is not very long since the Clyde, even at Glasgow, was comparatively clean. Now its water is loaded with sewage mud, foul with sewage gas, and poisoned by sewage waste of every kind. The cause of this change is to be found in the enormous increase of population and of manufacturing industry which during the past generation has been witnessed in Clydesdale.

We will not examine the condition of other rivers. It may suffice to say that wherever manufacturing industry prevails there is an abominable nuisance. In truth, this question of sewage, however disagreeable, will force itself into notice as one of the most pressing questions of the time. The beauty of our rivers has been spoiled, the fish in them have been killed, and the water has been rendered unfit for use. All large towns pollute the water which comes to them naturally, and are forced to bring other water to them artificially. It is contemplated to take the water of "still St. Mary's Lake," which belongs to the basin of the Tweed, and carry it to Edinburgh. In like manner it has been proposed to carry water from the lakes of Wales or Cumberland to London. But before these violent interferences with the order of nature are attempted, it might be well to try the effect of allowing nature a fair chance. It has already been determined that the Thames shall not be polluted by the sewage of towns upon its banks. And when these towns find that they must dispose of their sewage otherwise, they will doubtless contrive the means of doing so. It is said that by sewage irrigation large crops of grass may be grown, on which cattle may be fed. But although sewage is a nuisance, and meat is scarce, it has hitherto been almost impossible to employ the one in producing the other. Yet these Commissioners agree with other authorities in declaring that sewage can be profitably applied to land, and that there is no other trustworthy means of getting rid of it. It is said that when a large breadth of land cannot be obtained near a town, a process of filtration may be employed, for which a few acres of land, properly prepared, will suffice. The latter process is declared by these Commissioners to be effectual, while the former process is not only effectual, but profitable. As regards the refuse of manufactories, which is usually much more poisonous than sewage, manufacturers themselves would be glad to be placed under a general law which should compel all alike to adopt measures for disposing of this refuse otherwise than by pouring it into rivers. The pollution of the Thames concerns London only, but the pollution of "Tweed's fair river broad and deep" concerns all the English-speaking world. Americans have subscribed to the rebuilding of Warwick Castle, and they would doubtless subscribe, if necessary, to preserve the purity and beauty of the Tweed and its tributary streams. If this object had been proposed to the enthusiastic assemblies which toasted the memory of Sir Walter Scott last year, it surely might have been accomplished.

We have a vision of our own;
Ah! why should we undo it?

We have dreamed of the fair-flowing water of Teviot, and let us not allow ourselves to behold the hideous deformity of a dark and fetid stream. It were better never to cross the Scottish border than to run the risk of finding "another Yarrow" from that which bore burden to the Last Minstrel's song. But it cannot be that the process of defiling and deforming nature will continue. At the present rate of progress it would soon be necessary for an Englishman or Scotchman to cross the sea in order to behold anything that might deserve to be called a river. When things are at the worst they must mend, and nothing can be more disgusting than the description in this Report of the condition of the Galawater where it joins the Tweed above Melrose. The fiend who at the bidding of Michael Scott built a weir across the Tweed, and asked for another job, might find continuous employment in keeping this river clean. If he were very troublesome, he might be ordered to wash a man who had bathed in it.

THE EUPHRATES VALLEY RAILWAY.

THAT "England is an Asiatic Power" is a favourite doctrine with those who think it necessary to give some reason, founded on higher motives than avowed sloth and selfishness, for advocating the modern Manchester policy of total abstinence from European politics. If we may not altogether admire the use which is made of the plea, we cannot impugn its truth, nor altogether deny its validity; and it has at all events over the naked baseness of the "Perish Savoy!" principle the advantage of decency; it does recognize the existence of such a thing as national duty, and national responsibility for the exercise of the great powers and the use of the splendid opportunities which Providence has granted. It recognizes these things at least in name and form, even if those who employ the phrase are not generally more earnest in their zeal for the performance of England's duties and the maintenance of English policy in Asia than the old-fashioned statesmen who would have scorned to make the greatness of our Oriental Empire an excuse for littleness at home. England is a great Asiatic

Power—the greatest, if she chooses, of all Asiatic Powers—and enjoys in that position such opportunities of national greatness and of unselfish beneficence as have rarely, if ever, fallen to the lot of a ruling State or dominant race. And, as the mistress of the finest empire in Asia, and the stronger and more civilized of the two rivals between whom the hegemony of the continent is now divided, and in whose hands its future lies, she cannot, without a palpable dereliction of duty, without proving herself manifestly degenerate from her past and unworthy of her present, abdicate her paramount influence in Oriental politics, or leave them to settle themselves or be settled by the sword of the strongest, as she has of late seemed disposed to leave the affairs of Europe. Every question that affects the stability of a leading Asiatic Government, the rise or decline of a nation, the distribution of territory, even the intrigues of a Court or the slow and silent progress of hostile diplomacy, is of as deep concern to the sovereign of India as are the like matters in central Europe to Austria and Germany, or as the fate of Holland and Belgium is to France. Above all, she is intimately affected by the policy and the fortunes of the two principal Mahomedan States, by the tendency of their foreign alliances or leanings, by their internal development or decay, by everything that can render them an easier prey to Russian aggression, or a stronger barrier against it. She is interested in them, too, by a more unselfish title; by her obvious mission, or, in American language, her manifest destiny, as the civilizer of Southern Asia, the prospective or possible restorer of its lost prosperity, the developer of its long-neglected, but still enormous and practically inexhaustible, resources. And further she is interested in them, directly and immediately, as they lie between herself and her Eastern possessions; and as their friendship or enmity, their civilization or retrogression, may hinder or help communication between the source of her strength and the seat of her power—may facilitate or retard the transport of British troops, artillery, and material to India, and the establishment of a route along which traffic may pass more rapidly and readily than by the Suez Canal and the Red Sea, and the existence of which would therefore tend more than anything else to open up India to British capital, energy, and enterprise, and to open to Indian industry and commerce, quickened by their influence, the markets of the West. Those, then, who remind us so emphatically that England is an Asiatic Power must in consistency allow that nothing that materially affects the fortunes of Asiatic Turkey can be matter of indifference to her. Those who, on the ground that our future lies in the East, bid us regard with undisturbed tranquillity the conquests of Germany, or the encroachments of France, must on the same ground admit that we are much more deeply interested in the advance of Russia and in the stability of the Porte; that, if we can afford to sit still while Prussia acquires the command of the Sound, it is because we are more intimately concerned in the security of the Bosphorus; and that in proportion as we think less of the balance of power on the Rhine, we are more impelled to watch with anxiety the balance of power on the Caucasus. That the principle in question has not been thus carried out, the complaints of Indian statesmen, the unopposed progress of Russia, and the recent abandonment of the Porte at a critical moment, sufficiently prove. That a certain number of English public men are alive to the greatness and urgency of our Asiatic interests, and contrive to compel the attention of languid or pre-occupied Ministers, is testified by a variety of valuable publications which the general public does not read, and by occasional questions and conversations in Parliament to which, significant as they are, it pays no attention.

After the question of an overland railway route to India, and the Report of General Chesney on the Euphrates Valley exploration, had been allowed to slumber for thirty-five years, a Committee sat during the two last Sessions to consider the subject; and it has produced a Report in favour of the project which has evidently been impaired in force and cogency by the lukewarmness of the commercial and the reserve of the official members, but which nevertheless is worth reading, and is backed by evidence, not voluminous, but extremely weighty and well chosen, and bringing a great preponderance of authority to bear on the affirmative side. That it would be of immense advantage to England and to India if the passage between them could be shortened by seven or eight days, few will dispute; that the military importance of such a result might at times be incalculable, the Mutiny has proved beyond possibility of doubt. The Suez Canal may to some extent have diminished the need for an overland route, but the Suez Canal may prove a precarious and inadequate resource in time of pressure; that it should be stopped altogether for a time is not inconceivable, and in any case a saving of seven days is sufficient to secure an extensive preference for the proposed Euphrates railway. That the latter might not, for some time to come, pay commercially is so probable that it is not likely to be undertaken as a mere commercial speculation. But it appears that the Turkish Government is willing to incur the outlay if England will guarantee a loan for the amount; the cost of the line proffered by the Committee is estimated by them not to exceed ten millions sterling, is stated by others as low as six and a-half millions; and the question for consideration is whether the value of the line to England, in her capacity as an Asiatic Power, is not worth all the expense that such a guarantee is likely to involve. Of course, if the line did not pay its working expenses, and if the Porte were insistent, we might have to pay some 300,000l. or 400,000l. a year. But if the Porte should become insistent, the prospect before us might well present difficulties and dangers compared with which this would be the veriest trifle, and in which the possession of such a line would be of incalculable value.

A line from Scutari to Baghdad and Bussorah would enable the traveller to reach India with a minimum of sea voyage, by taking the route via Calais and Constantinople; but for military uses such a line would be valueless, and for commerce less convenient than the Suez Canal. A line with its terminus on the Euxine would be less advantageous still, and subject to the conclusive objection that it would be intercepted just when we needed it most. For English purposes, the required line must have its North-western terminus on the Mediterranean; and the choice appears to lie between Suedia (Seleucia, in the bay of Antioch) and Scanderoun or Alexandretta; the former of which is the less suitable port, while the latter is unhealthy in the extreme, and moreover involves a costly passage through a rough and mountainous district. In either case the line would run by Antioch and Aleppo to a point on the Euphrates; thence along the river to Baghdad; and thence probably along the Euphrates, perhaps by the left bank of the Tigris, to Bussorah or the neighbourhood, terminating probably at Grane, a small port to the south-west of Bussorah, on the Persian Gulf. It seems to be generally agreed that it would not be worth while at present to attempt to carry the line to the eastward as far as Kurrachee, where it would join the railway system of India; but, if the scheme prospered, and the route were found commercially profitable as well as politically important, such an extension would no doubt be made at a future date. It is obvious that both the termini of the proposed line would belong, practically, if not technically, to England. Both would be wholly beyond the reach of Russian aggression, so long as Turkey is capable of self-defence, and both would be easily held, and could only be held, by a Power that is mistress of the seas. The whole length of the line would be perfectly safe so long as we remained on terms of amity with Turkey and with Persia. It would pass through a country still fertile, though comparatively desolate at present; a country whose past history shows that nothing but irrigation and diligent cultivation are necessary to render it one of the most productive in the world; the seat of the powerful empires and populous cities of Assyria and Chaldaea, afterwards the richest portion of the Persian monarchy; in later days, the chosen seat of the Arabian Caliphate. Neither Turk, Arab, nor native Christian will ever by themselves restore even the shadow of its lost prosperity; but if the railway should attract English colonists, and if England should be resolute enough to secure for them adequate protection against local tyranny, their skill and enterprise might before many years had passed develop once more the extraordinary resources of the soil, and lay the foundations of a new agriculture and civilization upon the ruins of the oldest in the world. They would find native labour available to a sufficient extent for their original requirements, and would attract increasing numbers as their operations and their wealth increased; and the railway would secure to them the only remaining necessity of successful colonization—access to the markets of the world. In this way the American railways carried, sometimes on speculation, sometimes, as in this case, for the sake of "through" traffic, in advance of population, across unsettled regions, have brought population with them, and created the industry whose needs they exist to supply. So well is this understood in the States, that many railways have been made, chiefly if not entirely, at the cost of this prospective population—a moiety of the land within a mile on either side of the line being granted to the Company, and sold by it to defray the cost of making the road. A similar speculation in the case of the Euphrates Valley might be, and would certainly seem, too hazardous and uncertain a venture for English capitalists; but in estimating the prospects of the road, the possibility of making it the centre of a flourishing English settlement in one of the richest countries of the world ought not to be wholly overlooked.

On the political and military value of the road the Report of the Committee is silent, or nearly so. But a pamphlet lately published—the translation of a paper written in 1858 by an Austrian officer of high rank, on the position and policy of Russia in the East—sets this point in the clearest light. Russia, argues the writer, as a great inland Power, naturally and necessarily craves an access to the sea. At present she has none that answers her purpose. The Arctic seaboard is of course useless; the conquests of Prussia put it in her power at any time to close the Sound, and shut up the fleets of Russia in the Baltic; and Turkey holds the only outlet from the Euxine. The nearest and most attractive point at which the maritime ambition of Russia could aim is of course Constantinople. But neither Austria nor Germany could tolerate the occupation of European Turkey and the tenure of the Lower Danube by so powerful a neighbour, and, for military reasons, an attack on Constantinople while Austria and Germany hang on the flank of the invader would be a most hazardous, if not a desperate, enterprise. Of this the Cæars have shown themselves so far aware, that while they never have renounced, and probably dare not renounce, their designs on Constantinople—an object of no less eager desire to the nation than to its rulers—they have of late directed their active exertions in another direction, and have pushed their encroachments and strengthened themselves chiefly on the side of Asia. Their next effort may probably be made towards the Asiatic coast of the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf. In that case Turkey and Persia would be thrown into the arms of England; and England would have to defend her Indian Empire on the battle-field of Asia Minor. In such a conflict a railway which would enable her without difficulty to bring into the field of action the whole disposable force of India would be of the utmost importance, and might be decisive of the issue. This aspect of the question deserves attentive study from all but those who believe as obstinately that our Indian Empire would be safe if the Russian dominions were extended to the Levant and the Gulf of Persia, as that England would not be endangered if Belgium and Holland were annexed by a Continental rival, and helped to make the first of military Empires also a great naval Power. The case could not be better, more clearly, or more tersely stated than in this pamphlet (published by Stanford); and without an attentive consideration of its arguments, supplementing as they do the facts and supplying the omissions of the Parliamentary Report, it is hardly possible to form an adequate conception of the magnitude and urgency of the question to which General Chesney devoted the best energies of his life, and to which, just before its close, he succeeded at last in directing the thoughts of statesmen, the attention of Parliament, and, we trust, the interest of the nation.

LEGAL EPIDEMIC.

READERS of the newspapers must often have been struck by the way in which particular forms of crime or eccentricity seem suddenly to become prevalent. Now there is a series of peculiarly brutal murders; then all sorts of hubbuc and incapable people go out in boats in equally weather, and get drowned; for the next few weeks, drunken husbands take to setting unaging wives on the fire to cool their tempers; and after that, by way of a change, we are horrified by the news that our neighbours on all sides have acquired an uncomfortable habit of filling their houses with large pythons, boa-constrictors, apes, baboons, orang-outangs, and other ugly or malicious monsters, who occasionally get tired of domestic seclusion, and wander out into the streets. During the next few weeks we shall, no doubt, have the usual dose of accidental shootings. A fool sees a gun in a corner, assumes that it cannot possibly be loaded, points it in fun, and kills somebody, his mother or sweetheart perhaps. This is an everyday story of the autumn months. If the tender-hearted persons who are so troubled about dickybirds and acrobats would take up this much more serious question, they might possibly do some good. A sound flogging would be a mild penalty for the abominable folly of pointing a gun at any one "in fun." Disease has its fashions like bonnets and crinoline, and it would appear that the humours of the mind have a similar tendency to become epidemic. It cannot have escaped observation that for some time past the papers have been full of trials for libel and breach of promise of marriage. It might almost be supposed from the reports of the law courts that everybody had been seized with an uncontrollable passion for libelling everybody else, and that all the unmarried male adults in the country had given themselves up madly to flirting and jilting. We have not the slightest intention of discussing any of these cases, or of questioning the justice of the verdict in any particular instance. We refer to them merely as evidence of the curious tendency of such things to come in a rush. It is difficult to say whether it is only an epidemic of violent litigiousness, or whether libelling and jilting have really become more prevalent in English society; but, on the whole, we cannot help thinking that the former surmise is the correct one. It is difficult in reading the cases which are reported day after day to resist an impression that the strain which is now being put on the law of libel and slander, and also on that of breach of promise, is rather more than they can be expected to bear. We have certainly no sympathy with backbiters and slanderers, or with faithless swains. It is quite right that people should be taught to keep a watch upon their tongues, to eschew idle gossip, and to be very careful how they speak ill of their neighbours, and also that promises of marriage should not be allowed to be lightly broken. But it may be doubted whether it is desirable that a civil action should be twisted from its natural and legitimate purpose, and be made the means of inflicting punishment for small and not very easily defined offences. There is also an obvious danger in encouraging a spirit of excessive litigiousness, and in leading people to imagine that they are either bound or entitled to seek legal redress for everything that can be construed into an injury to their feelings. What is vulgarly called "taking the law" of a man may be a pleasant revenge for those who can afford it, and who, even if they fail to get a verdict, may have the satisfaction of knowing that their adversary has been subjected to much anxiety and expense; but it can hardly be supposed that reckless litigation is calculated to promote social harmony and good feeling.

It was predicted, when plaintiffs in breach of promise cases were allowed to appear in the witness-box, that defendants would certainly have a bad time of it; and the results of recent trials would seem to show that there were good grounds for this belief. It will be remembered that in the memorable case of Bardell v. Pickwick, Mrs. Bardell was borne fainting into the Court, with her darling boy kicking and howling in sympathy behind her; and if she had been permitted to go into the box, her counsel's famous speech would probably have been superfluous. It is difficult to imagine the defendant in an action of this kind, who, on the most favourable construction of his conduct, has made a fool of himself and fallen a victim to the designs of an artful woman, presenting an interesting and prepossessing appearance before a jury. If he looks soft and ashamed of himself, the jurymen feel that he is letting down their sex before the world; if he is bold and defiant, it is accounted heartlessness, and is pretty certain to be punished by heavy damages. Everything is against him. There may be good reasons why he is justified in endeavouring to escape from a marriage with a woman who has perhaps in many ways imposed on him; of whose want of delicacy, sensibility, refinement, or honesty, he has become painfully aware; whose parrot talk, sham graces, and false hair he has seen through as soon as the first glamour passed off; but then it is difficult to bring these things seriously and impressively before a jury. They are things hard to prove from the witness-box, although they are probably things which an impartial person of the least discernment could not be five minutes in the plaintiff's company without discovering. The smart flashy woman, who can droop her eyes and make good play with her handkerchief, and who is just the sort of person to lay a clever trap for a simple fellow, is also admirably adapted to produce an effect when giving her evidence in Court. Speculative attorneys, with an eye to a profitable case, may be trusted to take care that their client has sufficient schooling beforehand in the niceties of her part, and in those sensational passages which are supposed to be most telling with juries, and to be not altogether thrown away upon judges. It appears that a dead set has lately been made on the farmers. In nine out of ten recent breach of promise cases the defendants belonged to this amiable class, and perhaps it is not less significant that the plaintiffs have usually been barnmaids or young persons in a light fancy business. From of old the bucolic heart has been proverbially soft and tender, and the farmers of to-day are no doubt as susceptible as the shepherds of early times. After a brisk forenoon at market, and a comfortable dinner at the "ordinary," Strephon is just in the mood for a chat with Chloë in the bar, or a little philandering with Daphne at her counter, and is probably not too guarded in his simple prattle. The result is that he finds himself one day depicted in thrilling language as a gay and ruthless deceiver, and has to pay over a snug little fortune to the shrinking dove with whose gentle heart he has so cruelly trifled. There are no doubt cases in which it is possible to form a reasonable estimate of damages for breach of promise, as, for instance, where the plaintiff has given up a situation, or spent money in preparations for the wedding, or where her counsel take their ground solely on the material advantages she would have enjoyed if the defendant had married her, and ask compensation for so many gowns and dinners of which she has been defrauded. But if lacerated feelings are to be paid for, it would be interesting to see the account made out in detail. It is tolerably obvious that the sort of women who do not shrink from the exposure of their love affairs in a public Court, and the publication of the more ridiculous passages of their correspondence in every newspaper in the country, are not, as a rule, the most sensitive of their sex.

It is usual for judges in cases of this kind to warn the jury against giving what are called vindictive damages; but it would seem that they are not always indisposed to connive at verdicts which are intended to punish the defendant, although at the same time it is admitted that the plaintiff is not entitled to compensation. In a recent breach of promise case at Chester, the jury said they desired to give just enough damages to carry costs. The only meaning which can be attached to a verdict of this kind is, of course, that the jury do not see that the plaintiff has suffered any real injury, but they think the defendant acted imprudently, and should be made to smart for it a little. The same fundamental misconception of the meaning of a civil suit underlies most of the verdicts which are delivered in actions for libel. The person libelled rarely obtains more than a few shillings or a few pounds, which is as much as to say that he is none the worse for the hard things which have been said of him; but still, as a matter of social discipline, the defendant must pay a fine. The practice of allowing costs to suitors who have practically failed to make out their case is a dangerous encouragement to speculative actions. It may sometimes be necessary for a man to vindicate his character by an action for libel; but, as a rule, suits of this class only give a wide currency to observations which would otherwise have been quickly forgotten, and which in all probability never did the person to whom they were applied any substantial injury. It is seldom that any one resorts to this kind of protection who does not feel that his character is already in a questionable condition. It would appear that in the case of libels a reaction has set in against the over-straining of the law to which some of the judges have been in the habit of lending themselves, and it is not improbable that something of the same kind may happen before long in regard to actions for breach of promise. The only legitimate ground for a civil action is that an injury has been done for which compensation can be assessed in money; and if it cannot be fairly assessed in this way, the jury have no right to look beyond the claims of the plaintiff, and to consider whether the general interests of society require that the defendant should be punished. It is not desirable that the law should be administered in such a manner as to encourage frivolous or speculative suits. Some of the judges require to be reminded, as Dr. Carpenter reminded the philosophers at Brighton, that common sense is, after all, the basis of their science. They are too apt to forget that the object of the law is rather to make peace than to foster litigation and provide incomes for sharp attorneys. A strong judge who had the courage to take in hand tricky or trivial cases and to laugh them out of court, as the late Mr. Justice Maule used to do, would render eminent service at the present time.

WEYMOUTH AS IT WAS AND IS.

THE Special Correspondents of the newspapers who have been lately called upon to describe Weymouth seem to have laboured under the difficulty of finding that it is rather a poor place. It depends for its importance chiefly on the memory of King George III., and perhaps when many columns of the Times have been devoted to the visit of the Prince of Wales, it may be interesting to refer to the same newspaper for an account of Royal doings at Weymouth in the year 1798. At that day Special Correspondents had not been invented, and the country was so used to the occurrence of great events that it had no need to get up an artificial excitement over small ones. French war and Irish rebellion could not shock the Court from its dull propriety, and the King and Queen lived on the open beach at Weymouth in apparent disregard of the possibility of the sudden appearance of a hostile squadron in the Bay of Portland. The birthday of their Majesties' eldest daughter had been kept with "the usual demonstrations of joy," which perhaps had become rather too usual to be agreeable to the person in whose honour colours were displayed and salutes fired. The King, Queen, and all the Princesses, with a number of the nobility, had been varying the monotony of seaside life at Weymouth by an excursion to Maiden Castle, near Dorchester, to see the sports of the country people, which were not over till late in the afternoon. "All persons of jovial, friendly, and loyal dispositions" were invited to be present at these sports, which were held on the 29th of September. The amusements were perhaps too manifestly suitable to the tastes of a King whose serious speculations were, according to the satirist, directed to the question how the apple got inside the crust of a dumpling. The handbill announced that a pound of tobacco was to be grinned for, and a good hat was to be cudgelled for. A pig was to be given to whoever could catch him by the tail, and a barrel of beer was to be rolled down the hill as a "prize to whoever stops it." There was also diving, wrestling, and sack-racing. At the very time that the King and his Court were enjoying themselves in this homely fashion, an army was in the field against the Irish rebels, to whom a French squadron was striving to carry aid. The same newspaper which describes the birthday rejoicings at Maiden Castle announces that a British frigate fell in with the Brest squadron on the 24th of September, and was so nigh the flagship as plainly to perceive the troops on board of her. The squadron was so encumbered, and sailed so very badly, that it was thought Sir John Warren must reach the coast of Ireland before the French could approach it. This officer had sailed from Plymouth in quest of the Brest squadron, and the Correspondent of the Times comfortably adds that "Lord Bridport is stationed off Ushant to prevent their return into port." The King and his people were much alike both in their taste for amusement and in the imperturbability of mind which enabled them to enjoy it in the midst of tremendous dangers.

We have been quoting from the number of the Times which contains the official announcement of Nelson's victory at the Nile, but we dwell chiefly on the ordinary condition of England as shown by the correspondence of the newspaper transmitted before the victory was announced. The "naval and military intelligence," as we should now call it, is brief, businesslike, and entirely devoid of flurry or bombast. A portion of the North Sea fleet has sailed under Sir Richard Onslow for the Texel, while the remainder is with the Commander-in-chief, Lord Duncan, in Yarmouth Roads. It was enough to announce that the North Sea fleet was ready for sea, and Duncan in command, to assure the public that all was well. In the previous year that fleet had been so thinned by the secession of disaffected ships that Admiral Duncan had found himself at sea with only his own and another ship. He nevertheless proceeded to his station off the Texel, where lay at anchor a Dutch fleet of fifteen sail of the line. The mutiny at the Nore was not, like that at Sheerness, justified by the refusal of reasonable concessions to the seamen, nor did the mutineers display their patriotism by selecting for the mutiny a time when the enemy's fleet was not expected to put to sea. But it was a remnant of the same loyal spirit which caused the mutineers at the Nore to haul down the red flag and fire a royal salute on the King's birthday. This was on the 4th of June, 1797. Within a fortnight the mutiny was suppressed, and in October following Duncan's fleet, with many of the mutineers on board, fought the battle which terminated the existence of Holland as an independent naval Power. Napoleon proposed to employ the resources and situation of Holland against England, and it is possible that hereafter some other ambitious potentate may cherish a similar design. But after a century and a half of rivalry the Dutch were forced by this defeat to acknowledge that England had finally gone beyond them in naval power. About the same time Admiral Jervis had gained an equally important victory over a Spanish fleet, and therefore it probably seemed to the Editor of the Times enough to tell his readers that this veteran, now become Earl St. Vincent, was with his fleet off Cadix looking after the Spaniards. As regards the French squadron which had alighted out of Brest, Sir John Warren would catch them at sea, or, if not, Lord Bridport was ready for them when they should return to port. In the meantime let us all be jolly, and grin for a pound of tobacco, if we possess the faculty of grinning. We do not indeed know where Nelson is, or what he is doing, but if the expression had been invented, we should say that he is pretty certain to turn up as the right man in the right place. If he can only catch the French fleet which has sailed from Toulon, he will give a good account of it; but he is engaged upon a task which resembles that of seizing a pig by his greased tail. The sports were held three days ago, and Weymouth is wondering whence will come the next excitement, when a messenger arrives from London bringing to His Majesty the news of Nelson's victory. This news had been delayed in transmission. The ship which bore Nelson's despatch was captured after an obstinate resistance by a French ship of superior force, and a duplicate despatch sent overland brought the news of the victory to England. The battle was fought on the night of the 1st of August, and the official announcement did not reach the Admiralty until the morning of the 2nd of October. It is difficult to believe that important intelligence could have travelled so slowly, and although the name of Vanguard, which belonged to Nelson's flagship, is borne by one of the ironclads at Portland, the ships and seamen of Nelson's age are as obsolete as the postchaise which carried the messenger to Weymouth with news of the battle of the Nile, and by great exertions was able to arrive there before the King went to rest.

Whatever else has changed in naval affairs, the nature of a south-west gale remains the same, and a gale, or little short of it, was blowing during the recent visit of the Prince of Wales. He came to celebrate the completion of an undertaking of great magnitude and manifest utility. The Portland Breakwater encloses a secure anchorage of about 1,600 acres. The entrance is defended by a fort at the end of the Breakwater, and the entire harbour is commanded by works on the Isle of Portland, and both fort and works will be as strong as the resources of military science can make them. The Breakwater is built of rough stone from the quarries of Portland, which has been excavated by convict labour. A scaffolding, supported on piles in the sea, carried a railway, and by means of it waggon-loads of stone were brought down from the quarry and tipped into the water. This work has been proceeding for twenty-three years. The first stone was laid by the Prince Consort, and the last stone has been laid by the Prince of Wales. A fleet of fifteen ironclads was assembled in honour of the completion of an undertaking worthy of a great naval power, and creditable to the engineers who designed and executed it. The money expended on this Breakwater has never been grudged by the most rigid economist; and we believe that no complaint was ever made against the conduct of the works, except when it was said that the convicts, being well fed and not overtasked, could not be undergoing very severe punishment. The Prince of Wales and Prince Arthur came from Osborne by steamer for the solemnity, and returned there after it was over. They lunched at the Gloucester Hotel in Weymouth, which was the favourite residence of their great-grandfather, and the country people collected for a sight of royalty, although there was not offered to them the additional attraction of a cudgelling-match for a new hat. Enormous sums of money have been spent upon new models of ships and forts during the last twenty years, and even if the result be unsatisfactory, there was no choice but to make the attempt. We have got an ironclad fleet, and nobody seems to know exactly what it can do, whereas when King George III. used to visit Weymouth the country had a fleet upon which it could always thoroughly rely. One point, however, which has been sometimes doubted seems to be ascertained. Whatever may be the form of ships of war, seamen are required for their management; nor is it likely that naval skill can ever be superseded by mechanical contrivances. That wonderful self-reliance which enabled Nelson and his captains to make a successful night attack on a French fleet anchored in an unknown bay was the product of long and hard service, in which the seamen of those days contended with the elements incessantly, and with the French, Dutch, and Spanish navies wherever they could be met with. But it must not be assumed, as some superficial readers of history have assumed, that the defence of the United Kingdom at that time was entrusted solely to the fleets with which Duncan, Jervis, Hood, and Nelson watched with sleepless vigilance every movement of their country's enemies. On the contrary, it appears by the same newspaper from which we have already quoted, that Militia regiments were embodied under canvas in England, while in Ireland an army was still in the field against the rebels, whose hopes were not finally crushed until Sir John Warren defeated the French squadron near its destination in the Bay of Donegal:—

The French are in the bay,
They'll be here before the day,
And the Orange shall decay, &c.

One French squadron did reach the bay, and landed the troops it brought, but they were soon defeated. If a similar attempt had been made in the Bay of Portland, we may be sure that the Militia and regular troops of the Western counties would have sufficed either to prevent or revenge an attack on the marine palace of King George III., nor would the change from cudgel-playing to a more exciting contest have been unwelcome to the men of Dorset. Perhaps if we were involved in actual war with near and powerful enemies, we should show ourselves not unworthy to represent the nation which neither French hostility, Irish rebellion, nor even the mutiny of its own fleet could terrify. Intellectually perhaps King George III. and his Court at Weymouth made rather a poor figure; but their calm enjoyment of the simple pleasures of country and sea-side life contrasts advantageously with modern fussiness and frivolity.

THE OPEN COMPETITION MANIA.

IT has not been stated whether the question of "master and slave," to use Mr. Ayrton's expressive language, has yet been adjusted at Kew, but most people, we imagine, will now be glad, if possible, to forget a painful and repulsive incident, and to hope that the scandal of the Director's retirement may be averted. We shall say nothing more on the personal aspects of the controversy, but there is one part of the Kew correspondence, relating to the appointment of an assistant to the Curator, which seems to deserve especial notice as an illustration of the practical working of the open competition system. It is a most amusing and suggestive story, and reads exactly like a novel with a purpose, only it is all true. Last summer it was discovered that the Curator of Kew Gardens was oppressed with heavy and multifarious duties, and it was therefore proposed that he should have an assistant who could, if necessary, take charge of the accounts; and who should be "familiar with the routine duties of a garden, and be recognized by the foremen and gardeners as holding a responsible position." It was also explained to Mr. Ayrton, whose personal experience has probably supplied him with some painful reflections on the subject, that "much tact and temper being required in dealing with gardeners as a class, it is above all things essential that the clerk, who must mix with all those at Kew, should be a person who would command their respect." The Treasury, after some correspondence, agreed to the appointment of a clerk to the Curator, at a salary of 100*l.* a year, rising to 200*l.*, and the next question was how the appointment should be made. When Mr. Ayrton decided that there should be an open competition, Dr. Hooker urged that at least there should be a selection of candidates previously to competition, as "certain personal qualifications that cannot be tested by competition are absolutely essential to the proper performance of the duties required." To this the First Commissioner replied, that if the person appointed did not give satisfaction during the period of probation, the appointment would not be confirmed. If the matter had been left to the Director and Curator, they would probably have picked out a young man for the place, without troubling the Civil Service Commissioners to do more than subject him to a test examination. The whole thing might have been settled in a week or two, and the over-worked Curator would at once have begun to enjoy the relief he so urgently required. But Mr. Ayrton was resolute in insisting upon an open competition, and of course the Civil Service Commissioners backed him up. The result was a long and complicated correspondence between the Board of Works, Kew Gardens, the Civil Service Commissioners, and the Treasury, and the appointment of an incompetent under-gardener who was a burden to the department, and had to be got rid of at the cost of half a year's salary for doing nothing. At this moment the poor Curator is still, as far as we can make out, without an assistant.

We wish we could print the whole correspondence, it is so characteristic of the blind and reckless fanaticism of the supporters of the craze about competition, as well as of the absurd way in which public departments contrive to waste time and stationery, and to make needless work for themselves. It is difficult to imagine anything more ridiculous than three or four great public offices concentrating their energies for months together on a petty question of this sort, which could have been settled straightway without any fuss or difficulty, and in the most satisfactory manner, if it had only been left to the authorities at Kew; and then making a mess of it altogether. It appears that the Treasury, as soon as they really understood the question, supported Dr. Hooker's proposal that he should nominate a candidate for a test examination, but this was opposed by the Board of Works and Civil Service Commissioners, and in the beginning of December the Treasury gave way. The result of the competition, for which there was a special examination, was that Mr. Robert Smith, an ex-gardener of Kew, was pronounced the successful candidate, and duly appointed. His arrival at Kew was reported in the following letter of the Curator:—

Kew Gardens, Kew, 21 Feb., 1872.

SIR.—In reference to Mr. R. Smith, whom you have sent to me as Clerk to the Curator, I beg to state that I have this morning explained to him fully the duties and responsibilities of the appointment, of which I found him entirely ignorant.

He then informed me that if he had known that such were the requirements of the office, he would not have become a candidate.

I consider him utterly unfitted for such a position, and am quite at a loss to find any employment for him.—I am, &c.,

JOHN SMITH, Curator.

Dr. Hooker also wrote to say that Robert Smith's testimonials were wholly unsatisfactory, and pointed out that they did not include one from himself, although Smith had for a short time been employed at Kew. On referring to the conditions of the competition, we find it laid down that "candidates will be required to show what preliminary training or technical education they have undergone to qualify themselves for a situation of this nature, and they must satisfy the Civil Service Commissioners on this point before they can be admitted to the competition." Yet on this important point the Commissioners never took the trouble to ascertain the opinion of R. Smith's late employer, the Director at Kew. English competition was one of the subjects in which Smith passed; and the first sentence of the first letter he wrote to the Board of Works was as follows:—"I presented myself to Dr. Hooker on Tuesday morning to receive instructions in my duties, but neither he nor Mr. Smith have as yet given me any," &c. The accountant of the Board of Works was sent down to examine R. Smith in book-keeping, and reported that, having shown him a list of office duties, "he promptly replied that he did not understand anything of them, and that he knew nothing whatever of office business."

In the face of this testimony, the First Commissioner insisted that R. Smith "should be employed and instructed in his duties for six months, and a report made on his fitness at the end of that period"; though how a man could be employed, before being instructed, in duties of which he knew nothing, was not explained. Dr. Hooker replied that he knew R. Smith to be unfit for the place from "actual knowledge and experience of him in the Gardens," and that it was no part of his duties or the Curator's to instruct clerks for the Civil Service. In another letter he thus summed up the case:—

1. A man who has never kept accounts is selected to have made over to him complicated accounts involving many thousands annually.
2. A man who has never kept stores is selected to keep and check store accounts, and to supervise in detail the quantities and prices of stores purchased and delivered and consumed.
3. A man who does not spell correctly, punctuate properly, or write a good hand, is selected to conduct a general correspondence.
4. A man whose qualifications in point of skill, quickness of apprehension, neatness and order, have never been inquired into, is selected to arrange papers of a most heterogeneous and uncommon description.
5. A man who up to the age of twenty-eight has never directed men as a foreman himself is selected to direct foremen in matters with which they are more or less familiar, while he is not at all so.

He also observed that to raise a gardener, who never had even a second-class place as such, to the rank of clerk, over-pay him, and put him into communication with skilled foremen, for the purpose of learning from them how to control them in some of their most responsible duties, would arouse their justifiable resentment.

Upon this the Board of Works asked the Civil Service Commissioners to re-examine R. Smith. The Commissioners replied that it would be "quite contrary to their practice and at variance with their principles" to re-examine a candidate whom once their judgment had been pronounced; but they could not deny that R. Smith "was not required to produce evidence on those points which cannot be tested by examination—i.e., the evidence of testimonials respecting his previous training, and especially his practical familiarity" with the duties he would have to discharge. The Commissioners were good enough to "regret that a certificate should have been issued by them implying his possession of practical qualifications" as to which they had never made the slightest inquiry, and which competent judges asserted that he did not possess. The certificate had been granted, however, and, no matter how inaccurate and misleading, could not be withdrawn. It appears that it is a "principle" with the Commissioners to insist upon "their own infallibility; and the only consolation they could offer to the department which they had saddled with a useless and ridiculously over-paid assistant was that it would be for the First Commissioner "to cancel his appointment, if after six months' trial he should prove incompetent to discharge the duties of his situation"; thus calmly ignoring the fact that he had already been pronounced incompetent, and had himself admitted that he would never have applied for the place if he had known what the duties really were. The Board of Works now intimated to the establishment at Kew that R. Smith must be taught and allowed a fair trial. This drew from the Curator a letter pointing out that he had never asked for a clerk, but for an assistant or "henchman"; that R. Smith at the best was hardly worth 20s. a week, not 100s. a year, "and that he could get the pick of the best men in England for the salary offered by the Board"; and protesting against having his "duties, already onerous, increased by having to superintend an officer of the Board doing next to nothing." Dr. Hooker appealed to the Treasury; the Treasury recommended Mr. Ayrton to cancel the appointment of R. Smith, and allow Dr. Hooker to choose a man for the place, remarking that, "if by the requisite probation you mean that R. Smith is entitled to be kept on trial until the end of some indefinite period, however completely he may have proved his unfitness, my Lords do not consider that view sustainable." The appointment was accordingly cancelled; but whether the other recommendation has been carried out does not appear. It need hardly be said that, if the head of an important establishment cannot be trusted to fill up a subordinate office of this nature, subject to a test examination by the Civil Service Commissioners, he is clearly unfit for the position he occupies. It should be observed that in this case two persons at least were very ill used—the over-worked Curator, who was deluded and mocked with the promise of assistance, and whose work was rather increased than diminished, and would have been very much increased if he had not refused to teach an under-gardener bookkeeping, arithmetic, English composition, &c.; and the unhappy candidate, who was tempted to offer himself for a situation for which, when he knew the duties, he candidly pronounced himself unfit, and who has had to endure the humiliation of being dismissed, and of having his deficiencies discussed in a public correspondence. Perhaps the good result of this incident has been that it has drawn from the Civil Service Commissioners an admission (13th July) that "in cases where the qualifications are of such a kind that the head of a department considers they cannot be tested except by personal inquiry on the part of one of its officers, the Commissioners see no reason why such personal inquiry should not be made a preliminary for the competition"; for which small gleam of common sense, better late than never, there is reason to be thankful. The Commissioners have certainly had a very sharp and humiliating lesson.

THE EXPULSION OF THE JESUITS.

THE decree of the German Parliament against the Jesuits is evidently not intended to be a brutum fulmen. They are really to be expelled from the new Empire, and great is the consternation of the whole Gesuitische party, and indeed of Ultramontane prelates and the Ultramontane press throughout Europe. That the blow cannot now be averted appears to be quite understood, and there are indeed serious fears entertained that Catholic Governments like those of France and Austria may follow the example of the Protestant Cabinet of Berlin; indeed, the strictly Catholic Government of Bavaria had, many years ago, set them the example. The opposition accordingly now takes the form, not of petitions, but of protests; and as protesters have no directly practical aim, but simply desire to relieve their tortured feelings somewhat after the manner of the much-enduring Mrs. Gamp when she declared, "Them's my sentiments," they may naturally allow themselves considerable latitude in the choice of language. It is not politic to swear at people whom you wish to influence, and it is at best a work of supererogation when you are going to knock them down. But if you have no chance of persuading, and cannot use your fists, there is a certain satisfaction in letting them know very distinctly what you think of their conduct, more especially if you can take the public into your confidence also. It appears from a manifesto just issued by the indignant Catholics—we hardly know whether to say of Elsas or Alsace—that this temptation has proved too strong for them, and the fire long kindling within has at length found outward vent. Our hesitation as to the nomenclature arises from the circumstance that, while the mandement issued from the episcopal palace of Strasburg to all the parish priests in the diocese is in French, the accompanying protest, which they are requested to sign themselves, got signed by their congregations, and return at once to the Bishop's secretary, is in German. It was perhaps thought best, in addressing heretics, to use an heretical tongue. However, the contents of the document are of more interest than the language, and it certainly is not open to any imputation of unbecoming matters. What, then, are the essential points of the grievance alleged by the signatories?

They begin by observing that, if they kept silence while the Catholics of Germany were presenting monster petitions against the new law, it was not the silence of indifference. Most emphatically did they agree with the emphatic declarations of their brethren; and now that the obnoxious enactment has become a law of the Empire, they feel constrained in their "Catholic conscience" to put forth a solemn protest. The religious orders and congregations belong to the organism of the Church, as the nobler members belong to the human body: which suggests a curious physiological inquiry as to the vitality of the ecclesiastical body in the ages when the nobler members were as yet non-existent. The founders of these orders "are the heroes of Christian faith and love," and the Church is always and everywhere their debtor. Their principles and their works are known to the world—rather too much so, some critics of the Jesuits might think. For the last twelve centuries they have been models of Christian faith and morality. The protesters go on to observe that the religious working among them are of their own flesh and blood, and that their interests and sympathies are bound up together. They then refer, in refutation of the plea that the law against the Jesuits is not directed against the Catholic Church, to the language of official and officious journals, full of abuse of the so-called "black company," of the Holy See, and of the freedom and unity of the Church. But it is not so much to repudiate these insults as to give testimony to truth and right that they lift up their voice. Their view may be expressed in a few words:—"We see in the law against the Jesuits an attack on the freedom of conscience, the freedom of the Catholic Church and of Catholic families. We indignantly protest against the carrying out of a law which injures and revolts two hundred million Catholics in their inmost and holiest feelings." A protest not very dissimilar in style and tone had been issued a month before, accompanied by a long-winded address to the Catholics of Germany, by the German Catholic Union, in which the new law is attacked on five different grounds. It is an injury to the Church which has approved the Jesuit Order, and a menace to all Catholics who agree with them in faith and morals; it is an infringement of personal liberty; it is an act of ingratitude towards those who have given heroic proofs of courage and self-devotion; it is a violation of public opinion; and lastly it is a disturbance of religious and national security. The address expatiates on several other topics, including the Old Catholic movement, which is sharply denounced, and includes an elaborate, but somewhat ambiguous, exposition of the true relations of Church and State, quite open to an interpretation in accordance with Boniface VIII.'s famous Unam Sanctam, about the Two Swords.

We are not going to enter on a discussion here as to the abstract justice or injustice of the new law. Sir Robert Peel is probably almost singular among politicians who are not anxious to see a similar treatment applied to the Jesuits in England. But Germany is not England; and the German people, if they are not much belied, differ considerably from their brethren here. Be that as it may, however, and whether or not the grounds of Prince Bismarck's policy are morally and politically adequate for its justification, it strikes us that some of the grounds of protest urged against it are not very happily selected. One might perhaps observe that what the Catholic Union calls "an attack on a defenceless band of scarcely two hundred priests," even supposing it to be arbitrary and unjust, is hardly equivalent to an outrage on the Catholic Church, and a menace to all her children. But, in fact, there is a far more serious lacuna in their statement of the case. As long as the Alsatian protest confines itself to a general glorification of the merciful and heroic deeds of religious orders during the last twelve hundred years, during three-fourths of which time the Jesuits were not in existence, they are on comparatively safe ground. There may be a reverse to the picture certainly, and regulars and seculars have not always, if history may be trusted, been on quite such affectionate terms of intimacy as appears to be the case at this moment. Still, on the whole, the great religious orders were a powerful instrument of good in the middle ages, and their services to literature and civilization as well as to religion ought never to be forgotten. But with them the German Empire is waging no contest. When the protesters claim an entire solidarity with the "maxims and works" of the incriminated communities, they must be presumed to refer chiefly, if not exclusively, to the particular Society which is the object of adverse legislation. Now, even supposing that there were, as there are not, 200,000,000 Roman Catholics in the world, is it exactly correct to say that they all feel their innermost and holiest feelings outraged by any sort of attack on the Jesuits? At the time of their suppression in 1773 we are told that the feeling on the subject was a mixed one, and that, if they had bitter assailants, they had also fanatical adherents. But there can be little doubt that Clement XIV. carried with him the general suffrage of the Catholic public, as he certainly had the unanimous support of the Catholic Governments in the step he took. And it is remarkable that the one country in Europe where the dispossessed Order found a welcome and a home was schismatical Russia. Catherine II. had gained too much by the religious dissensions which they had studiously fomented in Poland not to be grateful, and they readily accepted her invitation to settle, with their belongings, in a country where the Pope had no power; and there they remained—of course dropping the name, but retaining the reality of a religious order—till Pius VII. recalled them into active service. The maxims and deeds which had drawn on them this summary chastisement from the supreme authority of their Church did not altogether approve themselves to the "Catholic conscience" of Europe; and if Pascal found general applause in exposing a vicious theory of morals, the universal suspicion of every Catholic Government supplied strong presumptive evidence that his criticism was directed against no mere speculative errors. The "freedom of conscience and of Catholic families" which are now invoked in their defence are not the interests which they were then supposed especially to represent. And the case of Poland, already referred to, even if it stood alone, would go far to prove that their presence has not always been the surest guarantee of national "quiet and security." But it does not stand alone. No Englishman can forget that the Jesuits were seriously implicated in some at least of the conspiracies during Elizabeth's reign, and, after leaving a broad margin for the fancies or exaggerations of Protestant alarmists, it still remains true that they did much behind the scenes to foment the religious and political embroilments of the reign of Charles I. In France their political influence was of course as notorious as it was, for a time, almost absolute. We do not refer to these matters with any desire to stir up an anti-Jesuit crusade, or even with any intention of pronouncing on the wisdom of the recent legislation against them in Germany. But it does prove clearly that there is—to use the terminology of the logic books—a notable ignoratio elenchi in the vindications and protests which are being issued with a rather suspicious uniformity. That any curé in France or Germany would care to decline the "request" of his bishop to sign a petition or protest on any subject under the sun is highly improbable, but the signatures can hardly be taken as a safe index of even clerical opinion. And what the general result would be of polling the Catholic laity, either in Germany or elsewhere, as to their devotion to Jesuit principles and interests, there can, we should imagine, be very little doubt.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

II.

THE two Catalogues severally of the "Fine Arts" and of the "Industrial" Departments do little credit to the publishers, the compilers, or the editor. The "Publishers to Her Majesty's Commissioners" boasted at the time of the last International Exhibition in Paris that they alone had proved the possibility of bringing out a complete Catalogue on the day of opening. This boast was refuted by a public statement, never contradicted, that ten days after the opening a whole gallery of pictures was still waiting to the English edition of the Catalogue. We were thus prepared for what might otherwise have come on us as a surprise, that ten weeks after the opening of the present International Exhibition there was still a void of 500 numbers in the Catalogue of "the Fine Arts Department"—in other words, between No.

1700 and No. 2300 there is not a single entry. The companion Catalogue of the "Industrial Department" is no better. It is true that the authorities try to silence censure by the ingenious but now hackneyed device of "under revision" printed on the title-page. And, wishing to make all charitable allowances for the difficulties involved, we were willing to give the publishers time. We did not purchase a second copy of the Catalogue till July 13, and then went to work among the jewelry. But the confusion was still so considerable, the discrepancy between the Catalogue and the objects so great, that the simplest way was to throw the Catalogue aside altogether. We asked among the attendants for explanation, but in vain, till we came to the chief stall in the Gallery, when, from the midst of glittering diamonds and gold, the showman thus spoke:—"Those books are all wrong; they were published before the objects were arranged or in the cases, and have never since been set right." That a little knowledge and a fair amount of care would have rectified the errors, and secured for the use of the public a trustworthy and instructive inventory, there can be no doubt. The visitor has only to cross the road to the Museum, and turn to the Catalogue of Ancient Jewelry prepared by Mr. Sodon Smith, to appreciate, through force of contrast, the value of perspicuity and order. It is a pity that the Commissioners do not annul the essentially commercial arrangements with their publishers. It is time to abandon the policy of squeezing out penny or halfpenny profits. The paramount purpose should be to make the Catalogue, like that of the National Gallery, not an inventory of goods and chattels, not a parade of names, not an advertisement of shops, but an instrument for the education of the people.

The collection of sculpture is imposing from the multitude of works exhibited and the number of nations represented; but altogether it is without novelty, and it is insignificant in art merit. Figures almost as familiar as the Duke of Wellington on the arch are once again exposed to view without the possibility of the trite plea that "a thing of beauty is a joy for ever." Yet for the purpose of pleasing decoration, or as objects which may serve as furniture to fill vacant windows and walls, we can scarcely object to the "Youth at a Stream" (2580), by Mr. Foley, R.A.; the "Young Naturalist" (2912), by Mr. Weekes, R.A.; or "The Reading Girl" (2641), by Signor Magni. It is well known that favourite figures are multiplied to order by journeyman carvers, and the replicas thus manufactured commonly lose the life of the originals; of such mechanical manipulation, at once hard and weak, pretentious yet purposeless, are many of the figures here placed on sale. On the whole it may be said that the chief value of the collection is to teach by dire example what students should avoid. It is sometimes indeed instructive to see the worst that an artist can do; on this principle we direct special attention to "Il Paradiso" (2519), by Mr. J. Ball; a terra-cotta bust of Mr. Millais (2524), by Mr. Boehm; a "Double Bust" (2569), by Miss Susan Durant; H.R.H. the Princess of Wales in hat, muff, and skates (2591), by Count Gleichen; and "The Dying Saviour" (2660), by Mr. Physick, sen. It is our duty to protest against the admission of works which bring the English school of sculpture under the ridicule and contempt of foreigners. But when the fundamental principle of these Exhibitions is abandoned for no principle at all, when the worst of mediocrity is allowed to usurp the place of the exceptional excellence for which these Galleries were originally reserved, it becomes difficult to save our national reputation from disaster and disgrace.

Turning in sorrow away from the English sculpture, we find but little consolation on the foreign side. The contributions from Italy are scarcely the best of their kind. "The Veiled Model" (2682), by Professor Tantardini, displays with habitual debility the pretty fancy, the delicate detail of the school; the head is half seen, half concealed by a gauze-like veil, a trick of the chisel which some years since rained for Signor Monti loud and empty applause. Italy also contributes samples of her genre and pictorial styles.

In contrast to the Italian sculpture, which shows the school of Canova in decadence and debility, are the vigorous bronzes which assert for Russia an honourable place among art-producing nations. By far the most remarkable figure of the year is a life-size statue of "John the Terrible" (2510), by M. Markus Antokolsky. The character of a monarch who killed his own son in a paroxysm of rage is here sketched with decisive force; the hands have the sinewy grip of talons, the eye is keen like the eagle's, the head is shadowed by moody melancholy and vindictive purpose. The manner is essentially Northern; indeed the style has points in common with Molin's "Vrestlers," exhibited in London in 1862, and now standing before the Academy in Stockholm. The modelling is sketchy, and the drapery wants decision, a defect accounted for by the sculptor having chiefly worked in wood or ivory, on a scale below life-size. M. Antokolsky was born in 1841, and was educated in the Academy of St. Petersburg. M. Nikolaus Lieberich, a member of the same Academy, is known for small bronzes—animals, hunting groups, &c.; seven of such works were in the last Paris International, many groups we have met with in Russia, and ten more are now in London. This artist has always seemed to us too prolific for improvement; yet "The Dead Roebuck on a Mat" (2634), now at Kensington, is exquisite for detail and modulation; the touch is tender, firm, and true. "Reindeer Sledge" (2631) is a favourite subject. Not so successful, because beyond the sculptor's reach, in composition and treatment, is a complex "Group of Polish Hussars—the Death of Count Rjevonski, Commander of the Polish Hussars; seventeenth century" (2632). Another worker in bronze was Baron P. Clodt, Professor in the Academy, and sculptor of well-known groups in St. Petersburg. This diligent artist is here represented by no less than sixteen studies, among which stands conspicuous the "Model of the Monument to the Emperor Nicholas" (2540). Like Lieberich, and in common with genre painters who recently have risen into reputation, Baron P. Clodt took a naturalistic turn; accordingly the examples here shown have individual character, literal truth, without much art treatment. "Study of a Mare and Foal" and other groups lent by the Academy, are closely modelled from nature; the touch is sharp and trenchant. It will be interesting to compare this realistic and comparatively recent phase with the silver and gold work, and also with reproductions from ancient models. Russia has for centuries been famous for her artificers in silver and gold, and the styles adopted range from Byzantine to Finnish and Scandinavian, from Italian classicism to modern naturalism. We do not observe any of the revivals or reproductions of Finnish jewelry which were rightly deemed among the most artistic products in the St. Petersburg Exhibition of 1870.

We must not leave the plastic arts without directing the visitor to the Belgian annexe. Here are the best terra-cotta busts of the year (283, 284). M. Rodin and M. van Hasbourg have a facile, sketchy, staccato way of modelling and incising the clay. Also should be noted humorous and grotesque groups, likewise in terra cotta, by the famous M. Leopold Hauze of Brussels. In the Great Exhibition in Paris crowds gathered around clever scenes in miniature by this caricaturist in clay, taken from Molière, Shakespeare, and Béranger. M. Hauze in the way of grotesque sculpture has no rival; but kindred spirits may be found on the pictorial side of art; the late Herr Hasenclever, sometimes termed the Hogarth of Germany, occasionally indulged in these comic and sarcastic strains. But comedy in sculpture, even when reduced to the scale of statuettes, must necessarily have a restricted range.

In the section of "Metal Work" are several masterpieces, both English and foreign. "The Tennyson Vase; Silver" (2717) is a noble work for fertility of invention, for independence of treatment, and for decorative use of the figure. Mr. Armstrong, the designer, has just achieved a success in the reliefs on the Albert Memorial. He is one of the very few artists in modern times who, following the steps of Cellini and other versatile masters of the middle ages, can translate ideas into various materials; his art maintains dignity and observes essential law, while it ministers to use or descends into ornament. Like praise cannot be bestowed on the designs of Signor Raphael Monti; a "Silver-Gilt Jug" (2742) is extravagant, the composition is without governing purpose or definite style. Signor Monti in marble has been pretty and petit; his famous group "The Sleep of Sorrow and the Dream of Joy," belonged to a school of debilitated romance and emasculated beauty. A style thus wanting in severity and strength naturally degenerates into incoherent maudlin when permitted to enjoy its own caprice in the unrestrained sphere of decorative art. Yet Italy and Spain give interesting proof that their children cherish the old traditions, inherit the talents, and practise the arts which in the great historic times were transmitted from father to son. "A Steel, Gold, and Lapis Lazuli Book-cover" (2735) is an elaborate composition, a skilled work of Signor Cortellazzo, an artist some years since discovered and brought into notice by Englishmen who are in sympathy with the new birth, the modern Renaissance, in Italy. A year ago we noticed an important work by this artificer of Northern Italy, contributed by Sir William Drake, to whom the present Exhibition is indebted for further examples. The style has a vigour and originality seldom found in modern Italy; it would seem that in the plains of Lombardy the old fire still slumbers—the fierce Northern spirit, which speaks boldly in the sculptured stones of Verona. Spain, too, is not backward to give signs of renewed life and reanimated talent. Mr. Alfred Morrison has from time to time made us acquainted with damascene works, adapted from Moorish or Renaissance models. The artist, Señor Zuloaga, established near Madrid, revives that national inlay of metals for which the Moors were renowned. We hear that Señor Zuloaga is animated by the enthusiasm and singleness of purpose which belong to genius. Around him he has gathered scholars who share his devotion and lighten his labour. International Exhibitions need not fail of the good ends for which they were instituted if they can thus afford a place of common meeting for the talent which lies scattered too often in neglect over the face of Europe.

"Musical Instruments," one of the specialties of the year, scarcely fall under our immediate province; when mute they are but mechanism, and when speaking they are discord. They announce their presence in the loudest voice, all at the same time, and within hearing of the same persons. The confusion of tongues has seldom been equalled since the overthrow of Babel. By one of those contemptus habitual to International efforts, "Jewelry," another specialty of the year, finds itself located on the spot where the din incident to "the illustration of the art of music" is most deafening. The spectator, as he looks around the much vaunted "Peasant Jewelry," consisting of head-gear, "hair-pins," "bodice pendants," and such like, naturally fancies himself at a village wake made merry by songs, dances, and drums. The idea of "peasant jewelry," when first started with certain interesting importations from Italy, was not without promise. But all ideas generated at Kensington are hunted to the death; no art receives final justice till it has been exhibited in its last degradation. Such is the philosophy which so-called "peasant jewelry" is made to teach; here are gems which not the poorest woman that walks the street would care to wear. Here too are certain head-dresses from the Black Forest piled on wooden blocks; the beads, sealing-wax, tinsel spangles and base metals, heaped together might fill a bushel; a mid-Lent cake put on a peasant's head would have as much art as this and other silly monstrosities. Nothing but ill can follow when the British public, who need to be taught better, are told that such art deformities are worthy of regard.

Matters are scarcely improved by the collection of Brummagem jewelry, which occupies seven pages of the Catalogue, priced from 1s upwards. When to this are added "Clerkenwell Jewelry," "Ornaments in Jet," six cases of "Irish Bog-Oak Ornaments," "British Imitation Jewelry," "British Cut-Glass Black Jewelry," and "Cheap Imitation Jewelry from Bavaria," it will be readily understood that little space remains for works of true art merit. Indeed a leisurely walk up Bond Street yields more art than an uncomfortable crush through the crowd at Kensington. Yet in the mass of so-called international jewelry there is some percentage of good work. It were needless to commend Signor Castellani's reproductions from Etruscan models. Among English houses Messrs Hancock stand supreme, in part because other firms keep aloof. Mr. Richard Green shows good workmanship and excellence in design. Taken altogether, however, the collection is a failure; certain portions indeed look like weavings from the ancient and modern jewelry in the adjacent Museum.

It is pleasant to pass from shop products to the room devoted to "reproductions." A commendable result of International Exhibitions is a "convention" signed in 1867, which commences with the preamble that "throughout the world every country possesses fine historic monuments of art of its own which can easily be reproduced by casts, electrotypes, photographs, and other processes without the slightest damage to the originals." It often happens that projects which range "throughout the world" and nowhere in particular; still in the present instance "reproductions" are shown which in date extend from the sixth century, and in geographic area embrace India, Russia, and Italy. For example, here are "coloured paper casts" from the mosaics of the sixth century in the church of San Vitale, Ravenna. These historic works have often been made known by outline or otherwise, but never before has each touch been transcribed; in other words, never has each tessera or component cube been copied and reproduced. And yet our modern attempts at mosaic have sometimes failed because the scale of the tesserae or the lines in which they are laid depart from the ancient practice. International Exhibitions will do good service just in proportion as they revert to the historic past, and seek to revive modern art on the basis of principles which experience teaches to be lastingly beautiful and true.

REVIEWS.

GROTE'S ARISTOTLE.*

IN the year 1865, in giving to the world his Plato and the Companions of Socrates, Mr. Grote announced his intention of completing the classical labours of his life with a similar review of Aristotle. "If," he said, "my health and energies continue, I hope one day to complete the present volumes, which contain only one-half of the speculative activity of Hellas during the fourth century B.C. The second half, of which Aristotle is the hero, remains still wanting." The posthumous volumes now published under the care of Professors Bain and Robertson are the fulfilment of the pledge thus given. That they are only a partial fulfilment cannot be matter of surprise when we recall the advanced age at which the undertaking was promised. Much rather must we admire the freshness of interest and the unclouded mental vigour which are visible throughout this fragment. For a fragment it is, imperfect in both senses, wanting in many integral parts as well as wanting throughout in finish and detail. The pious reverence which was justly due from the literary executors and editors has withheld them from supplying what was omitted, or filling in what was insufficient. Though they have evidently bestowed much care upon the revision of the papers in their hands, they have very properly felt that their duty to Mr. Grote was paramount to any ambition to present a complete exposition of the works of Aristotle. The kind of interest, therefore, which we find in these volumes is derived entirely from their reflection of the character and studies of the venerable author. We can by no means endorse Professor Bain's opinion that this book "taken altogether is undoubtedly a most important contribution to the history of ancient thought." It would perhaps be unfair to compare what was intended only as a popular work with Professor Bernays' essay on the lost writings, in which the inquiry moves in a plane of literary investigation into which Mr. Grote never ascended. But, to take only one of the various expositions of Aristotle in the hands of the modern student, Mr. Grote's work will not bear a comparison with Zeller's volume on the subject, a volume which can be read with equal advantage by the learned and by the general reader.

The modern expositor of Aristotle has to encounter in limine a difficulty which does not attend attempts to render Plato intelligible. The general character of the discussions in Plato (there are some exceptions) is that of what we call questions of the day. The Platonic dialogue often runs into the abstract, but it as often returns back to the concrete application of the political, ethical, psychological, or æsthetic question debated. Besides this, the dramatic character of the composition introduces the imagination upon the scene, and assists the apprehension of the reader. On the other hand, the material which the expounder of Aristotle has to render is always the most abstract thought attainable, and couched in the curtest language. Here mere translation is no aid. Paraphrase is little better. Unless the Aristotelian conception can be wholly exchanged for a modern equivalent, it is not explained at all, and had better have been left in the original Greek. And then an expositor who should attempt the last-mentioned method of explanation would often run the risk of substituting a modern mode of thought instead of explaining the Greek original. We might have expected from Mr. Grote's turn of mind that he would have attempted this method of modernizing exposition. But he has not done so. He is content to reproduce the technical terms in their naked unintelligibility, and to speak of Matter, Form, Energy, Potentiality, Actuality, Entelechy; or sometimes of Materia Prima, Materia Ultima, Materia Formata, Ens, and Non Ens, Relatum, and Hoc Aliquid, as though the production of these Latin terms was somehow a step on the road towards sense and meaning. It may be said that it is impossible to treat the logical works of Aristotle in any other way than that of bare analysis, or to give any idea of their contents without the use of his own technical terms. This may be so; and then it is not a reason for attempting the analysis, but for letting it alone.

We can scarcely doubt that, had Mr. Grote been able to complete his work, the ethical and political writings of Aristotle would have furnished materials for that kind of delineation of thought in which Mr. Grote peculiarly excelled, and in which he was truly original. It unfortunately happens that he had hardly carried his survey beyond the dry and barren treatises which make up the Organon, the commencement of the Metaphysics, and the Treatise on the Soul. This is precisely that portion of the Aristotelian remains which afforded the least scope for Mr. Grote's special faculty of elucidation. What profit can there be to any class of readers in reading such an exposition as the following? e.g.:—

In introducing us to the study of First Philosophy Aristotle begins by clearing up the meaning of the term Ens. Of its various significations he enumerates four; 1. Ens which is merely concomitant with, dependent upon, or related to another Ens as terminus; 2. Ens in the sense of the True opposed to Non Ens in the sense of the False; 3. Ens according to each of the ten categories; 4. Ens potentially as contrasted with Ens actually. But among these four heads the two last only are matters upon which science is attainable, and to these two Aristotle confines Ontology or First Philosophy. They are the only two that have an objective, self-standing, independent nature. That which falls under the first head, Ens per accidens, is essentially indeterminate, and its causes being alike indeterminate are out of the reach of science. So also is that which falls under the second head, Ens tantum verum, contrasted with Non Ens tantum falsum. This has no independent standing, but results from an internal act of the judging or believing mind combining two elements or disjoining two elements in a way conformable to or non-conformable to real fact. The true combination or disjunction is a variety of Ens; the false combination or disjunction is a variety of Non Ens, &c., &c.

We do not say that all this is destitute of meaning, but we think it may fairly be said that its meaning will scarcely be apprehended except by one who is previously initiated into the original Greek text; and for him such an abstract of the original will be superfluous. Yet even amidst this arid waste of the Organon there are found spots on which Mr. Grote's fertilizing mind has succeeded in bestowing some of that fresh life which is so exuberant in the History of Greece. As one such, we may mention those pages in Chapter XI. in which the axiom of contradiction as the principle of reasoning is tracked from its first germ in Greek thought to its developed enunciation by Aristotle. Another such passage is that part of Chapter X., on the Sophistici Elenchis, in which the conduct of discussion and argument by speakers or writers of the day comes under notice. Here the historical element comes in, and here Mr. Grote is at home. It is possible that the comparative excellence of his chapter on the Sophistici Elenchis may be partly due to his having had before him Mr. Fölte's valuable edition of that treatise. But it must also be ascribed to the greater geniality of the treatise itself, the concluding paragraphs of which have the peculiar interest that in them (as nowhere else) Aristotle almost approaches to speak confidentially of himself and his labours as a discoverer in the science of logic. The interest of the passage may perhaps justify a quotation from Mr. Grote's paraphrase:—

While rhetorical theory has thus been gradually worked up to maturity, the case has been altogether different with Dialectic. In this I [Aristotle] found no basis prepared; no predecessor to follow; no models to copy. I had to begin from the beginning, and to make good the first step myself. The process of syllogizing had never yet been analysed by any one; such logs had anything been set forth about the different applications of it in detail. I worked it out for myself without any assistance by long and laborious application. There existed, indeed, paid teachers both in Dialectic and in Rhetoric, but their teaching had been entirely without analysis, or theory, or system. Just as rhetorical teachers gave out discourses to learn by heart, so these dialectical teachers gave out discourses to learn by heart upon those subjects which they thought most likely to become topics of discourse. They thus imparted to their pupils a certain readiness and fluency, but they communicated no art, no rational conception of what was to be sought or avoided, no skill or power of dealing with new circumstances. They proceeded like men who, pretending to show how comfortable covering might be provided for the feet, should not teach the pupil to make shoes for himself, but should furnish him with a stock of ready-made shoes, a present valuable for use, but unconnected with any skill as an artificer. The syllogism as a system and theory with precepts founded on that theory for Demonstration and Dialectic has originated first with me. Mine is the first step, and therefore a small one, though worked out with much thought and hard labour; it must be looked at as a first step and judged with indulgence: You, my readers, or hearers of my lectures, if you think that I have done as much as can fairly be required for an initiatory start compared with other more advanced departments of theory, will acknowledge what I have achieved, and pardon what I have left for others to accomplish.—Vol. II. pp. 123-3.

The distinction referred to in the passage here quoted between Dialectic and Science may be almost said to be the keynote of Mr. Grote's "Aristotle" as we have it in these two volumes. If we complain of Mr. Grote as jejune and unsuggestive when expounding the logic of Science, we find that he becomes himself again as often as he comes across his favourite topic of dialectical debate, the elucidation of which filled so many pages of his "Plato." If it be true, as has been said, that the analysis of demonstrative reasoning has ever been the aim and inspiration of the true logician, the analysis of dialectical debate is the aim and inspiration of Mr. Grote. The way in which he defines and re-defines, describes and re-describes the dialectical process, is not the mere repetition of sheets which he did not revise himself; it is the reiteration of a favourite topic which has risen to perhaps undue importance in his mind. To this fondness for the idea of Dialectic we may perhaps ascribe the fact that Mr. Grote employs it to explain the much debated term "exoteric discourses." Perhaps we ought to apologize to the reader for introducing any mention of a word which, from the Renaissance downwards, has haunted like a spectre the name of Aristotle wherever his works have been the subject of discussion. It was impossible, however, for Mr. Grote either to pass over the word in silence, or to say anything new upon it. By exoteric discourses Aristotle, he says, means the process of noticing and tracing out the doubts or difficulties which beset the subject in hand, along with the different opinions entertained about it either by the vulgar or by individual philosophers, and the various reasons whereby such opinions may be sustained or impugned. We have neither space nor inclination to examine Mr. Grote's reasoning in detail. His disquisition reads extremely meagre when compared with Bernays' exhaustive examination of all the passages. Of some of these passages Mr. Grote seems indeed to have but loosely apprehended the meaning. And it is perhaps owing to the fact that his papers wanted his final revision that he appears to concede in one place (p. 72) the Ciceroonian interpretation of the word exoteric, against which he is contending, and that he attributes to Zeller two different opinions on the subject, and both of them erroneously. The fact would seem to be that Mr. Grote's mind was so filled by the rhetorical distinction between Dialectic and Science, or what he, as it seems to us, less correctly calls Philosophy, that this distinction occurred to him as a ready and simple solution of this among other problems.

In Mr. Grote's "Plato" the weakest chapter was that on the Canon of the Platonic writings. The chapter in the present work on the Aristotelian Canon is meagre and unsatisfactory. In the case of Plato, the data for deciding on the genuineness of the dialogues and epistles are comparatively few and simple. "The history of the Aristotelian Canon is much more complicated, and the facts and allusions are spread over the vast surface of the later Greek literature. It is true that, after the labours of Ross and Heitz, all the material passages may be considered to be ready prepared and digested for the use of the inquirer. It is easy to see that Mr. Grote is entirely dependent for his authorities on these previous collections. But though freshness and novelty were thus precluded, it was still open to him to have offered a succinct and neatly drawn summary of the existing state of the question. This Mr. Grote does not seem to have attempted. We have instead an imperfect and partial discussion in which only a part of the authorities is presented, and the chief difficulties of the subject are not brought into view. Mr. Grote is of opinion that both the collection of Andronikus (our Aristotle) and the Canon of the Catalogue in Diogenes are composed of genuine works of Aristotle; allowing of course for the intrusion into each collection of two or three spurious books. He appears also to adopt the belief, that the more abstruse philosophical works were unknown in the School in the interval between the death of Theophrastus and the edition of Andronikus; but he takes no notice of the long array of argument by which Zeller has attempted to prove that these books were known to the Peripatetic philosophers during that period—an argument which may not indeed be convincing, but which is too considerable to be passed over without an answer. Mr. Grote also endorses the opinion that the edition of Andronikus opened up a new phase to the Peripatetic philosophy, and that the loss of the original manuscripts had irreparably impoverished the School in so far as regards the deeper speculations of philosophy during the second and third centuries A.D. But the consideration of the Canon comes to an abrupt end in p. 62, where it merges in the discussion of the term exoteric, and is never again resumed. This no doubt must be again ascribed to the incomplete condition in which Mr. Grote's papers were left. The same cause probably is the reasonable excuse for minor inaccuracies. E.g., Heits had noticed that the Diogenes Catalogue assigns only five books to the Ethics, and yet that Diogenes himself quotes the seventh book. (Note corrects Heits by saying that seventh (τὴν ἑβδόμην τῶν ἠθικῶν) is only a conjecture of Henry Stephens or Ménage. The reader may ask why is it left doubtful of which of the two? But it is immaterial, for it is a conjecture of neither, ἑβδόμη being the reading of the Editio Princeps.)

FIFINE AT THE FAIR.

PANTING Time, as Dr. Johnson said of Shakespeare, and panting Space, as he threatened to say, toil after Mr. Browning in vain. Within twelve months he has published three poems of considerable length and not inconsiderable difficulty. Balaustion, indeed, though it required and deserved careful study, was both in the translation and in the original framework of the poem perfectly intelligible; and the Trance of Hohensted-Schrenkyan was perhaps not more perplexing than any other hypothetically subjective history or theory of the Second Empire, as it might have presented itself to the mind of Napoleon III. if, instead of being a conspirator and statesman, he had been an analytic and somewhat fanciful philosopher. Fifine is the most enigmatic of all Mr. Browning's works, with the exception of Sordello; but it has the advantage over the earlier poem, although both are written in cipher, of containing the key, if indeed there be a key, within itself. Neither Edipus nor Daniel could have interpreted Sordello, unless they had consulted the same books, whatever they may be, from which Mr. Browning must have derived his knowledge of an obscure passage in Italian history; but a reader who should combine the energy of youth with the tolerance of age, and the sagacious industry of Scaliger or Bentley with the microscopic acuteness of a modern German metaphysician, might perhaps after ten readings comprehend the purpose and the language of Fifine. Even to the ordinary student, after long attention, the poem seems to assume something of a definite shape, but the discovery is less certain than the result of Alastor's similar efforts in the Egyptian temple, who

Through the long burning day
Gazed on those speechless shapes; not when the moon
Filled the mysterious halls with floating shades
Suspended he that task, but ever gazed
And gazed, till meaning on his vacant mind
Flashed like strong inspiration.

The vacant mind of the reader of Fifine is not solaced in the meantime by any metrical charm, for the poem is composed in lumbering rhymed Alexandrines, with the occasional variety of a line of fourteen syllables—

Which like a badly wounded snake drags its slow length along.

Yet, in spite of all the drawbacks to enjoyment which are wilfully interposed, the subtle and profound genius of Mr. Browning encourages and partially rewards apparently hopeless toil. It is his pleasure to follow in the plan of his poem the casual associations of a kind of meditative day dream, until, passing into an actual dream as it is conventionally represented in poetry, he composes one of those symbolic allegories which are unknown to the sleep of real life. An ingenious and loquacious personage occupies the entire poem with a monologue, except that his wife Elvire, whom he is addressing, is allowed to speak to the extent of three or four lines in the whole. The rest of her thoughts are intercepted or anticipated by her philosophic husband, after the fashion of the actor who, in the unexpected absence of his comrade, performed the dialogue of Brutus and Cassius alone, with the aid of a silent interlocutor. "Don't interrupt me, Cassius," he continued, when he had finished his speech in the character of Brutus; "I know what you would say"; and then he proceeded to deliver the proper answer to himself, until he resumed the cue of Brutus. So the protagonist in Fifine, adding gentle force to vocal predominance, tells his wife, when she wishes to express her opinions for herself:—

"Do I say, like Elvire?"

(Your husband holds you fast,
Will have you listen, learn your character at last)
"Do I say . . . ?"

And then for forty lines the poor lady is compelled to hear what she would say, though she probably never thought of saying it. At one time the speaker gives her the comforting assurance that he has nearly done; but Elvire had not, like the reader, the opportunity of seeing that there were still fifty pages left. She was, in fact, only on the verge of the long allegorical dream.

Fifine, who gives her name to the poem, is the dancing girl of a travelling mountebank's show, which visits a fair at Pornic on the coast of Brittany, and the reflections which she directly or indirectly suggests to the husband of Elvire occupy the volume of nearly two thousand lines. She and her troop represent, among other things, the lawless or abnormal element of life; and by a natural transition, the inalienable independence of every separate personality. It is a plausible theory that every person is capable of discharging better than any other person some function which may by a combination of circumstances become for a moment the highest, as one grain of sand among a million may at a given angle most directly reflect the sun:—

No creature's made so mean
That that same way it bows, could we investigate,

Its supreme worth; falls by ordinance of fate
Its momentary task, gets glory all its own;
Tastes triumph in the world, pre-embued, alone.
Where is the single grain of sand, mid millions heaped Confusedly on the beach, but, did we know, has leaped,
Or will leap, would we wait, 'till the century, some once
To the very throne of things? Earth's brightest for the moment,
When sunshine shall impinge on just that grain's facets,
Which fronts him fullest, first, returns his ray with jet
Of promptest praise, thanks God best in Creation's name.

If so, Fifine herself, "the Parish of the North, the European Nautch," may perhaps also have her place in creation, and even her apology:—

Well then, thus much confessed, what wonder if there steal
Unchallenged to my heart the force of one appeal
She makes, and justice stamp the sole claim she asserts?
So absolutely good is truth, truth never hurts
The teller, whose worst crime gets somehow grace, avowed.
To me that silent pose and prayer proclaimed aloud
"Know all of me outside, the rest be emptiness
For such as you. I call attention to my dream,
Colture, outlandish features, and memorable limbs,
Piquant entreaty, all that eye-glance overkissed."
Does this much please? Then repay the pleasure—put
The price 'till the tumbourine. Do you seek farther? Tut!
I'm just my instrument—sound hollow, more smooth skin Stretched o'er gilt framework, I rub-dub, nought else within—Always for such as you. If I have use elsewhere,
If certain bells, now mute, can jangle, need you care?
Be it cauch, there's truth 'till the pleading, which comports
With no word spoken out in colleges or courts,
Since all I plead is, "Fav for just the slight you see,
And give no credit to another charm in me."

Elvire, as her husband with much probability anticipates, entirely declines to share in his tolerant views, and complains in language which he puts into her mouth that he

"In short prefers to me, chaste, temperate, serene,
What sputters green and blue, this flaggy called Fifine."
So all your sex mistake—strange that so plain a fact Should raise such dire debate. Few families were racked
By torture self-supplied did Nature grant but this,
That women comprehend mental analysis.

Which certainly Nature has seldom granted; and the not infrequent soundness of simple intuition is illustrated by the ultimately suspicious departure of the philosophic apologist to visit Fifine; yet this apparent irregularity is only a symbol of an interest in earthly things which is not incompatible with the higher yearnings expressed in the graceful prologue and in the solemn grotesqueness of the epilogue. The fancy for Fifine is merely the typical and wholesome pleasure of

One, who in the world
Both lives, and likes life a way,
Nor wishes the wings unfurled
That sleep in the worm, they say

Elvire herself, in some parts of the poem, becomes only a half imaginary personification of practical life and morality, while elsewhere she is as an ordinary woman equally accessible in her natural character for the poet's purpose. In one part of his devious disquisition the Pornic sage finds occasion to explain why he would rather influence women than men. To please a masculine audience he would think it expedient to profess himself one of the multitude, and only the exponent of their collective wisdom, while with women it is better for a man to make the most of himself, and even to assume fictitious excellences. Arion, whose dolphin was, it seems, a type of woman, is well known to have dressed himself in his purple robe when he struck the harp on the prow:—

So, standing on the bench o' the ship, let voice expend
Thy soul, sing, unalloyed by meaner mode, thine own,
The Orphic lay; then leap from music's lofty throne
Into the lowest surge, make fearlessly thy launch.
Whatever storm may threaten, some dolphin will be staunch Whatever roughness rage, some exquisite sea-thing
Will surely rise to save, will bear, palpitating.
One proud humility of love beneath its load,
Stem tide, part wave, till both roll on thy jewelled road
Of triumph, and the grim o' the gulph grow wonder-white
I' the phosphorescent wake; and still the exquisite Sea-thing stems on, saves still, palpitatingly thus Lands safe at length its load of love at Tanarus
True woman-creature.

It might have been thought that the use of the word palpitating with the accent and the rhyme on the last syllable was irritating enough without the introduction, six lines later, of the barbarous adjective palpitatingly; but, as usual, Mr. Browning is utterly reckless of the shocks which he inflicts on the educated ear. If it suits his purpose, he has no hesitation in putting into a kind of technical doggerel the details of musical mechanism:—

The augmented sixth resolved, from out the straighter stage
Of D sharp minor—leap of disimprisoned thrill—
Into thy light and life, D major natural.

The celebrated invocation to "Innocentia, Heavenly Maid," was comparatively poetical. At one point the colloquist, suspecting on insufficient grounds that his language is too plain and articulate, proceeds to explain his meaning to himself by playing Schumann's Carnival on the piano. The music tells him to sleep, and consequently enables him to construct an allegorical dream, something after the fashion of Shelley's most unworldly poem, The Triumph of Life. The dreamer is perhaps more consecutive in his thoughts asleep than awake. The curious student must be referred to the poem for the text of the allegory, and to his own ingenuity for the explanation; yet he may take with him the comforting assurance that it has a secondary or symbolic meaning, and the hint that, though Mr. Browning is no disciple of Comte, his dream has the Positivist object of justifying the existence of all things as they are. It may be conjectured that he, or rather the discursive personage who is for the time his mouth-piece, regards with scepticism some modern theories of science which he inelegantly calls Philosophy:—

Ah, Philosophy!

Despite the shop and change, diminished or increased,
Patched up and plastered o'er, Religion stands at least
T' the Temple-type—But thou? Here gape I, all agog,
These thirty years, to learn how tadpole turns to frog,
And thrice at least have gazed with mild astonishment,
As, skyward up and up, some fire-new fabric sent
Its challenge to mankind that, clustered underneath,
They hear the word, and straight believe, ay, in the teeth
Of the Past, clap hands and hail triumphant Truth's outbreak, Tadpole-frog theory propounded past mistakes.
In vain! A something ails the edifice, it bends,
It bows, it bates

No—the one voice which failed
Never, the preacher's coin of vantage nothing ailed,
That had the luck to lodge i' the house not made with hands,
And all it preached was this—"Truth builds upon the sands,
Though stationed on a rock; and so her work decays,
And so she builds again with like result."

The doctrine of development by natural selection is caricatured in a neat epigram:—

Man's instincts still attest
Promotion comes to Sense, because Sense likes it best:
For bodies sprouted legs through a desire to run,
While hands, when fain to slich, got fingers one by one.

There is perhaps little use in quoting detached passages from a work of which the general design is but approximately conjectured. Whether Mr. Browning is aesthetically justified in framing elaborate riddles which drive ordinary readers to despair in language which occasionally rises into poetry, and sometimes descends into a jargon little better than slang, is a question of literary morality which is not to be hastily solved:—

Are we not here to learn the good of peace through strife,
Of love through hate, and reach knowledge by ignorance?

Undoubtedly the puzzled and angry critic, striving with the intricate perplexities of Fifine, involuntarily finds himself liking what he approached with a feeling akin to hate; and as he inevitably begins with baffling ignorance, it may be hoped that he sometimes emerges into a glimmering of knowledge. From the first he finds that the discords which jar upon his ear and his judgment have a relation to art; and that the connexion of desultory passages is to be traced, if at all, by an imaginative clue. The stimulus to thought is in itself valuable, as a difficult or inaccessible Alpine summit furnishes an attraction to mountain climbers. The great majority of readers, who may think the discovery of the meaning of Fifine not worth the labour, may nevertheless find gratification in the Prologue and Epilogue, both of which probably bear some kind of relation to the main poem. The Epilogue, which also bears the title of "The Householder," is, with the exception of the last scene in the Second Part of Faust, an almost solitary attempt to apply a humorous treatment to Death; yet nothing can be more earnest than the figurative expression of impatience to have done with life. The assumption that personal recognition after death is not a doctrine to be asserted, but a familiar matter of course, gives to the little poem a reality worthy of Dante. There is nothing novel in the utterance of the feeling which

but in "The Householder" the signal has long before been eagerly expected, and it is the more welcome because it is conveyed by "a certain soul, which early slipped its sheath," and which, in the Prologue wears the Psyche wings of the butterfly, associated perhaps with the image of the "half angel and half bird" who was invoked in the Ring and the Book. The householder is the discontented lodger in a house which is the body or earthly life. The gentle protest of the woman-spirit in favour of propriety and decorum is admirably dramatic:—

Savage, I was sitting in my house, late, lone Dreary, weary with the long day's work:
Head of me, heart of me, stupid as a stone:
Tongue-tied now, now blaspheaming like a Turk;
When, in a moment, just a knock, call, cry, Half a pang and all a rapture, there again were we—
"What, and is it really you again?" quoth I.
"Again; what else did you expect?" quoth She.

"Never mind, lie away from this old house,
Every crumbling brick embrowned with sin and shame.
Quick, in its corners are certain shapes arouse—
Let them, every devil of the night, lay claim.
Make and mend, rap and read, for me—Good bye!
God be their guard from disturbance at their glee.
Till, quick, comes down the carcass in a heap," quoth I.
"Say, but there's a decency required," quoth She.

Al, but if you know how time has dragged, days, nights,
All the neighbour talk with men and maid—each man!
All the fane and trouble of street sounds, window sights;
All the weary of flapping door and echoing rust; and then
All the fancies . . . Who were they had leave, dared try Darker ere that almost struck despair in me!
If you know but how I dwelt down here!" quoth I.
"And was I so better off up there?" quoth She.

Help and get it over! Ruminated to his wife.
(How drew up the paper into the pocket people know?)

Like M. or N. departed from this life,
Dug the dirt or dust, mow and gear the so-and so.
What's the way of Soul Fourth? Press, verse? Try!
Affliction sure long time he bore, or what is it to be?
Till God did please to grant him ease—Do end," quoth I.
"I end with—Love is all and Death is nought," quoth She.

BALDWIN'S ANCIENT AMERICA.

THE theory of primal barbarism is certainly at present in the ascendant. It is embraced by the best and soundest judges, and of those who dispute it several, and some of the most successful, are evidently influenced less by purely scientific reasons than by the supposed interests of revealed or natural religion; they object to believe that the first men were savages, from the same motives that make them resent the doctrine that the fathers of the first men were apes. A priori reasoning certainly seems to support the obnoxious view, and history and archaeology have of late been pressed into the same service, as we think with less justice. Their evidence may fairly be impugned on the ground of an obvious and inevitable bias; for barbarism has no history, and leaves no monuments. But, such as the evidence is—flint tools in the drift, Swiss lake villages, and Danish shell-heaps ("kitchen middens") notwithstanding—it appears to be on the side of primitive civilization. That is to say, we have evidences of civilizations as old as or older than the oldest barbarisms, unless we accept the flint tools found in deep-buried gravel as the oldest relics of humanity, and clear proofs of barbarism. There is no recorded instance of a civilization spontaneously developed out of previous barbarism; perhaps there hardly could be. There are everywhere proofs that civilization has perished or degenerated; instances in which regions now desolate or half-civilized have been the seats of highly-organized empires and cultivated races; monuments of civilizations that have utterly vanished from the face of the earth, and even from the memory of tradition. Of the later ages of the Assyrian and Egyptian empires we have what may be contemporary notices in the Hebrew Scriptures; but their monuments prove the existence of powerful monarchies, highly organized societies, a very advanced state of some at least of the arts, and a certain knowledge of science, with a vast accumulation of material wealth, ages before the beginning of the oldest history. In Greece, the walls of Mycenæ indicate that before the time of Homer Peloponnesus had been occupied by a race capable of building fabrics which to the contemporaries of Homer appeared supernatural, whose memory was lost in Homer's time; and the ascription of the walls of Troy to divine architects suggests the probability that the same or a similar race may have perished out of Phrygia before the date assigned to Agamemnon. Such relics as these, in the absence of machinery, imply a dense population, a productive agriculture, a powerful government, an accumulated wealth sufficient to support a heavy burden of unproductive labour. The civilizations of India and China claim to date back as far as that of Egypt herself—whatever may be the value of their claim. And not only in the Old World do we find barbarism more modern than civilization. Over regions which at the period of the discovery of America were occupied, and had been occupied for centuries, by savage hunters, destitute of every vestige of culture, with no arts beyond the rudest cultivation of the maize and the manufacture of stone arrowheads and pipes, are found the remains of a civilized people; and in Yucatan, Mexico, and throughout Central America there exist still mightier ruins—the relics of a prouder empire and a higher culture than those of Montezuma. The Aztecas in the South, the Iroquois and Algonquians in the North, had settled on the graves of a perished civilization which both were incapable of appreciating. Much less is commonly known of these monuments than of those of the Eastern hemisphere, the one or two important works which have been written on these subjects not being generally accessible to European readers, though known of course to students; and we therefore welcome the volume in which Mr. Baldwin endeavours to popularize the information collected by others, and to familiarize both his countrymen and ours with the buried relics and crumbling monuments of ancient America.

There is a considerable resemblance in all these monuments; the habit of mound-building, of erecting vast piles of earth as the foundation of buildings, belonging both to the nameless aborigines of the Ohio and to the predecessors and neighbours of the Aztecas. The truncated pyramid is a favourite form with both, as it must be with all earth-builders. And relics found in the mounds, both North and South, indicate that their builders were worshippers of the sun, as were the Peruvians and most of the peoples of Central America. But the most marked peculiarity of the Northern monuments is wanting to the Southern. The former are almost exclusively earthen; very few stone walls, and we believe not one stone building, are to be found among them; whereas the mounds of Yucatan and Mexico serve only as the foundation of stone temples, towers, and dwellings. It is a natural conclusion that the Mound-builders, as they are called, of North America, did not use stone, perhaps because they settled chiefly on vast alluvial tracts where wood was very abundant and stone difficult to obtain. They have left, however, earthworks which have no parallel elsewhere. These are chiefly of two classes, mounds and enclosures. The former, chiefly of the pyramidal, but also of various other forms, range from 2,800 feet in circumference downwards, and are from six to ninety feet in height, but generally not exceeding thirty. Some of them, especially in Wisconsin, are in the form of animals. The enclosures are chiefly square or circular, shaped with a mathematical correctness which indicates considerable geometrical skill on the part of their builders, and fenced by vast and solid earthworks, which appear to have been meant for fortifications. In one case there is a square inscribed in a circle; in others, a vast square or oblong has had circular or square enclosures of smaller extent added on, as if the town or camp within had grown too large for its inhabitants. The mounds may have been intended as the foundations of temples or watch-towers; the former especially, as the builders appear to have worshipped the sun and moon, and may naturally have placed their shrines where neither forest trees nor sloping grounds would impede the first view of the rising luminaries. The settlements of this people appear to have their centre in the valley of the Ohio, but spread all along the course of the Mississippi, and through the greater part of the South and North-west.

They must have been an agricultural people, because only agriculture would support a population congregated in such numbers as these monuments imply, and furnish the means of employing a considerable portion of that population in unproductive works. They must have had a highly organized government, to have been able to collect large masses of labour for public objects; but, in the absence of massive palaces and temples, it may be that they did not live under the same unsparring despotism which rendered possible the monuments of Assyria and Egypt, and perhaps of Central America. But the nature of their monuments leaves this point absolutely uncertain. They had acquired the art of mining; for copper of the peculiar character of that found native on the banks of Lake Superior has been dug from their mounds, and extensive mining works are traced in that copper region, in which some of their tools, and the rollers on which they conveyed vast masses of metal, are also found. As no mounds are to be seen in that part of the States, it is supposed that no settlements were formed there, but that mining expeditions went there for the summer, and returned in winter. Water affords the only probable means of conveying large quantities of copper for the great distances they had to traverse; and the large masses found in their works imply their possession of vessels very much superior to the canoes of their successors. They had copper tools, and some silver utensils. They possessed the art of making pottery, and some vessels of perfect shape and superior ornamentation are found in their enclosures, and figured in this volume. They seem to have understood weaving, for fragments of cloth are found among the pottery. They perhaps knew something of astronomy, for a curious tube found in one mound exactly resembles one with which a silver figure discovered in Mexico appears to be observing the heavens. Of writing or sculpture there are no traces, and hardly could be any, seeing that no stonework is discovered, unless the so-called "Pictured Rocks" are relics of the Mound-builders.

The remains of a former civilization in Central America are of two classes; those which belong to the Aztecs, Quiches, and other races still in possession when the Spaniards landed, and those which were then ruins, and which clearly belong to an older and superior architecture. To the former comparatively little interest attaches; their history is to be found in the writings of the conquerors, and they add but little to our knowledge of the conquered. But there are ruined castles, temples, and cities which were ruins overgrown with forest when the Spaniards landed, and which seem to have belonged to an age long anterior to that of the Aztec dominion. The ruins of Palenque are assigned by antiquaries to a period many centuries prior to the Christian era, and of course it is not only possible, but probable, that the city had stood for centuries before its overthrow. The masonry, the ornamentation, sculpture, and mosaics of these ruins appear to be far superior to anything of which the later occupants were capable; and in some cases where a later building is erected on the foundations of an older one, the difference in strength and solidity, as well as in style, is such as to leave little doubt that they were not the work of the same people. In Central America, then, as well as in the United States, there remain the relics of a civilisation of which the very memory seems to have perished. The inscriptions of some of the former, if they should prove decipherable, may throw some light upon their history; the more probably that manuscripts of a somewhat similar character, though of recent date, appear to be still extant; of the Mound-builders we can hardly hope to know more than we do at present.

On the age of the latter much curious speculation has been bestowed, of which Mr. Baldwin gives his readers a very indiscriminate account, wasting much space on wild speculations respecting the imaginary island of Atlantis, and which it is lost time to discuss. But thus much seems to be ascertained. The mounds, and the whole region in which they lie, have been utterly overgrown with forest, and several generations of trees, some of them very old, have grown and perished since the Mound-builders were finally banished or exterminated from their towns and temples, their enclosures and their mines. The forests are supposed by good judges to indicate a space of from eight to ten centuries, and no one can tell how many more, since the disappearance of those who cultivated the land and covered it with forest-trees. Skeletons found in the mounds, in dry situations and in a favourable climate, have almost universally crumbled away, and scarcely a single skull is to be found in as good condition as that of the great majority of skeletons dug up in Europe under conditions not more favourable to their preservation after a period which cannot be less than 2,000 years. It is therefore assumed that these skeletons must have lain there more than 2,000 years, and probably very much more. Finally, the surface of the country has greatly altered since the Mound-builders disappeared. Some of their works have been destroyed by streams which now flow through a channel half a mile distant. And one local feature, if we can rely on its evidence, implies a yet greater antiquity than could be inferred from any of the preceding facts. The Mound-builders especially settled in the valleys of the greater rivers and along their tributaries. These have left several successive terraces along their course, as they ate their way deeper and deeper into the earth. Each terrace marks the lapse of ages, and the last must, says Mr. Baldwin, have occupied the longest time of all in its formation. Now this terrace alone is wholly free from the works of the Mound-builders; and if it be a correct assumption that it did not exist in their time, that time must be assigned to a period indefinitely remote. Without pledging ourselves to any opinion on these points, we can hardly deny that there are plausible reasons for believing the perished civilization of America to be at least as old as the comparative barbarisms whose remains have been dug out from Danish morasses and Swiss lake shores.

Mr. Baldwin has, as we have mentioned, quoted and discussed at needless length certain absurd speculations about Atlantis, too unfounded for refutation, and too worthless to be of interest even as mere conjectures. He shows, moreover, an occasional tendency to accept over-credulously the legendary accounts of classical and mediæval visits to the Western world. But these have a legitimate place in such a volume, if the reader be fairly warned that they are not to be regarded as contemporary and trustworthy narrative; they show that floating traditions of the existence of a trans-oceanic land were rife in the minds both of Phœnician and of Scandinavian adventurers, and that the visits of one or the other to its shores are possibilities, though for us they never can be more. Whether the now ruined cities of Yucatan really were seen by Tyrian mariners, and furnished the basis for the story of Diodorus Siculus, no one can ever know; but the thing is so far within the limits of possibility as to afford fair subject for imaginative speculation. It is certainly a curious fact that about the time of which Diodorus speaks there really did exist "many days' sail from Libya westward" such cities and such a country as he describes; and that if Tyrian seamen had been driven thither, they would have seen much what they are said to have seen. But if they had, would no attempt have been made to repeat their voyage and verify their alleged discovery? The story, again, of a continent buried beneath the Atlantic may be true. But if the thing ever occurred, it must have been utterly forgotten ages before Plato wrote of it. Is it not possible that the West Indies or Florida furnished the suggestion of Atlantis, and that the supposed Paradise disappeared, not beneath, but beyond, the ocean—no subsequent adventurer being bold or fortunate enough to retrace the path which had led one tempest-tossed vessel to those shores? There is enough of plausibility in such conjectures to render them attractive; not the less so, perhaps, that they must remain conjectures for ever. Few persons probably will read Mr. Baldwin's book without being diverted for a moment into some such train of speculation, more interesting perhaps, and not more baseless, than many of those which the author has thought fit to present to his readers.

IN A GLASS DARKLY.*

MR. LE FANU, having written some four or five foolish and vulgar ghost stories, presents them to the world as belonging to "metaphysical speculation," or "religious metaphysics," or "metaphysical medicine." He informs us that he has the stories from "the immense collection of papers" left by Dr. Martin Fleisselius, a man whose "knowledge was immense, his grasp of a case was an intuition." Happily for the non-scientific world, the Doctor "writes in two distinct characters." As Mr. Le Fanu says:—

He describes what he saw and heard as an intelligent layman might, and when in this style of narrative he had seen the patient either through his own hall-door to the light of day, or through the gates of darkness to the caverns of the dead, he returns upon the narrative, and in the terms of his art, and with all the force and originality of genius, proceeds to the work of analysis, diagnosis and illustration.

As for "the analysis, diagnosis, and illustration," and "the force and originality of genius," with which they are made, we must take Mr. Le Fanu's word; of course we have no opportunity given us of judging. But when he asks us to believe, after we have read through the stories, that the learned Doctor "describes what he saw and heard as an intelligent layman might," here at least we are able to exercise our own judgment. If Mr. Le Fanu can find readers so silly as to delight in all the horrors, as senseless as they are coarse, which he here serves up to them, he is welcome. But at all events let him not, while pretending to praise an imaginary author, have the assurance to claim for himself that he "describes as an intelligent layman might." It may be, however, that Mr. Le Fanu's readers look upon every one as intelligent who uses words beyond their comprehension. A man must needs be intelligent, for instance, who writes of "the lumen of the eyes," or of the "odyle and magnetic influence of the moon," who is quite familiar with "the primary distinction between the subjective and the objective," and speaks not of Brussels, but of "Bruxelles lace." Nevertheless, Mr. Le Fanu would have shown a little more modesty, and quite as much intelligence, if he had allowed his readers to find out his great powers for themselves, and had not added to his work a preface which is in fact a puff of himself. It is idle, we fear, to expect that Mr. Le Fanu will give up his ghosts and goblins, his gallows and coffins, his murderers and vampires, and his spectral forms, whether they come in the shape of a "small monkey, perfectly black, with a character of malignity—unfathomable malignity," or whether they come in the shape of "a sooty-black animal that resembled a monstrous cat, and that continued toing and froing (sic) with the lithe, sinister restlessness of a beast in a cage." There are some writers, indeed, who, ever dealing in horrors, yet are excused for their bad taste on account of the morbidness of their imagination. Before we can allow, however, Mr. Le Fanu to plead that his imagination is morbid, we shall require him to prove that he has, properly speaking, any imagination at all. In the most ignorant and debased of savage tribes there could scarcely be found an old woman who could not tell stories as full of childish horrors as Mr. Le Fanu's, and tell them in language that was at all events intelligible. Some of the mountain tribes of India believe in ghosts who reside in trees, and who are only to be propitiated by a dance being executed round the tree in which they reside. "Among the more superstitious tribes," we read in the Annals of Rural Bengal, "it is customary for each family to dance round every single tree, in order that they may not by any chance omit the one in which their god may be residing." Now, if any one man first struck out the thought that a ghost resided in a tree and required to be propitiated by a round dance, he indeed might justly lay claim to some amount of imagination. But when generation after generation had thus propitiated these ghosts, we should just as soon think of attributing imagination to a savage whom we found dancing round his hundredth tree as to Mr. Le Fanu, who, following in the track probably of his old nurse or of Mrs. Radcliff, is bringing in his hundredth spectre. Any one, if he were put to it, could find enough imagination to make up a story with the churchyard materials which Mr. Le Fanu delights to use, though it is not every one who, having performed this easy feat, would proceed to write a preface in praise of his own intelligence.

Mr. Le Fanu evidently thinks that in such imaginative works as his claim to be, the best way to win his reader's belief is to follow De Foe in his circumstantiality. Unfortunately, however, though he shows no imagination in his fiction, he shows a good deal of imagination in his facts, and while pretending to deal minutely with bygone days, proves at once that his ignorance of them is complete. His study of literature began, we should imagine, with the first novel that he wrote. The pelican, we are told, feeds her young on food which she plucks from her own breast. Mr. Le Fanu, on the contrary, would seem to feed the later offspring of his brain on sustenance solely derived from his first-born. We ought not, however, to fail to do him the justice of admitting that he now and then introduces a Latin word which suggests a certain acquaintance with the Latin Grammar, and a fine-sounding phrase which suggests a certain acquaintance with the Daily Telegraph. Like the editor of that paper, moreover, he has a great command over the moon, and in one of his stories passes with extraordinary rapidity from a night that is bright with moonlight to the next that is as dark as pitch. The scene of one of his stories is laid in the year 1794. It is certainly somewhat strange to find that in that year, of all years, a gentleman who was suffering from "depression, misery, and excitement," was advised "to try a short tour on the Continent," and went by way of Dover to Calais. It was not exactly the year in which a cure for excitement was to be looked for in France, or in which "a crowd of idlers stood upon the jetty at Calais to receive the packet." We are willing to forgive Mr. Le Fanu for the improbability of the ghost who was among the idlers, and who, Englishman, or rather English ghost, that he was, yet talked in "a broad provincial patois." We should be curious to learn, by the way, what patois is not provincial. Mr. Le Fanu may bring in his ghosts where he pleases, and when he pleases, and may make them talk even in the peculiar language which he writes, but he must not be allowed without rebuke to show an ignorance of modern history of which a writer of school histories might well be ashamed. In one of the stories, along with the spectre of the black monkey with the "unfathomable malignity," we have cabs and omnibuses. Now, though we think that the old women from whom alone, till we came across Mr. Le Fanu's writings, we had heard of such spectres, had sense enough to place them in far earlier times, yet we shall let him, if he pleases, take his monkey spectre to what he calls a 'bus. Nevertheless, if his story requires that 'buses and cabs and monkey spectres shall come together, we have a right to insist that he shall not pretend that his story was written quite so far back as "about sixty-four years ago." Even Dr. Henselius, though "his knowledge was immense, and his grasp of a case was an intuition," can scarcely be allowed in the year 1808 to have known of a 'bus. Perhaps, however, the prophetic knowledge, or intuition which he showed in this matter may have been a part of the "metaphysical speculation," or "religious metaphysics," for which he was so famous.

As for the five stories contained in these three volumes, there is not one of them which is not hopelessly absurd. The hero of the first tale, a country vicar haunted by the black monkey, cuts his throat with a razor. The hero of the second, haunted by the ghost who at one time spoke "the provincial patois," and at another time apparently took the shape of an owl, was killed in his bed by this most intrusive apparition. In the third story an old judge of the last century, after hanging the husband of his mistress, gets tried in a ghostly court, and is at last found hanged himself. Ever since, "this dreadful old man," the judge, has haunted a house in Westminster, carrying "in his ringed and ruffled hand a coil of rope." These three stories fill up the first volume, with the help of such extracts from "metaphysical medicine" as the following:—

So soon as the spirit-action has established itself in the case of one patient, its developed energy begins to radiate, more or less effectually, upon others.

The fourth story, which is the longest, contains some horrors in Mr. Le Fanu's best style. The hero is made, without knowing it, to order his own grave and his own coffin. He is thrown into a kind of trance, in which, though he cannot move, he yet knows all that is going on. He is laid in the coffin, and hears very distinctly "the working of a turn-screw, and the crunching home of screws in succession." Then these vulgar sounds," he remarks in Mr. Le Fanu's best style, "no doom spoken in thunder could have been more tremendous." Happily, before the noble murderers could make off with the 30,000*l.* which the hero, after the fashion of young Englishmen, had taken with him on his first visit to Paris, they were surprised. The hero is let out of the coffin, becomes "a sadder if not a wiser man," and has "deep reason to be thankful to the all-merciful Ruler of events for an early and terrible lesson in the ways of sin."

Our readers will have had enough by this time of Mr. Le Fanu's stories, and may be thankful to be spared an account of the most foolish and the most offensive of all his tales—that, namely, of the Vampire. When an author has the grave opened of a person who had been buried one hundred and fifty years, and describes how "the leaden coffin floated with blood, in which, to a depth of seven inches, the body lay immersed," we are, we think, more than justified in declining to analyse his silly and miserable story. We should hope that this time he will find that he has miscalculated the taste of the subscribers to the seaside lending libraries, for whom he probably writes. They will no doubt stand a good deal, but possibly Dr. Martin Henselius and his raw-head and bloody-bones horrors will prove too much even for their powers of endurance.

MUIR'S ORIGINAL SANSKRIT TEXTS.*

THE publication of these volumes has been somewhat irregular, and the fourth of the five volumes yet remains to be issued. Each volume treats of a distinct subject, and in fact constitutes a separate work; so that, although we have already (September 10, 1870) reviewed Vol. V., which dealt with Comparative Mythology, we now propose to notice another volume of the series. The first edition of the work was issued from fifteen to twenty years ago, but the second edition has been so greatly extended as to be almost a new work. An ardent student of Sanskrit during the years of his service in India, Dr. Muir has also been a liberal promoter of the spread of knowledge among the Hindus. Impressed with the belief that the Hindu system can be most successfully attacked by a demonstration of the weakness, insufficiency, and inconsistency of the writings upon which it is professedly founded, he has laboured hard to lay open the doctrines recorded in those writings; he has given liberal prizes to encourage others in the same course, he has munificently endowed a Professorship of Sanskrit in the University of Edinburgh, and now in the autumn of life he has released these volumes, the fruits of many a year of research and study. With the results of his own researches he has incorporated the opinions of his chief fellow-labourers in the same field of inquiry, and has brought together all the most important and authoritative writings, both Indian and European, upon the subjects of which he treats.

In the present article we shall confine our attention to the first volume, which notices the Mythical Accounts of the Creation of Man and of the Origin of the Four Castes. Of the portions which relate to the creation of man little need be said. They are interesting, and indeed important, to those who desire to study the rise and progress of Hindu belief and doctrine; but there is little in them to attract the attention of the general reader, or even to demand the study of the philosopher. It is different with the system of caste. How this great institution arose, developed, and spread, and how deeply and variously it has influenced the fortunes and decided the character of a large and most intelligent portion of the human race, are questions of primary importance in the history of man.

The oldest writings of the Hindus—the Hymns of the Rig Veda—whatever be their age, whether to be counted by hundreds, or by more than two thousand years anterior to the Christian era, represent the forefathers of this great branch of the Aryan race * Original Sanskrit Texts on the Origin and History of the People of India, their Religion, and Institutions. Collected, translated, and illustrated by J. Muir, D.C.L., LL.D. Vol. I.—Mythical and Legendary Accounts of the Origin of Caste, with an Inquiry into its Existence in the Vedic Age. Second Edition, rewritten and greatly enlarged. London: Trübner & Co. 1868.

as a pastoral people, dwelling upon the banks of the Five Rivers, and worshipping the personified elements. That they were an incurive people, and had made their way thither from the westward, hardly admits of any reasonable doubt, though it has been questioned. These primitive hymns of the Rig have been diligently searched, and in only one of them is there any mention or indication of caste. This hymn, called the Purusha sukta, celebrates the sacrifice of the purusha, or male, by the gods; and from the position assigned to it in the ritual of a later Veda, it was probably used in the celebration of human sacrifices. The immolation of human beings would seem to have been actually practised in the Vedic period, but to have subsequently assumed a symbolical character, men being bound to the sacrificial posts, while animals were slain as vicarious sacrifices. This hymn thus describes the sacrifice of Purusha :—

When (the gods) divided Purusha, into how many parts did they cut him up? What was his mouth? what arms had he? what two objects are said (to have been) his thighs and feet? The Brâhman was his mouth; the Râjanya was made his arms; the being (called) the Vaiya, he was his thighs; the Sûdra sprang from his feet. The moon sprang from his soul (manas); the sun from his eye; Indra and Agni from his mouth; and Vâyu from his breath. From his navel arose the air; from his head the sky; from his feet the earth; from his ear the (four) quarters; in this manner the gods formed the world.

This agrees essentially with the generally accepted belief that the Brâhman sprang from the mouth, the Kshatriya from the arms, the Vaiya from the thighs, and the Sûdra from the feet of Brâhma, the progenitor of the human race. It symbolizes the wisdom which was to guide, the valour to defend, the strength to support, and the labour to serve the body politic. This hymn is to all appearance the source from which all the myths respecting the origin of caste had their origin. So if the hymn can be classed among the most ancient, the institution of caste must have existed previously to the oldest records of the Hindu race. But all European scholars who have considered the subject agree, with few exceptions, that it is of later date. Colobrooke, one of the earliest and yet one of the most profound of our Sanskrit scholars, who first penetrated the mystery in which the Vedas were shrouded, gave it as his opinion that

That remarkable hymn is in language, metre, and style very different from the rest of the prayers with which it is associated. It has a decidedly more modern tone; and must have been composed after the Sanskrit language had been refined, and its grammar and rhythm perfected.

If caste had existed in the early Vedic period, it must surely have found mention in more than one hymn. When, too, it is found that this hymn is the only one in which the word Vaiya, the name of the third caste, appears, that it is the only one which mentions the fourfold classification of Vedic composition, and that it refers to the seasons of the year in a way that accords with later usage but differs from that employed in the other hymns of the Rig, the conclusion seems inevitable. But though this hymn cannot be classed among the most ancient hymns, its antiquity is inferior only to theirs, and it is probably anterior to every other kind of extant Hindu writing. So, then, the institution of caste is not coeval with the earliest records of the Hindu people. This is the result to which independent reasoning would have brought us; for, as (with a special and partial exception to be presently noticed) caste is entirely unknown to the other Aryan races, it may fairly be inferred that the institution arose among the Hindus after they had separated from their kindred stock.

The priority of the hymns of the Rig to all other Hindu writings is incontestable. The language in which they are written is so archaic, both in grammar and vocabulary, that some centuries before the Christian era special treatises were written in its explanation. The other Vedas, with the exception of the fourth, the Atharva, contain little beyond what is to be found in the Rig. What new matter they do contain is to all appearance of a somewhat later date, and in these the mention of caste, or at any rate of classes, is more frequent and distinct. What time elapsed between the compilation of the hymns, and the appearance of the writings called Brâhmanas, can only be guessed at, but it must have been considerable. The Brâhmanas contain explanations of the hymns and regulations for their proper use in the celebration of sacrifices, and they embrace also the later treatises called Aranyakas and Upanishads, which are the beginnings of the speculative theology of the Hindus. These inquire into the mystic sense of the hymns, and the symbolism of the ceremonies, with the grand object of attaining a knowledge of the godhead, and of the origin and destiny of man. All these writings, both hymns and treatises, come under the denomination of Śruti or revelation, "that which was heard," as distinguished from the Smṛiti, or "that which was remembered," by the sages who committed to writing the various productions which fall under this classification, and which are considered inferior in authority to the revealed writings alone. Under the designation of Smṛiti come first the Vedāngas or supplements to the Vedas, devoted to the explanation of the grammar, vocabulary, pronunciation, metre, astronomy, and ceremonial of the Vedas. Next come the Sûtras, or aphorisms relating to domestic ceremonies and sacrificial rites. The Institutes of Manu follow next in order of time, and may be regarded as the great basis of Hindu civil law and political institutions. Last come the Purânas and the Purânas, the former including the great epic poems, the Râmâyana and Mahâbhârata; while the Purânas, eighteen in number, display the Hindu system in its fullest development. It is difficult to describe these latter works. They deal with cosmogony and mythology, with legendary lore, and volubly upon the destiny of the world. How much, or rather how little, of fact they contain, it is difficult to estimate. Some gleams of fact shine feebly here and there; but the mind is bewildered with the millions of years and countless ages which they profess to record, while it is saddened with the sterile and empty results arrived at by a long succession of acute reasoners and daring speculators.

Through all these works Dr. Muir has pushed his inquiries upon the origin of caste, selecting and translating all the important passages which bear upon the question. The conclusion at which he arrives is that the passages quoted have rendered it abundantly evident that the sacred books of the Hindus contain no uniform or consistent account of the origin of caste; but, on the contrary, present the greatest varieties of speculation on this subject. Explanations mystical, mythical, and rationalistic, are all offered in turn; and the freest scope is given by the individual writers to fanciful and arbitrary conjecture. . . . The most common story is that the castes issued from the mouth, arms, feet, and thighs of Purusha, or Brâhma. The oldest extant passage in which this idea occurs is to be found in the Purusha Sûkta; but it is doubtful whether in the form in which it is there presented this representation is anything more than an allegory. In some of the texts which I have quoted from the Upanishads, traces of the same allegorical character may be perceived; but in Manu and the Purânas the mystical import of the Vedic text disappears, and the figurative narrative is hardened into a literal statement of fact.

In another chapter Dr. Muir seeks, by a study of the hymns of Rig and Atharva Vedas, to "ascertain the mutual relations of the different classes of Indian society at the time the hymns were composed." That there were priests and a priestly order is sufficiently apparent, but there is nothing to indicate that the order was exclusive and hereditary. The name by which the priest was designated was brâhman, and although the term brâhman (the present name of the priestly caste) is occasionally used, it had none of the exclusive meaning it now bears, but was used in its strict etymological sense of "son of a priest," and in one text indeed the words "brâhman-putra, priest's son," are used as the equivalent of the term brâhman. It is hardly necessary to point out that there is a wide distinction between "son of a priest" and "son of a priestly class." The conclusion which Dr. Muir arrives at is that "in none of the texts is any clear reference made to the Brâhmanas as constituting an exclusive caste or race, and nothing whatever is said about their being descended from an ancestor distinct from those of the other classes of their countrymen."

In addition to the negative evidence thus afforded, there is proof in the hymns and in later works that the authors of some of the hymns were men who were not of sacerdotal descent, although some of them acted as priests. It is sufficient to notice a single instance, that of the sage Visvâmitra, who is the recognized author of several of the hymns, though he is by common consent acknowledged to have been of royal descent, and to have raised himself to the priestly order. This proves that, although there was a sacerdotal and also a regal class, the former at least was not exclusive and hereditary.

The term Vaiya, the name of the third caste, is said to be entirely unknown to the most ancient hymns; but the word vis, from which it is derived, is used in the hymns to designate the general community of Aryan worship and culture. That there were at first only three great divisions is curiously corroborated by the Zand Avesta of the Zoroastrians, which mentions three distinct classes, closely resembling in their names and functions these three classes of the Hindu race. Dr. Haug, who has brought this passage to light, considers that these were not simply classes, but castes; and if this were so, the origin of caste must be carried back to a period anterior to the separation of the Aryans of India from those of Persia; unless, indeed, it could be supposed that both these branches of the original stock, having the germ of the institution, developed it similarly and simultaneously. The evidence of the Zoroastrian divisions being castes, and not mere classes, is however too slight to influence the argument; and there is the grand objection that caste never became a recognized Zoroastrian institution.

The origin of the fourth caste, the Sûdra, is wrapped in mystery. The very etymology of the name is unsettled. A Puranic authority derives it from the roots svak, "to grieve," and dra, "to run"; but this is inconsistent with the ordinary rules of derivation, and the meaning assigned to it of "one who grieves and runs" is very far from carrying conviction with it. Another etymology derives it from sudh, "to purify," but this is equally worthless; for, apart from the difficulty of formation, the derivation of the name of the impure caste from a root signifying "to purify" is a worthy parallel of hocus a non lucendo. The name Sûdra does not occur in the most ancient hymns. It first occurs with that of Vaiya in the Purusha sukta. So, between the period of the oldest hymns and the composition of this hymn, the term vis, which was used in the former to designate the general community, had developed into the form Vaiya, and had become the recognized name of a third class or caste, consisting of proprietors and traders, such as we call middle-class people. The Sûdras, or servile race, then first come into notice—what was their origin? Upon this question there is no satisfactory evidence. All is left to inference and conjecture. Dr. Muir quotes the opinion of Professor Roth that "the Sûdras consisted of a race subdued by the Brahmanical conquerors, whether that race may have been a branch of the Aryan stock which immigrated at an early period into India, or an autochthonous Indian tribe." The latter supposition may, we think, be safely dismissed; for the Sûdras have all the characteristics of an Aryan race, and, on the other hand, the Aryan writers make abundant mention of the śūdras, or barbarian tribes of India, with which they come in contact in their progress. Being left to conjecture, we may offer the following as at least a plausible theory of the formation of the fourth caste:—When the Aryan invaders made their way into India, they had their priests and their warrior chiefs, a hierarchy and an aristocracy distinct from each other and above the great body of the people; the first holding a position similar to that of the clergy of Europe, and the latter having, as there appears ground for believing, already acquired an hereditary character. It is not likely, however, that the great mass of immigrants was separated into clearly defined classes. But after the people had settled upon the territory they had won, some by superior intelligence and activity extended their possessions, and others through inferiority of character or misfortune sunk into or continued in the position of servants and labourers. There, as in other parts of the world, a moneyed class and a labouring class were gradually formed. The breach between wealth and poverty is ever widening. As the middle class grew rich and more secure in their possessions, they treated their dependents with the same contempt they received from the priestly and regal classes, and asserted for themselves a superiority over those who were dependent on their labour for their bread. These pretensions made no encroachment upon the privileges of the higher classes, and so met with no opposition on that side. Thus the middle class came to be recognized as the vis or people, and all below them were separated into a fourth and inferior class. Then the term Vinaya was formed from the old word vis, and applied with a more definite and restricted meaning, and the fourth or servile class received the appellation of Sūdra, which, whatever its etymology, is recognized as meaning "servile."

We have said that no satisfactory derivation has been found for the term Sūdra. If the origin of the word could be discovered, it would no doubt throw much light upon the position of the class to which it was applied. The failure to discover its root may perhaps be attributed to the fact of the search for it having been limited to roots beginning, like the word itself, with the palatal s, and, if such a root could be found, it would unquestionably be preferable to one beginning with the dental s. But although the interchange of these sibilants is not common, still the instances of such changes are sufficiently numerous to justify a search under the second sibilant when the proper one fails to supply any acceptable etymon. Now the dental sibilant does seem to offer a probable radix in the root śvid, identical with our word "sweat," which appears also in the Latin sudo and sudor. Admit the possibility of śvid being the root and the root is easy. The word Sūdra will mean "a sweater," one who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow, and will thus present an appropriate name for the labouring class. This theory is at least plausible and worth consideration.

Dr. Muir quotes, as the motto of his volume, a verse of the Mahā-bhārata:—

There is no distinction of castes. This world, which, as created by Brāhmā, was at first entirely Brahmanic, has become divided into classes in consequence of men's works.

Setting aside the pretensions advanced by the Brahmanical writer for his own caste, this appears to present an accurate statement of the facts. No distinction of castes was established by the Veda, but the institution sprang up subsequently as the result of men's habits and social arrangements.

In another somewhat lengthy chapter Dr. Muir proceeds to give some legendary illustrations of the struggle which no doubt occurred in the early ages of Hindu history between the Brāhmins and the Kshatriyas, after the former had begun to constitute a fraternity exercising the sacerdotal profession, but before the respective provinces of the two classes had been accurately defined by custom, and when the members of each were ready to encroach on the prerogatives claimed as their own exclusive birthright by the other.

This is another phase of the world-wide struggle between the spiritual and secular powers. It occupies a conspicuous position, and fills many a page of the epic poems and the Purānas. It also has its interest, as all such conflicts must have, but it is too extensive and diversified to receive more than a passing notice in the space at our command.

That great research and labour must have been expended on the preparation of these volumes is abundantly manifest, but how great can only be adequately appreciated by men who know the vast extent of the works from which Dr. Muir has drawn his materials. Equally conspicuous are the candour and the modesty with which the facts are arranged and the deductions drawn. If we have any fault to find, it is that the author has been too reticent perhaps of the opinions which he must have formed. He has gone to his work in the spirit of one anxious to arrive at the truth, not in search of proofs to establish a preconceived theory. The result is a mass of trustworthy evidence, for which he deserves the thanks of all who are interested in the history of the people of India.

ST. JANE FRANCES DE CHANTAL.

THE Life of St. Jane Frances de Chantal is so mixed up with that of her spiritual father St. Francis de Sales, that the biography of the one admits the reader to a knowledge of the character and of many details of the active life of the other, thus adding greatly to its value and interest. We are introduced to a pair of modern saints—truly deserving the title—holding a certain domestic relation towards each other; visiting at each other's homes, dining at the same table in the family circle, exchanging civilities, transacting business together, arranging a family alliance on ordinary secular principles of fitness, keeping up a close correspondence as devoted and mutually admiring and reverencing friends. We see them not only as (ultimately canonized) saints, but as accomplished gentleman and fine lady of the seventeenth century. These details of state, wealth, and property, of dress and courtly grace naturally belonging to their condition and accepted as such, are, however, in the history before us, so interwoven with the supernatural, with visions, prophecies, miracles, all related in the same tone of confident matter-of-course narration, never condescending to proof or evidence, that the effect upon the reader is that of reading two books at once—some monkish chronicle interlined with modern biography. The puzzle is explained when we recall the French origin of the narrative; the book being, in fact, as the editor informs us in the preface, only an abridgment and résumé of the Abbé Rougaud's Histoire de Ste.-Chantal et des Origines de la Visitation. Perhaps it is further explained by the necessities of the case; miracles being essential to the supreme distinction of canonization. This crowning honour St. Jane de Chantal set her heart upon obtaining for her departed friend and director, and, being a woman of remarkable strength of will, implicit faith in her Church, great authority, and saintly reputation, an inquiry set on foot by her for miracles constituted a demand which was sure to meet with its answering supply. Whatever view might previously have been taken of certain events, this inquiry would determine it in the desired way, and settle the question between natural and supernatural. Thus we read that Mother de Beaumont nailed his likeness upon the convent-gate, and was saved from the plague. A son-in-law of Madame de Chantal is wounded in battle and told by the doctors that death is imminent, upon which he applies a letter of St. Francis to the wound and the bullets come out of themselves. Mother de Chantal herself attested on oath that the whole convent at Annecy was frequently filled with a delicate subtle fragrance, attributing it to the fact that the Saint's body lay buried there. Of course many of the miracles recorded cannot be traced to simple honest imagination, but this was clearly stimulated to the utmost. The frequent testimonies to the odour of sanctity and to limbs pliant years after death, the story of a radiant picture and similar marvels, have the air of responses to an appeal which a convent of devout nuns would be ashamed to disappoint. Thus, if the chapel which contains the body of the Saint emits a fragrance, that at Lyons which holds his heart in a golden reliquary must needs rather surpass the wonder than fall short of it; and we are informed that from the relic continually flowed a sweet liquid resembling fragrant oil. Nor is the venerable Mother herself without similar testimonies to saintliness. While still a wife and living in the world, after exhausting the provisions at her command in alms to the poor during a famine, and being reduced to a single barrel of flour, we read, "It is credibly recorded that for full six months the entire household of Hourbilly and the neighbouring poor were abundantly fed from this single barrel of flour"; and as the famine went on the servants became quite accustomed, after sweeping out the granary one day, to find it full of corn the next. A gigantic porter renowned for his strength was seized with a strange attack of weakness when in later years he had to carry her litter, and it turned out afterwards that he had led a wicked life, and was executed for his many crimes; and so on. No wonder that, as her sanctity grew, the nuns of the eighty convents founded by her became anxious to retain as much of her as they could by any means secure for a lasting possession. Thus the nuns of the Visitation at Paris implored her to bequeath her heart to them, her body being pledged to Annecy, where lay St. Francis. The request was granted, but the convent at Moulins was eventually successful in securing the prize, which was preserved in a jewelled reliquary, the word itself bespeaking and foreshadowing miracles. Those less favoured had to be content with portions of her habit and her veil, surreptitiously snipped off as relics.

The reader willingly grants that the Saints were saintly, but feels that the mind cannot wholesomely dwell on the technical business of making out their saintliness. The whole strain appears to have been opposed to the spirit of St. Francis, and to the aims he had in view in organizing the order of which St. Jane de Chantal was foundress. But the spirit of the cloister must assert itself through every difference of rule. His turn was practical, he was opposed to excessive asceticism, he wished especially to dispense with the rule of enclosure, so that the poor and sick might be visited by the nuns at their own homes; but he had to yield in this to his spiritual superiors. There is no indication of his demanding that utter renunciation of the will and judgment which goes under the name of obedience, and which is naturally enough set up as the crowning test of sanctity in communities composed exclusively of two classes—the ultra strong wills that rule, the implicitly, blindly submissive who obey, and who under the term "simplicity" are indulged and commended in any amount of passivity in return for the self-respect which they renounce. We believe that St. Francis's test of sanctity would have been other than that here propounded:—

When Mother Roset was very old she was one day sent for to the parlour to sing to M. Olier, the founder of St. Sulpice. At all times it is supposed that Mother Roset had not a pleasant voice, and as it was now cracked, it was a considerable humiliation to exercise it for the benefit of a stranger.

But the aged Sister with great simplicity went close to the parlour grating and sang until she was told by the Superior to leave off. As soon as she was gone away M. Olier, who was one of the best living judges of true spirituality, exclaimed, "Fifty miracles would not so thoroughly have convinced me of the Christian virtue of that nun as this act of heroic submission."

Let us hope that the old lady had a better opinion of her voice than her critic, and that she had that satisfaction personnelle which casuists claim in reward of the labours of the pauvre esprit, as a compensation for the world's disparagement, arguing—C'est ainsi que Dieu, qui est juste, donne aux grenouilles de la satisfaction de leur chant. It is melancholy to think of old age, which should be venerable, submitting to make sport in this fashion. The reader, after a string of such feats of abject docility, is simply shocked by the tameness they display; and we verily believe St. Francis would have felt the same. There was no desire in him to crush individuality and put down common sense. In a case which is made much of as enjoining implicit submission to rule, we may discern the influential end and motive which guided that rule. It was just before the Profession Day, when the Gallery House at Annecy, the seed of so many houses, was to be dedicated and the first nuns professed, that the Sisters persuaded their Mother to let them take some money which the bishop had given them for the sick to decorate the chapel and altar. Mother de Chantal allowed herself to be persuaded, but no sooner had she done so than she wrote to confess her error, and next day, kneeling and in tears, accused herself of her fault. "Daughter, this is your first disobedience to me; it has given me a very bad night," said the Saint, and passed on, leaving her still kneeling on the ground. The spot in the orchard where this scene passed is handed down by tradition as sacred. Possibly St. Francis owes the distinction of the present volume to his friendship and reverence for St. Ignatius, as throughout its pages we detect the spirit of the Order whose watchword is obedience; especially in the one harsh exception to a tone of general bland toleration, where the biographer speaks of Jansenism as one of the most detestable heresies that have ever disfigured the Church of Christ.

Jane Francoise Frémyot de Chantal (grandmother of Madame de Sévigné) was born at Dijon in 1572. Her father, Béguigne Frémyot, was President of the then famous Burgundian Parliament, a man of rank and wealth and high religious character. She lost her mother in infancy, to which circumstance her biographer attributes a sternness and austerity which it needed all her saintly director's guidance to subdue into the full sweetness of Christian charity. It was, however, this difference of temperament, joined with unity of aims, which no doubt attracted these remarkable persons towards each other, and united them in a life-long and most intimate friendship, one of those many spiritual friendships recorded in the lives of saints—alike beneficial to themselves and to their teaching as tempering the asperities of asceticism—which prove that pure friendship is possible between man and woman, though in no case can the distinction of sex be wholly forgotten or ignored. Jane Francoise came into the world when the controversy between Huguenots and Catholics was at its height, and when Burgundy was "overrun with Calvinists." Before she was five years old she entered into it with characteristic energy. Being present at a dispute on the Real Presence she joined in the argument; her opponent, viewing his small adversary with surprise, tried to settle it with sugar-plums. She took them in her pinafore and marching to the fireplace threw them into the fire, saying, "Look, my lord, this is how heretics will be burnt in the fire of hell because they do not believe what our Lord says." She seems to have been trained in more freedom of will than most girls of her age; for at sixteen she refused to marry one man who proposed for her because she suspected him of Huguenot proclivities, and she declined another brilliant match on other grounds. At length she acquiesced in her father's selection of Christopher de Chantal, then head of the Rabutin house, with whom he had served in support of Henry IV. A scrupulous conscience might have found something to object to even in his case, for before he was thirty he had fought eighteen duels, which Bussy Rabutin ascribes to his extreme gentleness and meekness of demeanour. But he was seen to be full of religious faith and devoted to his duties, besides possessing the Rabutin charm of manner—what Madame de Sévigné afterwards called Rabutinage. Jane, a beautiful woman of dignified manner, and, at twenty, with some knowledge of the world, made him in every respect an excellent wife; courteous to her equals, a wise manager of his estates during his frequent absences at Court or at the wars, and at the same time full of good works. She married in 1592. Five years afterwards he was killed by accident in hunting, and she was left a wealthy widow with four children. Her first act when the trance of despair was passed was to take a vow of chastity, and to dedicate more of her time to religious exercises, feeling now for the first time the need of a director in the stricter path which she desired to follow. We are here informed that, while riding alone about her property, she had a kind of manifestation as to who this director should be—a person who looked like a bishop walking towards her in cassock, rochet, and biretta, with countenance of serene and heavenly aspect, who disappeared on nearer approach. This vision did not prevent her putting herself soon after under the direction of a pious monk, who encouraged her desire for extreme austerities, and who extracted from her four vows, two of which were never to leave him, and to let no other person speak to her of her interior state. We are rather struck with the ease with which she was able to resist these embarrassing vows when the true director came. In 1603 she heard St. Francis preach at Dijon, where her father lived, recognized him as the reality of her vision, he at the same moment noticing the young calm face in widow's weeds upraised in fixity of attention; and very soon Francis de Sales is on intimate terms with the President Frémyot and all her family, on further knowledge pronouncing upon her spiritual case—like the London physician overhauling the country practitioner's prescription—that the monk's advice had been excellent for the time, but the period had now come for reversing it, vows and all. We gather that the Saint's manner had an inherent native charm from the fact that nobody without such an instrument of power could have ventured on the freedoms which were more than allowed in him. Thus, sitting by Madame de Chantal at dinner, "Madame," he asks in a low voice, "should you like to marry again?" "No, indeed, my lord," she instantly replied. "Then you should pull down your flag," he said smiling. She perfectly understood him, and next day at dinner her dress was docked of certain little trimmings and coxcombries. It was the same when she wore lace; would not her dress be as clean without it? No doubt he had his eye upon a future foundress; for we read "He had at once discerned the noble and solid qualities of the young widow," and wrote of her that she brought vividly to his mind St. Paula, St. Angela, and St. Catharine. "She has a grand soul, and her courage in great religious undertakings is above that of women."

The character, the society, the proper work of women not only occupied St. Francis, but were a natural subject of interest with him. We find Françoise, Madame de Chantal's second daughter, who had a taste for dress, appealing to the Saint against her mother's restrictions, and he takes her part, advises a fine ruff for great days, and "thinks the child would be much pleased to have these laces and standing up ruffles. You see I know something about these things." In the same spirit he would call the young lady to order with paternal authority when his quick eye saw she was carrying things too far. His reproofs have a bantering tenderness. If he would check Madame de Chantal's too eager spiritual aspirations, he reminds her that she is but a poor miserable little widow—une pauvre petite chétive veuve. He condescended not only to dictate the material of the veils of the new Order, but, taking the scissors, shaped out the form with his own hand. When he led the nuns into the orchard of the Gallery House at Annecy during recreation, to explain to them the virtue of affability, and a thunderstorm came on, one of the novices cried, "Oh, my lord, I am so frightened!" He laughed and replied (on what warrant we know not), "O my child, don't be afraid; the lightning only strikes great saints or great sinners, and you are neither one nor the other." When Madame de Chantal wrote asking leave for less sleep, the request was promptly refused. He advised between seven and eight hours' sleep as necessary for women, whose brain and frame are more liable to give way under pressure, when their work necessarily loses its value. His rule permitted the indulgence of natural affection and terms of endearment. Perfect sweetness of character cannot be found without independence of mind. No blaze of sanctity ever obscured these natural graces in him, and his gracious air and manner set them off to their highest advantage. What must be the influence over men, and supereminently over women, of a Saint thus endowed?

All great undertakings for the benefit of society seem fated to exact some preliminary sacrifice, and to us the sacrifice in this case was St. Jane's eldest daughter Marie Aimée, betrothed at eleven and married at thirteen to the younger brother of St. Francis; we cannot help thinking because the arrangement conveniently put a difficulty out of the way of Madame de Chantal's dedication to her new work. Early marriages were allowed in those days, but when we read the complacent summing up of this interesting young creature's life—"this beautiful life, let it never be forgotten, had lasted little more than nineteen years, and during that time Marie Aimée de Chantal had become a wife, a mother, a widow, a nun"—it suggests some reflections in another key. St. Jane Francoise died in 1641, in her seventieth year, after a life of varied labour spent in the business of managing a family and large estates, and the more absorbing charge of the Order of which she was foundress. Her second daughter, Françoise, lived to eighty-five, and owed her death then to a holy imprudence in making a pilgrimage fasting to a sanctuary on a mountain height.

THE WELLINGTON PRIZE ESSAY ON TACTICS.

LIEUTENANT MAURICE may well claim credit for having built up a work of such living interest as his is, even to the layman, upon such a set of dry bones as the given thesis afforded. For, at a first glance, the sections into which this is divided for the purpose of strict technical inquiry (which may be briefly described as an examination of the best modes of marching on, of covering, of attacking, and of defending a position) do not suggest anything to the general reader likely to repay his perusal. He may probably expect only an addition to those unprofitable discussions of certain military theorists which profess to treat the whole possibilities of war in a given number of actions.

* The System of Field Manœuvres best adapted for enabling our Troops to meet a Continental Army. By Lieut. F. Maurice, Royal Artillery, Instructor of Tactics and Organization, Royal Military College, Sandhurst. London: Macmillan & Co. 1872.

definitions, problems, and cases, presenting all the dryness of the First Book of Euclid without any of its truth, since nothing is more likely to lead to false results than this trick of reasoning about men as though they were soulless machines. Lieutenant Maurice's Essay by no means deserves to be classed with these very useless disquisitions. Often original, he is always interesting, and has kept clear throughout of this pedantic school. But it is possible to fly from this error into the opposite extreme, and, in the effort to avoid too close adherence to formulae, to become so vague and discursive in treating the theory of war as to afford the student little solid basis on which to fix his views, and to leave the more hasty reader with only a confused impression of the writer's design. And it seems to us that Lieutenant Maurice has barely escaped this latter danger, in his wish to make his Essay as complete a study of the subject as the conditions allowed, without theorizing too closely upon it. He tells us in his preface that, as it was impossible that the paper should be published until some months after it had been written, he has carefully revised it, and added references to works which have only recently become available. We find accordingly at the opening a long list of books quoted, and in the Essay itself references to the very latest utterances on the subject of tactics, even to lectures of fugitive interest very recently delivered. Added as these are to other very numerous quotations, they give the work as a whole too much the character of a commentary on what has been said and written about modern tactics by others, rather than of an original essay on the great questions handled. We say purposely "as a whole," for there are not wanting passages, as will presently be shown, which are remarkably fresh and original in thought. And to many readers who have had little opportunity of studying what the military press, especially in Germany, has put forth on these questions, so complete a review, and so clever an adaptation of this literature to English ideas as Lieutenant Maurice offers, may have a special value. But it is our desire here rather to notice the writer's own special views, and the treatment of them which his work affords. His use of the long list of German essayists whose works he tabulates is, in certain places, of doubtful worth. In extending his studies over such a mass of criticisms and reflections, he has possibly confused himself. At any rate he has hardly learnt to measure quality, or mastered the essential differences in the worth of his various authorities, and their respective relations to the circumstances of which they write.

The text of the Essay lies in the first sentences. The author begins by quoting the admirable definition of the word Manœuvres from Colonel Hanley's Operations of War. He follows this by the broad statement of his own opinion, delivered thus:—

I have been led to the conclusion that the very basis on which at present our [i.e. the British] scheme for accomplishing this manœuvring is founded must be changed if we would meet the changed conditions of war. The objects to be attained are precisely those named in the definition [i.e. the quick orderly change of highly trained and flexible masses from one kind of formation to another, or their transference from point to point]; the method of securing them is greatly modified. Those who have been engaged in the recent fighting [the italics are our own, to point attention to the chief sources of knowledge employed], and who have recorded their experiences, are very unanimous on the subject. I must therefore ask for patience if, before proceeding to the detailed consideration of our future manœuvres under the several assigned heads, I am drawn into an inquiry the relevancy of which will be perhaps not fully apparent till the details are discussed.

We quote these introductory sentences as giving the proper key to the study of what follows. The rest of the brief preface is not by any means so clear. For how we can introduce the "very radical changes" which are to be suggested, whilst at the same time holding the extremely conservative doctrine that "the less we imagine we can dispense with any of the lessons of the past, the sounder our conclusions will be," is not apparent to us, fresh though we are from a careful perusal of Mr. Maurice's general inquiry. This, with some short supplementary chapters on the proportionate advantages of Attack or Defence, and on the Retaining Power of Small Bodies, occupies about a hundred pages, and forms the really important part of the Essay. The application of the principles which are arrived at to the problems assigned for competition follows as a matter of course, in sections which are well worth perusal, but which are necessarily of a much more technical scope than the preliminary discussion.

This, as we said at the outset, is rather a review than an original body of thought. Lieutenant Maurice has, in fact, taken much pains to fortify by abundant references his views of the necessity of great changes. A large part of his citations are from the well-known book of Boguslawski, and other minor German works which deal with the results of the late war. And to an English reader it will not be uninteresting to find that to Colonel Gawler (whose little book on the Essentials of Good Skirmishing is frequently referred to), as doubtless to many other old Peninsular veterans, great part of what the Germans consider as so especially national, so entirely born of their own system, and so bound up with the use of the breech-loader, was familiar many years ago, when we knew little enough of the Prussian weapon or the Prussian military training. It is highly creditable to the essayist's industry and research to have brought this fact so clearly to light.

Our author devotes his attention especially to examining "the evidence on which we can safely rely as to the changes which new conditions have introduced into the art of manœuvring." He is not so clear here as he might be, his desire to be complete leading him occasionally into over-diffuseness. His conclusion, in which we by no means concur, may best be read in his own words:—

We cannot judge absolutely of the future practice of the German general staff from either period of the late war. For in the first portion [the future before St. Privat has been introduced as an example] they had not learnt the necessities of the new condition of things, in the latter other circumstances [the moral inferiority of the Gambetta levies], had rendered even these new conditions of comparatively secondary importance. . . . It is essential to remember that the ground on which we are working is of an altogether different kind from the distinct positive study of such clearly recorded battles as those of Austerlitz, Waterloo, or Solferino. . . . The facts of the present campaign will not for a long time be so sifted as to supply us with a clear narrative of what occurred. When they are so sifted the evidence will not be of at all the same kind as in the other case. . . . On the whole, for the mass of our facts, we are obliged to rely on the statements of those German authors who adduce the facts expressly in order to establish their own theories.

We confess that the author seems here not only to fail in establishing his case, but to contradict it completely by showing the influence which these very statements have had in shaping his conclusions. To support this theory immediately, he here devotes some pages to a criticism of the Tactical Retrospect, directed, if we understand it aright, to show that Captain May took but a limited view of his subject, regarding it mainly from the standpoint of a captain of infantry. "He appears to err," is the somewhat long-winded expression, "from taking as the basis of all his calculations less a complete investigation into the duties and importance of each rank than his own partial experience." On the whole, however, Lieutenant Maurice seems after all to believe that Captain May's views, in order to be right, need chiefly to be extended, and that the independence claimed in the "Retrospect" for captains of companies must be diffused more or less through every grade of the military hierarchy. Such, at least, we take to be the writer's meaning; although here, as in some other parts of the Essay, it is somewhat obscured by superabundance of detail, and by over-anxiety to touch on every point that can by any possibility affect the question under consideration.

Some admirable remarks follow on the value of the local training which is the normal state of things in Germany, and of which it is added with truth that "an extreme difficulty presents itself in the application in detail of the local corps system to England." The author then passes on to suggest certain modifications in our organization which "seem to be needed, partly in order to enable troops to adopt the formations required by the new arm, partly in order to develop as far as possible the habit of independent action among subordinate commanders." Here he pursues—and with far more clearness than in his discussions on the German authorities whose influence, whilst he ostensibly criticizes them, is manifest throughout, even in his style—the path which so many of our military reformers would pursue, but which inveterate professional prejudices combine with national instincts to close against them. Larger and fewer companies; more independent training within these companies; a more perfect organization in each between the captain and the privates—these are the dreams of others besides the essayist, and bear the impress of that very German school, and particularly of that powerful "Retrospect" writer, which have been so closely criticized by him just before. That the same advantages might be gained by using smaller battalions, and making the battalion officer, be he styled major or lieutenant-colonel, for drill purposes what the company-chief is in Germany, seems to occur to Lieutenant Maurice as little as to those Prussian writers of whose spirit he has drunk so deeply whilst endeavouring to deprecate their claims to be an infallible guide. This section of the Essay is concluded with some remarks on our Auxiliary forces which will well repay study, and are free from the defects we have noticed. Here the author escapes from the trammels of a foreign school, and, being resolved to speak his mind, grasps a difficult subject with a firmness, yet delicacy, worthy of the highest praise. The following passage is so favourable a specimen of his manner, and so valuable in itself, that we quote it at length:—

It cannot be doubted that there are among the Volunteer corps bodies in all essentials as highly disciplined as men need be. The fact impressed itself upon all who had to do with most of those who undertook the trouble of attending the whole of the autumn manœuvres last year. There are among the Volunteers some who appear not even to have arrived at an elementary conception of what the nature of discipline is. The first are, under the present conditions of war, invaluable; the latter are much worse than useless.

I see no way of selecting those who ought to be employed, and of getting rid of those who would do mischief, except that of entrusting to each corps d'armée commander, at the moment when the services of the Volunteers of his district are required, the duty of a signing their proper functions to each. Some will be fit to join any troops of the line, and to become sharpshooters or mounted riflemen. Others may be able to act, if properly incorporated with good troops, as the Dutch-Belgians in Wellington's army in 1815. Others will only be fit to be thrown into a fortress, there to learn discipline and drill. [And drill, being now rather, for the army, a means of securing effective discipline than a direct preparation for war, its applicability to the Volunteers, a note explains, depends on the extent to which it tends to bring them under discipline.] In any case, for troops without discipline, there is no place in modern open war. Of the Militia, musculis institutis, almost exactly analogous expressions must at present be employed.

We have not space to consider the details into which the Essay afterwards passes, nor is it needful to our purpose. The argument which underlies the whole, obscured sometimes possibly by the author's desire to respect existing prejudices, appears with plainness in his closing page. More passive defence, to put it briefly, is a bad form of fighting. Defence, to be good, should include counter attack. However, in all cases manœuvring power is needed; and yet "until a greater manœuvring facility—due as much to organization as to training—is acquired by our army, the defensive is the rôle we ought to seek. Unhappily no army can limit itself to the defensive."

The Duke of Wellington has done a twofold service to the army and the country by the timely liberality to which we are indebted for this volume. He has shown that in the junior ranks of the profession there are keensighted critics of its wants and shortcomings; whilst the publication of such an Essay as Lieutenant Maurice's gives hopes that among the rising generation of officers men will constantly be found ready at call to show how the needful remedies should be applied, and the spirit of our army kept up to the demands of the age.

TOTTIE'S TRIAL.*

UNSWERVING self-sacrifice and uncompromising truth are the two favourite virtues of a certain class of novelists; and the exercise of common sense in the regulation of life is the one thing of which they are most afraid. As a rule, they think they have done the best when they have drawn the most impossible characters, which they weight all to one side; and to hint at the value of that kind of eclecticism which makes reason the supreme judge of action, and, in the case of conflicting virtues, chooses that which is most to the advantage of all concerned, is to them nothing more than Sadduceism, which no right-minded person should countenance. If, by being unnecessarily self-sacrificing, the hero and heroine can make themselves supremely wretched, and abandon the best interests of those dearest to them for a nominal and barren duty to a scamp; if they can show forth the superstition rather than the beauty of goodness, in the unelastic way in which they bind themselves to one dominant principle, then they think they have done a righteous work. They have vindicated the cause of morality against the selfish weaklings who sigh after happiness, and have put to shame the infidel philosophers who think that reason was given us to regulate our virtues as well as our follies; they have made their Moloch, and passed through the fire before it, and they are satisfied; but it does not trouble them that nine times out of ten they have talked nonsense, and created a fancy humanity which is not to be found in work-a-day life anywhere.

Kay Spen, who writes purely and prettily, is a little too much given to this kind of exaggerated morality, and seems to go upon the principle that, if a thing is but sufficiently disagreeable it is sure to be right; also, that the best method of effecting a reformation in a scoundrel is to deluge him with sickly sentiment, and to touch his sensibilities rather than his conscience. We are sorry to have this to say, but it is as well to hit the blot in her work boldly; for she has qualities of so good a kind that it is a pity to let them run to waste for want of more judicious holding together. We also object to her fondness for dwelling on puerile circumstances, by which she makes her book more like a child's book—or at the most like that special literature for young persons which is just the one step beyond—than we fancy she intends; nor, as a matter of style, can we see why "Tottie and I" should have the dignity of a whole line to itself, or why certain sentences should be ushered into the world denuded of their nominatives. This habit of writing without nominatives gives, to be sure, a fine, free, vignettéd character to a page, but it has its inconveniences; and on the whole we prefer to be favoured with the usual indication of what a sentence really means.

Tottie's Trial is a story of a slight and airy character, one with but little plot and no reserve, so that it is impossible to review it without betraying the secret of its construction; but as its strength lies in its simplicity and moral tendency rather than in its dramatic situations or power of exciting the interest of curiosity, we shall do it no harm by telling the story in its main features. Tottie's "trial" arises from the fact of her possessing an utter scoundrel for her father; a man who broke her mother's heart by ill-usage and desertion, and who has so entirely abandoned his child that she has never been seen by him at all; and, indeed, she has been taught, and the whole family have believed, that he went down with the Seyern, when this ill-fated ship foundered with all on board. Meanwhile Tottie has been brought up by her aunt and uncle, who idolize her, and who have adopted her. Suddenly, with no more warning than that contained in a letter from a brother in Australia, who says that he has seen him, backed by a letter from the man himself, Bertram Linford appears at the house, and claims his daughter. The aunt and uncle know him to be thoroughly vile, a heartless and unprincipled ruffian, a man with no more conscience than affection, and as little delicacy as either; yet because he is her father, they say nothing to Tottie to induce her to refuse to go with him, and suffer this young girl to wander away with a man who they know will make a market of her beauty, and in all ways degrade and make her miserable. As he is handsome and plausible, Tottie sees nothing of his real character; and naturally allows her passionate joy at possessing a father, whom all had so long believed dead, to have its full course. She might, however, have been induced not to go with him if her aunt had told her the truth; but her aunt did not tell her the truth, because of some exalted notion of duty to a parent, and of the beauty of self-sacrifice in any case. And it is at this point that we think Kay Spen unable to distinguish true morality from that which is merely nominal and sentimental. The aunt had Tottie's good to consider as well as Mr. Linford's paternal claims; the very law would not have given the girl to him; and under the circumstances of the case, his long desertion and the close tie between her and her aunt and uncle, she would have been allowed at her age to choose her own guardian. But because he was her father as a natural fact, not in any of the essential qualities of paternity, they give her up to his keeping without an effort to retain her; give her up, too, leaving her in utter ignorance of his real character, and let her drift from the safe security of an honourable home and the careful guardianship of love into the degradation and loose living of a blackleg and unredeemed scoundrel. It does not make it better that Aunt Nelly talks affectionate goodyism, and that her delicacy, or her notions of right, prevent her from opening Tottie's eyes, though ever so partially.

When Tottie gets into her father's hands the inevitable sorrow of course comes. For reasons of his own he throws her in the way of a congenial scoundrel, one Baron Rogern, to whom he owes money which he would willingly pay off by the sale of her hand. Tottie's maid and faithful home servant, whom Mr. Linford has dismissed because too much in his way as her protector, comes back to Aunt Nelly in despair at the misery her young mistress is enduring, and the bad look of things in general; on which Aunt Nelly, who has been sunk into a kind of physical and moral lethargy at the loss of her husband, rouses herself and sets off to Germany to rescue her imperilled treasure. And here again what seems to us the author's exaggerated idea of sacrifice comes in; Tottie, who has no power of judgment at all, and who is as credulous as any typical gudgeon that ever swam, after a short struggle consents to become the Baron's wife, on the representations of her father as to his indebtedness which she can redeem if she will marry his creditor. To prevent such an unholy sacrifice, Aunt Nelly offers to help Bertram out of his difficulties; but Tottie's unselfishness forbids this, and she refuses, to poor "auntie's" unfeigned astonishment, confirming her father's declaration that she is marrying voluntarily, when she answers his question in the presence of her aunt, and confesses that it is of her own free will she is making herself the Baron's victim and her father's sacrifice. We will not say how the difficulty is averted, but really we must regard the providence which watches over Tottie in her trials as exceptionally vigilant, and the happy issue into which she comes as a greater piece of good luck than most persons can boast of after such deadly peril. Bertram's conversion, too, though rather understood than expressed, is another miracle in its way, and one which we are sorry to be too sceptical to credit. We do not say that such a reformation is impossible, but in this case we had no early indications to lead up to it, so that it comes on us with a certain sense of violence and improbability. The man was not one of those weak creatures whose plastic nature may be moulded into the shape of angel or fiend according to the will of the manipulator; he was simply bad, without feeling and without conscience; and why being tumbled out of a carriage and hurt should transform him all at once from a hardened sinner to a weeping saint, from a wretch who had deserted his wives and sold his daughter to a quite edifying example of Christian virtues—that is, why it should give him qualities full grown, of which he has never shown so much as the germ—is a mystery not easily explained. Perhaps in a book of this kind, which appeals so entirely to the sentiments, we ought not to be too impatient of spiritual sugar; and a kindly philosophy is better in a woman than a harsh one. Still we think it desirable for an author to keep as true to nature as possible, and to remember that every manifestation of character must have a pre-existing basis.

Tottie's Trial is substantially the moral of compensations, with the companion doctrine of love conquering all things, evil included. When Aunt Nelly loses her husband in the fire, she finds the child, a boy, for whom he had died, who brings her out of her self-absorbed sorrow and supplies the place in some degree of Tottie, now in the midst of her perplexities with her father and the Baron in Germany. When this boy, Willie, is taken from her, Tottie returns; when Bertram Linford becomes a cripple, or rather an invalid for life, his soul gets grace, and his vices are lost in a halo of unexpected virtues; while even Joanna, disagreeable, selfish, and peevish as she is, becomes gracious and sweet through the divine power lying in being loved and cared for on the one hand, and of having some one to love and care for on the other. It would be a pleasant world if this kind of thing were true; but it does no great harm to "make believe" that it is in fiction; though, for our own part, we prefer stories which are more like life, and which show the inherent goodness even of warped and distorted natures on more solid philosophical principles than those of Tottie's Trial. Nevertheless this is a good little book; and, if slightly silly, it is extremely well intentioned, and calculated to make innocent young people all the better boys and girls when they have read it.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

IN these days of strikes and high prices the subject of Trade Unions has become one of universal interest, and even those to whom it is already familiar may be gratified at seeing it treated in some measure from a new point of view. In England we have been content to consider the question as it has forced itself upon public attention from time to time, without much heed of its roots in the past or its ramifications in the future. Dr. Brentano, convinced that no historical or social phenomenon can be altogether isolated, labours to connect the voluntary associations of the workmen of the nineteenth century, often proscribed and rarely encouraged by the law, with the recognized trade-guilds of the middle ages, an essential portion of the social fabric of the time. The decay of these institutions, and the omission of legislators to provide an adequate substitute, left, in his view, trade in an anarchical condition, and the working classes too completely at the mercy of the employers of labour. Trade Unions are, he considers, an instinctive effort to restore what was valuable in the old system, and have accordingly attained their fullest development in England, where the extirpation of guilds has been more complete than anywhere else. The filiation seems fairly made out; and, as an admirer of the ancient system of regulation, which, however antiquated and oppressive it may have ultimately become, undoubtedly corresponded to the needs of the society which originated it, Dr. Brentano is necessarily committed to the advocacy of its modern representative. His book, in fact, is substantially a plea for Trade Unions, favourably distinguished by sobriety of statement and closeness of argument, taking up the principal allegations against these institutions seriatim, and meeting them by facts and considerations principally derived from the proceedings of English Parliamentary Committees, accompanied with due references to the sources of information. From his own point of view his case seems conclusive, but it will probably strike an impartial reader that he has confined himself too closely to a single class of considerations, and in particular that he has failed to inquire into the discouragement to enterprise and invention, and the vexatious interference with business, which may be easily conceived to result from any minute system of trade regulations made in the interest of the workmen only. Of the two crying sins of Unionism—the tendency to repress exceptional talent, and the systematic coercion of minorities—the former is treated by him in much too offhand a fashion, and the latter ignored altogether. We hope we may conclude that the immorality of intimidation appears to him too palpable for exposure. There is so much force and justice in his observations respecting the good moral effect of combination, in so far as it leads workmen to recognize their responsibility as members of a great community, that we feel somewhat disappointed at finding his views of the ultimate extent of this influence so limited and partial after all. The proportion of intelligent artisans who are sufficiently intelligent to practise combination, and to submit to the self-denial it involves, will, he thinks, never be greater in comparison with the multitude than that of the burghers of the free cities to the serfs of the middle ages. If the advantages of combination are so great as is contended, they must exert an ever-increasing attraction on the mass; the inevitable spread of education seems also left out of account. Dr. Brentano's anticipations of the effects of the co-operative system likewise seem less than it might be reasonable to entertain. It may be inferred from this that he is no enemy to capitalists, and shows no countenance to Socialism in any form; no writer, indeed, could stand at a greater distance from Karl Marx and the International Society. He believes that the relation between employer and employed will always exist, but he looks forward to great changes in the former class from the absorption of small capitalists by large ones. As a political economist Dr. Brentano appears to be on the whole orthodox, except in so far as he differs from the majority of the Free-trade school by denying, as the argument of his work requires, the applicability of the principle of unrestricted competition to labour. A tendency to over-regulation by voluntary rule or legislative enactment is undoubtedly the weak point of his treatise; he appears, in particular, to hint at methods for repressing a surplus in the labour market which could not possibly be resorted to in a free country. With all its drawbacks, however, the work is one of great value as well as great interest, and well deserves to be translated into the language of the nation whose industry it principally concerns. It is a sequel to a former volume on trade-guilds in general, chiefly historical in its scope, and of less immediate interest.

The indefatigable industry of Dr. Bastian† has again been exerted in the compilation of a volume the magnitude of which, considering that it is but one of a series of similar works, can only be described as astounding. Unfortunately no improvement is apparent in the style or method of the treatise, which is, like its predecessors, an enormous commonplace book of excerpts, transcribed at full length in their original languages—a well nigh impenetrable jungle of erudition, without the advantage of an elephantine track. Dr. Bastian's subject, the legal institutions of uncivilized and semi-civilized nations, including the religious ceremonies and traditional observances which have the force of law, is one of great interest, and his accumulation of materials may be profitably resorted to as a valuable quarry, but he has scarcely taken the first step towards construction. This is the more to be regretted as the last few pages of his preface, treating of the scientific culture of morals, prove that he is inspired by sound practical ideas, and is perfectly capable of developing them with intelligence and precision when the thread of his argument does not snap under a weight of indiscriminate quotation. The first chapters of the work are devoted to the laws of the various nations referred to—being nearly all the nations on the face of the earth—the latter chapters to their superstitions; the author's thesis being that law originates in theology, and that in the earlier stages of society the distinction between the two is very imperfectly defined.

The late Dr. Rudolph Köpke*, although best known to the world as the friend and biographer of Tieck, and the editor of his correspondence, was also a scientific investigator of historical problems, and a pamphleteer on the Conservative side of German political questions. A collection of the former, and a selection from the latter class of his writings, with some literary reviews and memoirs, are published by Dr. F. G. Kiesling. The historical essays, the most important portion of the volume, chiefly relate to incidents in German history. They are composed in a popular style, and may always be read with pleasure, but on the whole were scarcely worth reprinting. There is nothing in any way approaching the interest of the author's Life of Tieck, by which he will be principally remembered.

Professor Watterich's work on the Rhenish Germans of the period of the Roman Empire† is principally occupied by an inquiry into the topography of the various tribes, and an argument to establish the reappearance of the Sigambri, so nearly exterminated by Tiberius, as constituents of the great Frankish confederation two centuries and a half afterwards. The dryness of these researches is to some extent relieved by the necessary introduction of historical detail, as well as by the amusing patriotism of the author, who writes as though the barbarian invaders of the Empire were impelled less by the spur of hunger, or the appetite for booty, than by a profound consciousness of their world-regenerating mission, and a resolution to fulfil the prophecies.

The original text of B. Hoencke's metrical Livonian chronicle‡ is lost; the work, however, exists in the form given it by Renner, a later historian. This has been edited by Dr. K. Hölshbaum, with a preface amply treating of the nature of the original work, the use made of it by Renner, and the relation of this historian to his successors. The transactions detailed belong to the early part of the fourteenth century, and consist mainly of the battles, massacres, famines, and pestilences which usually strike the imagination of a popular chronicler as chiefly deserving of record.

A society has been established for the annual publication of contributions to the history of the Hanse Towns§. The first volume contains much of great local interest.

The Silesian campaigns of the Hussites|| form a not uninteresting episode in the history of the long contest of the latter with the Emperor Sigismund. They are not, indeed, particularly rich in important incidents, consisting mainly of incursions made into Silesia for the sake of plunder, or in revenge for the original aggression of the Silesians, who had naturally taken the Emperor's side against their heretical neighbours. The circumstances of the country were favourable to the invaders. Silesia—a foundation, as Herr Grünhagen expresses it, of German culture upon the tabula rasa left two hundred years before by the Mongol Tartars—had attained a condition of great material prosperity. The people had thus become enervated, the old religious and political ideas had ceased to exert an inspiring influence, and the sentiment of national patriotism was almost quenched by the minute subdivision of the country into a number of petty principalities. Under these circumstances it is intelligible that the Silesians should have fought very badly, and that the Bohemians should have been able to ravage the land year after year with little effectual opposition. In the historian's opinion, however, this succession of disasters, and the estrangement they naturally occasioned between neighbours who had previously lived on good terms, are the main reasons which have prevented Silesia from being altogether Slavonized. The work is composed very much from the national point of view, but exhibits candour as well as research, and the style is pleasing.

The opinion of so artistic a writer as Herr Moritz Petri, the last editor of the works of J. G. Hamann¶, is entitled to great consideration, but we cannot help suspecting that his high estimate of "the Magnus of the North" has been mainly determined by theological prepossessions. Hamann's manner is pretentious, his style obscure, and his matter out of date. The most interesting portion of his writings is his correspondence and juvenile autobiography, which depict an abnormal, but not uncommon, type of character—the union of lofty aspirations and mystical religious feeling with shiftiness, pettiness, and general untrustworthiness in the concerns of practical life. The causes of the various irritating and undignified disputes in which he was continually engaged are indeed faintly indicated, but the impression remains that he was not one with whom intercourse was either agreeable or safe.

The late Bishop Sedlnitzky* presents a very different type of the religious character, and one entitled to deep respect, though too mildly speckle in its gentle benignity to be a proper subject for unreserved admiration. Sedlnitzky belonged to the small but interesting class of Evangelical Catholics, the nearest representatives of the Contarini and Sadoleti of the sixteenth century, and of whom Sailer is the best known example. These excellent men have always been distinguished by a simple and fervent piety, and almost total indifference to the sacerdotal and sacramentarian aspects of their communion, a disposition to fraternize with Protestants as far as possible, and a guileless and unworldly spirit, singularly unfitting them to cope with the persecution to which such tendencies have naturally exposed them on the part of acute and worldly-minded ecclesiastical superiors. Sedlnitzky's character for conciliation occasioned his appointment to the diocese of Breslau, in 1835, during the dispute between the Prussian Government and the Court of Rome on the subject of mixed marriages. This inevitably rendered him the object of bitter animosity at Rome, and when, upon the accession of a monarch of Catholic leanings, the Government ceased to protect him, he judged it advisable to resign his see. A man of more ability and resolution might have played an important part, but it is apparent, even from the record of his admiring biographer, that Sedlnitzky was officially a complete nullity. The only other important event in his life was his adherence to Protestantism a quarter of a century afterwards—a step delayed so long and accomplished so quietly as to pass almost unobserved. The work consists partly of the Bishop's autobiography to the time of his consecration, with additions by the anonymous editor, and partly of official documents relating to his appointment and resignation.

The reminiscences of a "South German theologian"† contain little that is eventful, dramatic, or picturesque, but possess the charm that is seldom absent from recollections interesting to the writer himself. The reminiscences of the author's childhood exhibit real freshness, and form an interesting picture of domestic life in a South German family of some position at the beginning of the present century. The union of homely simplicity with advanced culture is extremely pleasing. The writer subsequently studied at two German Universities, which may be recognized without much difficulty as Erlangen and Halle. The peculiarities of the various professors, many of them teachers of much reputation, are portrayed with remarkable vividness, not devoid of a slight infusion of satire, but free from every trace of ill-nature or disrespect. The author himself was intended for a philological career, but, becoming conscious of a lack of vocation, glided insensibly into a theologian—a professor eventually, as he hints. To this want of sympathy for the special studies of the University may perhaps be ascribed a comparatively low estimate of the efficiency of the professorial department. It is not precisely disparaged, but neither is it extolled. On the other hand, the picture of student life as it existed in the writer's time is highly favourable, the more so from the apparent absence of any aim at panegyric. It seems extraordinary that so much should have been expected, still more that so much should have been performed. The self-chosen occupations and recreations of the young men also appear to have been of an elevated, refined, and rational character. One would only like to know how far this excellent characteristic belonged to the author's own circle, and how far to the whole body of students.

The musical genius of Ignaz Moscheles‡ entitles him to a biographical record, which is especially interesting to English readers on account of his long residence in this country, his official connexion with the most important of our musical institutions, and his intimacy with the leading professors and patrons of the art in England. We do not indeed find much of absorbing interest or remarkable value, but the general tendency of the work is to revive agreeable recollections and to present a pleasing picture of a bright, simple, and cheerful existence, disinterestedly devoted to art. Few artistic biographies are so wholly free from every symptom of pottiness and every unpleasant episode. The most remarkable portions are those relating to three memorable passages in the history of music in England—the visit and death of Weber, the interposition of the Philharmonic Society on behalf of Beethoven, and the first visit of Mendelssohn. Heine, Schumann, and other celebrities are also noticed, and though there is a dearth of anything like piquancy of anecdote, the details are never trivial or uninteresting. The first chapter is autobiographical, the remainder is compiled by the musician's widow from her husband's letters and journals. Another volume will complete the work, which comes down at present to the year 1835.

W. A. Joukoffsky§ was one of the Russian poets who, in the opinion of his biographer, exercised most influence on the literature of his country. It would be dangerous to controvert this judgment, which, however, hardly seems justified by the account and analysis of the original productions he has left. Only two of these—a lyrical poem on the campaign of 1812, and a ballad-epic founded on the legend of a magician who sells his daughters to the demon to obtain a prolongation of his own compact—appear to be works of any remarkable power or compass. On the other hand, Joukoffsky was extremely active as a translator; his most important performance in this department was a complete version of the Odyssey. Perhaps the most remarkable circumstance in his history was his birth, he being the illegitimate son of a Turkish female captive. It would be interesting to trace the influence of this Turanian strain upon his character, which would appear to have been marked by a simplicity and sensitiveness reminding us forcibly of Blanco White. As with Blanco White also, his religious experiences make a large chapter in his history. For many years of his life he was under the influence of the more celebrated Russian author Gogol, who appears to have been a moody and restless fanatic; previously to his death, however, he returned into the bosom of orthodoxy. His life was in the main prosperous; he was caressed by the Court, partly entrusted with the education of the present Czar, and obtained, as is expressly stated, enough medals and decorations to require six cushions for their due exhibition at his funeral.

The story of Andrea del Castagno, the painter, who is said to have murdered his friend that he might be the sole possessor of the secret of oil-painting, has supplied Herr Arnold Beer* with the subject of a not ineffective tragedy. The motive of the crime, being in itself too selfish and mean for the purposes of tragic representation, is ingeniously complicated with a love intrigue, and the violent, imperious, ambitious character of Andrea is ably contrasted with the frank and innocent openness of his rival. The other personages are insignificant, and the language, though refined and elegant, smells too much of the lamp for the footlights.

HOME RULE IN BELFAST.

THE Belfast riots afford a melancholy illustration of the policy of governing by the apparently easy method of leaving disorder to cure itself. The Parliamentary Processions Act was passed some years ago for the legitimate purpose of preventing hostile factions from provoking one another to breaches of the peace. It is the delight of Irish mobs to cultivate hereditary animosities against those who differ from them with respect to the prejudices and passions which they mistake for politics and religion. The assertion of the principles in which they suppose themselves to believe is comparatively unattractive unless a profession of faith serves the collateral purpose of an insult and a challenge. It has long been the custom for the Orangemen of the North to celebrate the anniversaries of the closing of the gates of Derry and of the Battle of the Boyne for the purpose of reminding their Roman Catholic neighbours that the lapse of two centuries has not diminished their readiness to resume the contests which followed after the English Revolution. The opposite faction is neither more reasonable nor more pacific, and it enjoys the advantage of combining disaffection to the Crown with hatred of heretics. A few drums and fife, and a cluster of green or orange flags, seldom fail to produce a conflict which often leads to the destruction of human life. Party processions serve no legitimate object; and there are only two ways in which they can be rationally dealt with. The simplest course is to prohibit them by law, and to suppress them by force; but if they are tolerated, they ought, according to the American practice, to be protected by the whole force of the Government. A year ago the Mayor of New York, who happened to be an Irish Fenian, caused extreme indignation by prohibiting an insignificant Orange procession. The Governor of the State was compelled by public opinion to repeal the order of the Mayor; and the result was a riot in which several Ribbonmen were, little to the regret of respectable citizens, killed by the police and the soldiery. On the next anniversary a handful of Orangemen walked in procession without incurring any molestation from their enemies, because it was known that the troops and police were ready for the summary repression of any disturbance that might have been attempted. The Parliamentary Processions Act was honestly intended to put an end to a social nuisance which was not unattended with political danger; but in practice it was not administered with perfect impartiality; and sometimes seditious meetings of the Fenian type were tolerated, while the periodical and ceremonial observances of the Orangemen were rigorously suppressed.

The just discontent of the Northern Protestants not unreasonably tempted some of them to violations of the law. Fenians and Ribbonmen had been allowed to parade with banners and music under the pretext of visiting the tomb of O'Connell, or of doing honour to the memory of the Manchester murderers, and it seemed hard that an historical and symbolical commemoration of the triumphs of the partisans of England should be subjected to exceptional penalties. Some of the leaders of the disaffected Catholics displayed considerable political astuteness in joining in the demand for a repeal of the Act which had become especially distasteful to their Orange adversaries. Bona had been entertained that the disaffection of the Irish Church would induce the Protestants to contribute in the reign of the United Irishmen, with their bitterest enemies in hostility to the Imperial Government; and the removal of any kind of security against disorder is regarded by turbulent patriots as a gain. To the Ministers it probably appeared that the withdrawal of protection which was considered as superfluous might be an easy and unobjectionable mode of acquiring popularity. The peaceable community in Ireland is accustomed to be left out of consideration in the conflict of pugnacious factions; and accordingly, with the general consent of Irish members, Lord HASTINGTON proposed and carried the repeal of the Processions Act, and one or two peers of Orange tendencies congratulated the House of Lords on adopting a measure of political justice and equality. The immediate consequence has been a scandalous street fight lasting for several days in the second town in Ireland. The Orangemen had marched in procession without interference on the 12th of July and on the 12th of August; but when the Roman Catholics and the Fenians organized a similar parade on one of the festivals of the Church, the lower Orange rabble, with or without provocation, attacked them. Since that time a petty civil war has raged between the contending parties, with short intervals of common action against the guardians of order. In the subsequent conflict the origin of the disturbance has probably been forgotten. If the green flags were carried through the quarters of the town which are inhabited by Orangemen, the Roman Catholics must be considered as having provoked the conflict; but it is equally probable that the Protestant rabble may have been the first to defy their adversaries. In such cases it is almost impossible to ascertain the truth; and the main responsibility rests on the authorities, and especially on the Legislature which directly encouraged a mischievous and dangerous practice. There is little satisfaction in the practical refutation of the idle fancy that Protestants and Catholics were inclined to coalesce against the English Government. The few Protestants who take part in the agitation for Home Rule are themselves almost avowedly the dependants and instruments of the priests. It is due to the Roman Catholic clergy in the North to admit that some of them discouraged the Fenian processions, although they must have been reasonably irritated by the Orange celebrations. There can be little doubt that in the next Session Parliament will re-enact the prohibition against party processions. The decorous hypocrisy which affects regret for the pacification of Westmeath under a mild Coercion Act will probably long find expression in Ministerial speeches; but without the sphere of official fiction it is not doubted that the primary want of Ireland is the stern and uniform enforcement of peace and order. The object would not be more easily attained by separation from England, whether under the name of Home Rule or in the form of a Fenian Republic. Englishmen would, after as before the dismemberment of the Empire, feel bound to protect the Orangemen with all their faults against extermination; and the Roman Catholics of the better classes, with a portion of the clergy, are entirely opposed to the experiment of a democracy in which Ultramontane and Jacobin doctrines would contend, perhaps in a bloody struggle, for supremacy.

The conditions of Home Rule are defined, with the unconvincing logic which is sometimes found to be combined with violent ignorance, in an amusing pamphlet lately published by a Mr. REARDEN, who once combined the functions of an ultra-patriotic Irish member with the more profitable occupations of a London tradesman. His imaginary sketch of Irish institutions under a Federal monarchy resembles a didactic nursery tale of a former generation, in which the advantages of parental discipline were illustrated by the adventures of a family of children who had been allowed to govern themselves for a day. It was of course easy for the moral essayist to show that the infant Home-rulers would incur abundant misadventures, that they would make themselves ill by eating sweetmeats, and that they would tumble down into the water and the fire. The green con-city with the approval of the temporary rebels who had experienced the inconveniences of Home Rule or anarchy. Mr. REARDEN is still more extravagant in his involuntary caricature of Irish independence. The more plausible professors of Home Rule, as represented by Mr. BUTT, condescend to recognize the authority of the Crown, and even the share of an Irish House of Lords in legislation; and it is always assumed that the Federal or Imperial Government is to control the armed forces of the Empire. Mr. REARDEN, like the alarming child of proverbial notoriety, blurts out the more genuine hopes of the Fenians under the mask of the Home Rule agitator. Every electoral district in Ireland is simultaneously to elect a peer and a member of the House of Commons; so that the two branches of the Legislature will be identical in character and origin. The Viceroy, who might have been supposed to be the representative of the Crown, is also to be elected by universal suffrage; and it is inferred with much probability that the new dignity will not attempt to prevent seditious meetings in the Phoenix Park. The Ministers are to be elected by the two Houses of Parliament; and notwithstanding the utter annihilation of the prerogative, the Sovereign is to be compelled to reside for a quarter of every year in the perfectly independent Republic of Ireland. The whole population, including the Orangemen and Roman Catholics of Belfast, is to be armed and organized as a National Guard, and from its ranks an Irish Federal army, which is to be exclusively Irish and in no sense Federal, is to be raised by voluntary enlistment. The valour of the Irish Federal army will be sufficiently guaranteed by the military exploits of its ancestors, "from the hour when the Septs of 'Dathi routed the Roman legions in Gaul." It is not recorded whether the Septs of Dathi anticipated Mr. REARDEN's scheme of military organization by allowing the privates to elect all officers up to the rank of captain. Candidates for commissions in the Irish Federal navy, which in the time of the victorious Septs probably consisted of coracles, are "to be nominated by a previous vote of the crews." It has been thought by less thoroughgoing legislators that universal suffrage ought to be exceptionally excluded from men-of-war. If separation is not conceded for the purpose of establishing Mr. REARDEN's model Constitution, it is unnecessary to dwell on the terrible alternative which awaits the English tyrants. No dull Saxon would ever guess the special grievance which appears to have roused Mr. REARDEN to demand independence. A large part of his pamphlet is devoted to a demonstration that the Irish Land Act of 1870 is a plagiarism from a forgotten Bill once introduced by Mr. REARDEN himself. A mere Englishman might suppose that it was rather a merit than a crime in a Government to pass a measure which its professed author probably regards as just and useful; but an Irish patriot who believes at the same time in the efficacy of universal suffrage, and in the authority of "the Great Archbishop of the West," has no hesitation in using as an argument against the Imperial Parliament the beneficent character of its legislation. The Great Archbishop is not the only bugbear at which English usurpers must tremble. Mr. REARDEN announces the grave intelligence that Prince BISMARCK has taken lodgings in the Isle of Wight for the purpose of studying the weak points of the defences of England, and more especially the opportunities of an invasion of Ireland. It had been thought that Irishmen of Mr. REARDEN's stamp professed bitter hatred to Germany; but even BISMARCK will be welcome if he appears as a liberator. Nonsense, though it soon becomes tedious, is sometimes instructive, when it is a mere exaggeration of plausible delusions. There are not many Irish members silly enough to have written Mr. REARDEN's pamphlet, but it may be doubted whether any of them can propound a less absurd illustration of the objects of Home Rule.

RUSSIA.

THAT one consequence of the war between France and Germany would be to increase the power and influence of Russia was obvious enough, and was soon brought home to us by the ease with which Prince GORTCHAKOFF's bold attempt to undo the results of the Crimean war proved successful. There is no question at the present moment of Russia playing again so great a game; peace is the order of the day. But Russia has the opportunity of deciding in a great measure what the character of this reign of peace shall be. The CZAR is going to take part in the Imperial Congress, and the whole of the Continent seems occupied in speculating on the motives by which he has been induced to go to Berlin, and on the policy which he will favour when he gets there. The German papers have naturally put on his coming the interpretation most in accordance with German wishes. They regard the meeting of the EMPERORS as a protest against the rising spirit of French ambition, and as a very significant warning that a war of revenge is not to be tolerated. The French in their hour of depression after the signature of peace boasted freely enough that before long they would be sure to have a great ally, and that Russia and France would humble the pride of Germany. The first overt act of Russia since that time has been to take part in a friendly meeting with the German Powers, and this has presented itself to the German mind as a signal confutation of the expectations of their enemies, and as a sign that Russia finds it more worth her while to be the ally of the conquerors than of the conquered. It is impossible to doubt that the CZAR wishes to discourage any hopes which France may entertain of being able to renew the war soon with Russia at her back. But, on the other hand, it is not at all consistent with Russian policy to let it be supposed that she is afraid of Germany, or willing to abandon the great advantages which she reaps from both France and Germany desiring to court her. Accordingly Prince ORLOFF has been directed to inform M. THIERS that Russia is not going to take part in the Congress in any spirit of hostility to France. Russia stands perfectly neutral, and does not either help or thwart Germany in its relations with France, and the attention of the CZAR will be given at Berlin to matters which have nothing to do with a French war of revenge. Nominally this is, no doubt, true. Neither Germany nor Austria would allow that France is to be in any way attacked, or insulted, or damaged by anything which the Congress may decide on. But when we come to examine the questions which it is generally recognized that the Congress purposes to discuss, it is impossible not to see that the action of the Congress, if its conference results in action, must be more or less adverse to France. The three matters which the EMPERORS are principally to discuss are the position of the conferring Powers towards Ultramontanism, their position towards the International and the different forms of ultra Democracy, and their position towards Turkey and the Slavonic populations of Eastern Europe. France is regarded, rightly or wrongly, as the only secular stay of Ultramontanism. However much the present French Government may detest the Commune, still France is the hot-bed of Red Republicanism, and, again, to settle Slavonic and Turkish questions without the assistance of France is to exclude her from a political field in which for more than a quarter of a century she has loved to dominate. It may be quite true, then, that Russia attends the Congress with a friendly feeling to France, and that Germany will be left to take its own precautions against a war of revenge; and yet it may be equally true that every step taken in the Congress will silently mark the decay of French influence and power. The wisest kind of Frenchmen seem to recognize this, and to draw from it the only lesson of consolation that can be extracted from it. They say that it is not the business of France now to think of Russian or other alliances, or to be touchy and sensitive about the decay of French influence in remote countries. France must bide its time, attend to its own affairs, get clear of its connexion with Ultramontanism, show that it can support a respectable Government against the attacks of Democratic fanaticism, and let Turkey and Austria get on as well as they can in face of Russia. Time will reward this prudent patience, and the day will come when France will again be courted, instead of being ignored or slighted.

It is curious to find that the Russians themselves are quite as much in the dark, and are quite as much divided in opinion as to the proper policy for Russia to advocate at the Congress, as outsiders can be. The conflicting views of Russian editors may be seen in two extracts lately published in the Morning Post. The Golos proclaims that Russia will not again allow herself to be made a political headle, and that the dangers of a reaction like that of 1848-9 are out of the question. Russia remembers only too well how she has been repaid by the Governments which were defeated in the struggle with their subjects. France, too, will now see that she cannot reckon on an alliance with Russia against Germany, and this will strengthen the general confidence in the maintenance of peace. Reports of a quarrel between Russia and Germany on account of the treatment of the Baltic provinces will be silenced, at least for a time, while the renewal of friendly relations between Russia and Austria will serve to give satisfaction to the Slavonic subjects of Austria, and the dreams of the Poles will lose their last basis of possible success. The Eastern question will be satisfactorily adjusted, especially in respect to the last change of Ministry in Turkey, which the editor of the Gloss in his omniscience confidently asserts to have been the work of England and France. Russia has now convinced Turkey that she has no other object in interfering in Turkish affairs than to protect her co-religionists against Mussulman fanaticism. When the relations of Germany and Austria to Ultramontanism come to be discussed, Russia can be of the greatest use, for she has done what her neighbours are only trying to do, and has succeeded in removing all Papal influence from her own territory, so that she will hold the office of a wise instructress, teaching willing disciples; and Russia may even, according to the Gloss, take a useful part in deciding how the next Pope is to be elected. Russia has much less to fear from the International than Germany and Austria, but still she will be quite ready to show herself a good friend, and will aid cheerfully in trying to crush that dangerous society. In short, the presence of the Czar at the Congress is a symbol and guarantee of universal peace, whereas a mere meeting of the Emperors of GERMANY and AUSTRIA might have seemed likely to lead to aggression and disturbance. Very different are the sentiments of the editor of the Exchange Gazette. He thinks that the part taken by the Czar in the Congress is a complete mistake. Russia should hold herself aloof, and her real importance keenly felt by all parties. Austria is in great difficulties, and is worried out of her life by the proceedings of her discontented Slavonians. Prussia is even worse off; humiliated France haunts her like a ghost, and the machinery of the Jesuits is being set in play for her destruction. If Germany and Austria want the alliance of Russia, they must be made to pay for it. Russia is of course to be bought at a price, and the editor of the Exchange Gazette thinks that if Austria gave up the Ruthenian districts of Galicia and Hungary, and if Prussia gave up her territory on the right bank of the Memel, the Czar might wisely listen to the overtures of his neighbours. It is not to be supposed that either of the advocates of these divergent views knows much about the policy of his Government, or affects it in an appreciable degree. But the tone in which they both write deserves notice. Both are really inspired by the same conviction that Russia is the real arbitress of European politics, although the one thinks that Russia has most to gain by peace and friendship, and the other thinks she has most to gain by maintaining an attitude of sullen reserve until her alliance is bought at its proper price.

As to the International, it is not easy to see how the Congress or Russia can do much to thwart it beyond what each Government, according to its strength, can do for itself. Governments like those of Russia, Austria, and Prussia can act with exactly the amount of rigour against offenders that the habits and opinions of their subjects will tolerate, and in the present state of things the leaders of the International are not likely openly to defy very hostile authorities in such countries. But the strength of the International is the strength of opinion and feeling, and if the principles of the association gain real ground in Europe, society will inevitably in one way or another feel the effect. The International represents two different currents of thought. It represents the current of thought of lawless, ignorant, violent, and desperate men, who hate everything on which the present framework of society reposes, and wish to build up they know not what on the embers of a general conflagration. But it also represents to many minds that current of thought which is known as cosmopolitanism—the belief or fancy that all those who have not drawn the great prizes of life are bound together by a common brotherhood, possessing interests for its members far more intimate than the dividing interests of nationality or national ambition. It is in this respect that ultra-democracy has a likeness and kinship to Ultramontanism. But then there is this great difference between the two, that Ultramontanism is an established power, with possessions of its own, with recognized agents courted in high places, with a considerable historical prestige, and with claims more or less recognized by law. Governments therefore can do something against Ultramontanism. They can deprive it of its material resources. They can take away its property, banish its champions, prohibit its teaching, alter the laws under which it is sheltered. The only question is, how far they can do this wisely and profitably, and this must vary according to varying circumstances. There is something grotesque in the notion of Russia, which "removed Papal influence out of its territory" by sheer persecution, offering to teach this secret to Austria, a country four-fifths of whose inhabitants are Roman Catholics. All that Russia can do at the Congress is to engage not to thwart Germany and Austria by fermenting those Ultramontane intrigues in which the Court of Rome loves to see Russian assistance. There is also very little for Russia to do or to get at the Congress in regard to the Eastern question. Emperors are people far too well informed to believe in a new Turkish Ministry being the creation of a subtle and veracious English diplomacy. If the Czar went to Berlin and never said or heard a word about Turkey, he would, by the mere fact of his going, have done almost as much as he could do. His meeting with his brother Emperors is a sufficient proclamation to Russian agents and Russian sympathisers that they are to keep quiet for a time; and in the present day it is only what is immediately before us that is looked to, for no political combination is expected to last for ever.

MR. MORLEY'S NEW POLITICAL PARTY.

THE new political party which Mr. S. MORLEY has lately attempted to organize is a device as old as political faction. In Athens, in Rome, and in the more prosaic communities of modern times, moneyed demagogues have found their account in subsidizing the ringleaders of mobs. The purchase of political influence has been most thoroughly elaborated into a system of corruption in the United States. Votes are there too numerous, and therefore too cheap, to be the subjects of purchase and sale; but ambitious candidates for office with plenty of money pay the expenses of meetings, of committees, and of elections, receiving in exchange a recognized claim to office, unless they are contented with a reputation for liberality and with a consequent share in the direction of the party. Mr. MORLEY deserves a certain kind of credit for the almost original project of elevating himself to the rank of a little Dissenting CRASSUS. His wealth, which is supposed to be considerable, must seem fabulous to the hungry demagogues whom he assembles at revolutionary tea-parties; and some of them probably regard him like the prize ox to which BUNKE compared the Duke of BEDFORD, with the joints marked out ready for carving, as he unconsciously walked in the midst of his Jacobin associates. The citizens with foreign names who, having left their own countries for their countries' good, are kind enough to undertake the reform of English institutions, have the good sense not to point to warehouses in Wood Street, or to appetizing investments, when they applaud Mr. MORLEY's projects for letting out waste land to Co-operative Associations. A suspicion that all kinds of property hang more or less together may perhaps account for Mr. MORLEY's omission to invite the managers of the Land and Labour Association; yet it mattered little whether the London Communists who constitute one club under many names were convoked by one appellation or another. The Committee which is to propose to the different revolutionary bodies a hollow alliance with the Dissenting Radicals includes Mr. ODGER and Mr. GALBRAITH, "Citizen LE LUBEZ of the BRADLAUGH Republicans," and "Citizen ECCARIUS of the International." Mr. MORLEY will probably have the pleasure of contributing to the funds of the Society which murdered the Paris hostages, and of the Club which proposes to confiscate all landed property and to abolish the National Debt. The wildest promoters of anarchy will not unwillingly concur in that union of the Liberal party which is to be promoted at Mr. MORLEY's expense, probably without the smallest regard to any opinions which Mr. MORLEY may profess or suppose himself to hold.

It is not worth while to inquire whether Mr. MORLEY's project has or has not been adopted for the present by his heterogeneous allies. Mr. MIALI, who belongs to the same political section with Mr. MORLEY, attempted some time ago to associate with himself the professed enemies of all religion in the attack on the Establishment which he sometimes represents as a measure intended for the benefit of religion; but the revolutionary Clubs are not familiar with Nonconformist prejudices or phrases, and the Church is only one among many institutions which they regard with indiscriminate hostility. Mr. MORLEY's proposal to pay the expenses of agitation was more attractive, and economists who habitually regard labour and capital as necessarily antagonistic must be delighted to find a capitalist who is willing to furnish the means of destroying the securities of property. It was not too great a concession on the part of the Jacobins in the first instance to adopt the platitudes and fallacies of a political programme which expresses the spirit of middle-class Radicalism. The extension of the suffrage and the establishment of equal electoral districts cannot but be acceptable to Republicans and Socialists, although such measures form but an infinitesimal portion of their demands. The ingrained habit of unmeaning cant is illustrated in a proposal for vote by Ballot, as if it had not been already adopted by a reluctant and insincere Legislature. The abolition of property or rating qualifications for parochial and municipal offices, and of landed qualification for the office of justice of the peace, would gratify Mr. MORLEY's associates, inasmuch as it would more completely dissociate taxation and representation, and as it would place the administration of justice in less competent hands. The proposal that the State shall let waste lands, to be acquired for the purpose, to Co-operative Associations and small cultivators, and that it shall also lend them money to farm with, is probably intended as a compromise of the bolder projects of the Clubs. Compulsory education and the transfer of licensing power to the inhabitants, which is equivalent to the Permissive Bill, savour of the school to which Mr. MORLEY belongs. The purchase of railways by the State, and the substitution of nine hours labour for ten hours in the Factory Acts, are probably intended to conciliate workmen. The proposal that the Government shall compile a code of International Law, and procure the establishment of an International Tribunal, may be considered as a decorative and unmeaning flourish.

On the whole, Mr. MORLEY's bid for popularity and power is by some degrees less absurd than the scheme by which a predecessor obtained a temporary notoriety twelve months ago. The new list of commonplaces is not enlivened by any proposal for providing the population of great towns with houses and gardens in the country; and it would be inconsistent with Mr. MORLEY's objects as well as with his principles to attach to a project of revolution the names of Conservative noblemen and gentlemen. It probably appears to the author of the document which was adopted by Citizen LE LUBEZ and the rest, an adroit achievement to have induced a body of working-class demagogues to approve of a readjustment of the Income-tax for the benefit of traders at the expense of owners of property. The abolition of Schedule D would in itself amply remunerate those who might benefit by exemption from their due share of fiscal burdens for large contributions to the expenses of political agitation. The clamour against equal taxation, which was always unreasonable, becomes little less than impudent at a time when traders are realizing unprecedented profits, while the owners of fixed incomes find their revenues constantly diminishing in value through the increase in the cost of labour and of all commodities. By the citizens native or foreign who attend Mr. MORLEY's political receptions, the incidence of the Income-tax is regarded with profound indifference. The enlightened artisan takes good care not to return his income for taxation, although the clerk, and the curate, and the widow with a small annuity are compelled to pay a portion of his share in the tax as well as the whole of their own.

It is yet uncertain whether the form of corruption which prevails in America will take root in England in consequence of the establishment of secret voting and of a widely extended suffrage. The experience of exchanging money for power will be repeated again and again in a wealthy community in which political success has long been conducive to social eminence. The payment of election expenses or of the cost of preliminary agitation is as coarse a mode of bribery as the purchase of votes, but it has the advantage of being beyond the reach of the law. It will probably be necessary to submit to the exercise of pecuniary influence, and it is satisfactory to know that there will be rich men on all sides ready to bid against one another. If humble advocates of the public interest were likely to obtain a hearing from moneyed demagogues, they might perhaps venture to stipulate that by an honourable understanding purchasers should confine their expenditure to the propagation of their own political opinions. If a Radical can really buy up a Socialist Club, he performs a service to society; but he must be judged more severely when, not content with spending his money, he throws his own convictions into the bargain. It is possible that such negotiations as those which have resulted, or have not resulted, in the creation of the new political party, may remind the members of old political parties that the differences by which they are divided among themselves are insignificant in comparison with the chasm which separates a supporter of the English Constitution from a Citizen of the International, or of the Land and Labour League. The union of the whole Liberal party means an unprincipled coalition for the purposes of party ambition between the professed defenders of property and order and the promoters of universal spoliation and anarchy. It is a question of little interest whether Mr. MORLEY shares the opinions of Citizen ROUSSEAU; but it is important that an ally of Communist Citizens should not be recognised as a member of the Liberal party. Even in the worst days of the Lower Empire Byzantine politicians were thought to exceed the license of faction when they invited the assistance of the barbarians. Mr. H. GREENFELL, who is really a member of the Liberal party, has addressed to Mr. MORLEY a letter in which he justly acquits his correspondent of the charge that he is laying a trap for the leaders of the working-men, who are, on the contrary, laying a trap for Mr. MORLEY, with or without his connivance. Other Liberals will perhaps have the courage to maintain, with Mr. GREENFELL, that "mere impudence, a strong voice, or the power of flattering electors, should not be the only road to St. Stephen's." A member who has bought his way into the House will be preferable to a demagogue with a loud voice; but perhaps it is desirable that there should be some further variety of qualification. Mr. GREENFELL's criticisms on the various proposals of Mr. MORLEY and his Club delegates are forcible and just; but it is almost a waste of labour to prove that it is impossible to satisfy at the same time the ODGERS and BRADLAUGHS, and the party which has hitherto been called Liberal. Among the open questions on which the members of the coalition were probably unable to agree, are the maintenance of the Monarchy and the existence of landed property.

THE JAPANESE EMBASSY.

THE Japanese have come here at a time convenient enough for newspaper editors in search of materials, but not in itself very exciting or very illustrative of the gaiety or grandeur of London. They are said to be men of high importance in their own country, and one of them is going to stay here as an Envoy to the QUEEN. They are, however, but the humble precursors of a greater arrival. The MIKADO himself is said to be meditating a tour round the world, and a visit to Europe and America. But he is a wise man, and has learnt that the pleasure of being fêted and entertained in civilized nations is not without alloy, and that in some civilized countries the nuisance of the process rises to the height of perfect torture. His Ministers have been in the United States, and have been lionized there, and they must have told him all that they endured. Of England they will be able, we trust, to send very favourable reports. Anything quieter than London at the end of August it would be hard to find in the territories of civilized man. But they have doubtless learnt at New York that London is nothing to Paris, and that life at Paris is almost all pleasure, and that neither business nor parade there vexes the souls of men. Accordingly the MIKADO thinks he had better reverse the course taken in their inexperience by his Ministers. His notion is that he had better begin with Paris, and when he is a little braced up for the encounter with civilized life by the French capital, he will come on to London. We hope he will not expect too much here when he does come. In real life he will be allowed to spend a very great deal of money for very indifferent accommodation at an hotel, he will be shown round the Victoria Station, and the Lord Mayor will ask him to dinner, and give him the freedom of the City in a snuff-box. Few personages of his station have to complain of being too much noticed here, unless indeed something could be done for him at once grand and cheap, and a beautiful ball could be managed and the cost thrown on the revenues of Ceylon or Singapore. He will take the Americans last, and he will have the thoughts of home to support him while he goes through receptions, and "ovations," and interviews. No doubt, under the most disadvantageous circumstances he will see much that is worth seeing, as his Ministers are doing, even at this time of the year, in England. They have dined with Lord GRANVILLE, and been to see the Brighton Aquarium, and Lord GRANVILLE and the Aquarium are both types in their way of high civilization. But nothing that they see can be so wonderful to them as the fact that they are here. They are the representatives, and many of them have been among the chief agents, of a recent revolution which has altered the whole character of the Japanese Government. A monarchy guided by councillors determined on cultivating the most friendly relations with foreigners suddenly replaced an ancient feudal aristocracy the policy of which was based on the total exclusion of foreigners from the country. As the new Government wishes to benefit by all that foreigners have to teach the Japanese, and makes it its great aim to borrow from Europe and America all that it finds superior in arts and knowledge, it is not very strange that it should have sent an Embassy to Washington and London. What is extraordinary is that the Embassy should be composed of men so well prepared to study and comprehend a different form of life as is said to be the case with the Ministers now in this country, and still more that they should not be wanted at home, and that their country after such a sudden change should be in a state of quiet so profound that its new Sovereign can think of leaving it and of going off to the other end of the world.

Speculation has a free field before it when an attempt is made to guess what will be the ultimate fruits of the opening up of Japan to the outer world. No country stands to us in the same position. Japan is so much more manageable than China; it is so much more full of life a little akin to our own; its people have so much industry, energy, and ability. The SULTAN and the Viceroy of EGYPT have been here just as the MIKADO is said to be coming; but the Turks and Egyptians are not like the Japanese. The Turks pay taxes, and the SULTAN buys ships and rifles with them, or rather with the loans which the taxes are supposed to cover. The VICEROY is a wonderful man. He is the one man who cares for a sort of civilization among a people totally indifferent to it. He has gigantic ideas, and orders machinery and cannon with a noble prodigality. But the Turks and the Egyptians go on as before. In Japan it is the people, not the Government, we have to think of. They will learn of us, will buy of us, will sell to us, will copy us, will perhaps some day teach us. Some of the consequences are not very doubtful. In the first place, they can scarcely fail to borrow from us the painful art, now the foremost in the Christian and civilized world, of preparing for war at an enormous cost. They have no choice. It is said that German officers have already been engaged to drill their troops after the pattern of the conquerors of Sedan, and they must afford themselves the luxury of Armstrong guns and ironclads. For the preservation of order, and to prevent the presence of lawless foreigners overawing the native authorities, they must have an army, and they must have it armed after the most approved type. This, again, will increase the strength of the central power in Japan, and political consequences are sure to flow from material changes. Then Japan will form in all likelihood an outlet to English trade and English capital in an increasing degree every year. Japan has already got its footing in the London market, and has a loan quoted on the Stock Exchange. It probably will borrow a great deal more. It will have railways and telegraphs, and it will work its mines, and it will institute banks and every civilized financial invention. The Americans will compete, of course, and will perhaps do as brisk a trade with Japan as we shall. But there will be for some time trade enough for both of us, and England has much more capital to send out to Japan than America has. But the end of all this may not be as the beginning, and we may discover that in Japan we have found or created a rival. A large iron ship is said to have been lately built in China by native Chinamen under the superintendence of only four Europeans. If a ship can be made, other articles now peculiarly the product of the civilized world may be made too; and if such articles can be made in China, they can be made equally easily, and what is of great importance, disposed of much more readily in Japan; for China will probably remain long out of that groove of foreign trade into which Japan is eagerly throwing itself. If Japan had capital and skill, with its cheap labour, its frugal and industrious people, and its greatly superior power of meeting the wishes and tastes of Orientals, it might vie with us in, or even beat us out of, our Eastern market. Perhaps it may seem a wild fancy, but it is one not wholly undeserving of attention, that the great gainers by the trade of Japan in the civilized world will not be Englishmen or Americans, but Germans. What Germans want in order to be the masters of a commercial position is simply security. They cannot, like Englishmen or Americans, make money while their lives are in danger. But they are longing to find a foothold in the East, where their patience and penuriosity, and their grasp of affairs at once great and small, may tell; and if Japan can give them the shelter of a decent Government, they may prove very dangerous competitors in the Japanese trade.

Some intellectual and moral and spiritual improvement must accrue to Japan from intercourse with the outer world, although it is impossible, except in the most shadowy way, to anticipate its amount or character. In order to rival the mechanicians and engineers of the civilized world, they must not only have the same practical experience, but the same knowledge of the exact sciences. There is not the slightest reason to suppose that they would find any difficulty in acquiring such a knowledge, but it must be a work of time, and the instruments and methods of this knowledge must for many years come to them from abroad. A fair sprinkling of the Japanese will also learn English, and perhaps German, for the purposes of trade, and will thus acquire all the benefits that attend an imperfect knowledge of another language. The literature of the civilized world will some day permeate in a faint degree the Japanese mind, although the degree in which the literature of an alien civilization affects the minds of men, is curiously small, as is visible every day in India even in the case of the cleverest young Baboos, who know all about SHAKESPEARE, and can analyse his character, and quote his plays, and yet give Englishmen the impression that their notion of SHAKESPEARE, so far as they are not using more clever verbiage, is quite distinct from ours. The great importance of the English and American trade at first will probably give English literature a predominance in Japan, if European literature has any hold there at all. But at present the Germans are before us, and a traveller recently stated that in a Japanese seaport, while in nine shops he could buy German books, he could only buy English books in one. Some religious changes will also probably follow on commercial intercourse. Christianity is now completely tolerated in Japan, and an edict has been issued forbidding altogether the use in devotional rites of obscene emblems, which is at least a concession to that sort of right feeling which urges propriety when it is obvious that dirty lichen can no longer be washed at home. It is even said that the MIKADO could without any difficulty declare Christianity the national religion, and perhaps may do so; and that the Japanese indifference to religion is great enough to ensure that a large number of his subjects, and perhaps the majority, would call themselves whatever he wished. It is difficult to see that such a mere outward change is much to be wished for, and if there were nothing else to hinder it, a serious obstacle would be interposed when the MIKADO found that in favouring one denomination of Christians he would offend others, and that a political movement to conciliate foreigners might end in stirring up a bitterness among them which would extend to his own people.

FRANCE.

THE expectation of a peaceful autumn in France will not be disappointed if M. GAMBETTA can help it. For some time back his tempestuous energy has been more and more under restraint, and he now declares himself opposed to any agitation for the immediate dissolution of the Assembly. To outsiders the reasons in favour of this course seem so overwhelming that there is no merit in taking it. But before judging M. GAMBETTA by this standard two things have to be remembered. One is that conclusions equally self-evident have again and again been rejected or passed over by the Republican party. To wait till the pear is ripe before picking it may not be a conspicuous exercise of self-control, but it is an improvement upon the hitherto invariable custom of stripping the tree as soon as the fruit makes its appearance. The other is that M. GAMBETTA has been denounced by his enemies as a revolutionist of the worst type, a Communist without the honesty to declare himself. If there were any truth in this view he would spend the recess in making inflammatory speeches against the Assembly. By so doing he would inflict more damage on the cause of the moderate Republic than by any other that is open to him. The Republic that is being set up under the guidance of M. THIERS is essentially orderly and conservative. If it could be deprived of this character in the eyes of Frenchmen its remarkable popularity would be gone, and the country would once more be prepared to acquiesce in some kind of Monarchical reaction. This would give the extreme Republicans precisely the opportunity they want. The great body of the nation would again be alienated from politics, and power would again be a prize for any reckless faction to clutch at. By keeping silent as regards the dissolution of the Assembly, M. GAMBETTA is helping to prove that a Republic can give French Conservatives the material and social security which they demand of a Government. But a Republic which creates this conviction in minds so narrow and so keen-sighted must have a genuinely conservative character about it. By lending himself to the consolidation of such a system M. GAMBETTA gives good evidence of the falsity of the accusations levelled against him by the Right. Against its own will the existing Assembly is helping to found the Republic. More than any other body it has the power of doing this without exciting alarm or opposition in the country. But the Republic thus formed will be of a sort which in the eyes of a revolutionist will be as bad as any Monarchy.

The Left Centre have hit upon a novel device for relieving the dulness of the Parliamentary vacation. They have made arrangements under which any newspaper that desires it may receive a daily circular containing "appreciations" and "indications" of the line of conduct pursued by the Conservative Republicans. Their object in adopting this plan is probably of an economical character. They wish to save the expense of subsidizing a journal of their own. So long as matter is as scarce as it is at this season, these "appreciations" and "indications" will probably be received with gratitude. As soon as the Assembly meets again, the public will once more be left to learn the course of the Left Centre from the action of its members in the Chamber. In announcing the issue of this bulletin of its own political state, the Committee of the Left Centre make some observations of a more sensible character than might have been expected from the occasion which calls them forth. Eighteen months ago, they say, we despaired of seeing France survive her misfortunes. To-day we see her with the burden of a foreign occupation almost lifted from her shoulders and her old place in the world brought once more within her reach. Making allowance for much natural exaggeration, this is not an unfair account of the change that has come over the country. The burdens under which France still labours are so serious that we are tempted to forget that the burdens which weighed on her in the spring of 1871 were more serious still. It may be a fallacy to argue from the fact of her Government being Republican that the gains of the last year and a half are necessarily due to the Republic. They might conceivably have been realized under another system. But the mass of men are not logicians, and when they see a conspicuous success achieved by a Republic, they will be likely to assume that it could not have been achieved except by a Republic. Indeed for practical purposes the reasoning is sufficiently accurate; at all events the history of France since the close of the war has proved that a Republic is not hostile to the restoration and development of the national forces; and considering how little can be said in favour of any of the forms of government which it is proposed to put in place of a Republic, it is the part of ordinary prudence to accept it with contentment, if not with enthusiasm. The Committee of the Left Centre are evidently a little hurt that M. THIERS should have borrowed from them, without acknowledgment, the phrase "a Conservative Republic." They feel, however, that there is still something for the Left Centre to do. M. THIERS has appropriated their formula, but it will remain with those who invented it to define its principles, to explain its meaning, and to develop its consequences. To do all this is the mission of the press, and if the press should fail in its duty, the Committee of the Left Centre are ready to supply the newspapers with a series of ready-made leading articles.

The person, however, who is doing most to make the recess lively is the PRESIDENT himself. According to the Times Correspondent "it appears certain" that M. THIERS is meditating a very decided step forward in the direction of a permanent, as opposed to a provisional, Republic. The Assembly has always laid great stress upon the fact that it is constituent, and M. THIERS apparently intends to take it at its word. He will allow it to constitute a Second Chamber, and for this Second Chamber jointly with himself he will claim the power of dissolving the Assembly. The ingenuity of this device is considerable. It will be difficult for the Assembly to decline the task assigned to it, for a refusal to give the Executive even so much as a voice in the dissolution of a professedly representative Chamber would be to challenge it to decree a dissolution of its own mere motion, and trust to the result of the elections for a justification of its action. Yet to have the right to dissolve, even though it can only be exercised with the consent of a Second Chamber, is really to have the means of bringing a greatly increased pressure to bear upon the Deputies. In whatever way the Second Chamber is elected, it is likely to pull with the PRESIDENT in the matter of a dissolution. Even if it is elected by the Assembly from its own members, its duration will probably be regulated on a different principle, and it will have no personal interest in prolonging the life of a body to which it has no longer any special tie. If it is appointed by the Government, M. THIERS will certainly take care to nominate members of his own way of thinking. If it is elected by the country, it may be trusted to send the Assembly about its business as soon as the PRESIDENT shall be in any hurry to exercise the power which has been conferred on him. But the experience of the last session has probably made it clear to him that, if his hold over the Assembly were a little more visible, it might not be necessary to tighten it quite so often. In theory the power of the Assembly is absolute. The Executive is its creature, and though it is nominally responsible to the country, the fact that it cannot be dissolved deprives this responsibility of almost all its value. In practice the power of the Assembly is exceedingly limited; indeed it amounts to little else than freedom to do M. THIERS's will with more or less of ill grace. The disadvantage of this state of things is that it provides M. THIERS with no means of coercing the Assembly short of threatening resignation—a step which under present circumstances would be equivalent to a new revolution. This menace has always answered M. THIERS's purpose, and would probably continue to answer it. But an Assembly over which the whip has to be publicly waved in this fashion is not an institution that reflects credit on representative government. The pressure exercised on the Deputies by the knowledge that if they defy the PRESIDENT he can appeal to the nation to judge between him and them, is not open to this objection. All representative bodies are liable by the very law of their being to have the test of a dissolution applied to them, and the wish to shrink from it affects at most the character for sincerity of the particular Assembly which betrays it.

RAILWAY ECONOMICS.

THIERS is reason to hope that the Report of the Committee on Railway Amalgamation will simplify future inquiries on similar subjects. It has been already observed that the most useful portions of the Report consist of the negative conclusions in which it rejects many of the remedies which have at different times been proposed for the alleged defects and evils of the railway system. The Committee, after full consideration, has satisfied itself that equal mileage rates are inexpedient, that it is impracticable to establish any standard for the revision of rates and fares founded on cost and profit, that there would be no advantage in establishing a maximum amount of terminal charges, that immediate reduction of rates and fares cannot be effectually made, that periodical revision of rates and fares is impracticable without a standard of revision, and that revision based on limitation of dividend is undesirable, while the scheme of dividing with the public profits exceeding a certain amount would be attended with great or insuperable difficulties. In an earlier part of the Report the Committee had shown that the provisions of the Act of 1844 for the compulsory purchase of railways by the State are no longer applicable. The limitation of dividends to a fixed percentage has been already adopted in the case of Gas and Water Companies, with the result, where the maximum has been attained, of depriving the undertakers of any motive for improving the value of their property, or for increasing the public accommodation. The supply of gas is a comparatively simple business; the rates are necessarily uniform, and the demand is within the district almost universal. Railway traffic requires to be fostered with minute and unceasing vigilance; and every large Company has at all times thousands of rates in operation, while scarcely a single charge corresponds with the maximum amount of the legal scale. Universal reduction of rates would be almost impossible, nor can any separate rate be fixed or altered without reference to other parts of the tariff, and also to the rates of all neighbouring Companies, which are consequently allowed, through the machinery of periodical meetings of managers, a voice in the adjustment of rates. Places both of consumption and of production compete as well as railways; and it would often happen that a change in the rates of goods at a town in Yorkshire would immediately affect the trade of Lancashire or Staffordshire. The competition of coal-fields affords a familiar illustration of the relations which connect all similar manufacturing districts or similar markets. An attempt to regulate rates according to the cost of railways, and to an assumed percentage of profit, would be at the same time unjust and impracticable. The effect of establishing such a standard would often be to increase the existing rates on traffic which could not bear even the smallest additional burden. The Committee rightly conjectures that, for the purpose of avoiding popular jealousy, Companies will voluntarily limit their dividends by applying surplus profits beyond a given return to the construction either of new branches or of additional rails. There is no other fund which can be so conveniently employed in providing on crowded railways additional lines of rail for the separation of passenger and goods traffic. The improvement has already been commenced by some of the largest Companies, and matters nothing whether the cost is borne out of revenue or by the creation of new capital.

The effect of sea-competition, wherever it exists, in keeping down rates is likely to be permanent, and the Committee only thinks it necessary to suggest that Railway Companies ought not to be allowed to obtain a monopoly of seaports, except such as they may have themselves created. An unexpected importance is attributed to the independence of internal water-carriage, which has already been infringed to a great extent by the purchases and amalgamations of Railway Companies. The Report contains recommendations that no inland navigation now in the hands of a public Trust shall be transferred to a Railway Company; that adjoining canals and inland navigations shall be encouraged to amalgamate with one another; and even that facilities should be afforded to Canal Companies for the compulsory purchase of canals which are now possessed by Railway Companies. It would seem that the only competition which the Committee deems practicable is that between water carriage and railway conveyance. In common with all persons who form their opinions from theory and on general evidence, the Committee conclude that competition invariably ends in combination. In the investigation of Bills for competing lines, or for facilitating the competition of existing Companies, skilled witnesses and traders of all descriptions invariably express an exactly opposite opinion. Several Bills were promoted, and some were passed, in the last Session, for the purpose of establishing the competition which the Select Committee regards as illusory; and promoters, opponents, and independent witnesses on both sides invariably assumed as the inevitable result of the proposed undertakings, the institution not of temporary, but of permanent competition, which is perfectly compatible with agreement on the scale of rates. At the general meeting of the London, Chatham, and Dover proprietors, a few days ago, some of the shareholders objected to the high rate of working expenses arising from the speed and number of trains, which was, in the opinion of the dissentients, excessive. Mr. FORBES, Managing Director of the Company, who has no superior in experience or ability among railway managers, replied that the Chatham line was adjacent to the South-Eastern and to the Brighton, and that it was indispensable to the welfare of the Company that it should supply equal accommodation with its neighbours. Such a practical illustration of the effects of competition is worth many general propositions. The South-Eastern Railway, which compels the Chatham Railway to furnish good accommodation to passengers, is nevertheless for many purposes allied with it.

The Committee declines to recommend that Railway Companies should be allowed to exercise general running powers over the lines of other Companies. Even when such powers are given by agreement or by special legislation, they can only be used to a limited extent. It is often more convenient for all parties that a Company should obtain access to an important station over an existing railway than that it should construct a line and station of its own; yet, when the traffic is large and the distance considerable, it is sometimes advisable to incur a large expense for the sake of securing absolute independence. The Midland Company will have spent several millions in releasing itself from its connexion with the Great Northern Company in its access to London, and with the London and North-Western Company on its route to Scotland; and it is now generally admitted that in both instances the Board of Directors adopted a judicious policy. As the Committee remarks, the North British Company announced their intention of refusing the running powers over the Midland line which were offered in the Bill for the amalgamation of the Midland with the Glasgow and South-Western; but no confident inference can be drawn from a declaration which may perhaps have been made in pursuance of a plan for the management of the Parliamentary contest. It is well known that no direct profit can be made by running over a foreign line, inasmuch as the share of the gross receipts which is allowed to the running Company only covers the cost of working. It follows that there is a limit of distance, probably never exceeding fifty or sixty miles, beyond which the running Company cannot earn on its own line a profit which would make it worth while to use a foreign line. It is still a disputed point whether large facilities, including the employment of clerks and agents on a foreign system, are or are not equally effective for purposes of competition with running powers. It is the interest, and therefore the practice, of neighbouring Companies to make through rates with one another to all non-competitive places. The Committee proposes that universal through rates shall be compulsorily imposed; and that, as a general rule, the receipts shall be divided according to mileage.

The details of the system will be regulated in case of dispute by the new Commission; and in ordinary cases there will be little complication. The defect of universal through rates will, be, not that the traffic will be unduly charged, but that it will still be conveyed as at present by the Company which first handles the goods. In some instances through rates will give freighters a certain opportunity of choice; but in the great majority of cases traders know and care nothing about the route by which their goods are conveyed to their destination. Railway Companies are already legally compelled to send consigned goods as they may have been directed to travel; but the consignment is more often made by the agent of a Railway Company for the benefit of his principals than by the vendor or buyer. Nevertheless it is desirable to try the experiment of removing the impassable block which is now caused wherever through rates are withheld. Railway managers have many ways of protecting their Companies from the effects of too large concessions to their rivals. It will be well if writers on railway policy and economy will imitate the candour of the Committee in recognizing the inutility of almost all the contrivances which have been devised for anticipating by conjecture the lessons of experience. The want of forethought, or, as it might not less accurately be called, the inductive process, which it is a commonplace to denounce, has provided England with the best system of railways in the world; nor is it to be regretted that lines have been made because they seemed to those who possessed the greatest special knowledge likely to be useful and profitable, especially as in the great majority of instances the anticipation of the undertakers has been justified by the result.

MR. ROEBUCK AND THE WORKING-MAN.

MR. ROEBUCK, renouncing the bitterness of a political Ishmaelite, has treated the working-men of Sheffield to an impressive homily on the social value of suavity and gentleness. The result of recent political changes has been, as he said, to make the working-man the real governing man in England, or at least to put him in the way of becoming so, if he chooses to exercise the powers which have been bestowed on him. The numerical preponderance of the working classes has the effect, as long as they are united, of practically placing other classes at their mercy. Before the last Reform Act was passed Mr. Lowe suggested that it would be well to educate our masters, and Mr. ROEBUCK has drawn attention to a branch of their education which should certainly not be overlooked—education in social amenity and refinement. Mr. ROEBUCK said very truly that he has never been a flatterer of the working classes; indeed adulation of anybody can hardly be ascribed to him as his besetting sin. He once described himself as the dog 'Tear'em, who barked at everybody, and whose honest growl was always at the service of his country. Mr. ROEBUCK's favourite style of criticism is perhaps open to the artistic objection that it is deficient in variety; and his growling would occasionally have been more effective if relieved by a little genial approbation. Outspokenness at the risk of personal unpopularity is not, however, a common failing on the part of public men at the present day, and Mr. ROEBUCK's candour has frequently been attended with good results. It has been said that he lost his seat in the House of Commons in consequence of the part he took in bringing about an exposure of the abominable Trade Union conspiracy of which BROADHEAD was the leading spirit; but the working-men of Sheffield are probably convinced by this time that he could not have done them a more important service than in helping to break up the malignant despotism by which they were enslaved. Mr. ROEBUCK has always treated working-men, not with flattery, but respect. He has never thought it necessary to assure them that they were by nature the wisest and noblest of mankind, and at the same time to talk down to them as if they were silly little children who believed everything that was said to them, and who could be got to do anything by a few soft words and a little fawning. He has paid the working classes the compliment of believing that they are not deficient in common sense, manliness, and honesty, and that if they were told of their faults they would perhaps try to mend them. Instead of persuading them that they are naturally superior to all other classes of the community, he has repeatedly told them that it would be well to shake off the brutality, reckless self-indulgence, and ungenerous suspicion of others which too often distinguish them, and endeavour to become more gentle and amiable. And this, in other words, was the burden of his speech at the opening of the St. Peter's Club.

It appears that the St. Peter's Club has been established "for the convenience of working-men, tradesmen, and the 'middle class generally.'" The attempts which have been made during the last few years to establish clubs for working-men appear, as a rule, to have broken down miserably. The working-man was asked to come and take his ease and make himself comfortable in places which by an exercise of fantastic ingenuity were made as uncomfortable for him as possible. The rooms provided for him were prim and cold, and the regulations were vexatious. He was deprived of his pipe and restricted as to his liquor, and worried in all sorts of ways by rules and by-laws which had apparently been borrowed from some severe form of prison discipline. It seems to be one of the most hopeful things about the St. Peter's Club that it starts with as few rules as possible. It is not to be a class or caste club. It has a thousand members; one-third of these are working-men, who will find themselves mixing on equal and friendly terms with men of other classes, clerks, shopmen, small tradesmen, and the like. Hitherto working-men have been too much shut up among themselves, and have been shy and suspicious of other classes; and the organization of the Trade Unions has perhaps tended to foster this isolation. It can hardly fail to be productive of good results if artisans and tradesmen can be brought together in a club of this kind. Mr. ROEBUCK said he never could understand why the working-man with the large wages he received should be so different from other men who earned less money, but who took a higher social position. It has lately been stated that one result of the general rise of wages has been to produce an increase of drunkenness among the labouring classes. It is obviously an equivocal satisfaction to the great body of working-men to direct their attention to exceptional instances in which some of their number have risen in the world, and made their way out of their own class into a superior social grade. If anything is to be done to improve the position of working-men as a class, it must be in the way of enabling them to rise to a higher standard of intelligence and refinement while continuing to practise their trades. If there is any faulting on their part that they are looked down upon by other classes—and this has probably a good deal to do with their clannishness and isolation—it will be removed by the free and friendly association of working-men with clerks and shopkeepers in a pleasant club. Mr. ROEBUCK looks forward to the day when working-men—at any rate the better sort of them—will sit down to their meals at what he called a gentleman's table. This does not imply, of course, fine meats or luxurious service, but only cleanliness, order, decorum, and all those little niceties which are associated with self-respect and consideration for others. A French workman who goes into a restaurant has his napkin like anybody else, and appreciates the propriety and convenience of all the arrangements. He not only feeds, but derives a delicate enjoyment from the white tablecloth, the gilding, and mirrors. Except that his meal costs a franc, instead of four or five francs, he is dining as any gentleman might do, and if at any time his circumstances placed him in a higher sphere he would feel quite at home there. There is nothing so fatal to the happiness and welfare of the English working-man as that want of self-respect which so often makes him alternately surly and oringing. When the Revolution gave everybody in France an equal right to be called Monsieur and Madame, it did a good deal for the elevation of the working classes of that country.

The opening of this little club may perhaps seem a small matter, but we are disposed to agree with Mr. ROEBUCK that the experiment is an important one in its possible results, and that, if successful, it may help in bringing about a gradual social revolution of the most desirable and valuable kind. It is to be hoped that the promoters will not expect too much from it all at once, and that, above all, they will steer clear of the blunder of over-regulating their society. As the entrance-fee has been fixed at 10s., it is obvious that at first only a very superior order of working-men can be expected to join, but these will act as a sort of social missionaries among their own class, and the influence of the club will be felt far beyond its precincts. Some fears seem to have been expressed lest the effect of establishing a handsome and attractive club-room should be to draw away men from their homes. We should imagine that the taproom and the drinking-bar would have more reason to fear this new competition. It is natural, however, to suppose that working-men, when they learn to appreciate the comforts of their club, will look for something of the same kind at home, and their wives will be none the worse for the stimulus to exertion which will thus be applied to them. It was hardly necessary for Mr. ROEBUCK to disclaim any intention of making an onslaught on the British home and the British mother, for he had previously expressed a hope that the club-house might some day be open to the wife as well as the husband, so that they might dine there together with their children on a holiday afternoon. The plan of the club is a good one, and if it is left to develop itself naturally and gradually, and to manage its own affairs without external interference or fussy patronage, it will no doubt succeed. Even, however, if there were a number of clubs of this kind, they would hardly satisfy the wants either of working-men or of the middle classes generally to the same extent as a series of large, handsome, bright, well-conducted refreshment-rooms, after the fashion of the French cafés, open to everybody, and with a cheap tariff adapted to the poorest purse, where a man could smoke his pipe and read the papers, or gossip with a friend, at the cost of a few pence for refreshments. Mr. ROEBUCK's address to the working-men at Sheffield, whom he assumed to be honest, manly fellows who would not object to be told that they were not absolutely perfect, was equally creditable to himself and to his audience, and affords an agreeable contrast to the offensive adulation of interested sycophants.

EMIGRATION.

NOW that emigration is no longer regarded as the universal remedy for all the ills to which an old community is heir, there is perhaps some danger that its real advantages as a means of equalizing population and the means of subsistence may be lost sight of. The discovery that it is utterly unsuited for large classes of persons, coupled with the fact that these are often the very classes who are most disposed to emigrate, has a little brought it into discredit. It is pretty well known by this time that the colonies are not places into which paupers may be shot by arrangement, and that a distaste for work at home is not of itself a preparation for working elsewhere. Emigration cannot be trusted to empty the workhouses, or to rid the country of young men in whom education has developed the desire of wealth without suggesting any means of gratifying it. It is important, however, not to forget that the pressure of population may be relieved indirectly as well as directly; that paupers may be provided for not only by being shipped off to a new home, but by work being found for them in their old one; and that the condition of the class just above pauperism may be greatly bettered by a sudden diminution of its numbers, and an equally sudden rise in its standard of living. There was a time when emigration was a natural resource for skilled labourers, when to cross the Atlantic in search of work seemed all that was left to men who had fought their employers, and had again and again been compelled to surrender at discretion. At present, by some process the precise character of which is hardly ascertained, trade organization and the revival of industrial activity have brought about a kind of rough equation between the work to be done and the number of artisans who are able and willing to do it. As a rule, in all occupations which require much manual skill, and are pursued under conditions that make combination easy, the workman can meet his master on pretty equal terms. He is sure of good wages and fairly constant employment, and so long as this is the case he has no inducement to leave England. But besides the skilled workmen who are bound together in trade societies, there are others, not less skilled perhaps in their several handicrafts but destitute of the advantages which combination brings with it, who find it very hard to get on in this country. It is a common thing to find in a village young men, bred as carpenters or masons, who find just employment enough to keep them in their native place, but not enough to give them a comfortable or certain livelihood. Men of this sort would be better suited for an emigrant's life than the artisans of the great towns. In the country the division of labour is less complete, and a workman is more able to turn his hand to many things.

It is probable, however, that the real future of emigration lies in another direction. The class of persons who are best adapted for, and will most benefit by, emigration to an agricultural country are those who have been accustomed to agriculture at home. As yet this mine has scarcely been worked at all. In the emigration returns for 1871, 57,542 emigrants are described as "general labourers," 10,308 as "gentlemen," 8,053 as "farmers," 5,872 as "miners"

"and quarrymen," 2,870 as "carpenters and joiners," but only 1,378 as "agricultural labourers, gardeners, and carters." This mere fraction of the total of 252,435 persons who left the United Kingdom during the year is all that was contributed by the class which beyond every other is doing worst in England, and would be likely to do best in the British colonies. The reason for this disproportion is not hard to find. Dread of the unknown is greatest where education is least. If the agricultural labourer knows that there are countries where work and food are to be had in abundance, it is as much as he knows. He is absolutely ignorant of the means of getting there, and of the kind of life he would have to lead after getting there. The life he would leave behind him has so few attractions that to the educated man it seems that anything would be better. But to the uneducated man the ill that he knows not of are always worse than the ill he knows. Education must by degrees have changed this; but in all probability the process will be immensely accelerated by other causes. The immediate result of the general formation of agricultural Trade Unions must be a considerable disturbance of the relations between farmers and labourers, and the Unions will probably be driven to urge emigration upon their members as a temporary expedient for lightening the pressure on their funds. They will put themselves in communication with emigration agents, and get together and circulate the sort of information which the labourer requires to make him sure that by crossing the ocean he is not committing himself to a miserable life, and a still more miserable death. When once a few of the bolder spirits in each Union have made the trial, all difficulties will be at an end. Correspondence—even the rare and unsatisfactory correspondence which is the most that an uneducated man is likely to achieve—is a surer means of dispelling discouraging illusions as to the nature of an emigrant's life than any amount of printed evidence supplied by persons with whom the intending emigrant is unacquainted. And when once the initial difficulty of finding passage money has been surmounted, the example of Ireland shows what can be done by the absolutely unaided agency of emigrants interested in enabling others to follow them. Since the year 1848 the sum of seventeen millions sterling has been remitted by Irish settlers in North America to their friends in the United Kingdom. In the three successive years 1852, 1853, and 1854, the sums sent back were 1,404,000*l.*, 1,439,000*l.*, and 1,730,000*l.* In 1864, the year in which the least money was sent, the amount was 332,172*l.* From that date it steadily rose again till 1870, when it reached 727,408*l.* and in 1871 it was 702,488*l.* Of this last mentioned sum 310,990*l.* was in the form of pre-paid passages. The number of Irish emigrants during the year was 71,067, and the cost of their passage in steamers, as fixed by the Liverpool Steam Shipping Companies, was about 403,000*l.* The money sent back would thus far have sufficed to take out nearly as many again as actually wanted to go. In other words, the Irish peasantry have the means of emigrating whenever they wish to do so, as they might leave the country in nearly double their present numbers before exhausting the funds sent home by Irishmen who have already left it. It may be said perhaps that the family relationship is more keenly and more endearingly felt in Ireland than in England, and the fact is certainly borne out by other evidence than that of the money sent home by emigrants. But when full allowance has been made for this difference, we may still believe that sufficient affection is felt by the English poor for their wives or children or parents to induce them, if necessary, to make somewhat similar sacrifices to those which have been so freely made by the Irish. The figures which have been quoted are the best possible answer to the cry that is sometimes raised for State aid to emigration. The chief result of such a scheme would be to check a spontaneous liberality which, during the last quarter of a century, has raised seventeen millions of money.

At present the proportion of emigrants to the United States over the emigrants to the British colonies is very remarkable. In 1871, out of the 188,273 Englishmen who left this country, 144,617 went to the United States. Of Irishmen, the proportion was still greater, and in Scotland, though the proportion was much smaller, the actual excess was still considerable—16,236 out of 23,039. It is not impossible that these statistics may be modified if any large agricultural emigration takes place. The artisan and the town workman generally is disposed by political tendencies to prefer the United States to Canada, but the immediate opening for agricultural labour is perhaps greater in Canada. The agent of Ottawa assures the Emigration Commissioners that he has not been able to furnish more than a partial supply of agricultural labourers to meet the many orders received from the farmers in the province. The agent at Kingston says that four times the number of immigrants could have been settled without difficulty in his district. The agent at Hamilton speaks of an unprecedented scarcity of agricultural labour, and adds that, were it not for the substitution of machinery, it would have been impossible to secure the crops. It is quite possible that life in Canada may have more attractions for an English agricultural labourer than the more unfamiliar conditions of life in the United States. That the supply has hitherto been inferior to the Canadian demand is probably due to the absence of the agricultural element among the emigrants. No other class is wanted to anything like the same extent, and no other important class makes so poor a show in the returns. If the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol will allow us to say so, there can be no greater charity than to help industrious agricultural labourers to make their way from districts where they are poorly paid to a country where certain prosperity awaits them as the reward of steady work. Before long it may be hoped that the emigration of the English peasantry will be as self-supporting as that of the Irish peasantry has been. But in the first instance the money must be found through agencies nearer home.

DR. LIVINGSTONE AND MR. STANLEY.

SHORT of the presence of the long-missing traveller himself, nothing can well be conceived capable of kindling greater curiosity and interest than the appearance before the throng assembled at Brighton of the youthful adventurer who had to speak of Livingstone's discovery and safety. A certain halo of romance which had from the first surrounded an enterprise so novel and original as that of Mr. Stanley seemed still to hover around the speaker, and to be kept up in part by the spirited and highly dramatic tone which characterized his narrative throughout. To the popular eye and ear here was the very impersonation of what was to be expected in the hero of such an expedition, as well in physique as in mental qualities. Cool, self-possessed, and fluent, restless in energy, with a fund of mother-wit and a power of holding his own against critics and gainsayers on every side, it was no difficult task with the speaker to win his way at once to the heart and the confidence of at least the less critical or the less coldly constituted body of his hearers. Both in his short opening address, spoken extempore with an energy at times rising or descending to brusqueness, and in the more formal paper in which he told of his travels and geographical impressions, he showed a descriptive skill and verve which kept the enthusiasm of the audience at the highest pitch. Nothing in the way of a popular harangue could well be more graphic or effective than his description of his abrupt and sudden call to what seemed to him a vague and shadowy mission, his girding himself up to the search for a man whom he had been wont to regard, and could still scarce keep himself from regarding, as a myth. "Do you think he is alive?" was his first question of the native ruler at Unyanyembe, who could say no more than that he was said to be living at Ujiji somewhere, and was a great eater of butter, but that for his part he had divined by the Koran and found Livingstone was dead. For Ujiji Mr. Stanley set out on the 23rd of September last, after an abortive start or two, his men having deserted him, and both trackless jungles and native warfare barring the path. How he felt and behaved when, on the 10th of November, the man whom he had believed to be a myth stood before him, how he would fain have turned a summersault, but, for the sake of the Arabs who stood by, kept all feeling under a severe curb as he walked side by side with the pale, thin, grey-bearded old man, "dressed in a red shirt, with a crimson joko, with a gold band round his cap, an old tweed pair of pants, and his shoes looking the worse for wear" all is movingly told—and what a tale of calamities did he read "in that wrinkled face, those grey hairs in his beard, those silver lines in his forehead!" It must be allowed that Mr. Stanley has made an intensely thrilling tale out of the meeting and the events that followed it. We can imagine his unlooked-for arrival and genial companionship having not a little to do with bringing up the "ruckle" of bones that had crawled back months before in weariness and pain to Ujiji to the bodily standard of the hale and hearty and energetic Livingstone of old. On the other hand, the enthusiasm of the veteran explorer and geographer seems to have kindled in his younger companion the zeal of a neophyte in the cause of physical discovery, and it is with unquestioning faith that he has made himself the mouthpiece of his master's theories.

It is not to be taken as in the slightest degree disparaging to the accuracy of Livingstone's observations, or the bona fides of Mr. Stanley's corroborative reports, that implicit acceptance of what both travellers unhesitatingly advance as a solution of the Nile mystery is at present out of the question with geographers. It is to be deplored that a certain kind of heat has been imported into the discussions at Brighton, leading to an unpleasant break in the amenities befitting the occasion. It should have been made clear that no amount of doubt as to the inferences drawn by the travellers from what they saw and have told us need be taken as a slur upon the correctness or the good faith of what they declare as facts. Together they set out on the circuit of Lake Tanganyika round its northern shore, with the result of establishing beyond doubt that the lake has no possible connexion with the Albert Nyanza or the Nile. The River Ruzizi was conclusively found to flow into, not out of, Tanganyika, nor can it possibly flow into Baker's Lake. Rubinga, an intelligent chief of Usige, is reported by Mr. Stanley to have stated that the river escapes from the Lake Kivu, and he would appear to have himself traced as many as seventeen or eighteen of its affluents between the two lakes, including the Luanda or Ruanda. It is much to be regretted that the circumnavigation of Lake Tanganyika was not extended to its south-east shore, so as to dispose of the question whether it discharges itself, as seems most probable, by the Lufiji, Rufigi, or Ruahin, into the sea near Zanzibar. Another, if not the same outlet, may lie through the beautiful Lake Ziamba or Liamba, previously described by Livingstone. From Livingstone's last despatch, dated Unyanyembe, February 20, 1872, we get the latest views of the great traveller as to what he had achieved, with his plans for the future. What he has placed beyond doubt is the existence of a great mountain range, dividing the drainage of the Zambesi from that to the northward, identical probably with Ptolemy's Mountains of the Moon. But more important still is the great valley system of lakes and rivers, starting from a broad upland between  $10^{\circ}$  and  $12^{\circ}$  S., and from 4,000 to 5,000 feet above the sea, from which rise mountains 6,000 or 7,000 feet in actual height. This watershed extends over 700 miles from west to east. Countless springs here ooze up from the spongy soil, spreading out, says Livingstone, to a bird's-eye view, like the frost vegetation on a window-pane. In passing over 60 miles of latitude, he waded thirty-two primary sources of this kind. Several of them are covered with veritable living bridges, the rich dark glossy-leaved grass with its roots and leaves felting itself into a mat, which, when stepped upon, yields 12 or 15 inches, the water rising to that height up the leg, holes here and there appearing through which anywhere one might "plump through and finish the chapter." When the water is shallow, the lotus, or sacred lily, sends its roots to the bottom and spreads its broad leaves across the floating bridge. Uniting into four such streams in the main these springs form the head waters of the Chambezi, the bed of which Livingstone followed from its source till it entered the large lake Bangweolo, 150 miles wide and 4,000 feet above the sea, which our readers will find set down in Keith Johnston's map (1870). Turning thence northwards, it flows, under the new name of Luapula, past the town of Cazembe—a distinguished chief made known to us by Dr. Lacerda, the Portuguese—into Lake Moero, also set down in the said map. Thence the great river forces its way to the north through the Itua Mountains, and spreads out into a new lake, called Ulenqa or Kamalondo, in the Manyema country. It is here called the Lualaba, and has been named by Livingstone Webb's Lake River, after a friend. Soon after this it makes to the west a great bend of 180 miles, and after a further bend of 120 miles to the north and west, with 30 miles of southing next, draws round to the north-east, receiving the Lomame or Loeki, joined to which it flows through a large lake called "Lincoln" by the discoverer. Thence the united stream spreads out into a fourth large lake with many islands, to which Livingstone gives no name, and which he was unable to explore, failing health and supplies compelling his return in 1870 to Ujiji. Somewhat to the south-west from hence natives reported a remarkable mound, from the base of which the springs or fountains divide into two great rivers to the north-east. One of these, the Lufira, named by Livingstone Bartle Frero's, flows into Lake Kamalondo. That to the north-west of the mound, or "Young's Fountain," is considered by him to form the upper waters of the Lomame. These streams, with two others, which he believes to run south, are held by him to be those mentioned by Herodotus as flowing, one-half to the Nile and one-half into inner Ethiopia.

The main lacustrine stream thus tracked for the first time for 600 miles is held implicitly by the great traveller to be no other than the Nile. And this discovery he announces as the crowning glory of his career of toil. Here it is unhappily impossible for geographers to follow him. It is no question between gentlemen sitting at home in easy chairs, as Mr. Stanley somewhat hotly puts it, and one who has with his own eyes seen the Nile. As a matter, not of fact, but of inference, it is, to say the least, as much within the capacity of those at home, with the command of concurrent aids to judgment, and all the light of independent discovery, as of an observer on the spot. The simple and obvious laws of nature are at all events not to be gainsaid; and the mere considerations of level, unless the figures have undergone some strange and unimaginable juggling, are fatal to Livingstone's darling hypothesis. It is difficult to conceive the traveller himself sitting down to pen it without a misgiving, on second thought, that the height of the lower part of Central Lualaba, being one inch lower by barometer than Tanganyika, which he makes out to be 3,000 feet, is "about the altitude ascribed to Gondokoro." Some fifteen degrees of latitude, by his estimate, separating the Lualaba at this point from Gondokoro, both the latitude of which (over  $5^{\circ}$  N.) and the elevation are fixed by full and concurrent testimony, how is he to account for the river actually keeping a dead level for a thousand miles and upwards? As for Livingstone's river flowing into the Bahr-el-Ghazal, as has been suggested, not only is the same difficulty of level in the way, but all evidence concurs in representing the Bahr-el-Ghazal as a shallow, reedy stream, utterly unequal to the reception of a broad and deep volume of water like the Lualaba, in places over two miles in width. Livingstone confesses himself at times to be haunted by a suspicion that he had hit upon the Congo, which, if we mistake not, will be the impression of geographers in general, for that a stream of this magnitude can lose itself in some inland lake or swamp passes the bounds of what is probable. It may be, of course, that Livingstone's observations of level, as well as of geographical distribution, were incorrect. What instruments he had with him appear to have been imperfect at the best, besides having been long in use. The boiling-water test, at no time scientifically exact, is anything but enhanced in accuracy in the tropics, where the pole-star, too, can be scarcely, if at all, available for observation, and the sun is seen under the worst conditions for latitude. Livingstone's timepieces having long been useless, longitude must for some time past have become a mere matter of dead reckoning; and with what strictness he had kept count of time may be tested by the fact of his allowing himself to have been three weeks out in his reckoning when found by Mr. Stanley. Refreshed as he must have been, and amply supplied, as he himself writes, with stores, he reports it as his future plan of action to go south-west from Unyanyembe to Fipa, near the south-eastern end of Tanganyika, from thence round to Pambette so as to cross the Chambezi, and coast the southern shores of Lake Bangweolo (lat.  $12^{\circ}$  S.), and thence due west to the ancient fountains of Herodotus and Ptolemy. Thence it is no more than ten days north to Katanza, the copper-mines of which have been worked for ages, the malachite being practically inexhaustible. Ten days N.E. from Katanza are said to be the wondrous natural rock excavations ascribed by the natives to the Deity. In these, where water is said to be laid on in running streams, the inhabitants of large districts can take refuge in case of invasion. We shall look with interest for the account of these remarkable natural features. But the most absorbing curiosity must be felt for the solution of the central problem of all, by Livingstone's striking once more the southern shore of Lake Lincoln; going down from it to the Lomame, on into Webb's Lualaba, and pursuing the main river till it yields up the secret of its unknown issue. This issue he hopes and believes to be the Nile. In this belief and hope there can be few to join him. Still, the result, whatever it be, cannot fail to prove a valuable gain to our knowledge of African geography, and to our admiration of the indefatigable explorer. The thought of the hardships and toils which yet await him cannot but heighten our feelings of regret and disappointment that the expedition sent out from home at so much expense, and with such abundant promises, for his relief and support should have ended in so abortive a fashion. To the question of the responsibility incurred by those entrusted with this mission we may find occasion to refer hereafter, when the arrival of Lieutenant Dawson shall have put us in possession of all which that officer has to urge on behalf of himself or his comrades. In the meantime it is only fair to bear in mind the message conveyed to them by Mr. Stanley, that Livingstone wished all relief expeditions to be turned back; that he wanted no companions; and that he was amply supplied with stores—expressions which are fully borne out by his dispatch of February 20. Much blame has been thrown upon Mr. Stanley, apart from the amazing story about the commission for slave-chains, for his keeping back from the members of the Relief Expedition, and from Her Majesty's Consul, all information concerning his own or Livingstone's travels, besides supplanting his tried and faithful friend Dr. Kirk in the confidence of the great traveller. It was naturally with great pain that these gentlemen found the American Correspondent entrusted with Livingstone's despatches and letters home, as well as with the sending of fifty men with stores and arms for his relief. Not a little of this feeling has diffused itself at home, and doubtless found expression—strengthened it may be by what was deemed to savour of exaggeration, egotism, or love of sensational display in the address of Friday—in the unpleasant episode of Saturday evening's speech. Let it be borne in mind, however, what Mr. Stanley's functions and mission really were. His first duty was to his employers. As a newspaper Correspondent of the interviewing class, he fulfilled that duty with courage, resolution, and address. Charged with the interests of the New York Herald, he could hardly do otherwise than keep for the use, in the first instance, of that journal, the valuable matter which he had accumulated at so liberal and so heavy an expense to the proprietors. It must be annoying to the Geographical Society and its emissaries, as well as to the British public itself, to be forestalled in an enterprise so ably planned and so dear to the national heart as that for the discovery and relief of the missing traveller. Still, it would be unworthy of the nation, and even petty on the part of the representatives of geographical science, were feelings such as these suffered to detract from the meed of praise and thanks which is justly due to one who was in reality the first in the recovery and aid of Livingstone.

A PARISIAN SENSATION.

THE French, or at least the Parisians, notwithstanding the dangers which still threaten, seem to be enjoying their political holiday with a light heart. It is natural enough that an Assembly which persists in sitting at Versailles should not be an object of enthusiasm to the inhabitants of the alighted capital; and Parliamentary debates, even at their best, are dull reading. Now and then there is a smart shower of epigrams in the Chamber, or a Minister dignifies an adversary by a neat riposte; and it is probably one of the secrets of M. Thiers's hold upon his countrymen that he is invariably amusing. His facts may be imaginary, his logic obviously false, but at least he is sure to be lively and entertaining, even on questions of taxes and tariffs. As a rule, however, politics are rather tiresome, and the Parisians evidently feel that for the present, at any rate, they have had enough of an unpalatable dose, and have plunged gladly into social philosophy. M. Dumas showed characteristic adroitness in launching his recent pamphlet at the right moment, when the public was sick of political controversy and eager for a change. At first sight it might seem that the right of a husband to slay an unfaithful wife with his own hands was a subject which would be soon exhausted. But this has not proved to be the case. Not only has L'Homme-femme had an enormous circulation, but it has called forth quite a library of other pamphlets bearing on the same subject. It must be assumed that this kind of literature is popular, or it would not be produced in such profusion. If these had been still the days of the Empire, it would no doubt have been suggested that the Government had a finger in the matter, and was not sorry to see attention distracted from burning political questions to social problems which did not affect the stability of the dynasty. But there is no reason to suppose that M. Thiers is in league with M. Dumas, or has taken any part in fomenting the controversy. The most curious contribution to this body of literature is that of the Figaro. A week ago it published a long report, filling some three or four columns, of a trial for murder which was said to have just taken place in Corsica. The evidence of witnesses, the speeches of counsel, the remarks of the Court, the exclamations of the accused, were all given in the most circumstantial way. The scene of the trial was laid in the Assize Court of Bastia, in Corsica. The prisoner, Lucia Medelli, was described as a young, high-born, and beautiful woman, and she was charged with killing her husband in revenge for his infidelity. The marriage had been one of love, and for several years she and her husband had enjoyed a life of perfect happiness. She was passionately attached to him; but after a time he became cold and indifferent, and treated her, not only with neglect, but insult. He was at no pains to conceal his reckless gallantries, and at last carried his outrages so far as to commence a liaison with her maid under the domestic roof. The wretched wife in vain resorted to entreaty and remonstrance. At last, in a fit of despair, she shot her husband dead, by the side of his paramour. All this was told with names and dates and abundance of minute detail. The acte d'accusation was set forth in the usual style. The prisoner, when questioned by the Judge, admitted the murder, but pleaded that it was her love for her husband which had led her to kill him. Her counsel reminded the jury that all persons were equal before the law, men and women alike, that sex made no difference, and that it was their duty to treat his client just as they would treat a man who was placed before them on a similar charge. The killing of a husband by a wife was not a greater crime than the killing of a wife by a husband; and he put it to the conscience of the jury to say whether they would not at once have acquitted a husband who, in vindication of his honour, had slain his guilty spouse. The jury immediately returned a unanimous verdict of "Not Guilty," which was received with a burst of applause.

The report of this trial, appearing just at the moment when everybody was talking of M. Dumas's pamphlet, and illustrating, as it seemed to do, in a practical form the converse of his proposition, naturally excited much interest. The story found its way in different shapes into other papers, and at last one journal, reputed to be M. Gambetta's organ, bolder than the rest, published a version of the case in a letter headed "From Our Special Correspondent at Bastia." The next day the Figaro announced that its own report was a pure fiction from beginning to end; that there was no Assize Court at Bastia, and that Lucia Medelli and the rest of the characters were only the creations of the writer's ingenious brain. "The narrative," it stated, "is entirely imaginative; our Correspondent, René de Pont-Jest, merely wished to treat the question of the day in a form familiar to him." He had for some time been engaged in reporting judicial proceedings at Versailles and elsewhere, and he thought he could throw his ideas into a striking and effective form if he drew up an account of an imaginary trial. Those who believe that the press reflects the character of its readers will probably discover a painful significance in an incident of this kind. It must be remembered that this is not the first occasion on which the Figaro has indulged in practical jokes of a similar character. In the last months of the Second Empire, when the proprietor thought he had not been well treated by the Government, he published a number of the paper purporting to be written by violent Republicans, as a hint that the Figaro might, under provocation, adopt this as its regular tone. And for a few hours Paris had a sensation after its own heart. There is an ingenious passage in one of M. Taine's letters on England in which he complains of the hard, dry, matter-of-fact news published by the English newspapers. In Paris, he remarked, this would never be tolerated. No editor would dream of printing anything without first dressing it up artistically, and making a pretty story of it. Between trimming a genuine narrative and inventing a fictitious one is, after all, only a step, and it is a step which is soon taken. When once it has got to be understood that the newspapers are bound day after day to supply their readers with startling or amusing legends, and that it is no justification for a dull story that it happens to be true, we can hardly be surprised if a clever and audacious writer should be tempted to carry the artistic process a little farther back, and, instead of merely touching up a piece of news, should begin by inventing it altogether. It may be said that the Figaro in this instance had no intention to spread false news; that it merely indulged in a rather reckless jest. But the sort of news which was published by the Figaro and other journals during the war has not been forgotten, and it is hardly possible to take up any of the ordinary Parisian sheets without coming across numerous paragraphs which have evidently been concocted solely with a view to effect. The responsibility for tricks of this kind lies between the journalist and his readers. It is tolerably certain that he would not venture to sport with their confidence in his truthfulness if he had reason to suppose that truth had any value in their eyes. M. Thiers has a favourite theory as to the superiority, from the historian's point of view, of what he calls l'intelligence des faits over the facts themselves, and his countrymen are evidently not indisposed to agree with him on this point. The rise of a sober, truthful press would be one of the most hopeful symptoms of the regeneration of France.

As for the controversy which has been stirred up by M. Dumas's nonsensical and claptrap pamphlet, we must confess that we have no desire to go to the bottom of it, especially after reading some of the rejoinders which it has called forth, and which certainly go to a somewhat startling depth. We incline to the old-fashioned notion that there are some subjects which it is just as well not to probe too deeply, especially in a popular discussion. The advocates of women's rights have not neglected the opportunity of putting in a word, and their attack on French husbands is more vigorous than savoury. If the question which M. Dumas has raised is, as he would have us believe, a familiar one in French households, it may readily be believed that the blame does not rest exclusively on one sex. The artificial seclusion and restraint of French girls on the one hand, and the profligate character of many French husbands on the other, supply the conditions of inevitable domestic misery. It is simply impossible that a society could hold together in which the practices that form the monotonous theme of French plays and novels were really prevalent to the extent suggested. But the mere direction of the mind so constantly upon such subjects is in itself a sign of a grave moral epidemic. There could hardly be anything more characteristic of the views of French society than that strange rule in the unwritten code of manners, that no unmarried girl can be seen without loss of character at the Palais Royal Theatre, while a married woman, even the wife of a month or a year, is at liberty to revel at pleasure in the unequivocal indecency of the performance. The writer of a pamphlet entitled Eve contre M. Dumas fils protests against what she calls the foolish convention that well-bred women are absolutely free from the passions of humanity, and that they can be passed through the furnace of suggestion and temptation without being the worse for it. A relish for the dramatic analysis of the morbid psychology of illicit passion such as is presented in M. Dumas's Une Visite de Noë indicates a state of mind which can hardly fail to be productive of bad social results. It appears that the L'Homme-femme question has now found its way to the stage. A Correspondent of the Times mentions that at the Variétés a sort of lecture is delivered every night, called "Ne la tue pas," in which the fun is of the broadest kind; while another farce, on the same theme, called Tue-la, has proved highly attractive at the Palais Royal. The popularity of the controversy in this form is perhaps a sufficient indication of the kind of social atmosphere in which such things are possible.

OUR FOOD PROSPECTS.

EXCEPTIONAL anxiety has been felt this year, and with very good reason, by all classes of the community as to the prices which will have to be paid in the coming winter to the producers of our chief articles of food, whether natives or foreigners. The sudden rise which has taken place from various causes in the price of coal, that most important element in the comfort and in the expenditure of an English family, has had not a little to do with the sort of panic that has taken hold of the domestic mind. It has suggested, in combination with other matters, the fear that the winter which approaches may prove a hard one, and hard, not perhaps on account of the inclemency of the weather, but because of the pinching and starving that may have to be endured from the scarcity and dearness of food. There has, too, been an uncomfortable feeling abroad, more perhaps in commercial circles than elsewhere, that we are following paths in some of our great manufacturing industries which may be marked as dangerous; and there has been the conviction in cautious minds that a collapse as sudden as the inflation has been great in the prosperity of not a few chief branches of trade may only too easily be brought about by such a calamity as a bad harvest. The late frosts in the spring, the broken summer, the abnormally large rainfall of the year, sufficiently justified the apprehension that the grain crop must be a bad one, and that dear bread must be the lot of the people; while the constantly repeated accounts of the ravages of the "foot and mouth" disease, and lately the reports of cattle-plague at the nearest German port, and indeed amongst the cattle at our Northern ports imported from it, have almost reconciled the public to the weekly increase of their butchers' bills. As to the corn crops, there is no doubt that last week while the rain continued they were in the utmost peril; but fortunately the wet weather passed away in the very nick of time, and with it much of the gloomy foreboding which prevailed; and now, with perfect harvest weather, we are able to consider our food prospects for the coming year in a comparatively cheerful and hopeful frame of mind.

There are no means available by which the annual consumption of meat in this country can be accurately or even approximately ascertained. The agricultural statistics supply us with the number of animals in existence in the country on a given day in the year, and roughly distinguish, in the case of cattle, between those reserved for breeding purposes and for consumption, and also between those above and under two years of age, the time when they may be deemed fit for the butcher, and, in the case of sheep, between those above and those under one year old. But it is impossible to ascertain how many animals actually find their way to market in any one year, or the weight of them when slaughtered; and although we can learn from the Board of Trade accounts of imports the number brought into the country, there is no information as to whether they are poor or fat, nor is it possible to make a trustworthy estimate of their weight. It follows that there are no means of ascertaining by comparison the increase of consumption at the present time over that of any bygone period. Thus much, however, is clear, that the consumption of meat in England has increased in a ratio far larger than its production, in spite of the improvement in breeds which has provided us with larger animals, developing at an earlier age than at any former period, in spite of improved methods of feeding which enable a skilful manager to send a greater weight of meat to market from his farm in a given space of time by the employment of materials not produced on the farm, and in spite also of importation from all neighbouring countries of the stock which, attracted by our high prices, they are willing to spare to us. It was hoped that the enormous herds of South America might supply us with frames which our feeders might cover with excellent meat; but, although the adventurers appear to have conducted the experiment of importing cattle from that continent judiciously as regards the means adopted for carrying it out, insuperable difficulties conquered them. Australian preserved meats are slowly making their way, but it is evident that for many years to come they can count for only a small proportion of the whole demand of the country. No doubt successive dry seasons have reduced our home supply of meat, especially of mutton, and it is to be hoped that the comparatively rainy seasons of 1871 and 1872 may be found to have encouraged breeders again to increase their stocks to the numbers attained in 1868. But even if this be the case, it will be more than a year before the increase could tell on the supply; and meanwhile, if England maintains her present condition of prosperity, the increase of consumption will again have overtaken any possible increase of supply. The position appears to be such that, as it is impossible to reckon on larger supplies, the only hope of a reduction in price must lie in reduction of consumption. Some reduction will be effected, no doubt, by the exercise of an economy which is rendered absolutely necessary in families of the middle class in order to make both ends meet. In large establishments of the wealthy classes it is hopeless to expect domestic servants to exercise any self-denial, and meat will continue to be eaten at three or four meals a day; among the lower labouring class, whose wages have not increased in nearly the same ratio as those of the skilled artisan, the cost of meat will forbid even the occasional use of it; but so long as the existing prosperity of the great trades enables skilled workmen to exact their own terms, and those terms include a large rate of wages, it must be expected that the workmen will continue to require a large supply of meat for their families, whatever its price may be. It is they who have recently become great consumers of meat, and it is, in a great measure, the new demand created by them that has rendered our supplies inadequate to the wants of the country. Unfortunately, too, the women of this class are unskilled for the most part in cooking, and consequently waste increases the quantity of meat which is thus used up. Until we can see some reason to believe that the purchasing power of this class of the community is likely to be reduced, we fear that it is hopeless to expect any important diminution in the price of meat. All that can be done is to take care that the butcher does not tax the commodity too heavily by undue profits. It is satisfactory, however, to know that farmers were never more abundantly supplied with provender, and that they, or at least those of them who have a stock of animals, will reap profits of which, if report speaks truly, they stand somewhat in need.

As to bread, there seems to be sufficient ground to enable us to prophesy smoother things. But although, while we write, the weather is all that can be desired for harvest, yet the crop of grain is by no means as yet out of jeopardy. Assuming, however, the continuance of sunshine, it may be expected that wheat, and therefore bread, will be cheaper for the next twelve months than it has been during those just ending. Not, indeed, because there is a large crop, or a crop of good quality, in England, for all authorities appear to agree that there is neither one nor the other. The plant was rather thin, the ears small rather than large, and not always well filled; though, on the other hand, the plant was everywhere tolerably regular. But bad weather during the blooming season had the effect of leaving blank places in the ears, while the violent storms of July and August laid large breadths of the standing crop, which produced in consequence lean berries instead of plump ones, and the subsequent damp rainy weeks produced mildew and other diseases damaging to the grain. Some early wheats, and among them much of the finer qualities, began to sprout in the fields, and much that did not sprout will have been discoloured. The Gardener's Chronicle, in publishing its annual reports from 262 correspondents distributed over the country—of whom 135 estimate the crop to be an average one, while 98 put it below, and 29 above an average—remarks that since these letters were written the weather has been unfavourable and the estimates are probably too high; and, taking into consideration that the most important corn-growing districts send a large proportion of unfavourable estimates, it is feared "that it must be concluded that wheat will not yield an average return nor barley a full one; oats, and beans, and pease, on the other hand, are unusually good." It has also been reported that upon thrashing farmers find that the yield does not come up to their anticipations, while many samples leave much to be desired in point of quality. It seems, therefore, a conclusion not to be resisted, that our home crop is not equal to an average one in point of quantity or quality. Thirty years ago this state of things would immediately have rendered a higher range of prices certain, but now the development of the trade in grain since the abolition of the Corn-laws, and the facility of communication of remote districts in either hemisphere with the sea-board by railways, free us from apprehension of high prices if we can learn that some other countries have good crops. If several corn-growing countries have good crops, we may look for moderate prices even if England has a bad one. America and Russia alone can supply our deficiency, if other nations grow enough for themselves. For several years France has had poor crops, and has competed with us as a purchaser in foreign markets, at the same time buying our home-grown wheat in our own market. This year, however, France has the most exceptional abundance, and instead of drawing away from us part of the exports of other countries, will send us, according to trustworthy accounts, about one-fourth of what we are likely to need. Germany also will be able to spare no inconsiderable quantity, while America and Russia, with no other market than our own open to receive any of their surplus, will have to compete with France for English gold. California is said to have a prodigious yield of wheat, though the Eastern States of North America have a less crop than last season. The Russian districts have not uniformly good crops, but still, on the whole, they will send their usual large supplies. To sum up the whole matter—We have a crop, probably inferior to that of 1871, which was estimated to be from ten to twenty per cent. short of an average. America, from the Atlantic and Pacific together, may be expected to send us as much as last year; Russia about the same; Germany probably more; plus in each case what those countries sent to France last year. France will send us perhaps a fourth of our whole imports, and will not take anything from us. Of other sources of supply, such as the Danube, Egypt, Chili, Australia, &c., we cannot speak with certainty. We may reckon on having all the spare corn of the world poured into our ports, and we know that the crops are fairly good. We shall receive certainly more than we received last year, probably considerably more; and as there is no reason to anticipate a largely increased consumption, prices may be expected to decline. A bad potato crop, however, requires a supplement of bread, and the disease is said to have shown itself in this root over a large extent of country. The contingency of a larger bread supply being required on this account should not therefore be omitted from the calculation. If stock farmers may be expected to do well, corn farmers will have a bad time, as they will have to sell an indifferent crop of wheat at low prices. The public must content themselves with the hope of being able to set their saving in cheap bread against their loss on dear meat.

THE EPICENE SEX.

THERE has always been in the world a kind of women whom one scarcely knows how to classify as to sex; men by their instincts, women by their form, but neither men nor women as we regard either in the ideal. In early times they were divided into two classes; the Amazons who, donning helmet and cuirass, went to the wars that they might be with their lovers, or perhaps only for the masculine liking for rough work; and the tribe of ancient women, so withered and so wild, who should be women, yet whose boards forbade men so to account them, and for whom public opinion usually closed the controversy by declaring that they were witches—that is, creatures so unlike the rightful women of nature that only the devil himself was supposed to be answerable for them. These particular manifestations have long since passed away, and we have nowadays neither Amazons learning the goose step in our barrack-yards, nor witches brewing hell-broth on Scottish moors; but we have the epicene sex all the same—women who would defy the strictest social Cuvier among us to classify them, but who are growing daily into more importance, and making continually fresh strides in their unwholesome way.

Possessed by a restless discontent with their appointed work, and fired with a mad desire to dabble in all things unsexually, which they call ambition; blasphemous to the sweetest virtues of their sex, which until now have been accounted both their own pride and the safeguard of society; holding it no honour to be reticent, unselfish, patient, obedient, but swaggering to the front ready to try conclusions in aggression, in selfishness, in insolent disregard of duty, in cynical abasement of modesty, with the hardest and least estimable of the men they emulate—these women of the doubtful gender have managed to drop all their own special graces while unable to gather up any of the more valuable virtues of men. They are no more philosophical than the most inconsequent sister who judges all things according to her feelings, and commands or condemns principles as she happens to like or dislike the persons advocating them; and they are as hysterical and intemperate in their political cries as if the whole world wagged by impulse only. They are no more magnanimous under rebuke than the staunchest advocate of the sacredness of sex, but resent all hostile criticism as passionately, and from grounds as merely personal, as if they were still shrouded from public blame by the safety of their privacy; and they are as little useful in their blatant energy as when they spent their days in working monstrous patterns in crude-coloured wools, or found spiritual satisfaction in cutting holes in strips of calico to sew up again with a new stitch. They have committed the mistake of abandoning such work as they can do well, while trying to manipulate things which they touch only to spoil; they have ceased to be women, and not learnt to be men; they have thrown aside beauty, and not put on strength.

The latest development of the impulses which animate the epicene sex has taken its expression in after-dinner oratory. If we were as malicious to women as those whose follies we rebuke would have the world believe, we should encourage them to fight it out with womanly modesty and the world's esteem on this line. Their worst enemies could not wish to see them inflict on themselves a greater annoyance than the obligation of getting on their legs after the cheese has been removed, to turn on a stream of verbal insipidity for a quarter of an hour at a stretch. None but men who have something to say on the subject that may be in hand, and so are glad of every opportunity no matter how unsatisfactory, or men who are eaten up with vanity, take pleasure in speechifying after dinner. Its uselessness is apparent; its mock hilarity is ghastly; even at political "banquets," when words are supposed to have some deep meaning, we get very little reality in it; while all the funny part of the business is of the dreariest comedy, the most distracting pretence imaginable. If anything were wanting to show how much vanity prompts a certain class of women in their ways and works, and how tremendous their passion for notoriety and personal display, it would be this assumption of the functions of the post-prandial orator. Indeed they have taken greatly of late to public speaking all round; and some among them seem only easy when they are standing before a crowd, to be admired if they are pretty, applauded if they are pert, and, in any case, the centre of attraction for the moment. We do not look forward with pleasure to the time when ladies will rise after their champagne and port, with flushed cheeks and eyes more bright than beautiful, steadying themselves adroitly against the back of their chairs, and rolling out either those interminable periods with no nominatives and no climax, under which we have all so often suffered, or spasmodically jerking forth a few unconnected sentences of which the sole merit is their brevity. In the beginning of things, when the wedge has to be introduced, only the best of its kind puts itself forward; and doubtless the ladies who have already varied the usual dull routine of after-dinner oratory by their livelier utterances have done the thing comparatively well, and avoided a breakdown; but we own that we tremble at the thought of the flood of feminine eloquence which will be let loose if the fashion spreads. Fancy the heavy British matron rearing her ample shoulders above the board, as she lays down the law on the duties of men towards women—especially sons-in-law—and the advantage to all concerned if wives are liberally dealt with in the matter of housekeeping money, and let to go their own way without marital hindrance. Or think of the woman's-rights woman, with her hybrid costume and her hard face, showing society how it can be saved from destruction only by throwing the balance of power into the hands of women, and swamping that rude, rough, masculine element which has so long mismanaged matters by the nobler and brighter instincts of the oppressed sex. Or even think of the coquettish and alluring little woman getting up before a crowd of men and firing off the neatest and smartest park of verbal artillery possible, every shot of which tells and is applauded to the echo. How will men take it all? For ourselves, having too sincere a respect for women as they ought to be, and as nature meant them to be, we do not wish to see them turned into social buffoons, the mark for jeering comments and angry hisses when what they say displeases their hearers, and told to "sit down," and "shut up," with entreaties to some strong man to "take them out of that and carry them home to the nursery," by a hundred voices roughened with drink and shouting. But if women expect that hostile feelings and opinions will be tamed or altogether suppressed in their honour because they choose to thrust themselves where they have no business, they will find out their mistake, perhaps when too late. If they abandon their safe cover and come out into the open, they must look to be hit like the rest. We cannot too often repeat that if they will mingle in the specialities of men's lives, they must put up with men's treatment, and not cry out when they are struck home. In deference to them plain-speaking has been banished from the drawing-rooms of society; but it is too much to expect men to sit under heavy boredom or fatuous gobble without winking, and it is childish to ask us to make a free gift of our truth and time to women who outrage one and waste the other. On the other hand, the cheers that would follow if they hit the humour of the hour, or if, being specially pretty or specially smart, they afforded so much more excitement to the guests, would to our minds be just as offensive as the rougher truth, and perhaps more so. The leering approbation of men never over-nice in thought and now heated with wine, such as are always to be found at public dinners, is an infliction from which we should have imagined any woman with purity or self-respect would shrink with shame and dismay. But women who take to after-dinner speeches cannot be expected to be fastidious.

Perhaps it is asking too much of women of this kind to suppose that they will consider themselves in relation to men's liking. They profess to despise the unmaelike animal they are so fond of imitating, and to be careless of his liking, holding it a matter of supreme indifference whether they are to his taste or not. But it may be as well to say plainly that the disgust which we may presume the normal healthy woman feels for men who paint and pad and wear stays and work Berlin work—men who give their minds to chignons and costumes, who spy after their maids' love-letters, and watch their boys as cats watch mice—men who occupy themselves with domestic details they should know nothing about, who look after the baby's pap-boat and the cinders in the dust-heap, and can call the various articles of household linen by their proper names—the disgust which the womanly woman feels for men is exactly that which the manly man feels for the epicene sex. Hard, unblushing, unloving women, whose ideal of happiness lies in swagger and notoriety, who hate home life and despise home virtues, who have no tender regard for men and no instinctive love for children, who despise the modesty of sex as they deny its natural fitness—these women have worse than no charm for men, and their place in the human family seems to us altogether a mistake. If there were any special work which they could do better than manly men or feminine women, we could understand their economic uses, and accept them as perhaps not lovely outgrowths of a natural law, but at least as necessary and natural. But they are not wanted. They simply disgust men, and mislead women; and those women whom they do not mislead in their own direction they often influence too strongly in the other direction by way of reaction, rendering them sickly in their sweetness, and weak rather than womanly. If the interlacing margins of certain things are lovely, as colours that blend together are more harmonious than those which are crudely distinct, it is not so with the interlacing margin of sex. Let men be men, and women women, sharply, unmistakably defined; but to have an ambiguous sex which is neither the one nor the other, possessing the coarser passions and instincts of men without their strength or better judgment, and the position and privileges of women without their tenderness, their sense of duty, or their modesty, is a state of things that we should like to see abolished by public opinion, which alone can touch it.

ARCHBISHOP TAIT ON HEATHENISM.

OUR readers will hardly need to be reminded that the ill success of missionary enterprise has been a favourite topic of ridicule, at the expense of Christianity, not only with infidels, but with what is technically called "the world." And the fact, however it be interpreted or applied, is no doubt a sufficiently startling one, whether viewed in reference to Scriptural prophecies and commands, or to the vast expenditure of money and personal devotion which has been, we had almost said, wasted on so unproductive a field of labour. Roman Catholic missionaries have confessedly been the most successful, as might have been anticipated, if only from their much more effective organization; yet even their successes have been but short-lived and fragmentary as compared with the huge mass of untouched heathenism, including considerably over two-thirds of the human race. And Protestant missions have been very generally failures, although this country expends annually very large sums on the various missionary societies, as well Dissenting as Anglican. A good many reasons for the striking contrast between the achievements of the ancient, or mediæval, and the present Church in this particular might no doubt be found; but one principal difficulty in the way of our modern apostles of every sect is clearly attributable to the diversity of rival systems, all claiming to represent the pure Gospel, between which their catechumens are called to choose. "S. B. Thákûr," to whom we shall have to refer again presently, tells us plainly that the warfare of Christian sects is a matter of merriment to himself and other educated heathens. And the effect of this rivalry on the heathen mind was almost grotesquely exemplified when King Radama of Madagascar, after oscillating a whole year between the conflicting pretensions of his Protestant and Catholic teachers, died unbaptized, and each party at once charged the other with having poisoned him. However, we are not going to enter here on a discussion of the causes of missionary failures. The fact is patent, and has naturally been the subject of frequent comment, as well from a sympathetic as from a hostile point of view. It was left, however, for the Archbishop of Canterbury the other day, when speaking at a meeting of the Propagation of the Gospel Society at Carlisle, to put the matter in a new and alarming light, by suggesting as a clenching motive for renewed energy in the work of conversion that, "unless we take some steps, instead of our converting the heathen, the heathen will be converting us." His Grace has been severely taken to task in some quarters for the line he has adopted on the vexed question of the Athanasian Creed, and he may have been desirous to make it clear that he is not altogether indifferent to the importance of dogmatic belief. Be this as it may, he has, as we observed, put the question in quite a new light, and his utterances appear to have considerably disturbed the equanimity of the "Heathen Chinee," whom he evidently thought safe game for the discharge of his double-barrelled gun, if we may judge from the indignant rejoinders of "Ardesheer B. Kapadia," and "S. B. Thākūr," which figured on the following day in the columns of the Times. But first let us briefly recapitulate the gist of his Grace's remarks.

The Archbishop started from the obvious consideration that travelling is now so much easier and so much more general than in the days of our grandfathers, that all sorts of strange specimens of humanity, which they could never have witnessed without a pilgrimage to distant lands, are now continually on view in our own metropolis. A single day's walk through the streets of London will afford spectacles which ought abundantly to stir up men's zeal for missionary enterprise. We confess our first impression was that he was about to call attention to the huge mass of moral heathenism to be found among the nominal subjects of his former diocesan jurisdiction, which might certainly suggest a tolerably practical comment on the evils of religious ignorance and unbelief. He proceeds, however, to direct attention to a phenomenon which, if not more impressive, is more conspicuous to the naked eye. If you gaze in one direction you see half-a-dozen carriages conveying the Burmese Ambassadors to Her Majesty's levee, "absolute heathens, who have come to do their homage to the greatness of England." If you go to the Temple, you may find some sixty Hindoos, "heathens in the centre of English civilization," among its members. The number, the Archbishop's critics tell us, should be reduced to twenty. At the East End you find Chinamen smoking opium, and a whole troupe of Japanese. In short, "in our own metropolis we are brought so near heathenism of the worst class"—this seems to be the expression which especially sticks in the throat of "S. B. Thākūr"—"that unless we take some steps, instead of our converting the heathen, the heathen will be converting us." This, the Archbishop adds, is no imaginary idea, for the proximity of the East has infected the philosophy on which the young men in our seminaries feed, and men of learning, from coming into contact with disbelievers in Christianity, have grown more tolerant of its denial, while heathen systems are even finding an echo in the literature and philosophy of this Christian land. It is hard enough to learn that converts are being made from Christianity to Mahometanism in Cape Colony—not there only we are afraid—but it would be far worse to find the influx of heathens into London making converts here. Such is the statement, and we confess there is nothing in it that strikes us as particularly irrational or intolerant. How far the Archbishop was right about the influence of Eastern philosophy on modern English thought we are hardly prepared to say. That there is a school of writers among us whose ideas approximate more closely to a Pagan than to a Christian standard of ethics is true enough, and there are not wanting symptoms among the youth of our seminaries and elsewhere of the approximation being not wholly ideal. But we should have thought that Mr. Swinburne, for instance, drew his inspiration, like the poets and litterati of the Renaissance, rather from ancient classical authorities than from China or Hindustan. It is, however, only to be expected that personal contact with various forms of more or less civilized heathenism will have a tendency to diminish any abstract feeling of repugnance, just as there was a marked difference between the feeling of the earlier and of the later Crusaders towards their infidel antagonists; and the moral results of such contact, so far as they go, are exceedingly unlikely to be beneficial. Such, however, is not at all the view of the two distinguished foreigners with whose names we are ashamed to have to confess ourselves previously unacquainted, who have taken up the cudgels on behalf of the calumniated "heathen" against "the High Priest of the Established Church."

Of the two correspondents the first is perhaps the more argumentative, and the second the more abusive, though both of them argue, and neither of them is superfluously polite. We will take "Ardesheer B. Kapadia" first. He begins with a significant allusion to people who are paid for propagating beliefs which they do not themselves believe in, and then makes a direct home thrust by accusing "the High Priest" of propounding opinions "equally remarkable for their inaccuracy and want of Christian charity," which reminds one strongly of the popular indictment against the Athanasian Creed. It is hardly worth while to wrangle over the objects of the Burmese envoys in visiting England, or the precise number of Hindoo students at the Temple, inasmuch as the Archbishop's inaccurate figures do not in the least affect his argument. When, however, his assailant proceeds to dwell on the transitional state of the Indian mind, and the rapid moral and intellectual advance in India which is the product of a liberal education, we do not quite follow him in his inference, "that the religious belief (if by religious belief is meant a system which inculcates doctrines of a future life, charity, &c.) of the so-called heathens is as enlightened as that professed (but not implicitly followed) by the class whose views are echoed by the Archbishop." Indeed we are not sure that we exactly catch his meaning. It is surely not irrelevant to remark that the liberal education in India to which such salutary effects are attributed is the work of a Christian Government, and that "the doctrines of a future life, charity, &c."—to whatever extent they prevail—may not improbably be in great measure traced to Christian influences too. The last new religion of India is reported to be "the unity of God and good morals;" but then there are unfortunate diversities of opinion as to what is meant by God, and what is meant by morality, which somewhat mar the practical efficacy of this short and simple creed. However, "Ardesheer B. Kapadia" seems disposed to stake the relative value of different religions on a single issue. "These heathens," he tells us, "have toleration for their fundamental creed," and history teaches "that no religion can be considered enlightened which is not tolerant"—two propositions which he apparently fails to perceive are not quite identical. And he winds up by complaining that the Archbishop allows toleration no place in Christianity, and informing his Grace that it is as unlikely for the heathens of London to embrace his belief "as for Mr. Stuart Mill or Professor Tyndall to believe in the commonly received forms of Protestantism." "S. B. Thākūr" in like manner complains of people being called heathen of the worst class "for adopting the views of celebrities like Mr. Mill, Mr. Spencer, Mr. Darwin, Professor Huxley, &c." As no one suspects any of these "celebrities" of believing in the commonly received forms of Catholicism, we can only suppose it is meant to be implied that they have reached a perfection of toleration and enlightenment which supersedes every form of Christianity, and that the Archbishop would do well to emulate so distinguished an example. That, however, is a personal matter which does not concern us here. What does seem rather hard is that every religious system should be set down as intolerant which does not make toleration its "fundamental creed." And this is, in fact, the text of "S. B. Thākūr's" letter also, though he does not put it in exactly the same words as his fellow-heathen, "so called." Now we must confess ourselves to be so unenlightened as to doubt whether that is necessarily the best religion whose fundamental doctrine is that all religions are equally true, or at least equally useful. It is M. Huc, to the best of our recollection, who says in his Travels that it was a common form of salutation in China to ask a stranger "to what sublime form of religion he belonged," and, on his specifying his particular platform, to reply, "It is well, religions are many, reason is one." And a somewhat similar notion seems to have struck the Mikado of Japan, if it is true, as was reported the other day, that the Japanese Government has decided, "after careful consultation with the most noted exponents of every sect," to promulgate a new religion which "will be enlightened, simple, and adapted to common sense," and to which everybody will be compelled to conform. This syncretist form of faith might perhaps be worth the attention of our School Boards, and of the various Dissenting and other educational theorists who are themselves desirous, as the Bishop of Peterborough expressed it the other day, of manufacturing "a new religion." But we are not confident of its working so well even as "the commonly received forms of Protestantism," and the moral reputation of the Japanese is hardly such in all respects as to recommend an experiment "likely to meet the approval of all classes" in that country. Toleration is an excellent thing if it means that you are not to burn, hang, or otherwise maltreat your non-conforming neighbours. But a creed of which the fundamental article was the equal merit of all other beliefs would be too like a dietary made up of sugar-candy and rose-water.

There is one other point on which the Archbishop seems to us to be rather hardly dealt with by his assailants. They complain of his identifying Christianity with civilization, and they imply that heathen countries are not less civilized than Christian. This depends on whether civilization has any moral element, or, as Guizot expresses it, whether after all the human species is a mere ant-hill. We are not speaking of tribes like the North American Indians or the Hottentots, which seem incapable of surviving contact with civilized races, but we will take the most cultivated forms of heathenism, such as Mahometanism, which, strictly speaking, must rather be considered a Christian heresy, and what is the verdict of history? It has prevailed for about twelve centuries, and has made large conquests from Christianity, but in every country where it holds sway, in Turkey, in Asia, in Egypt, it has brought decay and demoralization in its train. Neither in the Mahometan, the Buddhist, nor the Brahminical systems are the true dignity of man, the sacredness of marriage, or the rights of personal freedom and of conscience consistently recognized. Everywhere infanticide is common, and woman is treated as a chattel. Buddhism, which dominates some four or five hundred millions of the world's inhabitants, holds out as the highest attainable perfection a state of otiose and unconscious passivity. Brahminism, which combines an abstract Pantheism with the grossest idolatry, knows no rights of man, but only of caste. As for the enlightened theism of which Keshub Chunder Sen has made himself the chief apostle, which is possibly what "Ardesheer B. Kapadia" means by the "doctrine of a future life, charity, &c.," it is as yet hardly on its trial, and, whatever be its value, is simply a mutilated plagiarism from Christianity, with a good many of the "etc.s" omitted. On the whole, we are not prepared, even under the distinguished sanction of "celebrities like Mr. Darwin and Professor Huxley," to welcome its introduction into England in place of the religion which our "so-called heathen" critics assure us it is impossible for them to embrace.

BAMBERG.

THE modern enlargement of Bavaria to the North has extended the dominion of the house of Wittelsbach over a crowd of spots of the highest interest in German history. Since the general overthrow of things there can be no doubt that the truest "Rex Francorum" has been he who reigns at Munich, though the title would have seemed strange if it had been applied to a Bavarian King who had assumed his kingship under the patronage of a Parisian "Emperor." The old Frankish land, with its hills, its rivers, its vineyards, its walled towns of every scale, from Ochsenfurt up to Nürnberg, was indeed a noble addition to the new-made realm, an addition which might even make up for those changes in geography by which the Bavaria of the modern map no longer, as of old, marches upon Lombardy. It is a land in which the change from even the last age to the present is forcibly brought home to us, when we see how many States, both principalities and commonwealths, which had a separate being within the memory of man, have been swallowed up to form one even among the secondary kingdoms of Europe. Among these the two Bishoprics of Würzburg and Bamberg and the free Imperial city of Nürnberg stand conspicuous. Of Würzburg, the seat of the episcopal Dukes of Francia, we spoke a year ago; a short journey bears us to the younger, but not less stately, seat of episcopal rule at Bamberg. The railway follows pretty closely—after the great bend of the stream at Schweinfurt it follows most closely—the upper course of the Main, till the point where, close below Bamberg, it receives the tributary waters of the Regnitz. The run through the Frankish hills reveals some object of interest at every step; here a height crowned by some happily ruined fortress; here a town which still keeps the walls which were once needed to guard it against those whom the fortress sheltered. There is Schweinfurt, with its walls, its long civic history, its memories alike of Olympia Morata and of Gustavus of Sweden; there is Hassfurt, with its walls and gates, the twin towers of its parish church, and the soaring choir of the knightly chapel; and a crowd of smaller places, each of which has its own interest and its own history. The journey may well end with the queen of all, with the city which a crowd of proverbs set forth as the glory of the Frankish land, episcopal and princely Bamberg itself. The higher part of the city, that which will first meet the eye of a traveller passing from Würzburg by Schweinfurt and Hassfurt, sends up a perfect diadem of towers, the crowns of the episcopal and abbatial ministers, while the houses of the city spread themselves far over the plain below. The great church stands on high, and yet Bamberg is not one of those cities which have grown out of primeval hill-forts. Neither is it a city which has grown up around the church of a bishopric or monastery. When we come to read its history, we find that the cathedral church which soars above the city is of later foundation than the city itself. So it is at Lincoln; but at Lincoln the minster was founded within the most ancient part of the city, and its foundation was one of the causes which made the city come down from the hill-top and spread itself over the lower ground. At Bamberg an exactly opposite process has taken place. The foundation of the cathedral church has caused the city to spread itself from the low ground on to the high. Bamberg belongs to the class of insular and peninsular cities. It may seem strange to compare a spot so far inland with a great haven of commerce; yet the position and history of Bamberg have much in common with those of Bristol. Bamberg is still a city of waters; streams and bridges meet us at every step; rows of picturesque houses line the shore in the less polished quarters of the city; the very Rathhaus floats on the water, and one of the bridges passes under its tower. The original town lies between the two arms of the Regnitz, as Bristol lies at the junction of the Avon and the Frome. It has spread itself over a flat suburb beyond the eastern arm, which, to follow out our Bristol parallel, answers to Redcliff and Bedminster, and at the other end it has spread itself beyond the western arm over the high ground answering to St. Augustine's and Clifton. And in both cases modern canals and docks, and changes in the natural course of the rivers, tend to increase the complication of the plan, and to make the watery element in the city yet more prominent. But it is not merely in their position, but in their history and in the results of their history, that Bamberg and Bristol have a likeness. In each case the spread of the city on to the higher ground has been caused or hastened by a great ecclesiastical foundation. At Bristol the Abbey of St. Augustine arose, and in the course of time became the cathedral church of a new diocese. Its place at Bamberg is filled by a crowd of ecclesiastical foundations, cathedral and abbey, collegiate and parochial churches, side by side. But in both cases the result has been the same. The church has sprung up on the higher ground, and the city has gone up after it.

In modern times Bamberg has become a Bavarian possession through the destruction of its ecclesiastical principality. Curiously enough, the gem of Frankensland was a Bavarian possession for a moment before that ecclesiastical principality was founded. The lordship of Babenberg—contracted into the later name of the city—had, after passing through several hands, come into the possession of Henry Duke of Bavaria, the sainted Emperor Henry the Second. Though his gift, in 1007, Bamberg became an episcopal see, with a diocese taken out of that of Würzburg, and the hill above the town, the seat of dominion of its earlier temporal lords, was covered with a crowd of holy places, grouped together as a kind of pattern card of the different classes of ecclesiastical foundatations. As early as 1012 the episcopal church, the church of St. Peter and St. George, was ready for consecration, and the account in the Annales et Notæ Bambergenses (Forts., xiv. 635) shows that what was consecrated was not a mere unfinished fragment, but a perfect church of the German type, with its choir and altar at each end. The chief altar at the west end ("altare occidentale, quod in eadem ecclesia precipuum est et principale") was hallowed by Eberhard, the first Bishop of the new see; the eastern altar ("altare orientale") by Erkenbald, Archbishop of Mainz, and a crowd of other altars by the Primates of Köln, Trier, Aquileia, Salzburg, Magdeburg, and "Aschericus Ungarorum Archiepiscopus." The fact is important, as showing that, though the building of a great church was often spread over many years, yet there were cases, like our own Canterbury under the hands of Lanfranc, perhaps our own Waltham under the hands of Harold, when such a work could be pushed on with great speed. But the church of Henry and Eberhard is no longer in being. The care of St. Otto, who, between 1102 and 1139, covered the church with sheets of copper as a defence against fire (Ebonis Vita Ottonis, ii. 17) was all in vain; in 1185 (Annales S. Petri in anno) church and city were burned. The present church is that which arose after this destruction, and, as its change of style shows, arose far more slowly than the original minster of Henry. We may express the difference by saying that the eastern apse with its towers—for the old plan is still preserved—is Romanesque with some slight signs of the approaching Gothic, while the western apse with its towers is Gothic with some slight traces of the departing Romanesque. Both fronts are rich and striking, but we greatly prefer the solidity of the two eastern towers to the western pair, which are in some degree frittered away, as at Leon. The inside is less satisfactory; the pointed arch never appears to less advantage than when it is set on a massive German square pier, without any attempt at artistic design. In monumental wealth few churches are richer. Not many minsters, even of the highest rank, can boast of the tombs of an Emperor and Empress, a Roman Pontiff, and a German King. In the midst of Bamberg nave, in a tomb of rich but late workmanship, rest the founder and his Empress, Henry and Kunigund, the pair who, like our own Edward and Edgyth, forsook their first duty in pursuit of a pretended sanctity. East and west lie two men of really higher fame. The western choir holds the tomb of Suidger of Bamberg, Clement of Rome, one of the virtuous Germans whom Henry the Third sent to reform the corrupted Papacy, and at whose hands he himself received the Imperial Crown. And in the crypt—a crypt of octagonal pillars, diversified by one column with a rich Corinthian capital—lies the crusading King, Conrad of Hohenstaufen, the uncle of the greater Frederick, who, for the good of his Empire, preferred his nephew to his son. Few Papal tombs are to be seen north of the Alps; few churches out of Bamberg can boast as their founder of one who was at once Saint and Emperor. But the union under one roof of a sainted Emperor and a Pope loyal alike to the Empire and to the Church makes the minster of St. Peter at Bamberg unique among the resting-places of the wielders of either sword.

But the zeal and bounty of the saintly Emperor did not stop at the foundation and endowment of the cathedral church. It would seem that, even in his days, the German Chapters had put on that character of disgraceful exclusiveness which made them a by-word down to the day of their fall. The church of St. Peter could receive none but men of noble birth among its members. But to provide for merit of lower degree, the Emperor founded, at no great distance from the episcopal church, on another of the five hills of Bamberg, the church of St. Stephen, also governed by the canonical rules, but to whose foundation persons of all ranks, and seemingly of both sexes, were admissible. The passage of the local writer Heimo (Jaffé, Monumenta Bambergensia 545) is worth quoting:—

In eodem loco extra urbem versus meridiem construxit ecclesiam in honore sancti Stephani protomartyris; ut, cum majori—scilicet sancti Petri et sancti Georgii—sole nobiles et eminentiores personas admittentur, hic minores et mulieres in Christi militum ordine canonico locum assumendi invenirent.

And for those who yearned after a stricter life than the canonical rule could supply, the Abbey of St. Michael and St. Benedict arose at the bidding of the Emperor on a third hill to the north of the cathedral church, so that the lower town of Bamberg could look up to three minsters all the work of the same Imperial founder. But St. Stephen's and St. Michael's have now but little left to remind us of the days of Henry. St. Stephen's has been rebuilt Jesuit fashion, all save a tower, seemingly of the fourteenth century, but which keeps the general air of a campanile of the eleventh, and whose pointed windows would seem more in place at Venice or Verona than at Bamberg. But the Michelsberg is still crowned by the great abbey church with its two spires, though its subordinate buildings have been first rebuilt and then applied to other uses. Some Romanesque work still remains at St. Michael's, not however of the days of Henry, but of the famous Bishop of the twelfth century, St. Otto, Bishop of Bamberg and Apostle of Pomerania, whose shrine and body still remain in the church which he reared. One picture, by a strange mixture of natural and spiritual genealogy, tells us both of the noble forefathers from whom Otto sprung, and of the bishoprics and monasteries which sprang from him. Other pictures set forth the various scenes of his apostolic life, a life which, written by two admiring biographers, will be found in the Bamberg collections of Jaffé. It is his memory which gives the greatest interest to the place, as the church is but of little architectural worth, the greater part being of a plain Pointed style without, and hopelessly Jesuited within. But the position is glorious, looking down on the city below and on the hills and plains of Frankland around.

These are the three creations of the canonized Augustus, standing side by side, each on its hill. Whether Henry and Kunigund dreamed of the days when a successor of Eberhard would rear a princely palace hard by the greatest of the three, still more that the successor of Eberhard should be at the same time the successor of Boniface, holding the sees of Mainz and Bamberg in plurality, may well be doubted. But the tale of the ecclesiastical foundations of Bamberg was not yet told. The Imperial foundations all stood on the heights. The sixth Bishop Günther, who sat from 1057 to 1063, turned his thoughts to the lower regions, and, through his bounty and that of a noble named Reinhold, another church, with its Provost, its Dean, and the other members of a German Chapter, arose in honour of St. Mary and St. Gengulf, beyond the city at the other end, beyond both the streams and both the bridges, in the quarter which, still carrying out our English parallel, answers to that of St. Mary Redcliff. The church, at least a later one on its site, survives, but, though St. Gengulf has two towers and St. Mary Redcliff has only one, in this case at least the Continental building can hardly venture to enter the lists with the insular one. The next Bishop Hermann returned to the heights by his own throne, and began the foundation of yet another collegiate church of St. James, which was finally consecrated by St. Otto in 1109. This is in some respects the most interesting of the churches of Bamberg. Its single remaining tower and its choir have been rebuilt, but the original nave and transepts are still there, the nave being a perfect basilica, with a long arcade resting on seven true columns on either side. Carve out the plain cushion capitals, and this nave might hold a place at Lucca; fill the void space between arcade and clerestory with mosaics, and it might hold a place in Ravenna itself. We are again reminded that we are within the dominions of a power which stretched from the one sea to the other when a church in the middle of Germany, consecrated by a Bishop who carried the word of life to the shores of the Baltic, reminds us at the first glance of the forms which we have seen by the Adriatic and the Tyrrhenian Sea.

Thus was Bamberg, as its local historian boasts, surrounded on every side, as in the form of a cross, with the churches and the patronage of saints ("Sic locus Bambergenis ecclesie et patrocinii sanctorum in modum crucis undique munitus"). But all these holy places stood without the original city; St. Gengulf beyond the river, the others on the heights. In the original peninsula there arose a few small monastic foundations of later date, as houses of Friars arose on the slopes of the upper city also, but the ecclesiastical greatness of Bamberg was all gathered outside of the original town. The central part of the city now contains only the single parish church of St. Martin, a building of the Jesuit style, while an upper parish church, with a choir of great stateliness, arose among the monastic and secular foundations on the hills. The whole make such a range as is seldom seen. To the ecclesiastical historian no range can be more interesting; the student of municipal history may perhaps be tempted to contrast episcopal Bamberg with civic Nürnberg, and to say that, even on their own ground, in the very raising of ecclesiastical buildings, the commonwealth outdid the Bishop, save when the Bishop was backed by an Emperor. Certain it is that, save the cathedral itself, no church in Bamberg can compare to St. Lawrence and St. Sebald at Nürnberg.

Let us add that the see of Bamberg, secularized in 1802, arose again in 1821 with lessened temporal, but with increased ecclesiastical, rank. St. Peter's is now a metropolitan church, and the Archbishop of Bamberg of the new foundation has as his suffragans the Bishops of the far more ancient sees of Speier, Eichstätt, and Bamberg's own parent Würzburg. In nothing has the world been more thoroughly turned upside down than in German ecclesiastical geography.

BRIGHTON LIONS.

THERE would seem to be something in the air of fashionable watering-places unfavourable to the prolonged residence of distinguished visitors. It is not that the air itself does not agree with them, but that it has an effect on other people very detrimental to their comfort. We learn from the French papers that M. Thiers has been much distressed at Trouville by the too demonstrative attentions of a number of persons who appear to have made their escape from the lunatic asylums in which they were confined expressly for the purpose of paying their respects to the President of the Republic. One of M. Thiers's admirers, who is popularly known as the "Fou de Trouville," has obtained the distinction of being arrested on account of his invidious admiration for the saviour of France for the time being. But Brighton in this respect is hardly better than Trouville. The two lions of the British Association, Mr. Stanley and the Emperor Napoleon, have both been put to flight. Mr. Stanley, while narrating some of his adventures at a dinner party, heard, or fancied he heard, a titter at one end of the room, and immediately rushed off, and took the next train to London. It may perhaps seem surprising that a traveller who has successfully encountered the dangers and miseries of African travel should be so morbidly sensitive to the snar of criticism. It may be some consolation to Mr. Stanley to be reminded that he is not the only great traveller whose tales have not been received with immediate and implicit credence. There is a passage in Boswell's Life of Johnson with regard to Bruce, the Abyssinian explorer, which should convince Mr. Stanley that it is certainly not because he is an American that he has been subjected to a style of criticism which he finds unpleasant:—

Dr. Johnson told me [says Boswell] that he had been in the company of a gentleman whose extraordinary travels had been much the subject of conversation. But I found he had not listened to him with that full confidence without which there is little satisfaction in the society of travellers. I was curious to hear what opinion so able a judge as Johnson had formed of his abilities, and I asked if he was not a man of sense. Johnson—"Why, sir, he is not a distinct relator; and I should say, he is neither abounding nor deficient in sense. I did not perceive any superiority of understanding." Boswell—"But will you not allow him a nobleness of resolution in penetrating into distant regions?" Johnson—"That, sir, is not to the present purpose. We are talking of sense. A fighting-cock has a nobleness of resolution."

It appears that Mr. Stanley also resents the observation of the President of the Geographical Section, that what was most wanted was precise geographical data, and not sensational stories. It is hardly worth while to inquire whether a narrative in this fashion—"I had to get there; I got there; there was a deal of killing"—can properly be characterized as sensational; but Mr. Stanley will probably admit, on reflection, that all the world was not bound in the first instance to believe that Livingstone had been discovered because a Correspondent of the New York Herald, of whom nobody knew anything, sent a vague telegram to that effect, followed by a ludicrously incoherent and blundering summary of some of Dr. Livingstone's old despatches, which had been published several years before. Letters from Livingstone of a recent date have since been received, and have placed beyond question the success of Mr. Stanley's enterprise; and there should now be no hesitation in doing justice to the spirit and dexterity with which he accomplished his mission. It may be true that the road he took was an easy caravan route, and of course this is a free country, and everybody is entitled to believe as much or as little as he pleases of the details of Mr. Stanley's growing narrative. But at least it does not become Englishmen, especially after the miserable collapse of the Livingstone Expedition, to underrate the perils or difficulties of a journey which none of their countrymen have had the courage to undertake. Mr. Stanley went out, as he said, not as a geographer, but as a newspaper Correspondent, and he brought back what his employers wanted, which was certainly not geography. It may be suggested, however, that, under those circumstances, Mr. Stanley is hardly justified in resenting his not being taken for what he does not pretend to be. "Nobleness of resolution" is not necessarily accompanied by a scientific understanding. It is not stated what effect was produced on Brighton by the news that the Correspondent of the New York Herald had suddenly departed, but it is possible that the event did not seriously disturb the equanimity of the inhabitants. Happily Mr. Stanley soon reported, and when he appeared at the Mayor's dinner on Wednesday everybody took care not to laugh. It was probably felt that there would be time enough to laugh when Mr. Stanley had gone.

As far as we can judge, "the young African lion," as he is familiarly called by those who profess to be his friends, seems to have suffered rather more from the newspaper reporters who dogged his steps, and overheard his talk, and decoyed him into private places to pump "copy" out of him, than from the indiscreet gentleman who laughed at the wrong place. Nor did the ex-Emperor escape a similar infliction. It has been suggested that his Majesty was driven away by the crowd which continually gathered under his window; but the Grand Hotel does not stand in the most secluded part of Brighton, and it is difficult to imagine any place where a distinguished personage who wished to be well stared at would be more likely to take up his quarters. We are rather surprised that we have not yet seen in any of the Imperialist journals an account of the "ovations" to which the Emperor was treated by the enthusiastic British public. It is conceivable that an ex-Emperor who has been leading a lonely life in a dull country house might not altogether dislike the flattering curiosity of the multitude; but a crowd at one's door is a very different thing from an intrusion of impertinent visitors into one's private room. It appears that on Saturday one or more reporters took the Emperor by storm, and insisted upon hearing from his lips a frank and candid statement of the intentions of the Emperors of Germany, Austria, and Russia in meeting at Berlin. It was to no purpose that the poor gentleman repeatedly assured his guests that he knew absolutely nothing about the matter, and had no better means of knowing than anybody else. "It is impossible for me to know," he said, "what the precise object of their Imperial Majesties may be," and it may reasonably be supposed that their Majesties have not thought it necessary to take their fallen brother into their confidence on the subject. The account of this interview, which is given by one of the reporters in the Daily Telegraph, shows that the ex-Emperor had really nothing to say. "The Emperor," it is admitted, "did not express any definite and explicit terms his views upon the general state of the meeting at Berlin;" yet his visitors had, "seriously weakened our 'distinct impression' of his mode of thought, and of his reticence on the part of the Emperor." The public, for instance, scarcely interfere with its 30,000 infantry under his command, his own questions of "unnaturally, commensurate results," whereas "he may at probably only place 24,000 men in line of even the looks, of his helpless victim. "I put it to him"—this is the usual style—"I put it to him whether," and then follows half a column, or thereabouts, of the reporter's own twaddle. "He looked at me, moved uneasily, but said nothing. That look, that movement plainly conveyed," and then we have another dose of idiotic or impertinent conjecture. Mr. Stanley seems to have gushed copiously on the gentlest provocation, but the Emperor required more dexterous handling. We are not informed what questions the "Fou de Trouville" intended to put to M. Thiers if he had not been arrested on the stairs; but they could hardly have been more silly and ridiculous than those which the Correspondent of the Telegraph addressed to the ex-Emperor at Brighton. The Correspondent primed himself for the attack by mastering a profound article in an evening paper, pointing out that if the Emperors of Germany, Austria, and Russia could each get what they wanted without fighting, there would be peace; but if they could not, there might some day be war. It is tolerably obvious that the three Emperors think fighting may at least be avoided for the present, or they would not take the trouble of meeting to settle a common line of policy; and one would hardly suppose that any rational creature required to be told that no congress of potentates can furnish an absolute guarantee for everlasting peace. Having gone over the heads of this article, the Correspondent asked the ex-Emperor to furnish the company with an outline of Prince Bismarck's secret policy with regard to France. Napoleon replied very frankly that it was impossible for him to know what the Emperors had in view. He added that he could only answer the question whether they were likely to take France into their reckoning, by asking whether there was anything in the present attitude of the French Government to supply Germany with a pretext for taking precautions against it. Under some further pressure, Napoleon, still protesting his utter ignorance of the designs of Prince Bismarck, which will be readily believed, went on to hint that M. Thiers evidently meant mischief to Germany, and, as a Protectionist, was no friend to England. The ex-Emperor refrained from pointing the too obvious moral of his little parable—that it would be a fine thing for Europe to have somebody at the head of affairs in France who would make things pleasant all round. The Correspondent observes that Napoleon's "voice, according to some, may yet again be the most powerful in Europe"; but it can hardly be supposed that Napoleon himself labours under the delusion that the Powers either would or could put him back on the throne to keep the French down. It is still more incredible that the Emperor should imagine it to be for his interest to have this notion spread about through France.

It seems to us that there is a twofold impertinence in this system of interviewing—an impertinence as regards the person who is expected to make a clean breast of his secrets in this manner, and an impertinence as regards the public, which is supposed to be foolish enough to care for disclosures which are worthless unless properly authenticated. It may be interesting to know that the Emperor thinks Brighton "a delightful place," but it is difficult to say whether it is more absurd to suppose that he knows all Prince Bismarck's secrets, or that, if he had been taken into the Prince's confidence, he would share them with the first newspaper reporter who forced himself into his hotel. It seems to be understood that a certain relaxation of conventional proprieties is allowed at the sea-side which would not be tolerated elsewhere, but journalists should at least remember the respect they owe to their own calling and to the public. It is to be hoped that the Emperor may find protection against interviewing in the Isle of Wight, and that Mr. Stanley may also obtain a respite from his too diffuse admirers.

AN ELECTION BY BALLOT.

"THE eyes of the world" are no longer fixed upon Pontefract, which must be very satisfactory to that borough. It is a difficult matter to satisfy the ideal expectations formed with regard to the constituency which has had the fortune of first testing the provisions of the Ballot Act. Pontefract during last week gazed with astonishment upon the foreigners who swarmed about its streets and asked innumerable questions, which were certainly not uncalled for, to judge from the querists' previous acquaintance with the subject. Letters must be written and materials must be found. Many of the Correspondents, whose personal luggage consisted of a pair of spectacles and a copy of the Ballot Act, had rushed down at a moment's notice, and hardly knew in what county they were. Pontefract had a castle, and a king had been murdered there. Had he in any way furthered the introduction of the Ballot, or patronized the cultivation of liquories? What was liquories, and where did Lord Mexborough live? Mr. Childers had accepted office, but how, when, and why? Such were the problems which had to be solved; any story was good enough for the ingenuous inquirers; the discussion of the dissyllabic or trissyllabic pronunciation of the borough as bearing upon the Ballot furnished another fertile topic. In spite, sternly enforced, of the wealth of material, the task of these enterprisers, it would certainly be a difficult one; they were not permitted to do as they would have to do in the process of voting, greatly to the care of oneself is generally very small, a functionary, and found out after having been taken care of in a school, the educational resources, one is apt to feel somewhat swayed. In this way a great amount of information was given to the public, and two or three statements were often correct out of ten.

Two circumstances combined to give a special interest to the election—namely, the bitter personalities made use of, and the working of a new Act, although with regard to the latter we cannot regard this occasion as any criterion of what we may expect in the future. Political parties have always been pretty evenly balanced at Pontefract, and previously to the general election in 1868 a disposition existed to allow each party the possession of one seat. It was only at the strong instance of the newly enfranchised electors that a contest was set on foot at the dissolution, an impression being prevalent at Pontefract, as elsewhere, that the Reform Bill of the preceding year would largely increase the number of Liberal votes. The result of the polling showed that matters were very much as they had been before. The contest of 1868 was a political one; that of last week was simply personal. "You did—I did not"—was the form of argument employed in order to enlighten the electors. Lord Pollington attacked Mr. Childers in his address. Mr. Childers rejoined, and the subsequent disclosures will long supply the West Riding with gossip. The controversy was a very pretty one; there was the lie with circumstance, and the lie direct; "much virtue lay in an If, but If the only penmaker" was absent. On the day of the poll appeared Lord Pollington's last contribution to this literature unique in electioneering annals, in which he says:—

If I was a fool in 1868, if I was a "staunch Liberal" in 1868, if in 1868 I believed Mr. Childers to be a gentleman who would be incapable of divulging what he calls the purport of a private conversation, who would be incapable of reading in public a letter which I believe is marked "private," and which I in no manner disavow, is that any reason why I should not when I grow wiser, when certain evidence has proved to me that my opinions on those subjects were erroneous, is that any reason why four years later I should not stand before you as a Conservative candidate?

Strange as it may seem, we do not believe that this exposure had much influence upon the votes of the electors, for there is more than ordinary joy over the accession of a penitent Liberal to the Conservative ranks, who is precluded from making any more changes in his political convictions. It may have been a strong temptation to Mr. Childers to discredit his opponent, having such damning evidence at his disposal, but we venture to think that it would have been in better taste for a man in so powerful a position to make no use of such controversial weapons. It no doubt was extremely annoying to a Minister seeking re-election at the hands of a constituency which he had represented thirteen years to be opposed at such a time and in such a manner, but the private conversation and letters of his adversary ought not to have been required for the purpose of gaining the seat. Lord Pollington aggravated matters by giving a contradiction to the first story. Had he regretted that publicity had been given to a private conversation, frankly admitted that he had changed what he called his convictions, and omitted all mention of his father's name, the production of the letter would have been obviated, and the contest deprived of half its bitterness.

The repose of Pontefract was very mortifying to the newspaper reporters, who trusted to have some opportunity of describing a fight before they returned home. It would take far more than an election to disturb the peace of that ancient borough, which, as the whole world is now aware, contains within its limits Knottingley, Ferrybridge, Newtown, Monkhill, Carleton, Pontefract Park, and Tanahelf. Knottingley has always been the Conservative stronghold; to the burgeman in his fur cap and fur waistcoat, just on his way to, or just come back from, Google, political topics are profoundly uninteresting. He is inclined to support the "third man," as a new candidate is usually called, on the grounds that to the third man are due the drinking and the bribery which, in spite of Lord Houghton's contradiction, have been fondly looked upon as characteristics of a Pontefract election. The Knottingley voters are sailors rather than landmen, and present a strong contrast to the shrewd-faced inhabitants of Pontefract, who are quite as capable of judging of many questions as their representatives, and are no unfair specimens of West Riding intelligence. The contrast in point of education between the two divisions of Pontefract and Knottingley is brought out very strongly by an analysis of the poll. In the district of Pontefract 1,009 electors were on the register; of these 703 voted, 86 being illiterate. In the district of Knottingley 932 electors were on the register, of whom only 545 polled, the number of illiterates being 115. Twelve per cent. appear therefore to be uneducated in Pontefract, whereas the proportion is as high as 21 per cent. in Knottingley. Those who did poll were probably the more intelligent of the inhabitants, and we have little doubt that one-fourth of the gross number of voters in this latter district would be found unable to read. This is not a pleasant fact to contemplate as one of the results of the Act of 1867, for if the same proportion holds good in all other constituencies, one-sixth of the political power at present enjoyed is in the hands of illiterate persons. Attention has been already called in our columns to the small number of votes recorded in comparison with the election of 1868, when 132 more votes polled in the district of Pontefract, and 177 more in that of Knottingley. The friends of the Ballot have endeavoured to ascribe this indifference to special circumstances, but we cannot help thinking that it is chiefly to be attributed to the want of interest felt in the new method of voting. The labourer engaged in harvesting was not likely to give up a day's pay for the pleasure of exercising the franchise, nor was secrecy of voting very palatable to the recipient of bounties in past years. Nothing could be duller than the Ballot—"dull, beyond all conception dull"; the policemen yawned in the face of the perplexed voter as they ushered him into the presence of the Vehmgericht who explained his mysterious duties, and then relapsed into a moody silence when their victim had been hurried away. At one time fears were expressed lest there should prove to be a deficiency of accommodation, but they proved wholly groundless. During the last hour more bottles of beer entered the polling-booths than voters, and the interest in the proceedings had completely died away. Advantage was taken of the permission accorded by the Act to use school-rooms to a very great extent, as out of the five polling-places four were held in schools of various denominations, the fifth being in the Town Hall. This was far from being satisfactory, as in the district of Knottingley the three polling-places were in the centre of the town of Knottingley, all within a few hundred yards of each other, and consequently more than a mile distant from the houses of many of the voters. This objection did not apply in so marked a degree to the district of Pontefract, although a polling-place on the Tanshelf side of the town would have been more convenient. The calculations made concerning the average number of voters who polled at the different booths have not been verified. At Booth I. 353 voted, while in Booth V. there were only 105 votes recorded.

With regard to the illiterate voter much dissatisfaction prevailed. An educated voter, polling quickly and meeting with no obstruction, could record his vote in half a minute; on the other hand, one gentleman, who must be reckoned as the king of illiterates, is reported to have occupied twenty minutes in performing his duty to his country. Various suggestions have already been made to remedy this difficulty; but the most practical came from a Pontefract constituent, who recommended the adoption of a paper coloured blue and yellow, an attachment to one of those two colours being frequently the only political conviction of which the voter's mind is capable. We suppose it would be impossible to disqualify the illiterate voter, or to hope for a moment that any educational test might be required from those who exercise the franchise; a separate booth, however, might be provided for his accommodation, and in case this tended to discourage him from voting, or to cast a stigma upon ignorance, such a contingency could hardly be looked upon as a misfortune by the community at large. Owing to the distance of Knottingley from Pontefract, the voting-papers were not collected until five o'clock; and owing to the fact that the Mayor, who performed his duty with singular decision and ability, counted them himself, being naturally desirous that no mistake should occur in the first election under the new Act, the result was not known until three hours afterwards. As the 48th rule of the first schedule declares that "in the case of a contested election for any county or borough, the returning officer may, in addition to any clerks, appoint competent persons to assist him in counting the votes," there is no reason to believe that there will be any delay in future elections. Much has been said concerning the quiet of the proceedings under the new system; but we do not believe that what took place at Pontefract is any criterion of what may be expected generally. There was just as much excitement and noise last week as in 1868, and in large towns the concentration of all the hopes and fears and speculations of the day into a single moment may not improbably lead to scenes which will rival any that have occurred under the old system. The crowd at Pontefract is always a good-natured one, party feeling does not run very high, the number of electors is very small, and we cannot think that the borough will serve as a very valuable precedent in the annals of the Ballot. No doubt certain small defects will be remedied; a ballot-pencil will perhaps be invented, the point of which will not break when the weight of a sturdy elector is leant upon it; the board upon which he writes will perhaps be planed, and the sepulchral character of the arrangements somewhat modified. What political lessons there are to be learnt from the Pontefract election are unpleasant ones. Lord Pollington can only look back with pain and regret at the position he occupied, while Mr. Childers's success is not one to make Liberal candidates hopeful for the future. Nothing could be more disgusting than the attitude assumed by the opponents of the Contagious Diseases Acts. The agitation on behalf of disease knew no bounds. Little boys and girls distributed papers of filthy import on all sides, in which the most audacious statements were made, and factory girls as they went to their work speculated aloud upon the examination of women. Three females devoted themselves to the propagation of these tenets, and conducted the bitterest opposition against Mr. Childers. Latterly, however, a reaction set in, and a meeting composed of women, and presided over by a person of the name of Butler, was brought to a premature conclusion by the sprinkling of Cayenne pepper in large quantities, and the intrusion into the room of a body of electors. It is as well that future candidates should know that an acquaintance with these subjects, and a capability to solve the most hypothetical cases, will be imperatively demanded from them. Unless some resistance is made against the clamours of these indecent Menada, this species of interference by deputations will become more common, and repugnances of opinions in obedience to some pressure of the moment will become a general feature at elections. To unite the votes of a Liberal constituency will, it may be feared, be almost an impossibility at the next dissolution. The 25th clause of the Education Act has alienated a certain number of Nonconformists, to whom compromise and conciliation are unknown. The prospect indeed is not an encouraging one for those Liberals who may have opinions of their own, and who decline dictation at the hands of small sections of their party.

PREPARING FOR THE CAMPAIGN.

THE preparations for the Autumn Manœuvres are steadily advancing, the Northern army being busily engaged at Aldershot in taking its gallops, and the Southern force being occupied about Blandford in getting the greatest possible amount of enjoyment from its quiet military pic-nic. The greater part of the invading army has been at the rendezvous for a week past, but until two or three days ago everybody was allowed to take thin leisurely, and merely to look forward to division and brigade drill and outpost duty. It is to be regretted that, as the Southern army has had so little to do, the Northern army was not moved near to the scene of action; for, active as the new generals may be, expeditions from Aldershot cannot afford the training to secure which autumn manœuvres were instituted. Neither, we fear, at the latter, under present arrangements, yield all the results which might reasonably be expected; and the cause is not far to seek. Owing to the system of scraping troops together from all parts of the kingdom, there must be for some time a certain amount of rawness and want of homogeneity which cannot fail to interpose obstacles to manœuvring rapidly and with precision. A brigade, a division, and a corps d'armée ought each to be solidly organized bodies; they actually are but a fortuitous agglomeration of tactical atoms. Outside each regiment and battery everything is new and strange. The generals do not know their staff, the latter are unacquainted even with the persons of commanding officers, and the Southern army, at all events, is very much in the same position as was the Channel Squadron a fortnight ago. Even the Aldershot force, which we had fondly imagined was a permanently organized and complete division, ready to take the field bodily at a moment's notice, is to be sent to the manœuvres under new conditions. Every brigade has been more or less broken up, fresh corps have been added to the force, and comparatively few of the general and staff officers of the original division remain with it now that it has been developed into a corps d'armée. But we have urged so frequently the advantages of permanent organization, and the arguments in its favour are so obvious, that we suppose it would be a waste of time to write anything further on the subject. We may, however, be permitted to make a few remarks on a kindred matter. It would seem to be only reasonable that the generals and the staff officers appointed to take part in the manœuvres should be either men of ascertained merit, to whom it was considered advisable to give opportunities of practice, or men believed to be capable, but whom it was desired to test. Some, however, of those nominated on this occasion are men of whom we do not think anybody will venture to assert that they realize either of these conditions. Could we hope to do any good by speaking more plainly on this point, we should not hesitate to do so; but nominations could not now be cancelled, and we shall be satisfied if we succeed in impressing on the authorities the necessity of making a more careful selection next year. The matter is undoubtedly one of the highest importance. Skill in handling troops is in these days more than ever required. Hitherto the bulldog courage of the British soldier has continually got his general out of a scrape; but we must no longer rely on this resource. Our leaders must, therefore, be the best men we can find. We fear, however, it is impossible to pretend that the best men have in all instances been selected to take part in the coming manœuvres; and consequently, as regards generals, the campaign will not be a real preparation for war. To employ in these manœuvres men who would certainly not be employed in case of real peril and difficulty is to commit the blunder of training men who would never be permitted to put their training into practice.

Nor is this the only point on which we feel bound to express our dissatisfaction with the pending arrangements. The authorities take considerable credit to themselves for having organized a system of regimental transport, and are under the delusion that in this instance at least they have closely followed the example of Prussia. The imitation is, however, only superficial. To each Prussian regiment on a war footing is assigned a certain number of train soldiers. These, however, are dispensed with in time of peace, and when present are always kept to their special duty, and are reckoned, like hospital orderlies, as non-combatant additions to the fighting men. We, on the contrary, take in an infantry battalion fourteen non-commissioned officers and men, and a proportional number in the cavalry, from the already too small number of fighting men, and employ them as drivers. The consequence is that the public are under a delusion as to the real number of actual combatants in each battalion, and believe that our army is much stronger than it really is. The average strength in non-commissioned officers and men of the battalions about to take part in the manœuvres is not far from 550, and from this we take two per cent. for transport work, which deduction added to that of the other men in regimental employ seriously weakens our already attenuated regiments. The whole system, indeed, by permitting a disagreement between our paper and our real strength is most pernicious. The public, for instance, hear that a British general has 50,000 infantry under his command and they expect, not unreasonably, commensurate results; whereas in reality he can probably only place 24,000 men in line.

battle. And there is yet another argument against the system which is now being introduced. We enlist men of good stature and strength, train them carefully in drill, rifle-practice, and field-engineering, and teach them to take advantage of cover and to perform outpost duty with vigilance and intelligence. We then order them to undertake work for the proper performance of which no part of their training is in the least essential. In short, we first make a soldier of a man, and then employ him as a waggoner. We carefully set the razor, and then use it for cutting slate-pencils. In an infantry soldier size is an advantage. In a driver the reverse is the case. As, therefore, we do not find it easy to keep up the standard of height and chest measurement, common sense suggests that we should enlist none but short and light, but strong, men as drivers, reckon them as supernumerary to the fighting men, and train them as drivers only. These remarks apply with even greater force to the cavalry, inasmuch as a dragoon is longer in making than an infantry soldier. Moreover, notwithstanding that our regiments are absurdly under-horsed, and that a trooper cannot be trained in a day, cavalry corps are compelled to furnish horses as well as men for their own transport. Either all this is a very bad system or it is an egregious sham. It is the former if it is intended to practise it in actual war. It is the latter if it is only to be viewed as a temporary expedient. In either case we can only regard it as a grave mistake.

The programme of the campaign may now, we believe, be regarded as definitely settled. On the 5th the outposts of the two armies will be in contact on the river Wiley. On the following day will be fought the first battle, probably about Codford. The 11th will be a day of rest, and on the 12th the march past will take place on Beacon Hill, some four or five miles north-east of Amesbury. This arrangement apparently confirms the current impression that the Northern army is predestined to defeat, for, if successful, how would it be possible to fix any place near Amesbury as the rendezvous for the 12th? Whether it be correct or not, the rumour that the result of the campaign is already decided cannot fail to deprive the officers and men, of the Northern army at least, of all real interest in the operations. Indeed we have already heard of complaints on the subject, and it must be admitted that such complaints are thoroughly reasonable. It shows a strange ignorance of human nature so to arrange matters that half the force will enter on the campaign with no other feeling than one of profound boredom. We are aware that, at the very best, open-air Kriegsspiel can never be a good imitation of war, but surely no endeavour should be spared to render it as realistic as possible. The contrary plan would seem to have been pursued on this occasion. A cut-and-dried programme is clearly an utter sham, and the careful examination of the whole district by the rival generals before the arrival of a single battalion is no better. Everything indeed appears to be done to render the evolutions round Salisbury as unlike real war as possible. It would have been easy and natural to fix some line of demarcation, and to insist that it should be passed by neither officer nor man until the actual commencement of the campaign. As the case stands, reconnoitring will be, as regards the ground, a perfect farce, for each commander will know from personal observation all that his patrols can have to tell him. In the matter of tactics we are glad to say that a slight improvement has taken place since we last touched on the subject. The Northern army will not go into the field without, at all events, a system of tactics which is considered to be worthy of trial. We believe that its chief feature is that an infantry attack should be made as follows:—A battalion throws out one or more companies to skirmish, and an equal number to act as supports, entire regiments of course backing up the whole. The skirmishing company at first only sends out its best shots to skirmish, gradually sending up additional men as the range diminishes, till at length the whole company is broken up. By this time, or shortly afterwards, it is assumed that the enemy's position has been almost reached, and at the critical moment the company in support makes a sudden rush in close formation and aligns itself for the decisive stroke with the skirmishers. The idea is not a bad one, but in our opinion the final blow ought to be dealt by a larger body than a company. Any system is, however, better than none at all, and the military authorities are therefore to be congratulated on the progress they have made.

In conclusion we desire to call attention to something of scarcely less importance than tactics. We refer to a point of discipline. In this respect we seem to have gone back since last year. An order was issued a short time ago limiting the amount of baggage to be carried, and forbidding officers to take their regimental mess into the field. This order has not, to our knowledge, been cancelled, but as regards some corps it has been simply ignored. Now a huge mess-marquee is scarcely an object which can be overlooked by a general, and as its appearance is in this case an indication of distinct disobedience of orders, it ought certainly to have been greeted with a severe reprimand to the commanding officer. But if the general winks, the colonel may well shut his eyes. Such an incident is much to be regretted. In the first place, if an order is not to be sternly enforced, it should not be issued at all; and in the second place, it would certainly have been good practice for officers to mess as they would have to do on service. The art of talking care of oneself is generally very assiduously cultivated, but when, after having been taken care of in a particular matter by others for a series of years, one is suddenly thrown on one's own resources, one is apt to feel somewhat awkward. We know a general officer new living who, from want of being accustomed to rough it, was nearly starved during the Waterloo campaign. Curiously enough, he belonged to the same portion of the service which furnishes the chief offenders at Blandford.

REVIEWS.

LIFE AND LABOURS OF MR. BRASSEY.*

ONCE, when Johnson was talking at Streatham with more than usual brilliancy, Boswell said to Mrs. Thrale, "Oh for shorthand to take this down!" "You will do it as well," the lady replied; "a long head is as good as shorthand." Sir Arthur Helps, having no opportunity of recording Mr. Brassey's conversation, has induced many persons who knew Mr. Brassey well to give evidence, as he calls it, which has been taken down in shorthand, Mr. Thomas Brassey acting as examiner. The biographer understands his business much too well to exhibit to his readers the raw material which he has made up into a readable and not uninteresting story. To the world in general Mr. Brassey is known as a great contractor, who amassed a large fortune; and it must have been generally believed that he was an able man of business. That he was much more than an ordinary employer of labour, and that the elements of his success were moral as well as intellectual, is clearly proved by Sir Arthur Helps's account of his history and character. Mr. Brassey appears to have been one of the kindest and one of the justest of men; and a natural disposition which inclined him to place a liberal confidence in those around him was eminently serviceable to him in the conduct of complicated transactions which were necessarily entrusted to numerous agents. His birth and all the circumstances of his education and his life were highly favourable. He was the representative of an ancient family which had some generations before subsided from the rank of gentry to become substantial yeomen. His father possessed a considerable freehold, which seems to have been kept in the family from the time of the Conquest; and he was also a tenant-farmer on a large scale. Mr. Brassey left a school at Okeham at the age of sixteen to be articled to Mr. Lawton, a land-surveyor, who admitted him to partnership as soon as he was of age. The firm were agents to Mr. Price of Bryn-y-pys, then owner of the site on which Birkenhead now stands; and before he was thirty, Mr. Brassey had, by the death of his partner, become sole agent for the property. He had previously been employed as a surveyor in the construction of the Holyhead road; and a negotiation about some stone from a quarry under his management procured him the acquaintance of Mr. George Stephenson, who encouraged him to tender for a contract on the Grand Junction line. Mr. Stephenson's successor, Mr. Locke, invited Mr. Brassey to aid in the construction of the London and Southampton Railway; and from that time his reputation and resources enabled him to contract for some of the greatest public works in England and in foreign countries. Having thoroughly mastered the details of his business, he knew, with the elasticity of practical genius, how to apply his attention, as his transactions became larger, only to the general superintendence of the works which he undertook. No man comprehended more fully the inexpediency of worrying subordinates by minute interference. Every agent and sub-contractor was allowed and encouraged to discharge his duties in his own way, provided that the result was satisfactory. In the same spirit Mr. Brassey avoided all wrangling with the Companies for which he constructed works; he never made excuses; he scarcely ever asked for an extension of time; and when a misadventure occurred, he was more anxious to repair the damage than to adjust the liability between himself and his employers. In all his enormous engagements he never but once had a lawsuit. The liberality which characterized all his dealings both with capitalists and with the persons whom he employed would have been politic and profitable if it had not proceeded from a large and generous nature. It may be added that his virtues were of the kind which are nourished and ripened by prosperity. He acquired great wealth early in life, so that he could give way to his natural bent without rashness or inconvenience. In any circumstances he would have been upright, and he would have been loyal to his associates. A great contractor, like a mediæval leader of mercenaries, requires an army of officers and privates to be constantly at his disposal. He must not only possess capital and professional skill, but he must also have a staff of agents, of engineers, of sub-contractors and workmen ready for any enterprise for which he may be engaged. Mr. Brassey's feelings coincided with his interest in producing extreme reluctance to part with those who had once served him, whether they were skilled assistants or simple navvies. Great forethought and judgment must have been used in adjusting his numerous undertakings in such order as to provide constant occupation for subordinates who were numbered by thousands.

Sir Arthur Helps has with sound judgment procured and inserted a list of the contracts in which Mr. Brassey had a share in partnership with many other persons. So zealous a stickler for organisation and accuracy would have done well to give the capital as well as the railway mileage, and to add up tables of figures which extend over several pages. In correction of one part of the biographer's omission, it may be stated that, with his partners, Mr. Brassey constructed 8,000 miles of railway, as well as many other works, including the Victoria Docks, the Northern sewer in the main drainage of London, and the Thames Embankment. The cost of the whole must have exceeded 150,000,000*l.*, and it may be roughly guessed that Mr. Brassey undertook on an average half of each contract. "There were periods in his career during which he and his partners were giving employment to 80,000 persons, upon works requiring 17,000,000*l.* of capital for their completion." With a laudable desire to gratify legitimate curiosity, Sir Arthur Helps states the total amount of Mr. Brassey's profits. His percentage of profit was, according to his biographer, only three per cent. "He laid out seventy-eight millions of other people's money, and upon that outlay retained about two millions and a half. The rest of his fortune consisted of accumulations." It has not occurred to Sir Arthur Helps that the figures which he has given bear little relation to one another. Three per cent. would be not only an unremunerative return, but an actual loss on trading capital. The sum of two and a half millions earned by professional exertion has little or nothing to do with the capital which may chance to be employed, except as forming a part of the expenditure. On the large capital which he invested in his undertakings Mr. Brassey must have made far more than three per cent. In many of his works the contractors accepted a large portion of their payment in shares, finding, to that extent, all the capital required. During the financial crisis of 1866, of which he was, among the great contractors, one of the few solvent survivors, Mr. Brassey was subject to liabilities on the Victoria Docks for 600,000*l.*, on Danish railways for 800,000*l.* He held unsaleable bonds of the Lemberg and Czernowitz Company to the amount of 1,200,000*l.*, and he had taken shares, which were for the moment worthless, in payment of works from several other Companies. On the Lemberg line he had to pay from 40,000*l.* to 50,000*l.* a month for wages, and interest to shareholders at the rate of more than 120,000*l.* a year. The war between Austria and Prussia added to his difficulties; and one of his agents had once to run the gauntlet on an engine between the centres of the hostile armies. Nevertheless he contrived to finish the line four months before the agreed time; and consequently he was immediately able to place upon the market bonds of which he held more than a million. A trader who conducts business on this gigantic scale is primarily a capitalist; and the fortune which Mr. Brassey, after many heavy losses, is reputed to have left, was not more than an adequate return for his outlay and for his skill and labour. He was in the habit of expressing his determination not to retire from business, because, as he said, "It requires a special education to be idle, or to employ the twenty-four hours in a rational way without any particular calling or occupation. To live the life of a gentleman, one must have been brought up to it." He added that if he were forced to retire he would take to farming, and "weigh his stock every day, comparing their increase of weight with the cost of their food." In that or any similar occupation he would probably have made a little fortune. With his usual liberality of thought he admitted that fortunes, however large, might be suitably spent by those who had been brought up to it, but "the fatigue of spending 30,000*l.* a year would drive me mad." Unluckily for himself Mr. Brassey had never acquired the habit of reading; but he liked to collect knowledge from conversation, and he had a wholesome love of sight-seeing, from galleries and museums to the soldiers at the Horse Guards. Though not a speaker himself, he took pleasure in hearing speeches, and his favourite orator was Mr. Disraeli.

Although he was a punctual and voluminous letter-writer, his correspondence naturally related to matters of business, and a few letters which are inserted in the biography are entirely without interest. Sir Arthur Helps has not been able to preserve any record of Mr. Brassey's conversation, and consequently, notwithstanding all his efforts, the portrait which he has drawn remains vague and indistinct. Those who knew Mr. Brassey best appear to have considered him nearly faultless, except in the venial tendency of yielding too readily to the wishes and arguments of promoters of doubtful enterprises. The defect in his character was probably connected with the unsuspecting simplicity which must have contrasted strangely with the unscrupulous coarseness of many speculators and adventurers with whom he must have been constantly brought in contact. A great railway contractor has the greater merit in being harmless as a dove because those with whom he is forced to deal are often cunning as serpents. The widespread ruin which was caused by the failure of many of Mr. Brassey's competitors and associates was in few cases the result, as far as they were concerned, of innocent misfortune. The most interesting chapter in the volume is contributed by Mr. Thomas Brassey, who alone among the biographer's informants was better acquainted with his father's personal character than with his mode of conducting business. It is satisfactory to learn that Mr. Brassey had not only a disinterested love for applications of mechanical ingenuity, but a genuine taste for architecture and sculpture, while in consequence of some peculiarity of temperament he took less pleasure in painting. The colouring and texture of porcelain, the lines of a well-designed ship, and almost all other beautiful objects were appreciated by him with genuine zest. "I think," says Mr. Thomas Brassey, "I ought to allude to the admiration which he was wont to express for the troopers of the Household Brigade, their stature, their horses, and the style in which they always turn out." He approved of the Imperial system in France, and at home he inclined to Conservatism, but he never attempted to interfere with the political opinions of his some, both of whom belong to the Liberal party in the House of Commons:—

He was graceful in every movement, always intelligent in observation, with an excellent command of language, and he only here and there betrayed by some slight provincialisms in how small a degree he had in early life enjoyed the educational advantages of those with whom his high commercial position in later years placed him in constant communication. In all he said or did he ever showed himself to be inspired by that equality of heart and mind which most truly ennoble him who possesses it, and without which one cannot be a perfect gentleman.

As one of his humbler admirers remarked, "If he had been a parson he would have been a bishop, and if he had been a prize-fighter he would have worn the belt." One of his assistants considers that he pays a high compliment to Count Cavour, who took an active part in the introduction of railways into Northern Italy, in describing him as the best man of business he ever met with the exception of Mr. Brassey. In a world of disappointed hopes, of stunted careers, and of faculties ill-adjusted to employments, it is an agreeable thought that one happy owner of a sound mind in a sound body experienced a life of uninterrupted prosperity in the exercise of useful functions which he was pre-eminently qualified to discharge. The works which were constructed during Mr. Brassey's lifetime are perhaps almost equal in magnitude to those which before his time existed in the world; and the largest share in the necessary organization and application of labour devolved by a natural fitness on the most practical, the most prudent, and the most liberal of contractors.

Sir Arthur Helps has almost entirely overlooked the great financial operations in which Mr. Brassey must have been engaged in his later years. It may be presumed from the result that in this department of business also he was skillful and sagacious. It is a comparatively simple matter to calculate the cost of works in money, as in the case of undertakings which are promoted at their own cost by Governments, by great capitalists, or by existing and solvent Companies. The railway extension of the last twenty years has been to a large extent undertaken at their own risk by contractors and other capitalists, who, in consideration of a high rate of anticipated profit, accept payment in shares, which they afterwards place in the market at their own discretion. No commercial enterprise can be more legitimate in itself, although the complications and legal fictions which such contracts frequently involve have in many instances enabled dishonest adventurers to defraud creditors and independent shareholders. The practice and its results have caused much misconception of the statistics of capital outlay, and have consequently added to the confusion of thought which generally characterizes popular lucubrations on railway economy. Many lines have been constructed for three-fourths or for two-thirds of the nominal expenditure, the residue representing the real or ostensible profits of the contractor and of the capitalists who have provided him with funds on terms corresponding to the greater or less hazard of the speculation. In almost every treatise on railway matters the figures which merely represent a balance of accounts are confused with the sums which have been actually sunk in works, materials, and labour. In Sir Arthur Helps's thoughtful and instructive remarks on the conditions of railway enterprise he displays a want of perfect familiarity with some of the elements of the question. His observations on the conduct of business, and on moral and intellectual points of character, are always valuable and interesting.

LORD STANHOPE'S MISCELLANIES.*

LORD STANHOPE'S present collection of Miscellanies is in the strictest sense a collection of odds and ends. He has brought together pieces of various lengths, on various subjects, in various languages, and of very various degrees of interest. They are also by various authors, some of them being Lord Stanhope's own writing, and others the writing of various other people. They embrace subjects as remote from each other as the administration of the younger Pitt, the influence of Arabic philosophy in mediæval Europe, a somewhat perplexing incident in the life of Lady Mary Montagu, and the question whether the Latin violet really means what we call the violet, and not rather the iris. The pieces of Lord Stanhope's own, a few essays and lectures from various quarters, are much of the character of his writings in general. They show taste and reading; they are clear and straightforward, without a particle of pretence or affectation; they show something that may be called elegance, something even that may be called thought, but hardly anything betokening the attribute of strength. The last piece in the volume on the subject on which so many have written, the legends of Charlemagne, is exactly an example of what we mean. It is pleasant and graceful enough, but the subject is not treated as it would be either by a comparative mythologist or by a scientific historian. One is half angry to see such a subject taken in hand without a reference to the mutual light which, by help of the comparative method, the Homeric legends and the Carolingian legends throw on one another; and this, though Lord Stanhope, just like Mr. Gladstone, is for ever hovering on the borders of the comparative method, without ever quite getting within the pale of safety. Lord Stanhope never quite sees, though he seems to be always on the point of seeing, that the Charlemagne of French romance is to be looked on as a poëte being of romance, to whom the historical German Emperor Charles has given a groundwork of personality and little more. He thus misses the great lesson to be drawn from this series of romances—namely, the light which these legends which we can compare with contemporary history throw on other legends which we have no contemporary history to compare with. And to our generation it seems grotesque to see the founder of modern Europe spoken of in a half-patronizing way, and to find him measured by the man who set himself to burlesque him:—

On no period of history however have these legends settled more closely or in greater numbers than on the era of Charlemagne. That great Sovereign might well make a powerful impression on the popular mind. His dominion was as extensive as that of Napoleon, and indeed almost commensurate with it, while the duration of his reign was about threefold. The excellence of his civil institutions enhanced the glory of his military exploits; and he stands high above the series both of his predecessors and of his descendants.

We follow Lord Stanhope better in his arguments about the iris and the violet, which, subject to the judgments of botanists, strike us as very much to the purpose. We can thank him too for a paper written forty years ago, headed "On a Fabulous Conquest of England by the Greeks"—by Greeks being understood an Eastern-Roman army under Belisarius—which illustrates a subject that has since been more fully handled, namely, the relations of the English in the early days of their settlement in Britain towards the rest of the world, and especially towards the New Rome. Belisarius invades, not Britain, but England—Ἐγγλην, a country which is very naturally governed by a Πῆξ, as we cannot expect the Byzantine writer to allow an English King the title of Βασιλεὺς. Now out of this it would be easy to put together a story the parts of which fit together so well that it is hard not to believe one's own invention. The presence of Belisarius in Britain is witnessed to by the existence of an encampment between Cambridge and Aldreth, known as Belas's Hill. That his presence there led to a conquest of the island is witnessed by his offering to the Goths Britain in exchange for Sicily, a sure sign, to all minds but that of Mr. Lowe, that he was then in possession of Britain. The motive of the invasion is easily explained. Do not Gibbon and Byron severally bear witness to the presence of Vandals in Cambridgeshire at dates earlier and later than that of Belisarius? This accounts for the work which records him being found in that particular part of Britain rather than in any other. Having overcome the Vandals of Africa, he naturally went on to complete his conquest by subduing the outlying colony in Britain. This of course happened in the interval between the Vandalic and the Gothic Wars. Thus, when the Gothic War began he was in a position to offer Britain to the Goths in exchange for Sicily. No piece of circumstantial evidence ever hung better together.

A certain amount of curiosity is awakened by the first piece in the volume, which deals with a strange story about Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. Horace Walpole in 1751 had got hold of a tale of Lady Mary being kept in durance somewhere in Northern Italy, and that, he was pleased to add, by a lover, who had "taken it into his head to keep her close prisoner, not permitting her to write or receive any letters but what he sees." To the mention of the lover there is the answer that Lady Mary was at this time sixty-one years old, though of course the rejoinder is possible that Queen Elizabeth had much love made to her after that age. Now it seems that among Lady Mary's papers there was found a long narrative in Italian, which Lord Stanhope decides to have been her own composition, though not in her own handwriting, about Lady Mary being kept, not indeed in actual confinement, but under "a system of fraud and falsehood, and, quite at the end, of intimidation," which, according to Lord Stanhope, "supplied its place." The doer of all this, whatever it was, was a certain Count Palazzo. Now the first Lord Wharnccliffe, Lady Mary's great-grandson, asked Lord Stanhope whether, when he was editing her works, he ought to publish this paper as the true explanation of the matter to which Horace Walpole's bit of scandalous gossip referred. Lord Stanhope gave him the common-sense piece of advice to publish it by all means. His words are worth quoting:—

The question is not, you will observe, whether or not you shall bury all these transactions in oblivion, but whether, when once stirred and glanced at, you shall throw upon them all the light your papers allow, or else leave some future critics and reviewers—no very charitable race—to surmise that the papers must contain something too shocking to publish.

Now it seems that Lord Wharnccliffe was actually so foolish as not to follow Lord Stanhope's advice, and the end has been that the paper has been lost without any copy having been made of it. But Lord Stanhope has lighted on a paper in the State Paper Office in which Mr. John Murray, the English Minister at Venice in 1756, writes to the Secretary of State that "Lady Mary Wortley Montagu has been for some years past, and still continues, in the hands of a Brencian Count, who, it is said, plunders her of all her riches."

Another paper contains a correspondence between Lord Stanhope and Mr. Ticknor about a wild story of Miss Seward's as to the execution of André. According to Miss Seward's story, Washington estimated André to urge General Clinton to give up Arnold in exchange for himself, and, according to the same tale, Washington tried to save André's life, but, Commander-in-Chief as he was, was out-voted by the court-martial. This last story is of course absurd on the face of it, but it is something that Lord Stanhope has got hold of a letter written by Alexander Hamilton, then one of Washington's aides-de-camp, to his future wife, in which he says that he had himself tried in vain to get André's sentence changed from hanging to shooting, and adds further, "It was proposed to me to suggest to him the idea of an exchange for Arnold, but I knew I should have forfeited his esteem for doing it."

There are also a good many letters passing between the younger Pitt and Lord Temple in 1783, in the last of which, dated December 23, Pitt says:—

I called just now to tell you that we have taken the step of filling up the offices. Lord Sydney and Lord Carmarthen have taken the Seals, and the Duke of Rutland Privy Seal, for how many days or weeks remains to be seen.

On this Lord Stanhope adds a note:—

It proved to be not for days or weeks, but for years—and seventeen of them, so far as Mr. Pitt was concerned.

In another set of letters, chiefly by Lady Hester Stanhope—the same, we believe, who afterwards led so strange a life in the East—we get a picture of Mr. Pitt in quite a new character, namely in that of a colonel at the head of his regiment. In this capacity we read that he "exposed himself to the easterly winds late in the evening, attending his duty not as a soldier and Colonel of a regiment, but more like a drill-sergeant." "Nobody," we further read, "is so like an angel when he is extremely ill, and few persons less tractable when a little ill." Lady Hester spoke her mind freely on most matters. When the Northamptonshire and also the Berkshire militia both come to Walmer in 1804, she draws a marked and invidious distinction between the two. The Berkshire contingent, to be sure, was in some unexplained way under Lady Hester's own command, as were also "the famous 15th Light Dragoons":—

I never saw any Militia regiment so well officered, or composed of such pleasant men, as the Berkshire. A Northamptonshire squire is not pleasant in his own country, and does not improve with transplanting, but the regiment is a fine body of men.

Perhaps more interesting than any other part of the volume are two groups of letters which give us the views of several men of more or less eminence with regard to the politics of their own times. First come a group of letters headed, "The English friends of the French Revolution," consisting of letters which passed between the then Earl Stanhope, one of the small body of "friends" just mentioned, and three correspondents in France, the Duke of La Rochefoucauld Liancourt, M. François of Nantes, and the better known Etienne Dumont of Geneva. Lord Stanhope points out that the two former of his predecessor's correspondents afterwards became less revolutionary in their ideas, and were members of the Chamber of Peers under Louis the Eighteenth and Louis-Philippe severally. What the letters are, as Lord Stanhope says, most remarkable for, is the sanguine hope with which, even in 1793, the writers looked forward to a good time coming, and the calmness with which they discuss various proposals of reform in detail, as the respective advantages of permanent courts of justice in the different districts, and of judges going circuits in the English fashion. The one letter on the English side is very well worth notice, as in it Lord Stanhope pleads on behalf of the French priests on the general principles of religious equality. Later on in the volume we find several letters from Sismondi to the present Lord Stanhope, from 1835 to 1841. In 1839 Sismondi makes some remarks on the condition of Switzerland, which was then in a transitional state, the cantonal governments having been made democratic, while no change had yet been made in the Federal Constitution. Thus the democratic governments of Zürich, Bern, and Luzern exercised in turn those powers of the Vorort which the Federal pact had given to those three Cantons. Sismondi, though assuredly no lover of oligarchies, complains that Federal affairs were not so well managed during this interval as they had been when the Constitutions of the three directing Cantons were more aristocratic. This we can easily believe. Sismondi does not scruple to call the Federal pact as it then stood absurd, and it certainly became so after the change in the cantonal Constitutions. The warmest friend of democracy must allow that democracies, and especially Swiss democracies, have not commonly shown their best side in positions involving anything like authority or pre-eminence over other States. Sismondi died in 1842, six years before the establishment of the Federal Constitution which the Swiss people the other day refused to change, and which we could wish that he had lived to see at work. Sismondi also speaks his mind upon English affairs, and vehemently blames the policy of England in Syria and in China. Two passages from his letter of May 23, 1841, are worth quoting:—

Il y avait de votre part, my Lord, une bonté toute particulière à songer à moi au milieu de cette crise qui ébranle aujourd'hui votre pays, et que je contemple de loin avec une curiosité triste, avec tremblement, sans oser faire des vœux pour personne. Il n'en aurait pas été de même il y a une année. Mes sympathies étaient alors toutes pour les Whigs, pour des Ministres en qui j'aimais le désir du bien, du progrès, quelque chose que je ne fusse pas toujours sans inquiétude sur leurs expériences. Mais leur politique égarée, les guerres injustes et cruelles dans lesquelles ils ont précipité la nation, ont fait une révolution en moi.

The other passage refers to the Opium war in China:—

La guerre de la Chine me cause un sentiment d'horreur et de pitié plus profond encore. Il me semble voir diriger des colonnes d'infanterie et d'artillerie sur les écoles de l'enfance: c'est une horrible boucherie que le massacre d'êtres qui n'ont aucun moyen de se défendre. Une guerre est déjà jugée quand on voit des millions d'hommes tués d'un côté, quelques individus blessés de l'autre. Et puis le motif de cette guerre, le commerce d'opium et le commerce des nègres sont deux forfaits d'égale noirceur; de même c'est le sacrifice à la cupidité des droits du bonheur, de la vertu, de nations entières.

There are also some letters from Mr. Hallam. It is curious to hear him saying in 1841 that "the repeal of the Corn Laws would give but a temporary relief and aggravate the disease. But," he adds, "it will probably be expedient to modify the present duties, which have always struck me as rather too high." He speaks of the great position of Peel in 1842. He wishes in 1844, at the time of O'Connell's trial, for a Court of Appeal other than the House of Lords. He doubts about the retention of the Scottish Church Establishment, and adds:—

I doubt whether there is one man on the continent of Europe who would not condemn the Irish Protestant Church as an abuse. But I am far from saying that the whale O'Connell would cease to follow the ship if this tub were thrown to him. It would probably do much more harm than good.

The next year he writes:—

The Reform Bill chiefly, with other circumstances, has given us a constitution that does not work well. The annual complaint, that much is talked and little done, will recur more and more. The great cause is that nothing is thought too trifling to occupy the time of Parliament, and no Member too insignificant to bring it forward. The whole executive power is thus thrown into the House of Commons; not, indeed, quid executive, but so far as deciding what ought to be done, or what has been done rightly.

He holds that Private Bills would in many cases better go to some other tribunal, and also Railway Bills. On the one thing which has been transferred from the House of Commons to another authority—namely, election petitions—he does not, in the letters printed by Lord Stanhope, say anything.

CHINESE-ARYAN AFFINITIES.*

ALMOST simultaneously with the appearance of Mr. Edkins's recent work on China's Place in Philology, which has already been noticed in these columns, a treatise covering precisely the same ground reaches us from a different quarter; and the fact may be hailed as a welcome token, not only of the growing interest which Chinese studies now inspire, but also of a wide addition to the area of knowledge accomplished within the last few years. Dr. Gustave Schlegel, who holds the post of Chinese interpreter to the Dutch Government in its East Indian possessions, is already favourably known as a Sinologue through the translations and opuscules on Chinese subjects which have issued from his pen; and in the treatise now before us he has sought, by following the rigorous methods of the German school of philology, unhappily too much neglected in his predecessor's work, to trace the affinities between the Chinese and Aryan root-sounds, which, like Mr. Edkins, he is convinced may yet be elucidated. The study of this problem, obscure though its details may be, and faint as are the indications that can safely be relied upon, has nevertheless its favourable side for the scholar and philologist. If the Chinese language has suffered through being arrested in its natural course of development, as Rémusat has suggested, through the premature formation of an ideographic method of writing, it is not the less true that we owe to this fact the preservation of primitive forms of speech in a degree unequalled elsewhere. To the same circumstance is due the maintenance of a system of transcribing sounds which perpetuates, and in many cases explains, the origin of ancient pronunciations; so that in Chinese the philologist finds patent to his eye those archaic peculiarities which in almost all other languages he is compelled to use serious efforts to recover. The monosyllabic character of Chinese, so far from constituting an element of an irreconcilable diversity with the Aryan family of languages, is now seen to offer special inducements for investigation by the comparative philologist, since the primarily similar nature of languages such as Sanskrit and Hebrew has become more fully ascertained; and to this task Dr. Schlegel has applied himself, under the light afforded by the instructive labours of Pott, Curtius, Bopp, Benfey, and the more recent Continental writers. In his preface, dated Batavia, June 1872, Dr. Schlegel notices the recent publication of Mr. Edkins's work, the lack of scientific method and information displayed in which he deploras in terms similar to those which we have ourselves heretofore employed; and it is only fair to the Dutch scholar to observe that he shows himself perhaps strongest in precisely those qualifications in which our countryman is deficient. Quoting as the motto of his work Welcker's saying, that "the succession of analogies gives force to conviction, just as lengthening the lever adds power to mechanical effort," Dr. Schlegel seeks to connect the monosyllabic root-sounds of Chinese with the corresponding Sanskrit roots and their acknowledged affinities. Amid much that we must hesitate to admit as satisfactorily proved, a considerable number of new and striking analogies are undoubtedly brought forward in the prosecution of this task. The simplest concrete forms are naturally those to which we look as having been the first to become distinguished by appropriate sounds; and, onomatopoeia apart, it is among these that radical affinities may the most successfully be looked for. Thus, to take a few examples, Mr. Schlegel observes that in Chinese the generic name for the horse is ma, and that of the mare likewise ma [but written with the radical "female" beside the primary character]. In the Amoy dialect the horse is called hā or hā. In Japan it is called u-ma, in the Loo-choo Islands ma. In Mongolian the suffix ri is added to the root ma, and the horse is called ma-ri, whence are certainly derived the Anglo-Saxon meor, the old German meridā, marah, Old Celtic maros, Bas Breton marh, Gaelic mare, Lithuanian merga, German Mähre, English mare, &c.—P. 18.

The affinity of the words quoted from European languages with the Mongolian ma-ri, if not their derivation from it, as somewhat negligently put by Dr. Schlegel, is extremely probable, and the connexion of this root with the Chinese ma is supported by strong analogies; whilst the same may be said of a large number of other radical sounds which Dr. Schlegel has analysed and compared. Great ingenuity is displayed in his attempt at solving a problem which has long defied the efforts of philologists. The root of δωρεῖν (vulpes) has been sought in the Sanskrit lapdka or lapdaka (the jackal), signifying "the eater of carrion"; but against this suggestion Professor Schmidt-Göbel has acutely urged that inasmuch as the fox is pre-eminently a clean-feeding animal, the identification lacks assurance. Pott and Grimm have avowed themselves at fault on this point of etymology, the former suggesting that vulpes may be referred to the prefix vi (dis) and the root lip (scindere); whilst Grimm would derive fuchs from the ancient Norse far (hair), as signifying "the hairy one." Dr. Schlegel, however, points out that in Chinese one of the names given to the fox is fuh, a character composed of the radical signifying an animal, and the compound fuh, to crouch, thus indicating the crouching beast, an excellent designation for the fox, which moves forward only in a crouching and furtive manner. The ancient pronunciation of this character was puk. At Amoy the character is pronounced hok and pok, at Canton fuk. Now from this word may very plausibly be derived the Goth fauhs, the German fuch-s, English fox, Lith. lape (diminutive lu-puk-as), Greek άλυ-ων, &c.—P. 19.

An analogy which is perhaps more obvious than the foregoing is discovered for the first time between the designation pek, pronounced in archaic Chinese puk, pok, or pik, denoting the cypress or conifera in general, and the Greek πικν (pinus), and its affinities, the German fichte, Lithuanian pušas, &c., for which, as Curtius has observed, a root puk must be presupposed, although none has yet been brought forward in Sanskrit.

Leaving this elementary branch of his subject, we find Dr. Schlegel in his third chapter, under the heading "Semasiology, or Affinity of Ideas," displaying a high degree of acuteness, combined with original research, in the comparison of significations as well as of sounds in Chinese and Aryan roots. In this task he is aided materially by that quality of the Chinese language upon which we have already dwelt—viz., the pictorial or ideographic form of the written character. Not alone have the sounds of its primitive pronunciation been preserved, but an index to their meaning has in a still greater degree been retained, a result which merely phonetic writing can obviously not afford. To this clue Dr. Schlegel resorts as a means of tracing the early identity of ideas which led, as he contends, to the formulating of roots that appear alike in the Chinese and Aryan tongues. To use his own expression, he seeks to rediscover in a multitude of roots the primitive and derivative significations that have become developed from this fundamental idea, which will be the best means of convincing men of science with respect to the kinship between Chinese and the Aryan languages.—P. 55.

Having in view the object thus defined, a great number of Chinese sounds, such as kap, hap, bak, mut, pan, lut, &c., are examined and connected by a more or less plausible chain of reasoning with Sanskrit roots and their acknowledged derivatives. It would be impossible without a free use of the Chinese written character, which unhappily has not yet become numbered among the resources of European typography, to do justice in quotations to Dr. Schlegel's elaborate treatment of this branch of his subject; but we may call attention to what is perhaps its most important section, involving as it does a novel and well-supported theory connecting the term Arya itself with one of the most ancient designations applied to themselves by the Chinese race. Every Sinologue is aware of the difficulties which surround the interpretation of the word li, or phrase li-min, = the li people, occurring in some of the most ancient portions of the Shoo King, or Book of History, to which an antiquity equal at least to that of the earliest portions of the Védas can with certainty be attributed. Native commentators have acknowledged their inability to recover the primary meaning of this term, and in apparent despair the signification black has been attributed to it. Hence the expression "black-haired race" has become arbitrarily adopted as the rendering of the phrase li-min, but this interpretation has always been admitted as open to much doubt. It is well known that an etymological connexion exists between the character li and the idea of agricultural labour (as indicated by its component parts), and in more than one native dictionary its identity with a character having the same sound and the meaning "to plough" is actually pointed out. At the conclusion of an exhaustive process of comparison, in which, for the reason assigned above, we are unable to follow him in these columns, Dr. Schlegel sums up with the declaration of his conviction that the character li in li-min should be translated as "the ploughing people," and not as "the black-haired race"—a meaningless designation, since all the yellow races of Asia have black hair, and the Chinese could not possibly have given themselves this name by way of distinction from other men inhabiting China, with hair of a different colour, as Blott and Legge have supposed.

For contra, we find that the Chinese race was the only one, among all its neighbours, having per se an agricultural character, and the Chinese may therefore well have entitled themselves "the ploughing people," in distinction from their nomad and pastoral neighbours of the Tatar or Scythic race.—P. 163.

In support of this novel and interesting theory Dr. Schlegel would link all Indo-European words which designate the plough and its uses, and which contain the root ar, er, or, ir, with the Sanskrit ri or ri, signifying "to cut or hurt." This he identifies with the Chinese root h, sharp, ground to a point, whence are derived the compounds also pronounced h with the signification to plough, &c. From this basis Dr. Schlegel seeks to derive the renowned designation of our linguistic forefathers, the prehistoric invaders of Hindostan. If we accept this view, we must part of course, however reluctantly, with the meaning hitherto attributed to the root ri in Arya; and while ceasing to call the Chinese "the black-haired race," it would be no longer possible to believe that the Aryans gave themselves the title of the "exalted" or "noble" people. Few points in philology indeed have been more strenuously debated than this; and the striking etymological reasons assigned by Dr. Schlegel for his version of the title h-min are worthy of full consideration by Sanskrit as well as by Chinese scholars.

While recognizing with approbation the scientific method pursued by Dr. Schlegel, and the extensive research he has brought to bear in the treatment of his subject, we would nevertheless not withhold our opinion that the time has scarcely yet arrived for the expression of authoritative views on the subject of Chinese radical sounds. The course of study most creditably introduced by Mr. Edkins (apart from the mere theories enunciated in his late production), with the object of tracing and fixing synthetically the ancient forms of pronunciation, requires to be carried greatly further before we can feel sure that the necessary foundation for constructive work has been safely laid. Chinese literature is by no means deficient in writings of an archæological character; and the language has even its philologists, whose labours, although cramped within the narrow circle of exclusively national research, have been justly compared with the undertakings of men such as Bopp and Grimm. Twan Ta-ling and other native etymologists will render important services to the successors of Messrs. Edkins and Schlegel, whilst at the same time the gradual growth of the Chinese written character, with its numberless ideographic changes and phonetic transitions, remains to be studied and classified before we can hope to possess that degree of certainty in our premises without which comparative philology becomes a snare indeed. Equally needful is it that the Chinese dictionaries be resorted to for accurate knowledge of the origin whence individual words are historically derived. This necessary information they supply in a remarkable degree, notwithstanding which it has been strangely neglected by writers for whom it is of the first importance. Hundreds of Chinese characters, especially the names of concrete objects, owe their existence in the language to the fancy of this or that poet or translator, upon whom the exigencies of rhyme or tone, or phonetic difficulties connected with the task of rendering the Sanskrit and Pali records of Buddhism into Chinese, imposed at different periods the necessity of inventing some special written symbol. The Buddhist translations of the Han and T'ang dynasties notoriously swarm with characters of this description, partly ideographic and partly phonetic, and unless great care be exercised the comparative philologist may be led into basing upon one of these modern innovations theories which only the unquestionable antiquity of word and sound could justify. Another branch of study which still remains to be more actively pursued is that of the archaic forms of pronunciation still lingering in the spoken dialects of modern China. Dr. Schlegel has made great use of the existing dialect, or rather language, of Amoy, which is known to exhibit close coincidences with a very ancient form of Chinese pronunciation, and of which he is, we believe, a proficient speaker; whilst Mr. Edkins, on the other hand, has usefully explored the peculiarities of many of the dialects of Central China. The labour of a lifetime might yet, however, be bestowed upon this department of inquiry. The languages spoken at dialectal centres such as Canton, Amoy, Foochow, and Shanghai, all of which present notable differences in essential points, such as initial and final sounds, the modification of vowels, &c., have indeed been examined with care, and to some extent compared and classified; but all that has been done as yet in this respect is trifling beside the labours which philology still requires. In some of the minor local dialects of Kwangtung alone, archaic peculiarities may be found in full vigour which have already disappeared from the "Canton dialect" or recognized provincial language. This has alone been utilized thus far in the work of philological analysis, but, archaic as its pronunciation is in comparison with the language spoken in Northern China, it is less in harmony with the ancient sounds than several of the dialects, scarcely known to Europeans, which still occupy large tracts of country in the provinces of Kwangtung and Kwangsi. Thus, for instance, the Cantonese fo is represented in a dialect spoken at no great distance from the provincial capital by the sound 'h'k, where the ancient consonantal ending is clearly preserved in full force; whilst, in like manner, the initial ch and ts of modern Cantonese (as in chen and tsin) are represented in the more tenacious local dialect by the t of the ancient Chinese. We cannot err in recommending this field of study to the attention of Chinese philologists, and there can be no doubt that Dr. Schlegel's scholarly and suggestive work will stimulate research in this important respect.

THE TALES OF CHARLES PERRAULT.

THERE was a time when the whole of that department of folk-lore which, Teutonically speaking, comprises the "Märchen" as distinguished from the "Sagen," was represented in the world of letters by the few stories associated in France with the name of Perrault, and in England with the more mythical name of Mother Goose. At the present day, when the popular tales of all countries are compared with each other, and the work of comparison takes a course parallel to that of modern philology, we find a Cinderella and a Blue Beard in various ages and countries, and, in the eyes of studious inquirers, the myths that enlivened the nursery lose their definite outline amid the crowd of similar phenomena. Every German savant who publishes his volumes of "Volkmärchen" appends to each tale an elaborate note which tells how something similar has been made known in the first instance by the Brothers Grimm, the patriarchs of this species of investigation, and afterwards by the host of collectors who severally direct their attention to the old-world utterances of the Teutonic, Slavonic, or Latin nations.

Nevertheless, in the popular mind the tales of Perrault hold a place which completely separates them from other embodiments of fairy mythology, even from the Arabian Nights, which were first rendered familiar in Europe by his countryman and contemporary, Antoine Galland. Indeed, with the exception of "Aladdin," the "Forty Thieves," and perhaps "Sindbad," we are inclined to think that the stories related by Scheherazade are known only to the more literary section of the juvenile public. As for the tales of the Countess d'Aulnoy, although Mr. J. H. Planché, both by re-editing them and by reproducing them on the stage, has, with missionary zeal, endeavoured to render them universally familiar, they may be classed among the pedantries of childhood. But crass must be the ignorance of that urchin who, having attained the advanced age of ten years, has never heard of "Cinderella," or of "Little Red Riding Hood"—the "Cendrillon" and the "Petit Chaperon rouge" of Charles Perrault. It is notable too that these and other stories in the same collection are associated with no particular costume. All who have read the "Forty Thieves" figure to themselves Ali Baba as a man with a turban, and Aladdin as a gamin of China. They were foreigners; they were of the East, Oriental. But who save an archæologist would ever inquire after the country which gave birth to Cinderella, or the particular wood which nurtured Red Riding Hood's destroyer? In the popular imagination, the small-footed young lady who rode to the ball in a transformed pumpkin is certainly not Asiatic; a Cinderella presented on the stage with Turkish trousers would provoke the wrath of critical juveniles. But all the kingdoms, duchies, and republics of Europe are open to her for the choice of a birthplace, and if she will only avoid the high-waisted fashion of our Regency, she may go to what Court she will for her parure de bal.

The tales of Charles Perrault are ten in number—namely, "Le Petit Chaperon rouge," "Les Fées," "La Harpe bleue," "La Belle au Bois dormant," "Le Chat botté," "Cendrillon," "Riquet à la Houppe," "Le Petit Poucet," "L'Adroite Princesse," and "Peau d'Âne"; all of which, with the exception of the last, are known here as "Little Red Riding Hood," "Diamonds and Toads," "Blue Beard," "The Sleeping Beauty," "Puss in Boots," "Cinderella," "Riquet with the Tuft," "Hop o' my Thumb" (not "Tom Thumb"), and "The Discreet Princess." To these tales, which are in prose, are added in the edition before us three in verse, a rhymed "Peau d'Âne," the story of the patient Griselda, and the fable of the "Three Wishes," once rendered so needlessly indecent by Matthew Prior. The two latter stories, we need scarcely remark, have nothing in common with the rest, but are merely introduced into the volume as works by the same writer. Moreover, we read in an introductory "analysis" that "L'Adroite Princesse" did not appear in the earliest edition of the tales, and is therefore of doubtful authenticity. Intrinsic evidence favours this doubt, inasmuch as the tale in question seems much more akin to the school of D'Aulnoy than to the typical tales by which the name of Perrault is immortalized.

We use the word "typical" advisedly; for though Perrault had nothing to do with the origin of the tales, there is no doubt that he selected the very stories which more than any others are to be found among the folk-lore of the most diverse nations—stories which may serve as centres round which numbers of kindred but less familiar narratives may be conveniently grouped. One feels, indeed, curious to know whence Perrault immediately derived the subjects which, notwithstanding a little French personnage, he treated with such severe simplicity. That their origin is extremely remote everybody who has bestowed any thought upon the matter is perfectly aware. But what was the exact bridge by which they reached the mind of the Academician who in 1697 gave them to a world that received them as something entirely new? That they were regarded by the contemporaries of Perrault as the fruits of his own imagination is evident enough. In the edition before us, which is obviously intended to be erudite to a certain extent—an improvement on those which have gone before it—the conviction is clearly implied that Perrault was a sort of Æsop, a moral instructor who devised pleasing stories for the edification of youth. As for "Hop o' my Thumb," it answers the double purpose of burlesquing the Greek mythology and conveying ethical admonition. The ingenious urchin who contrives by a happy stratagem to facilitate the egress of himself and his brothers from the forest is a pleasant caricature of Ariadne; and the adventures with the Ogre reproduce those of Odysseus with Polyphemus. Let it not be imagined that this view darkly shadows forth the now received opinion that there is a connexion between myth and "Märchen," not to be cut off by boundaries in space or time, and that possibly the Odysseus of Eastern Europe may figure as a "Däumlein" in the North. Nothing of the kind. The editor gravely suspects that Perrault took the Odyssey into his hand, and imitated some of the incidents in a comic way, just as Mr. H. J. Byron or Mr. F. C. Burnand burlesques a serious tale, play, or novel. This, however, is merely an hypothesis which we are not required to accept; of the earnestness of Perrault as a moral teacher when he wrote "Le Petit Poucet" there is no doubt:—

L'auteur veut que des enfants sachent qu'à tout âge, avec de l'esprit, du courage, et de la prudence, on peut échapper à la méchanceté des hommes; et la conduite du Petit Poucet est ici un exemple d'autant plus capable de les instruire, qu'il est plus à leur portée. La meilleure manière de former la jeunesse est de lui donner, pour ainsi dire, de grandes idées, avec de petits moyens.

This is somewhat tall talk, but the opinion as to Perrault's intention is not without foundation. He wished to appear as an ethical instructor; but far from inventing stories for a moral end, he found stories ready made to his hand, as everybody now is sure to perceive, though this was the very fact that escaped the notice of his contemporaries; and having written them down in a pleasing, simple style, appended to each a short "moralité" in verse. Telling fanciful tales for their own sake after the fashion which we find in the collection of the Grimms and their followers, without a thought of teaching or touching anybody, was not after the manner prevalent under the reign of Louis XIV. Perrault's great enemy, Boileau, would have been utterly amazed at the opinion of any one who might have predicted that the examination of such puerile trivialities would one day occupy the time of the gravest archaeologists, and his surprise would have been shared by Perrault himself. The only ancients recognized by scholarly men of letters in the early part of the eighteenth century were the Greeks and Romans, and Perrault, though he must have been conscious that he had picked up his stories somewhere, could not have believed that he, the doughty champion of the moderns against the ancients, would chiefly be remembered as the representative of an antiquity of which he had never heard. There must be some excuse for the publication of his nonsense, and that was the use which it might be made of it to instil wholesome doctrine into the young mind. This is the moralité he attaches to "Le Petit Poucet":—

On ne s'afflige point d'avoir beaucoup d'enfants
Quand ils sont tous beaux, bien faits et bien grands
Et d'un extérieur qui brille;
Mais si l'un d'eux est faible, on ne dit mot;
On le méprise, on le raille, on le pille;
Quelquefois cependant, c'est ce petit marmot
Qui fera le bonheur de toute la famille.

The aphorism that a sharp puny child may prove better than an athletic blockhead is not very profound; but at all events the indifferent verses served to float "Hop o' my Thumb" respectably into good society.

The title, Tales of Mother Goose, which in England has been given to the Contes de Perrault, does not emanate from ourselves, but may be traced to the French. His book was adorned with a frontispiece representing an old woman telling the stories to three children of different ages, and over her was a frame, inscribed with the words "Contes de ma mère l'Oie." This mother seems to have made herself known early in one of the old French "fabliaux" as a veritable goose-mother, who told amusing narratives to her goslings.

In his own time Charles Perrault was chiefly celebrated as the persistent antagonist of Boileau in the great battle fought among literary Frenchmen towards the end of the seventeenth century as to the comparative merits of the ancients and the moderns. The youngest brother of Claude Perrault, a physician of repute, who afterwards became noted as an architect and a translator of Vitruvius, Charles, born at Paris in 1633, was honoured at an early age with the patronage of Colbert, and was appointed "Contrôleur-Général des Bâtimens." His influence with the Minister was employed for the benefit of art and artists; he had much to do with the foundation of the Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture, and to him the Académie Française was indebted for a residence in the Louvre. On the death of Colbert he devoted himself exclusively to literature, and the controversy in which he was afterwards engaged began with a poem in which he sang the glories of Louis XIV., and which he entitled "Le Siècle de Louis le Grand." The worshippers of the ancients found in this poem an unwarranted depreciation of all other illustrious ages, and Perrault increased their hostility by a Parallèle des Anciens et des Modernes, the publication of which continued from 1688 to 1696, and in which he ranked above Homer, not only the best modern writers, but also Scudéry and Chapelain. Racine and Boileau, who had been very slightly treated in the "Parallèle," felt themselves personally aggrieved; but, in the first instance, the former contented himself with a couplet, the latter with an epigram, directed against the offender. When Boileau published his "Reflexions" on Longinus, and Perrault answered them, the contest was at its height; but in time both parties found that they exposed themselves to the ridicule of the outside public, and through the intercession of friends peace was at last concluded. The last serious occupation of Charles Perrault seems to have been the composition of a series of panegyrics on the great men of the eighteenth century, which was completed in 1700, in two folio volumes, magnificently illustrated with portraits. Even this apparently harmless work was the source of a slight conflict. Among the great men who were the subjects of his Éloges historiques, Perrault had placed the world-famed Jansenists, Arnauld and Pascal, but through the influence of the Jesuits, these, by order of the Court, were excluded. However, the passage of Tacitus which declares how Brutus and Cassius shone pre-eminent through the absence of their images was cited on the occasion, and the two Jansenists were restored to their niches. Perrault died generally respected in the year 1713.

The tales, as we have said, were first published in 1697, about the time when the "Parallèle" which made such an important figure in the literary controversy was just completed. They were dedicated to Mademoiselle, and so little pride did the author take in them that he presented them as the work of Perrault d'Armonceau, his own son, who was a mere boy. Yet, without the "Contes," what would have become of the name of Charles Perrault?

LORD RAVENSWORTH'S VIRGIL.*

BY a mild application of the co-operative principle another memorable translation of Virgil's epic has been begun and finished. Our readers will remember that the first half, undertaken by Mr. Rickards, was reviewed a year or more ago in these pages. It seems from Lord Ravensworth's preface that, after perusing Mr. Rickards's version of the Second Book, which might fairly be taken as the best trial-ground of merit for intending translators of Virgil, he was stimulated to proffer aid in bringing the work to a conclusion; and the result lies before us in a version of the second half of the Æneid, all of which, except the Eleventh Book, the work of Mr. Rickards, is due to Lord Ravensworth's scholarly and graceful muse. It is a part of his own modesty, it is indeed almost a necessary consequence of partnership in translation, that he should esteem his friend's version more perfect than it has been judged by less partial critics. Nor is it unnatural that the taste which accepts, as Lord Ravensworth does, Mr. Rickards's version as approximately perfect in spirit, fidelity, and elegance, should copy the same model in some instances almost to a fault. Truth bids us say of both halves of the work that whilst it presents Virgil's Æneid in a readable form for the sofa and the lounge, neither the first instalment nor the sequel strikes us as likely to satisfy that test of a good translation, attractiveness as a composition that may be read aloud; and this partly because of the metre chosen, and partly from an inherent defect of life and spirit in the style of the translators. Doubtless it may be said that to those who are wedded to Conington's octosyllables no other metre can seem tolerable; but we are fortunately able to rebut this impeachment, and to rest, if need be, the whole case upon the excellent prose version which Mr. Conington's literary executors have just put forth. Without giving in our adhesion to a growing theory that versions of classic poets in a sort of poetic prose are the nearest possible realization of the poetry of Greece and Rome, we may at all events point to Professor Conington's prose version as giving to an English reader a far livelier, finer, and more faithful transcript of Virgil's epic than has been presented by Mr. Rickards and Lord Ravensworth; whilst the desideratum which we miss in the prose version, a system of rhyme which keeps away tedium from readers and listeners, is supplied, to our thinking (and, to judge from Professor H. Smith's preface to Conington's Miscellaneous Works, the public is of the same mind), by the Scottish flow of the eight-syllable ballad metre, with its occasional changes and variations.

Thus it is that, compared with either of Mr. Conington's versions, the English Æneid of Mr. Rickards and Lord Ravensworth can hardly be reckoned a success. On the other hand, it may encourage the latter, if ea cura quævis sollicitat, to be assured that there are passages in his Eighth Book quite fit to hold their own against any chosen passages of the Second Book as rendered by Mr. Rickards. Evander's parting with his son Pallas breathes in this English transcript very much of the rare pathos of the original; and a famous bit of description that follows (viii. 592-6) will be found to have met its just equivalent in Lord Ravensworth's version, as follows:—

Matrons on the walls
Stand trembling, and with moistened eyes pursue
The whirling cloud of dust and flashing spears.
Onward the squadron rides through brier and brake,
Marshall'd in order, and the heavy tread
Of prancing chargers shakes the mouldering ground.

Again, in the description of that portion of the workmanship of Vulcan's shield which relates to Cleopatra, Lord Ravensworth has wrought well and in a way worthy of his master (Æn. viii. 699 &c.):—

Load rings the Egyptian sistrum where the Queen
Undaunted in the midst exhorts her crew,
Nor sees the asp that lurk behind her steps,
Dog-faced Anubis and all monster Gods.

* The Æneid of Virgil. Books VII.-XII. Translated in English Blank Verse, by Lord Ravensworth. London and Edinburgh: William Mackintosh & Sons. 1872.

'Gainst Neptune, Venus, and Minerva's might,
 Their weapons poised. Mars through the battle din
 Rages in iron mail; the Paria dire
 Hovers in middle air, while with rent robe
 Fierce Discord agitates the throng, and her
 Bellona follows with blood-dripping scourge.
 Actian Apollo in the clouds was seen
 Bending his bow; thence, terror-stricken, all
 Th' Egyptian and the Indian hosts, and all
 The swarms of Arab and Sabean hordes
 Trembled and turned to flight; the Queen invokes,
 The winds with cables loosed and sails unfurled,
 Her pale and stricken with the fear of death
 Had Vulcan pained by the tide borne back,
 When grieving Nile his bosom opened wide
 And called the scatter'd armament to seek Safety and refuge in his reedy stream.

There is an epic dignity about these lines which of itself commends them to notice, and, when we compare them with the original, many signs show a careful study of the commentators, and due pains to represent the very mind of Virgil. If in the third verse Lord Ravensworth ignores the epithet "geminus," which Conington, in both his translations, is careful to preserve, it is to be said in extenuation that Virgil's allusion is ambiguous and obscure, and that the accident of the snakes being twain, or twin-born, has no other importance than to give precision to an emblematic picture. The closing lines represent to a nicety all the thought of the poet. In truth, we are disposed to think that Lord Ravensworth, perhaps even beyond his colleague, has succeeded in making blank verse subserve the level narrative and descriptive passages of the original; and it is not his fault that he cannot make it rise to the high argument of battle-fields and fierce encounters of word or deed. Herein Lord Derby, whom he quotes with reverence, was able in a great measure to surmount an inherent difficulty by an excellent choice and concatenation of words and diction.

In the Ninth Book, which is dear to scholars as containing the episode of Nisus and Euryalus, we miss in Lord Ravensworth's copy the fire and life of the original. Not so with Conington, to whom not only his better metre, but also his long and intimate perception of his author's nicety of meaning, gives an immense advantage. One almost laughs to find the words which we italicize in the hasty address of Nisus to his comrade—

Euryale, audendum dextrâ; nunc ipse vocat res.
Huc iter est (ix. 320-1)— turned into a melodramatic aphorism:—

By bravery alone
 The road of safety lies;

as if "hâc" meant "by daring deeds and intrepid action," and not simply the rough and ready way through the foe which the brave Nisus pointed out to his comrade with his forefinger. Conington in his prose version translates it "Hure lies our way"; and in his verse he renders the words "Here pass we." Though the point is a small one, it is remarkable how much more effective is the literal than the more subtle interpretation, which no weight of commentators, even if they were unanimous in support of it, would suffice to recommend to a poetic mind. Or let us take the agonized cry of Nisus when he finds his young companion in extreme peril, and can no longer brook to lie in ambush and not draw on himself the Rutulian onslaught:—

Me, me, adsum, qui feci; in me convertite ferrum,
 O Rutuli! mea frans omnis; nihil iste nec auro,
 Nec potuit; celum hoc et concita sidera testor;
 Tantum infelicem nimium dilexist amicum.—ix. 427-30.

To give the true "conspectus" of this passage at once, we need but quote Conington's prose:—"Me, me! behold the deed! make me your mark, O Rutulians! mine is all the blame! He had no heart, no hand for such deeds; this heaven, these stars know that it is true! it was but that he loved his unhappy friend too well!" In verse the late Professor of Latin is almost as faithful as in prose:—

Me, guilty me, make me your aim,
 O Rutules, mine is all the blame;
 He did no wrong, nor e'er could do.
 That sky, those stars, attest 'tis true
 Love for his friend too freely shown,
 This was his crime, and this alone!

Lord Ravensworth has misinterpreted the last line in taking it to be the author's gloss upon the words of Nisus, and not, as Conington saw, a part of those words, and, like the rest of them, an excuse and deprecation of vengeance for Euryalus. He translates—

"Me, me! Lo I am here; the fraud was mine!
 'Gainst me direct your swords, O Rutuli!
 He could not had he dared! So Heaven above
 Be then my witness, and ye conscious stars,"
 He loved he all too well his hapless friend.

Independently, however, of the final error, the broken utterances of the lines preceding strike us as less effectually realized in this than in the other versions we have quoted.

Lord Ravensworth's use of blank verse does not commend it as an instrument of superior faithfulness. If he has checked the tendency to paraphrase which was imputed to his translations from Homer, he has—quitting the freer license of the measure which he adopts from Mr. Richardson, and which he handles, so far as rhythm goes, with grace and facility—committed many errors of omission which damage the character of his version as a whole. We do not see why, in viii. 382-3, he should have utterly ignored the touch of history and reverence which Venus throws into her prayer to Vulcan when she speaks of his divinity as causam suam. The mistress of so many wiles knew how to play the model wife when she had anything to gain; and so Conington represents her as pleading her suppliant posture—

Low at those knees I most revere—

a touch which in the translation before us is conspicuously absent. In the same book the essential epithet aperte is ignored in v. 523:—"Ni signum cecidit Cytherea dedisset aperte?"—

Till Venus from the sky proclaimed assent.

The epithet here omitted is a great deal more than half the battle. "It was thunder in a cloudless sky," says Mr. Conington in his commentary, "which constituted the sign." In the latter part of the Ninth Book we have noted three or four omissions of more or less gravity in the space of some forty lines. No sort of equivalent is given for Pandarus's taunt to Turnus (v. 739)—"Castra inimica vides: nulla hinc exire potestas." And when a little further on, Turnus tells his opponent that, though his lance has missed its mark, his sword and the hand that wields it shall not fail, it is disappointing to find the words which constitute the gist of the passage slurred over, if indeed not entirely unrecognized:—

At non hac telum, mea quod vi dextera verent,
 Effugies; neque enim in tali nec vulnere auctor.—747-8.

But think not, boaster, to escape the sword
 Wielded by this right hand, now not in vain!

The point and force of is auctor here must be gathered from the context. The speaker means that this time no goddoss can turn aside a blow on which his whole strength is concentrated. Conington's prose explains it exactly—namely, "he from whom wound and weapon come is too strong for that"—i.e. for a half-blow. In an address of Mnesteus, a little further on, intended to rally the Trojans against the enclosed wild beast, Turnus, who is enacting such feats of valour even in his trap as it were, Lord Ravensworth strangely omits the English for the important words of his appeal, which we emphasize by italics:—

Unus homo, et vestris, o civis, unusquis capibus
 Aggeribus, tantas strages impune per urbem Kaldorit?

And shall one man
 Such slaughter perpetrate alone, and send
 So many victims to the Shades below? &c.

We could accumulate like instances, and could add to them errors of taste, such as where the oaks which sublimi vertice nutant are said "to seem to brush the sky," and again where a fugitive warrior, of whom Virgil says that "inter et arma fugâ muros tenet" (ix. 557), is represented

Dodging in hasty flight along the wall.

Certainly in this last instance Lord Ravensworth has forgotten the dignity which he admires, in common with most scholars, in Lord Derby's Iliad.

One word more shall be the last of fault-finding. Why on earth should the striking periphrasis (viii. 625) for Vulcan's shield, "Non enarrabile textum," be translated as it is in this version, "The shield's inexplicable tart"? Of all the words that are calculated to puzzle in their non-natural sense this is the most gratuitously puzzling.

It would be a sad thing if versions such as this were stereotyped. Still, though we have pointed out blots, we are very far from quarrelling with Lord Ravensworth's experiment. A really good version of the Æneid, even in blank verse, would furnish another proof that unlettered folk may enjoy the spirit of the Virgilian epic, even as they enjoy Pope's version of the parting of Hector and Andromache whenever it is read aloud. We believe there is a better chance for heroic couplets, for Spenserian stanzas, and, best of all, for ballad metres. But when prose versions have to be pitted against poetic versions, something is wrong about our poetical translators. Much in Lord Ravensworth's work—notably the latter half of the last book—shows that with careful revision and casting away of fear as to multiplying lines of English his last half of the Æneid might earn a place, which its present inaccuracies scarcely justify it in asserting, in the first ranks of modern classical translation.

THE MAID OF SKER.

AS may be imagined by those who have read Lorna Doone, The Maid of Sker differs as widely as possible from the fashionable modern novel. It may be called an historical romance, in so far as it embodies vivid pictures of remote social life in England some ninety years ago. It is eminently a novel of character, inasmuch as the ancient fisherman who tells the story offers his character for our scrutiny by way of perpetual problem. Sensational it is, no doubt; but the sensation is subdued and subordinated; it follows the story, as it were, rather than forms it. In places, indeed, we think of Dr. Johnson's criticism on Sir Charles Grandison. When giving Richardson's novel the highest praise, he remarked that, if you were to read it for the story, you would be inclined to hang yourself. Above all, The Maid of Sker bears the traces of thought, of care, and of labour upon every page, and exacts corresponding patience on the part of the reader, if he desires to appreciate its merits and beauties. For these might easily escape notice in a hurried perusal. It is rather the author's way, indeed, to employ the art that has learned to conceal art, and to betray his power with a studied absence of design. For example, few writers shine more in description. He uses language at once precise and poetical. With a complete command of words he has a happy gift of selection. It is plain enough that he faithfully paints nature from the life, yet he adds the touches, introduces the lights, and succeeds in reproducing the effects to which the ordinary observer would fail in giving expression. There is a hurricane which he describes at length in his opening chapters. He describes it with extreme minuteness; he does not omit a tint of the changing skies, or a single significant token of the rage of the angry elements. It is heralded, accompanied, and followed by strange and ominous phenomena, and yet he proves his power by holding us spell-bound as we see before us all that he describes. But more usually he contents himself with merely throwing in little unconsidered bits of description, which convey so much that they make us covetous of more. Whether this reserve be a vice or a virtue, it arises in great measure from the design of his book. In making an uneducated seaman and fisherman his spokesman, the author hampered himself in a way that taxed his talents to the utmost, while it denied them legitimate scope. As it is, the necessity of doing his story justice compels the old man to step out of his natural part. He thinks and speaks above his station. He makes a just application of words of which we cannot believe for a moment that a rude seaman can understand the meaning, and he spells polysyllabic derivations from the Greek with perfect accuracy. He indulges himself in humorous allusions which should be far beyond his natural depth. We venture no criticism on his actions, for, inconsistent as they sometimes seem with his nature, we know that all mankind are made up of incongruities, and old David Llewellyn is a most original specimen of his species. Nor are we disposed greatly to blame Mr. Blackmore if Llewellyn is inconsistent. If fault there is, it arises, as we said, from the mistake of the original design. In fact Mr. Blackmore has pushed his conscientious regard for consistency to a length which in the end becomes somewhat monotonous. Llewellyn, in his own sphere, is a humourist, a cynic, a philosopher, and a shrewd and caustic observer. There is often excellent humour in his remarks on men and things, in the gloss he puts on his own very ambiguous morality, in his running comments on his own actions, and the behaviour of other people. There is a sustained, although subdued, brilliancy about his speech with which at first we delight to dally. We are ever on the watch for some neat turn of thought, for some quaint comment from an original point of view. We have such surprises in abundance, nor does the well of wit run dry all through the volumes. But the wit necessarily smacks of the salt, until at last it begins to pall upon us. Llewellyn throughout asserts his individuality; no fault certainly, but undoubtedly a misfortune, for at last the inevitable mannerisms of the book come to detract from its unquestionable merits. Through a simple story, observing absolute unity of place and compassed in a single volume, David Llewellyn might have played his part to the glorification of the author and the delight of the readers. As it is, it must be owned that we sometimes have enough of him. We are wearied with his garrulosity. We know the tone of his talk about women and their ways, and of his remarks about matters in general. We could wish Mr. Blackmore had given us more of some of those secondary characters which he has drawn with rare vigour and discrimination.

There is another unaccustomed feature in this novel which we fear will not tend to its popularity. In these days love is lord of all at the circulating libraries, yet, in defiance of fashion and precedent, Mr. Blackmore almost dispenses with it. To be sure there is one marriageable young lady who cherishes a passion through the volume, but the course of affection runs rough with her all the time, and we are only allowed at rare intervals to see her making herself unhappy in the society of her lover; while the Maid of Sker is a baby for most of the time, or the childish object of boyish attachments. At the end, of course, she is wooed and married, and then Mr. Blackmore fetches up his leeway in a style that makes us regret he had not given us more of the tender passion. For our own part, we could wish that all the love-making of most novels was mercilessly suppressed. We should be relieved of much that is mawkish and monotonous, and works of fiction would be compressed into reasonable, if not readable, bulk. We pay Mr. Blackmore no ordinary compliment, then, when we express the wish that he had multiplied and lengthened his love scenes. Slight as it is, we have seldom met anything prettier in novel-writing than that where the Maid meets her naval lover in the passage, and welcomes him home from the glorious victory of the Nile.

The little Maid is a waif of the sea, who drifts on to the beach of Glamorganshire, where old David Llewellyn is pursuing his calling as a fisherman. The old man is fascinated by her infant beauty and winning ways, but more delighted still with the smart little boat in which she has been drifting. It is the very thing for his fishing. The child gains upon him so that he is sorely tempted to keep her. But butcher's meat is dear, and therefore, dismissing the extravagant caprice, he decides to give her up, and to keep the boat. At first we are greatly puzzled to know what to make of Mr. Llewellyn, and to the last, indeed, we are by no means clear about him. Undoubtedly from the first he looks sharply to the main chance, and considers himself a good deal, as is not unnatural with an elderly widower. At the same time he seems to be so frank with it all, he shows such a captivating simplicity of mind, he seems to have so soft a heart for beauty, childhood, and helplessness, that we cannot help hoping his candour may do him injustice. As we come to know him better, we are constrained to dismiss the illusion. He has his good points, of course, although we are often disappointed even in these. But on his own showing he has most of the vices that usually fall to the lot of elderly seafaring humanity, and has cultivated others that are generally considered the monopoly of landmen. Above all, as we have said, he is intensely selfish. He would never dream of indulging his feelings in an act of generosity at the cost of the smallest personal sacrifice. Accordingly, with considerable regret, he quarters the pretty child he has found on a rude, but well-to-do, household in his neighbourhood. As she grows up he dotes upon her so far as his nature can love anything but himself. It is a significant and clever trait that she takes precedence in his affections over his own little granddaughter Bunny. He watches anxiously over her fortunes, partly or principally because he thinks his own may probably be bound up with them. For it is plain enough that she is no common child; her highbred beauty and the refinement of her infant manners are stronger evidence on this head than the extraordinary fineness of the linen in which she was washed ashore. Yet retributive justice visits him in the shape of his own selfish short-sightedness. For, in his anxiety to keep it, he makes a mystery of the little boat which might have led to the foundling's identification, and to his being handsomely rewarded for finding her. How soon he has a suspicion of her parentage we are not prepared to say, for it is hard to follow the crafty workings of his mind. But he knew that an infant answering the description of his treasure-trove had been carried off from Devonshire, and the date of its disappearance corresponded exactly with the time when this other one turned up mysteriously in Glamorganshire. Certain little circumstances unknown to other people were in his knowledge all the time, and if he did not put two and two together, he must have been much less shrewd than we give him credit for being. Of course the Maid of Sker finds her parents in the end, and all that astonishes us is that she was not restored to them sooner. It is true that ninety years ago the coast of Devon lay much further from that of Glamorgan than it does now. In those days it was a six days' journey by land between the counties, and the precarious communication by sea was by coasting craft. Still, when the infant heir of a great house disappeared dramatically from a grand fête given to the county, while the disappearance burdened an innocent member of the family with the accusation of a horrible crime, it is difficult to fancy that the rumour of the event would not spread and lead to the identification of the mysterious infant of Sker. But there is a certain weirdness and wildness pervading the whole story that makes it seem pedantic to test it by ordinary probabilities. The perilous water journey which the child made safely in her little boat is as unaccountable in its way as the long deferred establishment of her identity with the daughter of the Squire of Narnton Court. When Mr. Llewellyn speculates later on the action of the tides and currents, he has to invoke the phenomena of the unprecedented storm to give more likely colouring to his explanation. That storm too whirls up the Glamorganshire sands in a way which we should only have conceived possible in the lightly heaped drifts of Eastern deserts, swallowing up five stalwart lads in a single catastrophe. Yet, unlikely as it all sounds to our sober sense, and much as it exercises us on subsequent reflection, Mr. Blackmore's talent or genius makes us receive it all as we read. He has taken a leaf from Swift and Defoe. Occasionally he fills in a conception bold to extravagance with a careful realism of petty detail. On thinking the matter over we may be sceptical as to the existence of Brobdingnag or Lilliput, nor can we understand how an island could lie out of the track of ships anywhere in the latitude where Crusoe was shipwrecked. But we feel ashamed of our scepticism and blame our own stupidity, when we find Captain Gulliver exact to a line in the dimensions of all that appertains to his pigmy entertainers, or when Crusoe enters with the precision of a logbook into each petty detail of his misadventures.

It is not only the incidents of Mr. Blackmore's plot which smack of the marvellous. As in Lorna Doone, he revels in the delineation of a wild and semi-lawless state of society. Only in Lorna Doone the law-breakers openly set the law at defiance, and as robbers or highwaymen turn their hands avowedly against every man; whereas the most sinister and striking character in the Maid of Sker is the Rev. Stoyke Chowne, a man of family, a clergyman, and a justice of the peace. We wonder if society in Devon ninety years ago was really as Mr. Blackmore represents it, and whether such a man as Parson Chowne was a possibility. His conduct throws into the shade the clerical eccentricities of his neighbour, Parson Rambone, who held the champion's belt for wrestling and bruising against all Western England. For Chowne by his crimes makes himself the terror of his neighbourhood, and revenges himself by means equally violent and commonplace on all who were unlucky enough to provoke his resentment. He fired the farmers' ricks, had his enemies maimed or murdered, bullied and outraged successive bishops, kept a pack of ferocious hounds about him, and a gang of naked gipsies on his property. His crimes were notorious; hundreds of times he placed himself within reach of the law; he had accomplices in all rank, and his coachman admitted, in conversation with Mr. Llewellyn, that he had committed arson repeatedly by his master's orders; yet Chowne was never reached by the law, nor did he greatly lose caste among his equals.

In short, we cannot pretend to say how far Mr. Macrom may have pushed the privilege of a romancer, for we confess that he transports us for the most part into a world of which we know but little. But, let fact or fiction begin or end where they will, the book is exceedingly able, and strikingly original. There is much powerful writing in it, a great deal of dry humour, with some touches of rare pathos, and to our mind its chief blemishes flow from the original error of judgment that cast it in an unfortunate form.

MINOR POETS.*

MR. MACROM, in offering his poems to the reader's notice, "expresses a hope that they may gain his approbation thoughtfully." We have noticed before now that not a few of our Minor Poets demand that they should be not only admired, but also read, and not only read, but read thoughtfully. Now, just as Polonius was ready in almost one and the same breath to admit that the cloud that Hamlet pointed to was like a camel, or backed like a weasel, or very like a whale, so the poet could find numbers of persons who, with just as little consideration, would admit that his poems were Shakespearian, Spenserian, or Tupperian, or anything else that he might require.

Si plus appocere visus,
Fit Mimnermus et optivo cognomine crescit.

The demand for thoughtful approbation belongs, if we are not mistaken, to our time. Bavius and Mævius, Tibbald and Cibber were satisfied with praise, and did not ask for thought.

Call Tibbald Shakspeare, and he'll swear the Nine,
Dear Cibber I never matched one ode of thine.

It may not perhaps be hard to find the reason why the Minor Poet of the present day is more exacting than his predecessors. It is not indeed all of them who thus challenge their reader's close attention. Many of them by their apologetic prefaces show that they will thankfully accept any praise of any kind. These authors, however, who make so large a call on our brains are those who have begun by first fairly puzzling their own. They have confused themselves over what they call metaphysics or philosophy. They have selected a subject which they do not understand, and they write about it in language which they do not understand, and then, lost in amazement at their own unintelligibility, they call for the thoughtful approbation of the world. Bad poetry is bad enough in itself, and bad philosophy is bad enough in itself. It has been reserved especially for the present age to have to suffer from the two at one and the same time, and to be constantly lost in wonder whether its poet is more foolish as a philosopher, or its philosopher more foolish as a poet.

Mr. Macrom has written two poems, only one of which, however, we can pretend to have read. And as this poem contains as many lines as five or six books of the Paradise Lost, we shall not perhaps be greatly censured when we state that we went through it, to use Mr. Gladstone's words, not by steps, but by strides, not by strides, but by leaps and bounds. The poem which is entitled "Idealities" thus opens:—

It was upon the mountain once revered—
The sacred ground of Helicon, I sat,
And in the action of its attributes—
A fascination of celestial sense;
For so I dreamed; this was its character;
Another action that unfolded mine—
A life in life,—a power addressing power;
The while I lived a subject of its realm.

When we had read so far we turned to see how it would end, and found a conclusion not unworthy of its beginning:—

The recent vision! Improvements,—
That semblance of reality—was gone;
Merged in the actual,—the Universe.

We thought that we had read quite enough to be entitled to express our disapprobation thoughtfully, but nevertheless we thought it best to try whether the four thousand or so lines of the poem were all written in the same distracting style. The poet, we found, after a disquisition on Man, and the "retrogressive impulses" to which he has given himself up, and the "moral drunkenness" which is produced in him by certain "dire draughts," at a time when his brow is disgraced by a wreath "whose flowers were worthy of Tartarean meads," then has a vision. He gets into some place where there is "mellow duskiness" and "a blue-toned dusk"—such a place, apparently, as where one might expect to find, to quote his own words,

Intelligence in unison,
To sympathize the sympathy it felt:—
A sense-embodiment of sentiment,
In real aspect, as in feeling, like;
For vision's life of each external phase.

There Apollo meets the Muses, and addressing them as "Gentle associates," says, "I send my greeting." Why he says "I send my greeting," when they are actually before him, is not at first sight quite clear. By the time we reach the fourth line, however, we find that Apollo had to get a rhyme for "attend," and so might meet with some indulgence for using the wrong word. Moreover, as when he spoke the Muses and "everything around" were "charmed into listening joy," we poor mortals ought, we suppose, to be satisfied. Apollo and the Muses hold a highly philosophic discussion on "the microscopic fly," on "nature's prompting prophecies," and on "Perfect Justice," written in capital letters. And then Apollo exclaims:—

* Unseen and Identical. Poems by J. B. Macrom. London: Smith, Elder & Co. 1872.

Songs of Life and Death. By John Payne, Author of "Intaglios: Sonnets," "The Masque of Shadows," &c. London: Henry B. King & Co. 1872.

Would
That this general belief, so good,
Were equally as wide in practice too.

Thereupon he informs his sisters that there is a gentleman watching them hidden in the bushes. He treats the poet with the greatest affability, calls him "Brother on Earth," and, in fact, when he takes leave of him at the end of about one hundred and thirty pages, says:—

Now must I say
Farewell: O, let it be but transiently!
Farewell! Farewell!

But before this happy conclusion is reached, each of the Nine Muses has her say. Polymnia—a foot-note tells us that Polymnia is "the contraction for Polyhymnia"—has a good deal to say about "the sum of mind so unity (sic) essayed," while Erato, who is under an impression that the middle syllable of her name is long, discourses on "the spirit law of consanguinity," and "the little home-nest" that is "soul-magnetic to the gaze." Olio goes on talking at such length that she is obliged of herself to own that "this theme of immortality has made me slightly stray," and thereupon, joining in a kind of duet with Calliope, the two declare in italics that "his retrospection proves what has been gained." We have our doubts whether the two Muses are not here quoting Proverbial Philosophy, but as we are not in a position to prove it, we will give them credit for whatever originality there may be in the sentiment. Even the Nine Muses get tired of talking at last, and Apollo, as we have said before, wishes the poet farewell. With him we will also wish Mr. Macrom farewell, but we cannot add with Apollo, "O, let it be but transiently!"

We do not think that Mr. Payne's Songs of Life and Death are quite equal to his Intaglios, which we had the pleasure of reading and praising last year. Some of the poems indeed are equal to anything he then wrote, but we doubt if the general level is kept quite so high. It may be that the sonnet, which to most writers is so difficult to handle, especially suits Mr. Payne's genius, and that he was more successful in his last work simply because he used a form of verse which suits him better. Nevertheless there is much in his present work that deserves high praise. Had, indeed, the whole volume been equal to the best of the poems, we should have hesitated before we ventured to review it among our Minor Poets. As it is, we almost owe an apology to Mr. Payne for the company in which we place him, and we ought to acknowledge that, if he is a Minor Poet, he deserves at all events to be reckoned their undoubted leader. There is often an originality in his poetry, a subtlety in his thoughts, a niceness in his language, and a melody in his versification, which at the present time we look for in vain in any but some one or two of our leading poets. Many of the poems, we must admit, we do not care for, and at times we come to lines that seem poor and forced. The following stanza, for instance, from the poem entitled The Dead Master, seems to us not only to be, like the future it mentions, involved in a haze, but also by its subject and the versification of the last line to be somewhat too suggestive of Mr. Browning's Grammarian's Funeral:—

Have we then heard thy singing for the last time
Shape us the glories of the olden days?
Have we a last time listened to the lays,
Wherein thou seal'dst the ancient heavens for pastime
And in the future's iridescent haze
Builtlest the past-time?

Mr. Payne, like Mr. Swinburne and some others among the poets, is extravagant in his admiration of France and his detestation of her conquerors. He addresses her as "the fairest and the holiest," as "Our Saviour France, the lover of mankind," as "writhing in the Vandals' hands," and "straining piteously against the brutal tyrant." But we can forgive Mr. Payne for his occasional haziness both in poetry and history when he gives us such fine poems as "The Ballad of Shameful Death," "Vocation Song," "Madrigal Triste," and "A Farewell." It is always difficult in the space we have at command to make such a selection from a poet as will do justice to him. Perhaps the following lines from the "Vocation Song" will show at once Mr. Payne's powers, and also a certain morbid melancholy of which we find too much in him. We should add that we omit the second and third stanzas:—

Lord, what unto Thy servants shall be given,
That have so long in pain and doubt and strife,
For Thee with hand and heart and song hard striven,
What time Thou givest out the crowns of life?

We do not ask of Thee, as this our garden,
To live a shining life among Thy blest;
'Twould be for us but abiding of Thy burden,
Not the fulfilment of the longed-for rest.

We have no kin with those uplifted faces,
Those ordered ministers that before Thee bow,
Set rank on rank upon the holy places,
With stiff sharp laurel fringing every brow.

For us, no haloes of Heaven could stay our yearning,
No crown of woven lilies and pale palms,
No City with eternal glory burning,
Set in the golden stress of careless psalms.

Miss Tupper gives us some poems which she says are translations, and other poems which she calls original. Her translations we read with a certain satisfaction, as we are kept all along in the best of company. In only one case does she descend below the poems of a Baroness, and, to make up for this solitary slip, we have translations from the writings of a King, of a Royal Highness a Prince, and a Royal Highness a Princess. As for what she calls her original poems, we shall next expect to find people talking of original echoes. Miss Tupper will certainly do better to keep to her translations from royalty than to write such original verses as the following, even if she has an Empress for her subject:—

Nobly the Empress did her part
In that dark time of woe,
And long from every loyal heart
Shall blessings on her flow.
So, gladdened by her people's love,
Thrice happy may she live,
Till the Great King who reigns above,
A brighter crown shall give!

We learn with satisfaction from an announcement on the fly-leaf, that these poems have been printed by water-power. We are told, moreover, that "these printing works are the first in the country where water-power has been applied to the art of printing." If water-power has not been applied to the art of printing, it has certainly for long ages been applied to the art of poetry. We are glad to find that inventive skill has advanced so far that in the printing of modern poetry an agent can be used with which it has so much in common.

The Chutney Lyrics are, we are told, "a collection of comic pieces in verse, of which twelve have already appeared in the columns of the Madras Athenæum and Daily News." Some of the pieces are tolerably lively, but we should scarcely have thought them worthy of republication, still less of sending all the way to Europe. No doubt in the intense heat of Madras a very little comicality will go a great way, for we have always noticed in our own country, that the higher the quicksilver stands in the thermometer the lower is the standard by which a joke is criticized; so that many a professed punster, who in January is voted a very dull fellow, in August passes off as a wit. In fact, the smaller fry among the humorists would do well if they always consulted the thermometer before they fired off their jokes, and never attempted to be comical if it marked less than 80 degrees in the shade. Of these Madras poems, moreover, some are so full of local allusions, and of words of the country, that to an ordinary reader they are altogether unintelligible. We will not undertake to say that the following verse may not to an Anglo-Indian pass as humorous. To the ordinary Englishman it is little better than gibberish:—

She is coming, my godown, my ghaut!
She is coming, my dawk, my sweet!
My catchery leaps, and my tops
In my bosom begins to beat,—
O my love, my masoolah, my ghee,
Thy poochie is at thy feet!

One of the poems, we are sorry to say, is written in the worst possible style, and is highly discreditable to the Englishmen who were concerned in the affair which is described, and to the author who wrote of it. The piece is bad enough in itself, but is made much worse by an explanatory note which the author has added. Even if the poem had had no foundation in fact, it would have been sufficiently shameful for an Englishman living in Madras to tell with glee how some of his fellow-countrymen, the leading civil and military officers of the station, accepted an invitation to a ball given by a Parsee, and then, while enjoying to the full all that their host with lavish hospitality had provided, ducked him in a tank as being a Parsee. Gross though the insult is to the native population, we should have hoped it would have been regarded as still grosser by our own countrymen. We should have hoped that not even a writer of comic pieces would have ventured to assert that in India a collector, a colonel, a major, a captain, and "the leading gentry," were mean enough to accept a man's hospitality because he was rich, and to insult him because he was a Parsee. Such a poem, we repeat, even if it had been a fiction from beginning to end, would have been bad enough, and would have shown where lies our greatest difficulty in governing India, and whence arises much of the ferocity that was displayed by the native population in the great mutiny. The author, however, informs us that "this piece is founded on fact," that the host was "turned out of the ball he himself had given because he was a 'nigger'." The parasite would seem to flourish everywhere. If he is weak, he is greedy and servile; if he is strong, he is greedy and insolent.

AMERICAN LITERATURE

THE two most important, the largest, and the most characteristically American works in our present monthly list are biographies—the one of a past, the other of a possible, President—

* The Life of Abraham Lincoln; from his Birth to his Inauguration as President. By Ward B. Lamon. With illustrations. Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

† The Autobiography of Horace Greeley; or, Recollections of a Busy Life. To which are added Miscellaneous Essays and Papers. Illustrated. New York: E. B. Tilton. Chicago: T. A. Smith. Detroit: Randall & Fish. St. Louis: H. C. Wright. San Francisco: Dunsmuir & Co. 1872.

Abraham Lincoln and Horace Greeley. Enormous length and minuteness, of detail, and the intrusion of much irrelevant and uninteresting matter, are common to both; and both throw a good deal of light on the peculiar conditions of political life in America. Probably English memoirs might be found of as intolerable size as this of Mr. Lincoln, which occupies upwards of five hundred of the largest octavo pages, closely printed, in relating his life down to the first moment at which that life acquired anything of public interest or significance. But they would seldom be equally worthless and wearisome, if only because an Englishman who has at any time filled an equal space in the public eye has been for many years before his final elevation an active public character, an important figure on the stage of history, or at least a participator in business of national and historical interest. But all of Mr. Lincoln's life that has any political value or historical importance was included in the period of less than five years which elapsed between his selection as the candidate of his party in 1860, and his murder in April 1865. Whatever interest attaches to his previous career is reflected upon it by his Presidency, and is simply such as we feel in the boyhood and early youth of one who has afterwards distinguished himself. It is interesting to learn what education such a man received, what signs of superiority his youth afforded, what circumstances first opened to him the career in which he has risen so high; but it would be intolerable to have to read hundreds of pages about his family, unknown and unworthy to be known, his lessons and his games, his unmarked and uneventful private life, his petty adventures and his paltry jokes, with long digressions about all his relatives and acquaintances. And if anything could aggravate the insufferable tediousness of such a narrative, it would be that laboured lightness of style which is affected by a certain class of bookmakers, English and American; and which combines the brilliancy of Mr. Sala with the self-confidence of Mr. Hepworth Dixon, the voluminous facility of Dr. Doran, with the affected flippancy of Mr. Jeffreys. Mr. Lincoln never was a man of importance or prominence till he became chief magistrate of his country at the crisis of her fortunes—a crisis precipitated, if not created, by his election. At this point, however, the present volume leaves him, with the promise of a continuation, which, if any law of proportion is observed, ought to occupy ten such volumes. Abat omnia! It may be worth while to explode even such innocent and insignificant fictions as those which gathered round the early life of the rail-splitter and bargee, but it is hardly worth any one's while to study the refutation. The stories are true in substance and impression, if false in actual form. If Lincoln did not split rails, he did saw planks for a neighbour's house—which planks have since been cut into walking-sticks by relic-hunters; if he did not make a trading voyage in a boat of his own, he did in that of his employer, and so forth. His early life was really as rude, as hard, as devoid of luxury and culture, as it has been depicted; he was the son of a thriftless father, belonging to the lower class of American farmers, and seems in his earliest youth to have shown much of his father's temper, and not a little tendency to sink into the character of a loafer. He had very little schooling—not a year altogether, we are told—and whatever education he displayed in later life, and it was not much, was due to solitary and somewhat desultory reading. He had been a labourer and shopkeeper before he became a lawyer, and had not succeeded in either capacity. He served as a captain of volunteers in the "Black Hawk" War—so called from the name of the Indian chieftain who commenced it. On one occasion, by offering to fight any man of his company with any weapons, he saved the life of a helpless, harmless, and friendly Indian, an incident which displayed at once the utter want of discipline and ruffianism of the private, and that cool and resolute decision which the officer was one day to exhibit on a wider stage and in graver contingencies. This war first introduced Lincoln to popular favour. He was elected to the State Legislature, and afterwards to Congress, and gradually, as a prominent member of the anti-Slavery party, became the personal opponent and rival of Stephen H. Douglas, the leader of the Northern Democrats, and the chief advocate of that last effort to hold the balance even between the extreme parties and to conciliate the prejudices of the North without such an utter sacrifice of Southern claims as would have broken up the Union, which was founded on the Dred Scott decision, and was finally defeated by the break-up of the Conservative party in 1860. Thus it was, perhaps rather by his rival's eminence than his own, that Mr. Lincoln came to rank among the prominent chiefs of the nascent anti-Southern or Republican party, while he had never provoked that bitter hatred in the South and that distrust in the North which were felt for such real leaders of the party as Seward and Sumner. Hence his selection as a comparatively "safe candidate that no one ain't afeard on" by the Republican Convention, a selection probably made with little idea of actual success. Mr. Lincoln's supporters were in a very decided minority, and prevailed only through the irreconcilable quarrel of the extreme Southern Democrats with Douglas and his Northern adherents. The volume closes with a notice of the consequences of his election; the secession of the Southern and the fierce excitement of the Border States, the rumours of intended kidnapping or assassination, and the ridiculous flight of the President-elect from imaginary dangers, of which the writer gives a lively though contemptuous account, and of which, as he declares, Mr. Lincoln was soon heartily ashamed; and, finally, of the "inauguration" at Washington, and Mr. Lincoln's deprecatory appeal to that confidence in the Constitution and in the good faith of their fellow-citizens which the John Brown raid had finally and inevitably driven from the minds of the Southern people.

Mr. Greeley's Memoirs—which, if we are not mistaken, is really, though not nominally, a new edition of a work we noticed not many months ago—consists of a series of autobiographical sketches, not forming a connected record of his life, but giving a lively account of its principal vicissitudes, and of those scenes and circumstances which had impressed themselves most vividly upon the mind of the writer. Mr. Greeley, like Mr. Lincoln, was born in the lower ranks of an agricultural community, and of a family either "feckless" or unlucky, or both; and he probably knew as much of actual hardship and privation in his boyhood as the great majority of his countrymen. Unlike Mr. Lincoln, he chose a city life; and while Mr. Lincoln gradually worked himself up through politics and law to a public position, Mr. Greeley early chose his profession as a journalist; and even when actually seated in Congress was known, and preferred to be known, to his countrymen chiefly through the New York Tribune. Without saying more of a volume which is not new to the public, we may note that both these biographies illustrate the present tendencies of American politics in an unintentional, but a very marked, manner. The selection of Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Greeley in preference to men far superior to them in public estimation and established eminence, as the candidates of their respective parties, was undoubtedly prompted by a shrewd appreciation of popular preference for self-made men; for men who are not too refined, too cultivated, too superior to the electing multitude; who, as Presidents, will owe their temporary elevation above the farmer or tradesman who votes for them solely to his vote; who have no other superiority than what they derive from public favour, and in whom the rudest of their supporters sees only what he might have been, and what his sons may become. We perceive also that, as men of independent hereditary fortune are almost ostracized from public life, there are but two professions by which a politician can well hope to live when his party is out of power—that is, if he means to be honest and independent, and refuses to sell either his vote or his patronage—namely, the Bar and the Press. The former has been hitherto the chief nursery of American statesmen, since the old order died out with the younger Adams; but there are indications that in the future the Press offers even better opportunities, and perhaps a not less lucrative career. It is also worthy of note how easy and frequent, in a society where education of a sort is generally diffused, where few native-born citizens are wholly illiterate, and where the advantages of knowledge are appreciated, is the rise of men, by their own exertions and by diligent self-education, from a very low place in the social scale to competence and respectability. Few men have less schooling than Lincoln, yet he contrived to make himself a competent lawyer and legislator—the former certainly an easier task in America than in England. Mr. Greeley had no educational advantages greater than any village child may enjoy, either in Old or New England; yet his pen has for many years past been among the most powerful in the Union. Not a few of the foremost men in the States began life, we believe, under no better auspices. And it is not that they have dispensed with education, as we sometimes see men able to do, and yet achieve wealth and influence in special careers—for, though not scholars, most of them are cultivated and well-informed; it is that they have had the resolution—partly, no doubt, because they had means and encouragement—to educate themselves. As it seems probable that the political business of America will be thrown more and more into the hands of men born in the same rank as Lincoln and Greeley, it is earnestly to be hoped that those who aspire to popular favour will continue, as heretofore, to fit themselves by diligent self-culture for posts to which they are chosen because they were supposed to be "plain" and uncultivated men.

Two Church histories of considerable pretension are before us. That of Dr. Butler, in two volumes, brings down the annals of the Church to our own day; but it is written after the fashion of a chronicle, in single short paragraphs, each with its separate title, and each telling in a few curt, dry sentences the story of the person, incident, or subject to which it refers. Such a broken and disconnected method of narration would spoil the effect of the best style and the most interesting matter; and Dr. Butler's style is as far from being lively as a great part of ecclesiastical history is from being entertaining. The result is, that though the work may be convenient as a book of reference, it is singularly unreadable as a connected narrative. The other work, by Dr. Mahan, in a single thick octavo volume, confines itself to the first seven centuries, and deals with the gradual foundation of the Church by the Apostles and their successors, its struggles with Paganism, its progress towards victory and supremacy, and the development of its doctrine and discipline. Though specially anxious to preserve a connected treatment and chronological order, the writer practically divides his work into a series of chapters, each treating of a particular subject—a heresy, a personal career, an ecclesiastical epoch, or the like; and the effect is that his history gives a more definite view of the course of ecclesiastical events, the causes and the tendencies of the different movements within the Church, and the manner in which it came to be what it was, and to hold the position it did at the fall of the Western Empire, than many works of far greater repute, deeper research, and higher authority. Intended rather for students than for scholars, it is calculated to serve as a useful introduction to ecclesiastical history on the one hand, and a valuable epitome for those who have no leisure to go further on the other. There is, as was natural, a strong ecclesiastical and orthodox bias discernible throughout, and heresiarchs especially are judged exclusively through the spectacles of their enemies and conquerors; but it would, we fear, be difficult to find an impartial historian of the Church, and, after all, this tendency probably deviates less from the truth than its opposite.

We may briefly mention two other works of a theological or ecclesiastical character: a comparison between the characters and careers of Wesley and Swedenborg*, by a writer belonging to the New Church, which, if it contains little that is novel, at all events deals with two familiar personages from a new point of view; and a volume of Sermons† by a popular preacher, in which passing events or every-day ideas and phrases are made the texts and illustrations of spiritual instruction—instruction conveyed with that familiarity of language and handling which is so popular in the mouth of a Beecher or a Spurgeon, but which is apt to degenerate into something that, to a refined and educated taste, is painfully like profanity.

A treatise on the history of medicine‡ collects a good deal of information respecting the physiological theories, therapeutic practice, and medical superstitious of ancient times—Greek, Roman, Oriental, and mediæval—and respecting the life and teaching of some of the oldest practitioners of the art, from Hippocrates downwards. It is far too brief to give anything like a connected history of that real development of medical science which began but a few centuries ago, and to which only the latter chapters of a thin volume are devoted; but it will serve to bring within the reach of the curious a good many facts and traditions respecting the infancy of the art and its first reputed practitioners which are interesting, if not useful, and which few would have leisure to hunt out in the unfamiliar original works from which they are derived.

The Land of the Veda§ contains the impressions of an American missionary about the religion, the customs, and the people of India, and his experiences among them during the terrible crisis of 1857. Few Englishmen, of course, will think of looking to such a source for any real information concerning India; the author had infinitely less opportunity of learning anything about the country or its inhabitants than hundreds of English writers whose works are accessible to all, and familiar to many of us, and he is blinded by professional and religious prejudices of a very bitter flavour. It is not to an average missionary—and Dr. Butler is no better—that we should look for a fair and intelligent estimate of the various religions of India, and of their devotees and defenders. He knows fakirs and Brahmins only as enemies of his cause, and odious impostors and deceivers of the people. To the Moslem he stands in the relation of an invader to the most resolute and formidable of the invaded races; and he detests them the more because the very resemblance of their faith to his own makes them more obstinately bigoted against his teaching than those who, if they listen at all, can hardly fail to discern dimly the infinite superiority of Christianity to their own debased and grotesque superstitions. What is interesting in Dr. Butler's reminiscences is due not to his feelings as a missionary, but to his position as an independent and not favourably biased critic of English rule. And it is satisfactory to find that, despite American prejudice, and allowing for differences of opinion and point of view, his sympathies on the whole go strongly with the Imperial race; that he testifies to the comparative excellence of our Government, the purity of motive and devotion to their duties displayed by its servants; and that he abhors the mutineers too fiercely to be deeply shocked by the severity of the retribution inflicted on them. This is natural, perhaps, in one who shared the horrors and perils of an English community during months of constant anxiety and frequent alarms; and who had good reason to believe that Nana Sahib or Tantia Topes would have paid little respect to the doctrines of Grotius and Vattel, and drawn no subtle distinction between the missionary and the civilian—between American and English women and children.

* Wesley and Swedenborg: a Fraternal Appeal to Methodist Ministers, inviting them to consider the Relations of Methodism to the New Church. By E. K. Keyes, Pastor of the first New Church Society in Philadelphia. Philadelphia: Lippincott & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

† Sermons. By the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, Author of "Crumbs Swept Up," "The Abominations of Modern Society," &c. Delivered in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. New York: Harper & Brothers. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

THE CONTEST FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

THE American newspapers have, in their laudable regard for the taste of their native readers, become for some time past utterly unreadable by foreigners. It is only a devoted supporter of General GRANT who can take pleasure in studying the revelations made by an hotel clerk of the number of glasses or bottles of brandy which were sent up on a certain day to the rooms of Mr. GRATZ BROWN, Liberal Republican nominee for the office of Vice-President. Mr. GREELEY, who had hoped to produce a good effect by a series of garden parties at his farm in the country, has been compelled to discontinue his receptions in consequence of the inconvenient curiosity of the reporters for hostile journals. Both the candidates for the Presidency have recently made tours which have been watched by their respective partisans with unequal degrees of anxiety. For some time Mr. GREELEY has abstained from committing himself by any unnecessary declarations of opinion, but it is difficult to be sure of a politician whose business in life is talking and writing. The elaborate speech in which he lately explained his determination not to speak seems to have been both effective and judicious. A denunciation of the Northern adventurers who are called "carpet-beggars" is thoroughly just; and Mr. GREELEY's supporters will not inquire too narrowly whether the intruders have not professed the principles of the Tribune. General GRANT is well known to possess a fortunate incapacity for making speeches, and his supporters have therefore no objection to his showing himself in public. It becomes more and more certain that the contest will lie between the Republicans and the Democrats. Those Republicans who had a right to call themselves Liberal originally seceded from their party with the object of promoting a reform of the Civil Service, a relaxation of the protective system, and, above all, a general elevation of political morality. They were baffled at Cincinnati by the election managers, who were chiefly bent on maintaining the corruption and abuses which had been associated with the candidature of General GRANT. Mr. GREELEY is a passionate and unreasoning Protectionist; and he is thoroughly imbued with the mischievous traditions of modern American politics. When he was lately requested by Mr. SCHURZ to express his opinion on the reform of the Civil Service, he had nothing better to suggest than that the re-election of a President ought to be prohibited by the Constitution. Having taken an active part in the Cincinnati Convention, Mr. SCHURZ thought himself bound to accept its decision; but some of the best of his political associates have resolved either to remain neutral or to support General GRANT. Among the hack politicians of the Republican party the only prominent adherents of Mr. GREELEY are Mr. FAYSON and Mr. BANKS. The nomination of Mr. GREELEY must have been abandoned if it had not been adopted by the Democratic Convention at Baltimore.

Mr. SUMNER's address to the coloured voters in favour of Mr. GRANT appears to have produced no effect. Mr. GANNON, Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS, and Mr. FREDERICK Douglass have made a counter appeal on behalf of General GRANT, and if the question were to be decided by reason, they have the best of the argument. It is true that Mr. GREELEY is an old and consistent Abolitionist; but he is also recognized from the very beginning of the civil war as the right of secession; he proposed the payment of large compensation to the slave-holders, and he repeatedly urged Mr. LINCOLN to offer the Confederates favourable terms of peace. In truth, Mr. GREELEY's course from 1860 to 1865 affords the best proof of his honesty and candour; if not of his disinterestedness. But it is scarcely probable that the negro population should appreciate the motives which induced him to acknowledge the constitutional right of secession, or to offer aid to Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS. As Mr. DOUGLASS remarks, emancipation would never have been effected if the peaceable establishment of the Confederacy had been permitted; and although General GRANT may have been a supporter of the pro-slavery party before the war, he more than all other men contributed to the victory which enabled the North to impose abolition on the defeated States. It seems that in North Carolina the partial success of the Republicans is due to the support of the coloured voters, and it may be presumed that they will follow the same course in other parts of the South. Republican newspaper Correspondents record or invent the use of language which, if it is genuine, proves at the same time that the negroes may be trusted to vote for General GRANT, and that they are utterly unfit to exercise the elective franchise. It is highly probable that if the coloured population votes in a compact body, the white citizens in turn will unite in support of the Democratic candidate. No accurate calculations seem to have been made of the respective numbers of the two classes of voters in the different Southern States. Before the war the whites of the South outnumbered the slaves in the proportion of two to one, though in some of the Gulf States the majority was reversed. Even if all the Southern States were unanimous, they would only form about a fourth part of the entire Union. The most experienced and skilful of the election prophets calculate that the result will depend on the vote of Pennsylvania. In that State the Republicans slightly outnumber the Democrats; and in the list of General GRANT's local supporters are to be found some of the most corrupt and powerful managers of the party.

It is probable that the public discussions of the next two months will on the whole tend to the advantage of General GRANT. The Democrats have with few exceptions made up their minds to support Mr. GREELEY on grounds utterly unconnected with his opinions or his character. The balance of power is in the hands of moderate or non-political voters, who for the most part incline to Republican doctrines. It is true that the most intelligent of the number disapprove of the stupid fiscal policy of the dominant party; and that the regular Republicans thought fit at Philadelphia to pledge themselves to the maintenance of a protective tariff. The Cincinnati Convention left Free-trade an open question, while it selected one of the most bigoted of Protectionists as its nominee. All parties are probably aware that the commercial policy of the United States in no way depends on the opinion of the President. If Congress thought fit to reform the tariff, General GRANT must be too conscious of his own ignorance to interpose the obstacle of the veto, and Mr. GREELEY would certainly not use any influence which he might possess as President for the benefit of consumers. In the confusion of opinions and professions personal qualifications may probably in some degree affect the result of the election; and there can be no doubt that a successful general is a more presentable candidate than the odd and uncouth pamphleteer who has been selected as his opponent. Unless old soldiers in the United States differ from the same class in other countries, the hundreds of thousands of voters who are justly proud of having served in the war will be prejudiced in favour of the representative of the army. Few persons will share the personal animosity which tempted Mr. SUMNER to apprehend the bugbear of a military despotism. The enforcement of martial law in disturbed districts of the South is but the performance of a legal duty imposed by Congress; and it is perfectly well known that if General GRANT or any other officer were insane enough to attempt a military revolution, he would not find a corporal's guard to obey his orders.

There is no reason to suppose that the result of the Geneva arbitration will diminish the popularity of the present Government. The Americans have contrived to persuade themselves that the presentation of the Indirect Claims was not a scandal, nor the collapse of the experiment a failure; and their national self-complacency is not likely to be again subjected to so severe a strain. There would be nothing discreditable to them even in a wholly unfavourable award, because the adverse litigant has admitted, by the signature of the Treaty of Washington, that the Direct Claims were a fit subject for arbitration. There is probably some foundation for the unpleasant rumour that the Arbitrators have decided against England on the question of liability for the acts of some of the Confederate emissaries. There is no party question at stake, for Mr. GAZELER and Mr. SUMNER were among the most vehement advocates of the Indirect Claims, and of the adoption of a hostile tone towards England; and it is now believed that Mr. CUSHING, who belongs to the Democratic party, procured the insertion of the Indirect Claims in the American Case. It may perhaps be with a view to the interests of General GRANT that the American agents at Geneva have, in direct violation of the expressed wishes of the arbitrators, lately published a portion of their arguments. Whatever may have been their motive, they will have satisfied their countrymen that down to the present time there has been no abatement of professional pugnacity, nor any undue consideration of English feeling. When the Tribunal asked for a further argument on the meaning and effect of the new-fangled rules of international law, it perhaps scarcely anticipated a discussion of all the topics which are introduced into the speeches of the American counsel; but possibly they may have intended to address voters in the United States as well as Judges at Geneva. It may not have been thought inexpedient to dwell on concessions which are so unpalatable to Englishmen that they must be agreeable to American patriots. It is scarcely in human nature to abstain from the satisfaction of recording the humiliation of an adversary. The award, even if it is unfavourable to the claimants, cannot efface the fact that the Treaty was concluded under pressure; and Mr. GAZELER's supporters can scarcely contend that any other Government would have extorted more advantageous terms than those which were obtained by General GRANT. At a distance the regular Republican party seems likely to win, but prudent observers will not forget that their means of judgment are imperfect.

ITALY.

THE Italian Government has recently revealed in a semi-official manner the mode in which it proposes to deal with the vexed question of ecclesiastical persons and property in the territory which it has taken from the Pope. It is supposed that this revelation of its intentions is designed to provoke discussion, so that the feeling of the country may be ascertained beforehand, and the proposals of the Government may ultimately be so shaped as to command sufficient Parliamentary support. The Government is in a position of great difficulty. Rome and all the territory of Rome is now part of Italy, and what is law for Italy generally ought to be law for Rome. If the national interests demand the suppression of religious orders and the confiscation of ecclesiastical property elsewhere, they must be supposed to demand the same thing in the capital and the adjacent districts. On the other hand, the Italian Government has proclaimed that it wishes to meet the Pope fairly and liberally, and recognizes his claim to have a special position at Rome as the head of his branch of the Christian world. To do too little would be to offend the bulk of the Italian nation and to show fear of the priests. To do too much would be to invade the spiritual power of the Pope, and to give him a grievance which might seem a grievance even in the eyes of those who thoroughly approve of the transfer of the capital to Rome. Whether lay Italy or priestly Rome will approve of the plan of the Government is doubtful, but at any rate it is based on intelligible principles, and seems to contain the elements of a satisfactory compromise. Outside the city of Rome the law is to be applied exactly as in the rest of Italy. The orders are to be suppressed in the same way, and ecclesiastical property is to be treated in the same manner. But inside Rome there are to be two differences. In the first place, ecclesiastical property is not to be sold for the benefit of the State. The proceeds of sales are to be specially appropriated to purposes having some analogy with those to which the property was originally destined when it passed into ecclesiastical hands. The money is to be devoted to religious, educational, and sanitary purposes. This may not mean much, for, if Rome is to be the capital, large sums must be found somehow to make its sanitary arrangements decent, and the State is only finding the means for doing so. If it appropriates the proceeds of the sales of ecclesiastical property to draining and cleansing the city and contiguous districts. But the object is of course to make it appear that the Government does not wish to profit directly by the which it uses its strength to take on the Pope in his own city, and that it merely secures the application to good ends of property now wasted. In the second place, the property of the religious institutions having their central seat in Rome is not to be taken from them, except that they are to lose the property itself, and receive an equivalent in Italian rentes; and the houses of the great societies are not to be taken from them, except when wanted for purposes of public utility. Thus those institutions of the Roman Church which are of a universal rather than of an Italian character would still go on with their old local habitations and with their present revenues, but Italian land would pass out of their possession.

The arrangement appears in itself well contrived, for it at once recognizes that the Pope has duties to perform which have a scope beyond Italy, and at the same time it sets free Italian land for lay ownership. In a few years it would become almost impossible for any political changes to restore the ecclesiastical party to the possession of what it has lost. Property would pass into the hands of private owners, and experience has shown that the Church never regains what individuals have once bought and paid for. The interest of the religious institutions in Italian rentes would also tend to make them careful how they attacked a Government, the credit of which alone gives value to the securities they would hold. But the dislike of the priests is so bitter in Italy that it is by no means certain that the Government can carry its proposal, and impetuous men will claim that no more mercy shall be shown to their enemies, the priests, at Rome than elsewhere. The Government is alive to this feeling, and takes pains to prove that, if it is going to propose something more favourable to the priests than its supporters would like, it is not from any want of firmness. It has just ordered several ecclesiastical schools to be closed at Rome because Government inspectors were not received in them; and the ecclesiastical authorities had to succumb, and to agree that the schools should be so far placed under lay control before they were permitted to be reopened. The Italian Government also thoroughly joins with the German Government in its policy towards the Ultramontane party, and it will be sure to take every opportunity of avoiding the reproach that it does not dare to do what Prince BISMARCK dares, and that it hesitates between Germany and France. It is also doing its utmost to promote the national and lay feeling in the country, and perhaps its evident sincerity in this direction may, when the time comes, give it strength to carry a compromise with Rome which would be distasteful to the Parliamentary majority. Italians regard the army as at once the bulwark of the nation and as the great instrument for welding together the different parts of Italy, and giving habits of discipline and order to the population. The last time the Italian army showed itself on the field it did not distinguish itself; but the bitter lesson of Custoza was not thrown away. The greatest possible pains have been taken since then to make the army what it should be, and the officers have been made to familiarize themselves with every improvement in the art of war, while the men have been made to rival the Germans in the endurance of strict discipline and fatigue, and in the development of personal energy. During the last few days a series of manoeuvres has been going on in which the heir of the Crown has taken a leading part, and which has been conducted under the eyes of the King. It appears to have been a brilliant and successful affair, and competent judges speak in the highest terms both of the troops and of their leaders.

Italy, too, is constantly making progress in the road to wealth. Italian prosperity does not go on with Mr. GLADSTONE's famous leaps and bounds; it scarcely can be said to take strides; but it goes on at a good practical pace. There is almost always something new to record about Italian progress. The railway has been pushed on and opened to Oraneto, and this will give troops a ready access to districts hitherto infected with brigands. The works by which Brindisi has been made a fit port for the Indian trade are so far completed that travellers now find easy access to large steamers, and can get the requisite accommodation in the town. Venice has then thrown into long forgotten activity by the prospect of having a share in the Eastern trade, once so largely its own, restored to it. Slowly money is being put into the better cultivation of land, agricultural machinery is being introduced, and the backward barbarism of Italian agriculture shows signs of being changed here and there, although the habits of a nation cannot be changed in a single generation.

of the change shows itself in the vitality which brigandage still exhibits. The Papal and the Roman Neapolitan Governments did everything for many years to foster brigandage and make it one of the accepted occupations of the people. One man in Sicily or Southern Italy was a brigand just as another was a shepherd or a cowherd. The inevitable consequence was that the whole population got demoralized on the subject, and no one cared to uphold the law, or was even very much shocked when brigands were reported to have committed unusual atrocities. In Sicily the Government even entered into a sort of alliance with the brigands, and local authorities were left to decide how much brigandage should go on; so that complaints died away, and because no one complained, the Government affected to believe that it had put down the brigandage which it had really recognized. The Italian Government has immense difficulty in dealing with this social curse, and Englishmen cannot fail to sympathize with its difficulty, for we are baffled in Ireland just as the Italian Government is baffled in Sicily and the South. It makes laws and carries them out in a way that answers perfectly well in Tuscany or Lombardy, and as all Italy is one, the law fitted for the better parts is held to be the only law fitted for the worse. The Government cannot use enough severity, and it finds it difficult to use even as much severity as the law permits, as the local juries view brigands with as much sympathy, fear, and admiration as Irish local juries view hedgerow assassins. Even if it can get a peculiarly bad brigand convicted, the Italian Government does not know what to do with him; and, in order to devise a deterring punishment short of death, is said to be contemplating the establishment of a penal settlement in Borneo. Somehow it seems to be necessary to get the consent of the English Government to the project. There is no obvious reason why our Government should object, and we can only hope that the experiment may be more successful than English experience would warrant us in anticipating.

RECENT POLITICAL TALK.

EVEN in the dulllest days of the dulllest time of year something in the way of mild political discussion is sure to be said by somebody. Men who in the Session are very small people politically have a chance of being heard or reported when the vacation comes; and men who during the Session are conspicuous can speak with pleasure and comfort in the holiday time, for it is quite enough for their hearers that it is an eminent man who is addressing them. Mr. Lowe had a little talk at Wick the other day, and although he did not attempt to say anything of the slightest novelty or importance, he gave the utmost satisfaction. The only new feature in his speaking at Wick was probably lost on the burghers of that remote town, and they were unaware how very unusual it was for Mr. Lowe to make a speech in which he was civil throughout, and had a good word and a little bit of praise for everybody. Of course a stranger in Scotland must say something handsome of the Scotch, or things could not go off pleasantly; and Mr. Lowe found as good a subject of congratulation as any when he drew the attention of his audience to the possibility that, as the large majority of Scotchmen are Presbyterians, they may not quarrel at School Boards as bitterly as the more divided English. Lord Frederick Cavendish had scarcely even as much to say to his Yorkshire constituents as Mr. Lowe had to say at Wick; but he has lately given a pledge of his desire to work hard and learn business by accepting the post of the Premier's Secretary, and although most of his speech was nothing but a repetition of the old familiar history of the doings of the Liberal party in the last forty years, and especially in the last four glorious years, yet he suggested or lighted upon one or two points which were not destitute of interest. Defending the Ballot, although not warmly, and avowing that he regarded it only as an experiment, he strove with some ingenuity to do away with the reproach so often urged against it, that it is calculated to foster political apathy. It is not the Ballot, he urged, that makes men careless about voting. For want of the Ballot, many voted who did not in the least care about politics, but who were paid or forced to vote. Now that bribery and intimidation are discouraged by the Ballot, such men have no reason for voting, and so stay away. In a certain degree this is true. It will only be after a general election, or perhaps after more than one general election, that it will be possible to estimate how far the Ballot has really made electors disinclined to vote who, had there been open voting, would have taken a pleasure in recording what they imagine to be their political opinions. In any one election it is possible to overrate the discouraging effect of the Ballot, and some allowance ought to be made for those who in other days voted from corrupt motives, and now stay away because the only motives that ever made them go to the poll no longer influence them.

A second point casually noticed by Lord Frederick Cavendish raises a question which it is very difficult to answer. He wished to comfort his hearers about the state of Ireland, and very naturally no object could be nearer the heart of Mr. Gladstone's Secretary. The ray of consolation which Lord Frederick Cavendish found in his survey of Irish politics beamed on him from the discovery that formerly all Irish revolutionary movements were headed by some portion of the Irish upper classes, while now none but men unknown beyond their own villages are disaffected, and the gentlemen who go in for Home Rule are, on their own showing, perfectly loyal. Is this properly a subject of congratulation or not? It is no doubt in one way easier to deal with the Fenians than they mostly belong to a class of rude and ignorant men, who, if they do anything at all, are sure to do something illegal. They can be watched, seized, and punished by the ordinary arrangements of police, soldiery, and law. On the other hand it is perhaps a source of political danger, and is certainly a source of social demoralization, that the lowest part of a population should nurse a revolution all its own, and that the minds of the poor should be penetrated with a longing for wild change without any influence to counteract the evil, such as springs from the leadership of a movement being in the hands of men of some sort of education, position, and political knowledge. It may be quite true, so far as the English public has any opportunity of judging, that the Home Rulers and the Fenians have no intimate connexion with each other. The Home Rulers are at once asking for what England will not give and Fenian Ireland does not want. An arrangement for concocting Irish jobs in Dublin instead of at Westminster, or even for getting with increased facility permission to lay down gas and water pipes, and to take land wanted for public purposes, is no more an object at which Fenians would be content to aim than the leave to elect provincial mayors would satisfy French Communists. Practically speaking, it makes perhaps little difference whether Lord Frederick Cavendish was right or wrong. Whether it is to our gain or loss that the Fenians and the Home Rulers are distinct in their aims, their feelings towards the Crown, and their social position, there is nothing to do but to keep down the Fenians with firmness, and to try to convince the Home Rulers that England is not going to commit suicide for their amusement. But every one connected with the present Ministry is so fond of making the best of everything Irish, and showing that in some unexpected way things there are all right, even when they seem wrong, that it is occasionally worth while to ask whether there is any ground for the assumptions of Ministerial speakers, and to question whether they do not unnecessarily often beg us to shut our eyes and swear that everything we see in Gladstonian Ireland is very delightful.

While the Liberal member was discoursing Liberalism in the North division of the Riding, Mr. Stanhope was discussing Conservatism in the Southern division. The vacation is for the present the time of the year which we imagine best suits the cast of Mr. Stanhope's political mind. During the Session he seems to have been overwhelmed with the novel secrets as to voting in which he was initiated. He explained to his constituents that he thought when he was elected a few months ago that voting in Parliament was simple, straightforward work. He would have to consider what was the point on which he was going to vote, and to vote accordingly. If he knows better than that now. He understands that he must not so much think of the question at issue as of the connexion of the vote with the tactics of his party. The Conservative Whip, in fact, can see which way a vote will tell in a manner that an honest young Yorkshire squire would never dream of. It is hardly necessary to say that a gentleman who had just made this amazing discovery, and was engrossed in the pleasure of realizing it, did not go very deeply into general politics, or attempt to meet the difficulty of the hour and to sketch the Conservative programme. But one subject of real interest seems to have presented itself in some dim way to his mind. Some one appears on one occasion to have asked him what was the reason why household suffrage should not prevail in the country as well as in the towns. This, he owns, puzzled him. He knew that the country householders ought not to have votes, but why was this? Two reasons appear ultimately to have dawned on him, in which he cheerfully acquiesced as perfectly satisfactory. Assuming that the alteration of the county franchise would be coupled with the institution of electoral districts, he deduced two consequences; the first, that the counties would return fewer members, and the second, that electors would be parcelled out, and have to vote in squares, and that to be a voter in a square district would be a great change. Both reasons have some sort of foundation, but neither of them is the real reason why agricultural labourers should not have votes. Neither political party dares to say what the real reason is, for both think that these rural people may be soon added to the ranks of our masters, and that it is prudent to stand well with them beforehand. The one all-sufficient reason why the county householders should not at present have votes is that they are totally unfit to have them, that they cannot understand any political question, and that they require education before they can be trusted with political power. No doubt this was partly true of the town population; but some risk had to be run on account of the difficulty of drawing a line. Taken as a whole, the rural population is less advanced in intelligence than the urban, although it has a queer shrewdness of its own; and to the experiment of household suffrage in towns there is no immediate cause whatever for adding the experiment of household suffrage in counties. But Mr. STANHOPE was not perhaps far from the truth when he prophesied that before long the Liberal party will try to make capital out of the unrepresented agricultural labourers, and he might have gone on to say that not improbably the Conservative party will, in its desire to secure the special representation of every one connected with the land, rival or outbid its opponents.

THE COUNCILS-GENERAL.

THE proceedings of the Councils established in every French department can hardly be altogether satisfactory to the party which created them. The greatest, if not the only, victory of the majority of the Assembly over M. THIERS was the passing of the decentralization law. M. THIERS was strongly opposed to it on administrative grounds; the Left were strongly opposed to it on political grounds. The one thought that the existence of local checks would be fatal to the direct and vigorous action of the Central Government. The other thought that the existence of local elective bodies would give a great increase of strength to the rural, Conservative, and, as was presumed, monarchical element in the country. Upon this latter point the majority in the Assembly were for once at one with the minority. They hoped that the Departmental Councils would serve as so many centres round which local Conservatism would gather and organize itself, and they took for granted that in proportion as this effect was produced the monarchical party in the country would gain power. Whether M. THIERS's forebodings have been justified there is nothing to show, but the traditional position of the Central Government in France is probably too assured to be soon weakened. The hopes of the Right and the fears of the Left have been at once fulfilled and falsified. The Departmental Councils have done all that was predicted of them, whether by friends or enemies, but the net result of their action has been the opposite of what was expected by either. They have given a considerable degree of organization to local opinion, and that opinion is beyond all question Conservative in its general drift. So far the Right and the Left have both proved true prophets. But this local Conservatism, instead of beginning to agitate in favour of a Restoration, has done nothing but call down blessings on the Republic. After every allowance has been made for the habit of Frenchmen to speak well of the powers that be, and for the influence which the Government exercises in the Councils by means of the Prefects, it seems impossible to doubt that the general sentiment of the majority of them is one of satisfaction with M. THIERS, and of contented acquiescence in the Republic. They are not, of course, to be credited with any theoretical enthusiasm on the subject. They care nothing about the Republican idea. They would be willing to change the Republic to-morrow for any form of Government which would give them a security and tranquillity unattainable under a Republic. But as a matter of fact they believe, and believe for the first time, that the Republic can give them this order and tranquillity, and so long as it does so they have no wish to see it overthrown. The great lever of the monarchical parties is thus withdrawn. Hitherto the establishment of a Republic has always been the beginning of a steadily growing distrust of the Government on the part of the rural population. It was upon this distrust that NAPOLEON III. traded with such success, and it was upon this distrust that Imperialists, Legitimists, and Orleanists alike hoped to trade in the time to come. Unless the future shall disclose some new discord between the Republic and the peasantry this prospect is now at an end. Whatever else the Departmental Councils may do, they will not proclaim HENRY V. or NAPOLEON IV. So long as the Republic deals fairly by the interests which they mostly represent, they will deal fairly by the Republic. They are content with things as they are, and no frame of mind can be less suited to the production of either restorations or revolutions.

However the expectations of their authors may have been disappointed by the action of the Councils, there is reason to hope that their creation will exert a very beneficial influence upon French politics. Public opinion in France has been far too much of a simple dead weight, which rolls from side to side according as the vessel happens to incline. This state of things is partly due to the dissociation of politics from the concerns of the people. Universal suffrage has been combined with a system under which everything has been done for them, and the result has been that, except in times of rare political excitement, they have voted with no conception that they were doing anything which could affect themselves except in some remote and wholly unascertained degree. Educated Englishmen are not usually disposed to think very highly of the system of local self-government which exists in this country. But, with all its faults, it has helped to keep alive an interest in elections, and has accustomed people to look to an election as the ordinary means of getting what they want. It will be a step in the political education of the French people that they should learn to see a connexion between their votes and the conduct of the Government. They will be brought to this point all the more easily if the matter at issue is the construction of a road or the building of a bridge. If they once recognize that when they desire the adoption of this or that measure of departmental policy the way to get their will is to vote for a particular candidate for the Council-General, it will not seem so strange to them that the return of a particular candidate to the Assembly should affect the fate of some measure of general policy which they equally wish to see adopted. It is worthy of note that the most generally expressed sentiment at the recent meetings of the Departmental Councils has been the desire for compulsory education. It may be that the French intellect, which is usually keen where it is most narrow, has discovered that the want of education is a fruitful source of political and social weakness. It may be that the wish is expressed rather as a polite mode of snubbing the clergy, who are for the most part hostile to compulsory education. But whatever may be the motive that has prompted the suggestion, the fact that it has been so generally made must strengthen the hands of the Government in dealing with the subject next year. The Right cannot absolutely reject the testimony of bodies which they themselves invested with power as being the best representatives of local feeling. The last Education Bill became so changed in its progress through Committee that the Government refused to acknowledge it when it came out. The majority will no doubt be anxious to subject the next Bill to a similar process, and in that case the Government will derive useful aid from the proceedings of the Departmental Councils.

The worst use, perhaps, to which the Councils-General could be turned would be to entrust them—as, according to report M. THIERS has, or, more accurately perhaps, had formerly, some thought of doing—with the election of a Second Chamber. No more ingenious means could be devised for bringing the Upper House into hopeless discredit. It would differ from the Lower House, not in being wiser, or richer, or more experienced, but simply in being returned by men specially chosen to see after small affairs and consult small interests. If we can imagine an elective House of Lords the members of which should be returned by the Boards of Guardians, we shall realize the kind of impression which would be made on the French nation by the news that the action of their direct representatives in the Assembly was liable to be overruled by the indirect representatives of local interests. The only thing that could have induced M. THIERS to entertain so wild a fancy is the extreme difficulty of constructing a Second Chamber, coupled with his own desire to get a Second Chamber somehow. The discrepancy between the precise statements of the Times Correspondent and the general denials of them which comes to us through Baron REUTER has not been explained. According to the latter account, M. THIERS is made to say that the Assembly cannot usefully take up the subject of a Second Chamber until it has voted the Budget and passed an Education Bill and an Army Reorganisation Bill. This they mean that on all these points the President feels that he can trust the Assembly to do his bidding, and that he does not care to invent any new modes of bringing pressure to bear on it until it has shown fresh signs of insubordination. In M. THIERS's mind the wish to see a Second Chamber set up is probably altogether secondary to the wish to have the existing Chamber well under control. If he pursues the former object at all, it will be simply as a means of promoting the latter.

THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURER.

THE adoption of Unions and strikes by farm-labourers in several districts is a matter too serious to be neglected, and yet it is difficult and embarrassing to discuss. The prospect of a chronic antagonism among the classes which occupy the rural districts naturally affords unqualified gratification to several sections of the great body of social and political agitators and reformers. The theorists of towns who have cultivated an imaginative hatred of landowners, the advocates of the alleged rights of labour as against capital, and the great majority of unattached philanthropists, all for various reasons welcome the adhesion of the farm-labourer to the doctrines of the modern artisan. There is no doubt that in some counties wages have been habitually low, and the price of labour may probably be raised by combination; but it is in the nature of Trade Unions to be both permanent and encroaching, and a revolution in the conditions of country life is not to be contemplated without uneasiness. Some of the literary promoters of the present movement are in the habit of denouncing the system of land tenure as a cause of deficiencies in agricultural improvement, and of a consequent limitation of the utility of land. That the art of farming has in the memory of the present generation advanced more rapidly than any other industrial process, and that the soil of Great Britain is, in proportion to the capital employed, the most productive in the world, are considerations too vulgar to be allowed to interfere with large generalizations. The farmer must be disappointed to find that the officious friends who have taught him to appreciate the grievances inflicted by his landlord now turn upon him on behalf of the oppressed and discontented labourer. No reduction of rent, no law of compensation for supposed improvements, nor even a tenant-right conferred on the occupier at the expense of the owner, could compensate him for the threatened interference with his management of his own affairs. Present prices, and the prospect of an increasing demand for agricultural produce, may perhaps enable him to bear up against the exaction of additional wages; but if the farm-labourers are to receive orders, like colliers or bricklayers, from a Union Committee, there is little prospect of further improvement in agriculture. The entire system of cultivation depends on the power of the farmer to direct in minute detail the operations of his workmen, which are incomparably more various and more dependent on circumstances than the monotonous toil of the miner or the weaver. A rule analogous to the regulation which prohibits bricklayers from using both hands for certain kinds of work might render profitable farming impossible. Forty years ago the labourers of the time with instinctive provision destroyed thrashing-machines. The more various and elaborate machinery of the present day will furnish some check on the demands of workmen. The extraordinary ingenuity of the Americans in devising mechanical contrivances for farming purposes has been chiefly stimulated by the scarcity of labour.

Any inquiry into the merits of the dispute between the farmers and the labourers is necessarily one-sided in its effect, though not in its substance. If an impartial student of rural economy forms conclusions in favour of the workman, his opinion is at once accepted as an admission by the supporters of agricultural Trade Unions. Any warnings which he may address to the labourers and to their leaders invariably fail to reach their destination. The dullest man can understand a statement that his wages ought to be raised; and a village labourer readily believes the doubtful proposition that the organization of Unions has on the whole improved the condition of mechanics and factory operatives. It is not so easy to explain to him comprehensively that the cultivation of the land is a business which scarcely admits of being conducted under arbitrary rules. Iron must be dug in the shape of ore, smelted, and puddled, and subjected to other processes in regular succession; but much of the work on a farm is discretionary in its nature, and the amount is regulated by considerations of cost. As Lord DERBY remarked in his speech at Bury, while labour is at famine prices employers will naturally reserve it, as far as possible, for unavoidable and urgent wants, just as people resolve to abstain from meat when it is very dear. Labourers in the employment of landowners are to a large extent engaged in effecting improvements which are not urgently necessary, nor perhaps immediately profitable. One of the first results of a successful conspiracy of agricultural labour against capital would be a diversion of a portion of the capital now applied to the land into alien channels. The evil would be aggravated by the formidable nature of the weapons which the labourers' Unions can employ. A strike at the beginning of harvest would threaten farmers with ruin, and the whole country with frightful disaster. Newspaper readers have become accustomed to the statement that committees of carpenters or house-painters have called out the men employed by certain firms, and that the summons has been unhesitatingly obeyed. The consequence will be only that builders and contractors will be embarrassed in the conduct of their affairs, and that ultimately they will be forced to recoup themselves at the expense of the general community. The facts recorded in the daily column of "Strikes" indicate dearer houses, dearer furniture, and an increase of the growing cost of living. The same system applied, in accordance with the benevolent hopes of philanthropists, to agricultural labour may imply the ruin of the farmer and extreme distress to the poor. Lord DERBY has reminded the labourers that it does not follow, because they can make pretty much their own terms at harvest-time, that they will be equally able to do so in the winter months. It is true that in the dead seasons of the year the employer may have his turn; but the labourer is at the worst secured against starvation by his power of seeking in the provisions of the Poor-law an alternative for wages. In this case the rate-payers will enjoy the satisfaction of providing the funds by which the members of the labourers' Union will pay the expenses of the strike. In a short time, if the anticipations of democratic politicians are confirmed by the event, farm-labourers will be admitted to the franchise, and will be enabled to return all the county members. It will follow that the Poor-law will, if necessary, be modified in favour of labourers out of work; and it will be well if the agricultural population is satisfied without further concessions.

If it is useless to compete in argument with agitators before an audience of labourers, it is mischievous for the advocates of agricultural employers to rely on transparent cant. If incitations to popular violence were in any case justifiable, they become imbecile when they are facetiously addressed by bishops and others to the numerically weaker party. Assurances that travelling demagogues are the worst enemies of those to whom they appeal are certain, even if the statements are true, to be regarded as selfish falsehoods. The best security against the impending danger would be the discovery of some arrangement which would visibly and intelligibly identify the interests of the employer and the workman. A pamphlet by Sir BALDWIN LEIGHTON, called the Farm Labourer, contains some suggestions on the subject which deserve consideration from those who have the means of appreciating their practical tendency. He recommends that large gardens should be appended to cottages, and that when it is possible pasture for a cow should be allowed on reasonable terms to the skilful and thrifty labourer. Another proposal is, that money allowances, such as those which are in some parts of the country made to shepherds for the lambs which they rear, should be extended to workmen engaged in the care of stock or in the cultivation of the land. A percentage on the excess of the crop over a certain return per acre, or on the price of fat beasts beyond the cost of purchase, would probably encourage care and industry. It also seems reasonable on an arable farm to increase the wages whenever wheat reaches a certain price, because dearthness of wheat is a clear gain to the farmer and a dead loss to the labourer. It is possible that there may be practical objections to the particular methods of remuneration which are suggested; but some approximation of the kind to a co-operative system would have advantages beyond the mere increase of money payment. Although the employment of a farm-labourer is intrinsically far more diversified, more speculative, and more interesting than any other manual kind of industry, his own share in the study of soils and processes and in the observation of seasons is dissociated from considerations of personal benefit. The dullness of the labourer's life is commonly exaggerated, and his intelligence has never been justly estimated since the days when COSSUTT expressed in vigorous language his contempt for reading and writing in comparison with ploughing and reaping. It is only to a cockney that the contemplation of a turnip-field or a fat bullock is tedious; but it would become infinitely more exciting to the agricultural labourer if he could mentally convert farm produce into shillings and sixpences about to find their way into his pocket. It is possible that a judicious system of allowances proportioned to the results of his labour might disincline the workman to listen to the blandishments of itinerant agitators. It can only be known by experience whether concessions which might be attributed to alarm would encourage further demands. Roving orators would soon learn to claim for their clients as a right any privileges and perquisites to which especial value was attached; but on the whole employers would be prudent in making their relations to workmen somewhat more complicated than at present. It is easier for the Committee of a Union to demand an advance on the money rate of wages than a modification of contracts which might include percentages, allotments, and cow pasturage. Nothing can be more reasonable than the indignation of the farmers against the abettors of the Unions; but Socialist essayists are beyond the reach of their resentment; and they ought for their own sakes to disarm as far as possible an attack which they have no power to prevent.

SPANISH AMERICA.

THE New World which was early in the present century raised up to redress the balance of the Old seems us far as ever from establishing an equilibrium of its own. From one end of Spanish America to the other bloody and barren revolutions continue their monotonous succession. Two or three months ago an ambiguous war, half foreign and half civil, disturbed Honduras; and it is announced that a conspiracy headed by an Archbishop and some Jesuit priests has recently been frustrated in Salvador, which appears to have been somehow mixed up in the affair with Guatemala. As the militant prelate and his associates may be supposed to have engaged in this plot for the benefit of the Church, it is a relief to find that something like a principle or a corporate interest took the place for once of the personal intrigues which ordinarily distract South American Republics. There is also a clerical party in Mexico, where the town of Tampico has lately been seized by a revolutionary body; and it may be expected that further rebellions and civil wars will follow the death of JUAREZ. On the Northern frontier more serious complications threaten to demand the attention of the Mexican Government. It is asserted that cattle and horses have been stolen in large numbers from the parts of Texas which border on the Rio Grande; and it is significantly suggested that the best remedy for the mischief would be the annexation of the neighbouring districts to the United States. It seems a little surprising that American settlers should not be able to protect themselves against Mexican incursions, and that stolen cattle should not long since have been recovered with usury. It is evident that the mere advancement of a frontier only removes the point of contact with troublesome neighbours, and that the inconvenience of having to deal with independent Mexicans can only be abated by the annexation of the whole Republic. At present it may be doubted whether Congress will listen to the complaints of the anxious citizens of Texas. It would be perfectly easy for the United States to occupy the whole or any portion of Mexico; but American institutions include no machinery for the government of dependencies; and judicious politicians will not be disposed to admit a mongrel race of aliens to participation in their national sovereignty. The rejection of General GRANT's scheme for the acquisition of San Domingo proved that the Senate was disinclined to territorial aggression in the South. The acquisition of Texas was effected when the dominant party in the Union was principally bent on the extension of slavery into unoccupied soil. A conquest of half-a-dozen Mexican provinces in the present day would be inglorious and embarrassing.

In a remote part of Spanish America a revolution of the typical kind has partially failed. Peru had been thought to be comparatively orderly; and, like all the South American States, it enjoys the blessings of a nominally Republican form of Government. Among other conditions of civilization Peru has a National Debt, principally held in England; and its guano deposits form a valuable property. It frequently happens that the Spanish Republics elect a military leader as President, and a certain General BALTA had nearly arrived at the end of his term of office in Peru. As it was believed that one Señor PARDO was the popular candidate for the Presidency, it was naturally expected that BALTA would attempt an irregular prolongation of his own power, and he was urged by his Minister of War, General GUTIERREZ, to make the experiment. When the decisive moment arrived BALTA shrank from the risk of usurpation, and consequently GUTIERREZ assembled an armed force, threw the President into prison, and proclaimed martial law in Lima. It appears that even in Peru repeated precedents have not yet given armed rebellion the force of law. PARDO and other principal citizens took refuge on board ships in the harbour, the Congress declared GUTIERREZ a traitor, and the populace of the city took part against the new Dictator. A brother of GUTIERREZ who had been appointed Minister of War, was killed in the streets; and the Dictator avenged his death by murdering BALTA in prison. After a struggle which lasted four days the partisans of PARDO obtained the victory, and the usurper and his principal adherents were put to death. The restoration of law and order has since been ostentatiously announced and PARDO is for the moment undisputed PRESIDENT of the Republic. The attempt at revolution is said to have cost only two hundred lives; but it sufficiently illustrates the anarchical condition of Peru. The mob by accident supported the cause which may be considered constitutional; but it celebrated the triumph of freedom after its own brutal manner. The corpses of GUTIERREZ and of his two brothers were stripped, rubbed with an inflammable substance, hoisted up with pulleys to the level of the tower of the cathedral, and finally burnt in the public square. Although GUTIERREZ was apparently a worthless adventurer, he may almost be excused for thinking military rule good enough for a barbarous and bloodthirsty rabble. Whatever may be the merits of the existing authorities, they were unable or unwilling to prevent a scandalous violation of public decency.

The holders of Peruvian bonds will scarcely be reassured by the official commonplaces of the representatives of the Government in London. During his brief reign GUTIERREZ raised a forced loan of 60,000*l.*, and he imprisoned the English managers of the London Bank of Lima for refusing a contribution. There is every reason to fear that his example may be hereafter followed by other ambitious soldiers, who will not fail to use their temporary or permanent authority for the extortion of money. The case of the Spanish Republics seems to be absolutely or indefinitely hopeless, as they contain no materials on which solid institutions can be founded. Democratic little communities, with petty armies exclusively employed in civil broils, seem destined to a perpetual alternation of anarchy and tyranny. The greatness and prosperity of the United States have been in the highest degree injurious as a model to the emancipated colonies of Spain. It was easy to imitate the rejection of the supremacy of the mother-country; but in Mexico and throughout the greater part of South America after the expulsion of the Spaniards no element of order or government remained behind. Notwithstanding the numerous faults of Spanish administration, it would be better for Peru or for Salvador to receive Governors from Madrid than to hold out the office of President as a prize for conspiracies and military mutinies. The only State in South America which is exempt from periodical revolutions is the Empire of Brazil, which has the good fortune to be governed by an ancient European dynasty. The present EMPEROR is as it happens, more accomplished, and probably more competent to govern, than an average President appointed by popular election; but his chief merit is, to make a new application of LEAUMARCHAIS' epigram, that he has taken the trouble to be born to a throne. He has no expiration of his term of office to provide for, and no rival to regard with jealousy; nor could a successful soldier hope to take his place even if he were able to overthrow his authority. The Brazilian army, when it was lately engaged in foreign service, was nominally at least commanded by a Prince of the Blood, who might be trusted not to employ his commission as an instrument of usurpation. There are many plausible arguments against hereditary rank; but in unsettled communities it is the only kind of distinction which is not attainable by force or by fraud. It is at least highly probable that the Spanish American States would have been happier and better governed if they could have followed the example of Brazil. It is true that there could scarcely have been a king of Peru or a king of Chili, and therefore a Viceroy ruling through a responsible Ministry would have been the best kind of ruler.

The Empire in Mexico was an artificial and anomalous contrivance, and probably MAXIMILIAN would have been unable to maintain himself even if the Government of the United States had not compelled the French Government to withdraw its army from the Continent; yet the Americans incurred some moral responsibility by interfering with Mexican affairs exclusively for the purpose of gratifying their own feelings of resentment and pride. The enterprise of NAPOLEON III. implied his confidence in the permanent disruption of the American Union, and the Mexican Empire was consequently, and not unnaturally, regarded as an affront to the United States. Nevertheless the consolidation of the power of MAXIMILIAN, if it could have been effected, would have been an unmixed benefit to Mexico. The country requires rest and consistent administration; nor is it in a condition to afford the risk of being governed by an incapable or dishonest President. JUAREZ, as long as he lived, was vigorous and upright, but he was incessantly disturbed by provincial insurrections. His successor belongs to the opposite, and therefore to the weaker, party, and it is wholly uncertain whether he will command general support. The only useful result which a resolute optimist could attribute to the condition and character of the Republics of Spanish America would be the paradoxical object of keeping some of the most productive portions of the world in a physical and moral state of fallow. The vast capabilities of the area of the United States are surpassed by Mexico and by the Southern continent, and at some period they will probably be developed either by immigrant races, or by the descendants of the present population organized in a manner not yet discovered. A Federal Republic in Spain would probably in some respects resemble Guatemala or Peru; but it would assuredly not descend to their level.

THE LICENSING ACT AT WORK.

IT was not to be expected that the country would immediately settle down under the discipline of the new Licensing Act without any expressions of irritation or resentment. It cannot be said that it is a severe law, and there is every reason to suppose that it meets with general approval, and is believed to be just and necessary. But then it is new, and Englishmen do not like being put out of any of their accustomed ways, and are especially sensitive on any point affecting their personal freedom. We are justly entitled to the reputation of being what is called a law-abiding people, but this disposition is quite compatible with a little restiveness under a new law, which has not yet had time to make itself known and respected. It is quite in the nature of many of our countrymen to be very angry about being shut out or turned out of a public-house at a particular hour, although they would never have thought either of going or staying there but for the irresistible provocation of a brand-new prohibitory statute. The publicans believe that their commercial interests are at stake, and the publicans' customers resent the interference of the law with their old habits, and its implied imputation that they are incapable of taking care of themselves, and require to be regulated by Act of Parliament. There have been some disturbances at Exeter and Maidstone, and disturbances have also been threatened at Leicester, but there does not appear to have been serious opposition to the enforcement of the Act in any quarter. In Exeter a drunken man was rescued from the police, and at Leicester there was an unsuccessful attempt to rescue one. At Maidstone a mob went about the town shouting and demanding to be served with liquor; but the publicans were protected by their shutters and the police. At Exeter, however, there were at one moment apprehensions of a riot. A handbill had been circulated intimating that "working-men who do not get their 'wages early' would find 'beer and other refreshments'" after the public-houses were shut at the gentlemen's club-house. The mob took the hint and howled and booted under the windows of the club, by way of protest against the injustice, as they deemed it, of shutting the working-man out of his public-house while the gentleman could tiddle all night in his club-room. The handbill purported to be signed by "A Teetotaler," but it is suspected that some of the publicans were in reality responsible for it, and it is obvious that from the Alliance point of view the working classes are expected to be grateful for the protection of the Act as far as it goes. It has been stated that working-men's clubs are being organized in various towns, and there will probably be some difficulty in determining in every case whether a club is a genuine affair, or has been got up merely as a public-house in disguise. The best security against abuses of this kind is that the law is moderate and reasonable, and that there is really very little temptation for anybody to take the trouble of evading it. High duties and smuggling go together, and if fanatical Teetotalers had their way there would no doubt be private drinking clubs at every corner. In a recent official Report on the operation of the liquor law in Maine, it is stated that it "has led to domestic" and public hypocrisy and secret drinking," and has "thoroughly demoralized the people." The multiplication of private facilities for drinking in this country would certainly supply unmistakable evidence that the law had failed to secure the object for which it was passed.

The discretion which is allowed to magistrates as to fixing the hours during which public-houses may be opened unfortunately leaves the door open for noisy and mischievous agitation; and it would appear that the Bench itself is not free from inflammatory influences, if we may judge from the pugilistic encounter which occurred the other day between a couple of justices at the Licensing Sessions at Norwich. In London the hours are permanently fixed by the Act, but elsewhere the magistrates have the option of varying them in no fewer than fourteen different ways. The partisans of the Teetotalers will naturally contend for the shortest, and the partisans of the publicans for the longest hours, and a great deal of pressure will naturally be brought to bear by each party on the magistrates with whom the decision rests. If the hours are suddenly reduced to the minimum allowed by the Act, there can be little doubt that it will occasion great annoyance and exasperation, and attempts will probably be made to defy or evade the law. A violent movement of this kind is certain to provoke an equally violent reaction, and the advocates of temperance will inevitably defeat their own purposes if they endeavour to push their views to an extreme. The Act, as we have said, appears to be supported by the great body of public opinion, and there is a general desire that it should have a fair trial; but there are many who sympathize with its objects who are by no means prepared for sudden and despotic changes. People in this country do not like to be too much policed, and their Act will do far more good if it is not forced too much against the popular grain. Even those who are anxious to see the hours reduced to the lowest point should understand that they are more likely in the long run to attain their object if they are willing in the first instance to proceed quietly and cautiously. The disturbances which have already taken place sufficiently indicate the temper of the mob; and we can imagine what would be the condition of the country if by any chance the United Kingdom Alliance succeeded in getting its pet crotchets embodied in an Act of Parliament. There would doubtless be violent excitement, rioting, resistance to the police, and probably, after a variety of scandalous scenes, the repeal of the obnoxious law. It is pointed out in the Report on the Maine Law to which we have already referred that the general irritation and inconvenience experienced from the law would probably have a powerful influence on the next elections in the State, and that, if it were repealed, a reaction might be expected which would add still more to the demoralization of the community. The warnings of Maine should not be lost on the Teetotalers of England. There is something to be said for the theory of the elasticity of the Act, and its adaptation to local habits and convenience; but the principle of local option is clearly liable to abuse. A different set of hours in every district will produce confusion, and an appearance of personal caprice, and will be apt to provoke a spirit of opposition. It is to be hoped that something like uniformity will be maintained, the only distinction being between towns and country places.

What is wanted is that the magistrates should exercise their common sense in administering the Act, allowing as much personal freedom as possible in regard to hours, but coming down severely on any flagrant violation of the law. A publican at Tipton has been very properly fined 5*l.* and costs for allowing drunken persons to frequent his house. Four drunken men were found in his house on one night, two in one room and two in another, and one of them so drunk that he sprawled on his hands and knees under the table. The landlord was told of it, and said he saw nothing wrong. Later on several drunken men were seen staggering out of the house; and early next morning one was found asleep inside so drunk that he could not stand. This was obviously a very bad case, and the magistrates did well to give the publican a sharp lesson. In recent controversies public opinion has been strongly on the side of the publicans as against the Teetotalers, but it will be unfortunate if the publicans misunderstand the reasons of this tendency. Most rational people are satisfied that there is a great deal too much drinking in this country, and a great deal too much money spent in drink. A vested interest in the propagation of drunkenness is recognized neither by law nor common sense, and if there has appeared to be any tenderness in dealing with the publicans, it has certainly not been prompted by any desire to extend their business. They have great political influence, and the political leaders on each side are perhaps a little too much afraid of them, but their strength, or what appeared to be their strength, in the recent contest was mainly due to the impracticable fanaticism of their opponents. If it were supposed that the tactics of the United Kingdom Alliance would really have the effect of checking drunkenness, they would no doubt meet with wider support; and it is not from any hesitation as to interfering with the profits of the liquor trade that a severely restrictive policy has not been adopted. The reason why a moderate measure has been preferred is simply because it is believed that it is more likely to promote the object in view than a system of violent prohibition. We observe that the publicans of Chatham and Rochester, in applying to the magistrates of the district to allow taverns to be kept open till twelve o'clock on week days instead of eleven, base their claim on the ground that a change from the old hours would cause inconvenience to the public and loss to the publicans. It is to be hoped that the magistrates when they give their reply will make it quite clear to the petitioners that the convenience of the public is all that they are entitled to consider, and that it is none of their business to encourage drinking in order to swell the profits of publicans. No refinements of language will gloss over the fact that drunkenness means drinking too much, and that the only way to check it is to get people to drink less. It is believed that this result may be most effectually promoted, not by harsh and despotic laws, but by moral influences and the progress of education.

PAUPERISM AND SCHOOL FEES.

THE Local Government Board have taken a step of considerable and commendable boldness. They have sent a circular letter to the London Boards of Guardians pointing out that the Education Act has not limited the discretion given to the Guardians by a previous statute to take into consideration, when granting outdoor relief, the inability of a parent to provide education for his child, and suggesting that, "in the exercise of this discretion the Guardians should upon each application for relief inquire whether the children of the applicant are being educated, and if, by reason of the inability of the parents to send them to school or to pay the school fees, they are not being educated, that in connexion with the administration of out-relief the Guardians should afford the parent such relief as may enable him to comply with the law which expressly compels that his children shall be educated." The boldness of this suggestion consists in the fact of its running counter to the sentimental dislike to call things by their right names which dictated the last words of the 25th section of the Education Act. This section, as so many politicians have painful cause to know, empowers School Boards to pay the fees payable at a public elementary school by any child whose parent is from poverty unable to pay them, and it then goes on to declare that "such payment shall not be deemed to be parochial relief given to such parent." In other words, it is solemnly decreed by Act of Parliament that a certain payment "shall not be deemed to be" what it undoubtedly is. A man who is unable to provide for those dependent on him the necessaries which the law declares him bound to provide for them, and who is assisted to provide these necessaries by a grant from the funds of the community, is a pauper. It makes no difference whether the necessaries in question are physical or moral. In so far as the law compels a man to send his children to school, it places schooling on the same level with food. There is no hardship in punishing a parent for allowing his children to starve, because if he is unable to feed them he can appeal to the community to feed them for him. In the same way there is no hardship in punishing a parent for allowing his children to grow up in ignorance, because if he is unable to educate them he can appeal to the community to educate them for him. The parallel between the two cases is complete, and it was a defect in the Education Act that it tried to ignore it. Parochial relief is relief given to enable a man to provide necessaries for himself or for others. The payment of school fees by a School Board on the ground that a parent is unable to pay them is relief given to enable a man to provide what the law declares to be necessary for his children. It would give the most skilful casuist some trouble to distinguish between the two payments, and to explain why one is parochial relief while the other is not. It is true that certain of the London Boards of Guardians seem to think that their casuistry is equal even to this demand, since they have adopted a resolution setting forth that the payment of school fees upon a large scale by the Boards of Guardians would have the effect of increasing pauperism rather than diminishing it, and recommending that the entire cost of educating the children of the poor shall be paid out of the school-rate, "thus relieving the poor-rate of any charge whatever upon it for educational purposes." The latter part of this resolution is only the expression of a natural wish that the School Boards, and not the Boards of Guardians, should be saddled with the unpopular duty of raising money. But the former part can only be explained on the theory that pauperism does not smell as ill if it is called by another name. If there are a hundred persons in a parish receiving aid from the rates in order to enable them to obey the law as regards giving their children food, and fifty persons receiving aid from the rates in order to enable them to obey the law as regards giving their children schooling, there are one hundred and fifty paupers altogether. Whether the two payments are made out of the same fund, or out of two different funds, they are equally paid by the public, and the effect on the character of the receiver is the same in both cases. Or, if there be any difference, it is that where the payments are made out of two different funds the aggregate of them will be greater, and the demoralization produced by them will be greater. Multiplication of agencies means multiplication of expense, and if the School Boards have to maintain a staff of officers for the purpose of ascertaining facts which could be equally ascertained by the existing staff of the Board of Guardians, the ratepayers will ultimately be the sufferers. What makes a man a pauper is the acceptance of relief from the community, and if the immediate source of relief is the school-rate, and not the poor-rate, there is the more danger that this acceptance will become habitual. Many parents would make an effort to avoid having to apply for aid if the application marked them as paupers, which they will not make so long as it is declared by Act of Parliament that a man may throw on the community the burden of educating his children, and yet not be ranked among those who receive parochial relief.

The circular of the Local Government Board is important from another point of view. It opens out a prospect of finally getting rid of that objection against the 25th clause which, though defeated for the present, may at any moment be renewed. The grievance alleged to be created by the clause as it stands is that the ratepayer may be wounded in conscience by having to contribute to a rate which will in part go to the maintenance of schools belonging to other denominations than his own. A more irrational objection was never raised; but there seems no reason to doubt that it is widely felt, and still more widely professed, and if the whole controversy could be blown away by a side wind, the prospects of elementary education would be greatly improved. The Local Government Board suggest that, if in all cases where a parent is unable to pay the school fees he were treated as to that extent a subject for outdoor relief, the Guardians would not be obliged to pay the fees for him any more than they are obliged to buy food or clothing for him when he is unable to buy them for himself. When a man is found to be destitute of the means of obtaining these necessaries, and is not considered a fit subject for indoor relief, he has a certain sum of money given him wherewith to procure them. In like manner, when a man is found to be destitute of the means of obtaining education for his children a sum of money would be given him wherewith to procure it. It is needless to say that this presupposes the universal establishment of compulsory attendance at school. Without this there would be no adequate check on the expenditure of the money given. The parent of a physically starving child may usually be trusted to buy food for it; but the parent of a morally starving child could hardly be relied on to the same extent. Under a system of universal compulsion, however, no difficulty would arise. The School Board would ascertain that A. had two children within the school age who were not attending any school. A. would be warned, and, if need were, prosecuted, for his omission to send them. His plea of poverty would be remitted to the Board of Guardians, who would investigate into the truth of it, and, according as he succeeded or failed in making it good, they would grant or refuse the required sum a week. The School Board would have nothing to do with the question how A. found the sum. They would know that he either had it or could obtain it, and they would simply insist on its being paid to the managers of some public elementary school. The Board of Guardians would have nothing to do with the question how A. spent the particular sixpence he received from the parish. They would have satisfied themselves that his weekly income, when all told, was sixpence short of the lowest sum on which he could live and comply with the law as to school attendance. The enforcing of that law they would leave to the School Board. In this way the most scrupulous conscience could find no ground for offence. A portion of the poor-rate might go to support a Denominational school just as a portion of it may now go to support a Denominational grocer or cheesemonger. But there would be no means of discovering whether it did so except in those rare instances in which an outdoor pauper has absolutely no means of subsistence except what is allowed him by the Guardians. Even in this last case it is not probable that a Non-conformist ratepayer would insist on interfering with the way in which the pauper spent his allowance, provided it were not more than sufficient to supply him with bare necessities, and he could be proved to have complied with the provisions of the Education Act by sending his children to a public elementary school. If this is paying too great a compliment to the common sense of the Dissenting body, it will at any rate be safe to say that so extremely refined an objection would meet with no popular support.

The only persons to whom this solution of the difficulties arising out of the 25th clause would be unacceptable would be the extreme zealots on one, perhaps on both, sides. There may be some extreme denominationalists who, in their ardent desire to see local rates applied in aid of Denominational schools, would lose sight of the injury which a prolonged and acrid controversy on such a subject must do to the cause of education. There are certainly some secularists who, in their ardent desire to sweep all children into undenominational schools, will regret the discovery of a compromise which relieves the conscience of the ratepayer without doing violence to the conscience of the parent. But the whole body of reasonable men, of whatever religious persuasion, will see cause to rejoice in a settlement which abolishes the need of considering whether school fees shall be remitted or paid, and removes the question in what cases it is proper to do either from the cognizance of the School Boards. To the accomplishment of this happy result only two conditions are requisite—the establishment of universal compulsion, and the recognition that the receipt of public relief constitutes a pauper.

SOCIAL REPORTERS.

MOST people understand human nature well enough to know that nothing interests like self; that they are secure of attention, even eager attention, so long as they make their hearer their topic, and tell him what he does not know of the impression he makes on the minds of others. But their knowledge generally stops here; they do not know the consequences which naturally result from this class of communications. They wish to please, to put their friend in good humour with them and with himself; but sympathy is seldom deep enough or wide enough to calculate on the ultra-jealous sensitiveness of mankind in this matter of the estimate and appreciation of others. The report of any intelligent, honest discussion of one's character, however indulgent and friendly, is perfectly certain to leave some burrs sticking to the memory which not even time will rub off. It is a fact that only wholesale, and it is none the worse if indiscriminate, praise can safely be reported to the subject of it—the sort of praise that the recipient can pass off with an indulgent deprecatory complacency. Nothing short of this is without some lurking sting to our self-esteem. Not that this grosser incense is intoxicating to a man of ordinary sense, or is accepted for a moment without inward protest; but it is free from the drawback of the one ingredient which, however slight the tincture, will go far to embitter the most flattering decoction. No character is ever discussed in absolute freedom without much being said which would annoy the person in question beyond the compensating power of any amount of general encomium. Qualification at once turns eulogy into criticism, and, to sensitive natures, adverse criticism; the ifs and the buts, the bare hints at frailties, deficiencies, or weak sides, seem to absorb all the ingenuity of the speakers. Their praise is soured and curdled, and at best loses all its sparkle, under the evil influence of cold analysis.

In all eulogy, we are told, there is an infusion of poppy, and so, when unmixed, it will not linger verbatim on the memory. An intelligent participant in the discussion scarcely cares to report it even to its subject without the seasoning which gives it point and relish. It is something to have a character worth the labour of analysis. As it appears to the reporter, the cleverness of the discussion all comes out on this side. Some good things were said which it is a pity should not be heard by the person most concerned, and most able to feel their inclusive truth. They are the sort of things which he says of others, and therefore he is likely to appreciate them; and in fact the report, criticism and all, ought to satisfy him. But it does not. He is amused for the moment, but reflection turns it to bitterness. To be discussed at all with any familiarity comes upon people as a disagreeable surprise, however free and easy they may be towards their own friends behind their backs. There is nothing more curious than this blindness to the natural law of reprisals, the hidden tit-for-tat which is ever going on, whereby the small injuries we commit against our neighbour are certainly being avenged somewhere; so that if we find our amusement in his weaknesses, the fact should remind us that our own are surely furnishing sport to him or to his unknown and unconscious champion, the instrument of fate who is making the balance even. Fortunately the avenging process is carried on in the dark; men retort on one another without knowing it. A providential blindness, in fact, lies upon us all in regard to this matter of what others are saying of us. We take liberties with our friends, and never speculate on a return in kind. Common sense does not think about it at all, and vanity takes for granted that we cut as superior a figure in other eyes as we do in our own. "Considering," says Mr. Trollope, "how much we are all given to discuss the characters of others, and to discuss them often not in the strictest spirit of charity, it is singular how little we are inclined to think that others can speak ill-naturedly of us, and how angry and hurt we are when proof reaches us that they have done so. It is hardly too much to say that we all of us occasionally speak of our dearest friend in a manner which that dearest friend would very little like, and that we nevertheless expect our dearest friends shall universally speak of us as though they were blind to all our faults, and keenly alive to every shade of our virtues." But our point is that, even where there is no ill-nature, no carping spirit, but, on the contrary, every desire to do justice, backed by a real appreciation, something is sure to be said that would jar on self-love, and that consequently cannot be retailed without peril to the equanimity of the hearer. Pascal is strong on this point, but his general tone towards human nature leaves it uncertain whether the inherent vanity of man, or his equally inherent malice, is most in fault:—

Personne ne parle de nous en notre présence comme il en parle en notre absence. L'un qui est entre les hommes n'est fondé que sur cette mutuelle tromperie; et peu d'amitiés subsisteraient si chacun savait ce que son ami dit de lui lorsqu'il n'y est pas; quoiqu'il en parle sincèrement et sans passion.

There are people whose social business it seems to be to expose this mutual deception. The temper that impels to the practice is not necessarily spiteful; at worst it need not go beyond a desire to tease for the moment, to "get a rise" perhaps out of a man who thinks himself superior, to see how he behaves under free handling. There is a relish in letting such a man know that he is not taken at his own estimate, that his friends presume to understand him a good deal better than he understands himself, and smile behind his back at certain delusions, while doing ample justice to his general powers; the "delusions" being the points of self-knowledge on which he most values himself. It displays a sense of discernment merely to report to a valetudinarian that his connexions are much more hopeful of his condition than he allows himself to be, and have cheerfully commented to one another on his good appetite and unbroken slumbers. A fine lady has been known to dismiss a favourite physician, to whom she was worth a considerable annuity, upon the information of one of these blunders that he had, in an offhand manner, without circumlocution, pronounced her "better" to some inquiring third party. The habit of reporting such conversations certainly deadens the sympathies; the people who indulge themselves in it cannot distinguish between their own feelings and those of their interested hearer. What strikes or amuses them must needs be intrinsically amusing, and will only gain point and relish from its personal bearing. In their obtuseness they even come to regard criticism as a sort of homage and compliment, from the fact that to be a topic of conversation is in the abstract infinitely gratifying and stimulating to vanity. It is in this way that servants and subordinates—the sympathies of different classes towards each other being always imperfect—once encouraged or even permitted to report the comments of others, quite lose sight of their main object of pleasing in the hurry of exhibiting their own admiring devotion; and will blurt out what "he said with his taunts and his flattery," for the credit of their own indignant rejoinder. No man whose self-respect is in working order will allow others, in mere talkativeness, or to recommend themselves, or to engage his prejudices on their side, to report to him what has been said in his disparagement, or indeed in any spirit whatever, merely to indulge his curiosity. He would feel himself a party to a breach of confidence by the simple act of listening. Prudence and dignity are close allies here, but these are three-time guardians, which the old régime permitted the master to cast off with his valet de chambre, and which ladies now throw over sometimes with their maids, or in condescending gossip with their social inferiors, to the permanent injury of their relations with their equals.

Children are often innocent victims of this liberty, which is the more inwarrantable from their defencelessness; and most people's memories must recall some personal comment repeated, some revelation of outside opinion for which their philosophy was not yet prepared, which set the blood coursing at the time, and infects the consciousness still in mere sympathy with dawning sensitiveness. The poor, whose ordinary training inculcates little dignity or self-restraint, are as a rule dead to the ill consequences of this habit.

In villages and small communities, the excitement of life, the sense of company and numbers, is kept up by it; it supplies that necessity to all monotonous existences, a grievance. Men, near neighbours, slowly and silently withdraw from speech and intercourse with each other, because somebody has told them something that the other has said. Taken simply there was not much harm in it—perhaps only some question of skill or management in their calling; it has to be twisted into ill-will; but brooding and silence supply the needful venom. The subject of the remark values himself more, feels himself more distinguished, more somebody, for keeping up a sense of soreness and investing a possible slight with the pomp and state of deliberate insult. On the other hand, there is a sort of satisfaction in finding your neighbour out of humour with you, supposing that no damage to worldly interest comes of it, and we shall not find the unintentional offender in any hurry to explain or make up matters. No society can exist without a public opinion of its own. What people say forms this opinion, and in very small circles, thrown for their excitement upon themselves, it is necessarily what people say of one another. It is first what Widow Smith "should say" which comes to the ear of Betty Jones; but it is amazing to see the ingenuity with which the idea of a public can be generated out of the inhabitants of two or three contiguous cottages; and thus, if one person makes a remark on another in the hearing of two or three, and remains uncontradicted, it is instantly reported under the formula "There's a many as says." It is no longer the opinion or the injustice of an individual; the judgment of her world is reported to the absentee.

It would be curious to know how many lasting prejudices, how many passive alienations, how many coldnesses which might have been friendships, are due to the repetition of trivial comments and small criticisms not intended for the ears they reach. It requires effort and some closeness of intercourse to overcome an early unfavourable impression formed on however slight grounds. We mostly hold by the opinion we first form of people, unless brought into some intimate relation to which prejudice inclines or which circumstances do not favour. Dante and other searers into the future and unseen have pleased themselves with grouping kings, philosophers, poets, great captains, and engaging them in the Divine Comedy upon an easy review of the past, setting them to compare notes as it were, and so bringing them to a mutual understanding. Might not neighbours and contemporaries whose sphere in this life is less elevated find a congenial diversion in tracing to their source the various separating influences which hold good people apart?

We have made no mention of the trick of reporting what has been said without giving the name of the speaker, either to stimulate curiosity or to impart more weight to a stricture. Seeds of vanity, or of mistrust and suspicion, are equally sown by this anonymous method; but as the tongue that spoke the criticism is shrouded in mystery, the particular indiscretion and breach of confidence which we have just now had in view has not been committed; the error, so far as there is one, is against society rather than the individual.

CHILDREN BY THE SEA.

AUTUMN brings its congresses—scientific, ecclesiastical, archaeological—but the prettiest of autumnal congresses is the children's congress by the sea. It is like a leap from prose into poetry when we step away from Associations and Institutes, from stuffy lecture-rooms and dismal sections, to the strip of sand which the children have chosen for their annual gathering. Behind us are the great white cliffs, before us the reach of grey waters with steamers and their smoke-trail in the offing and waves washing lazily in upon the shore. And between sea and cliff are a world of little creatures, digging, dabbling, delighted. What strikes us at first sight is the number of them. In ordinary life we meet the great host of children in detail, as it were; we kiss our little ones in the morning, we tumble over a perambulator, we dodge a hoop, we pat back a ball. Child after child meets us, but we never realize the world of children till we see it massed upon the sands. Children of every age, from the baby to the schoolboy; big children and small children, weak little urchins with pale cheeks and plump little urchins with sturdy legs; children of all tempers, from the screeching child in arms to the quiet child sitting placid and gazing out of large grey eyes; gay little mad-caps paddling at the water's edge; busy children, idle children, children careful of their dress, hoydens covered with sand and seaweed, wild children, demure children—all are mustered in the great many-coloured camp between the cliffs and the sea. It is their holiday as it is ours, but what is a mere refreshment to us is life to them. What a rapture of freedom looks up at us out of the little faces that watch us as we thread our way from group to group! The mere change of dress is a revolution in the child's existence. These brown-holland frocks, rough sunshades, and sandboots, these clothes that they may wet and dirty and tear as they like, mean deliverance from endless dressings—dressings for breakfast and dressings for lunch, dressings to go out with mamma, and dressings to come down to dessert—an escape from fashionable little shoes and tight little hats and stiff little dresses that it is treason to rumple. There is an inexpressible triumph in their return at eventide from the congress by the sea, bedraggled, but with no fear of a scolding from nurse. Then, too, there is the freedom from "lessons." There are no more of those dreadful maps along the wall, no French exercises, no terrible arithmetic. The elder girls make a faint show of keeping up their practising, but the goody books which the governess packed carefully at the bottom of their boxes remain at the bottom unopened. There is no time for books, the grave little faces protest to you; there is only time for the congress. That is why they hurry over breakfast to get early to the sands, and are moody and restless at the length of luncheon. It is a hopeless business to keep them at home; they yawn over picture-books, they quarrel over croquet, they fall asleep over backgammon. Home is just now only an interlude of sleeping or dining in the serious business of the day. The one interest of existence is in the sea. Its novelty, its vastness, its life, dwarf everything else in the little minds beside it. There is the endless watching for the ships, the first peep at the little dot on the horizon, the controversies as it rises about its masts or its flag, the questions as to where it is coming from and where it is going to. There is the endless speculation on the tide, the doubt every morning whether it is coming in or going out, the wonder of its perpetual advance or retreat, the whispered tales of children hemmed in between it and the cliffs, the sense of a mysterious life, the sense of a mysterious danger. Above all there is the sense of a mysterious power. The children wake as the wind howls in the night, or the rain dashes against the window panes, to tell each other how the waves are leaping high over the pier and ships tearing to pieces on reefs far away. So charming and yet so terrible, the most playful of playfellows, the most awful of possible destroyers, the child's first consciousness of the greatness and mystery of the world around him is embodied in the sea.

It is amusing to see the precision with which the children's congress breaks up into its various sections. The most popular and important is that of the engineers. The little members come toddling down from the cliffs with a load of implements, shouldering rake and spade, and dangling tiny buckets from their arms. One little group makes straight for its sand-hole of yesterday, and is soon busy with huge heaps and mounds, which are to take the form of a castle. A crowing little urchin beside is already waving the Union Jack, which is ready to crown the edifice, if the Fates ever suffer it to be crowned. Engineers of less military taste are busy near the water's edge with an elaborate system of reservoirs and canals, and greeting with shouts of triumph the admission of the water to miniature little harbours. A corps of absolutely unscientific labourers are simply engaged in digging the deepest hole they can, and the blue nets over their sunshades are alone visible over the edge of the excavation. It is delightful to watch the industry, the energy, the absolute seriousness and conviction of the engineers. Sentries warn you off from the limits of the fortress; you are politely asked to "please take care," as your clumsy foot strays along the delicate brink of the canal. Suggestions that have a mechanical turn about them, hints on the best way of reaching the water, or the possibility of a steeper slope for the sand-walls, are listened to with attention and respect. You are rewarded by an invitation which allows you to witness the very moment when the dyke is broken, and the sea admitted into basin and canal, or the yet more ecstatic moment when the Union Jack waves over the completed castle. Indolence and adventure charm the dabbles, as industry absorbs the engineers. The sands are, of all earthly spots, the most delightful; but a greater delight than any earthly spot can afford awaits the dabbler in the sea. It is mostly the girls who dabble; the gaiety and frolic suit them better than the serious industry of castles and canals. Deliverance from shoes and stockings, the first thrill of pleasure and surprise at the cool touch of the water, the wild rush along the brim, the dainty advance till the sea covers the little ankles, the tremulous waiting with an air of defiance as the wave deepens round till it touches the knee, the firm line with which the dabbles grasp hand in hand and face the advancing tide, the sudden panic, the break, the disorderly flight, the tears and laughter, the run after the wave as it retreats again, the fresh advance and defiance—this is the paradise of the dabbler. Hour after hour, with clothes tucked round their waist, and a lavish display of stout little legs, the urchins wage their mimic warfare with the sea. Meanwhile the scientific section is encamped upon the rocks. With torn vestments and bruised feet, the votaries of knowledge are peering into every little pool, detecting mussel-shells, picking up sea-weed, hunting for anemones. A shout of triumph from the little adventurer who has climbed over the rough rock-shelf announces that he has secured a prize for the glass jar at home, where the lumps of formless jelly burst into rosy flowers with delicate tendrils waving gently round them for food. A cry of woe tells of some infantile Whymper who has lost his hold on an Alpine rock-edge some six inches high. Knowledge has its difficulties as well as its dangers, and the difficulty of forming a rock-section in the face of the stern opposition of mothers and nurses is undoubtedly great. Still, formed it is, and science furnishes a goodly company of votaries and martyrs to the congress by the sea. But of course the naval section bears away the palm. It is for the most part composed of the elder boys, and of a few girls who would be boys if they could. Its members all possess a hopeless passion for the sea, and besiege their mothers for promises that their future life shall be that of middies. They wear straw hats and loose blue shirts, and affect as much of the sailor in their costume as they can. Each has a boat, or as they call it, a "vessel," and the build and rig of these vessels is a subject of constant discussion and rivalry in the congress. Much critical inquiry is directed to the propriety of Arthur's jib, or the necessity of "ballasting" or pouring a little molten lead into Edward's keel. The launch of a new vessel is the event of the week. The coast-guardman is called in to settle knotty questions of naval architecture and equipment, and the little seamen listen to his verdicts, his yarns, the records of his voyages, with a wondering reverence. They ask knowingly about the wind and the prospects of the weather; they submit to his higher knowledge their theories as to the nature and destination of each vessel that passes; they come home with a store of naval phrases which are poured recklessly out over the tea-table. The pier is a favourite haunt of the naval section. They delight in sitting on rough coils of old rope. Nothing that is of the sea comes amiss to them. "I like the smell of tar," shouts a little enthusiast. They tell tales among themselves of the life of a middie and the fun of the "fo-castle," and watch the waves leaping up over the pier-head with a wild longing to sing "Rule Britannia." Every ship in the offing is a living thing to them, and the appearance of a man-of-war sends them sleepless to bed.

There is but one general meeting of the children's congress, and that is in front of the bathing-machines. Rows of little faces wait for their turn, watching the dash of the waves beneath the wheels, peeping at the black-robed figures who are bobbing up and down in the sea, half longing for their dip, half shrinking at the inevitable moment comes nearer and nearer, dashing forward joyously at last as the door opens and the bathing-woman's "Now, my dear," summons them to the quaint little box. One lingers over the sight as one lingers over a bed of flowers. There is all the fragrance, the colour, the sweet caprice, the wilfulness, the delight of childhood in the tiny figures that meet us on the return from their bath, with dancing eyes and flushed cheeks and hair streaming over their shoulders. What a hero the group finds in the urbin who never cries, with what envy they regard the big sister who never wants to come out of the water! It is pleasant to listen to their prattle as they stroll over the sands with a fresh life running through every vein, to hear their confession of fright at the first dip, their dislike of putting their head under water, their chaff of the delicate little sister who "will only bathe with mamma." Mamma is always good-humoured by the sea; papas come out of their eternal newspaper and toss the wee brats on their shoulders, uncles drop down on the merry little group with fresh presents every day. The restraint, the distance, of home vanishes with the practical abolition of the nursery and the school-room. Home, schoolroom, nursery, all are crammed together in the little cockleshell of a boat where the little ones are packed together round father and mother and tossing gaily over the waves. What endless fun in the rising and falling, the creaking of the sail, the gruff voice of the boatman, the sight of the distant cliffs, the flock of sea-gulls nestling in the wave-hollows! The little ones trail their hands in the cool water and fancy they see mermaids in the cool green depths. The big boy watches the boatman and studies navigation. The little brother dips a hook now and then in a fond hope of whiting. The tide has come in ere they return, and the little voyageurs are lifted out, tired and sleepy, in the boatman's arms, to dream that night of endless sailings over endless seas. It is a terrible morning that brings the news of their recall to the smoke and din of town. They wander for a last visit down to the beach, listen for the last time to the young bandit in his Spanish sombrero who charms the nursery-maids with lays of love, clab their pence for a last interview with the itinerant photographer. It is all over; the sands are thinner now, group after group is breaking up, autumn is dying into winter, and rougher winds are blowing over the sea. But the sea is never too rough for the little ones. With hair-blown wildly about their faces, they linger disconsolately along the brink, count the boats they shall never see again, make pilgrimages to the rock caves to tell its separate story of enjoyment; in each of them, and fling themselves with a last kiss on the dear, dear sands! Then they shoulder their spade and rake, and with one fond look for the cliffs, turn their backs on the sea. But the sea is with them still, even when the crowded train has whirled them far from waves that the white gull skims over. They have their tales of it to tell to their governess, their memories of it to count over before they fall asleep, their dreams of it as they lie asleep, their hopes of seeing it again when weary winter and spring and summer have at last slipped away. They listen to stories of wrecks, and find a halfpenny for the sham sailor who trolls his ballads in the street. Now and then they look lovingly at the ships and the sand-buckets piled away in the play-cupboard. So with one abiding thought at their little hearts the long days glide away till autumn finds them again children by the sea.

AYRTON AMONG THE TOMBS.

THE First Commissioner of Works is, as we all know, great upon vaults. From vaults the transition to tombs is not a hard one; in the only sense of the word "vault" which Mr. Ayrtton seems to know, it is a very easy transition indeed. Give a dog a bad name and hang him, says the proverb; and it looks as if the crypt of St. Stephen's Chapel had been pretty well put out by Mr. Ayrtton's calling it a vault. From snubbing the vault and its friends Mr. Ayrtton has now made a great advance; by a judiciously chosen sentence or two he has snubbed all the royal and historical tombs in England and all who care about them. Which, one might ask, is the harder fate for a King or hero of past times, to have his tomb swept away by Henry in the sixteenth century or to have it survive to the nineteenth century to be snubbed by Ayrtton? The position of the First Commissioner is a sublime one. By some unusual good luck, he has got an opportunity of showing his contempt for the whole history of England, for the existing Society of Antiquaries, and for his own predecessor in office, all at once. One thing only was lacking; he might snub them all indeed, but he could not snub them in the most exquisite of all forms of snubbing; there was no chance of bidding even the living antiquaries, still less the departed Kings, to "govern themselves accordingly." Still it is something to be able to show that in the eyes of an Ayrtton the history of our country counts for no more than we have already seen that art and science count for. It is something to be able to show that in his eyes the memorials of departed princes and worthies are worth simply the intrinsic value of their materials. All the Kings of the earth may lie in glory, every one of them, in tombs rich with the choicest skill of the craftsman. To an Ayrtton the excellent work, graven out of the quarry or hewn out of the thick trees, is worth simply whatever it might fetch at the market price of stocks and stones. A "picture of brass" on tomb or pavement is to him a mere Nebuchadnezzar. The researches of the First Commissioner perhaps do not go so far back as the last century; otherwise how venerable in his eyes would be the memory of those Hampshire justices who eased the county rate of two guineas by selling the leaden coffin of King Alfred.

Mr. Ayrtton, as far as we know, was, like King George the Third, born and educated in this country. At all events he must join that revered monarch in glorying in the name of Briton, when he remembers that Britain is the only civilised country in the world where the monuments of its history are looked up as objects altogether beneath the national attention. In other lands we may sometimes complain of the way in which particular monuments are treated, we may sometimes sigh to see works of restoration going on which are in truth works of destruction; still the principle is acknowledged that the history of the nation, written in its earthworks, its buildings, its historical monuments of every class, is a matter which it is for the nation itself to take under its own care. It is only in England that we press the doctrine that it is lawful for a man to do what he will with his own, so far as to let him destroy, without the nation so much as lifting a finger, objects which are his only in the dry technicality of law, and which in a higher sense belong to the whole civilized world. One savage may dig down Dorchester dykes; another may build over Winnebendon Camp; a third may run riot through an ancient minster, toss its sepulchral figures about hither and thither, and may drill holes through its roof, seemingly for the purpose of making it easier to set it on fire. And it is plain that the noble savage of all loves to have it so. We may spend vast sums in excavating and plundering the monuments of other lands, but for the preservation of the monuments of our own not a farthing may be spent, not so much as a voice of protest may be lifted up. Nothing can be done, we are told, without legislation, and an Ayrtton is not inclined to legislate on so contemptible a subject. Wroxeter may perish before our eyes; Anderida and Silchester may follow it; our castles, our churches, our sepulchral monuments, may perish of decay or of barbarous handling, and the First Commissioner of Works would rather look upon it as good riddance of bad rubbish. Mr. Ayrtton has made up his mind that one curse at least shall never light on him; he at least knows how to escape the woe denounced in certain cases against those who build the tombs of the prophets and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous.

We have before us two documents, containing a correspondence between the Society of Antiquaries and the present and late First Commissioners of Works with regard to the "proper custody and preservation" of certain "regal and other historical tombs or monuments," which it would seem that the late First Commissioner, less enlightened than his successor, was inclined to look on as not wholly unworthy of the national care. It is plain that in February 1869 there was a disposition on the part of at least one member of the Government to see whether anything could be done for the preservation of at least one class of our national monuments. It is indeed rumoured, but we cannot vouch for the truth of the rumour, that it was only by a misconception that the care of the then First Commissioner was seemingly confined to a certain class of historical monuments. It is whispered, but we in no way commit ourselves to the truth of the whisperings, that representations had been made to the Government from various quarters pressing on them the necessity of doing something for the preservation of our historical monuments in general. It is said that, by a confusion on the part of some person or persons unknown, an inquiry which was meant to extend to historical monuments in the widest sense of the words, to historical memorials of every class, was narrowed to the particular class of monuments in the vulgar sense—that is, memorials set up or laid down to commemorate some dead person. We know not how this may be; it is certain that among historians or antiquaries the words historical monuments, like the French technical phrase monuments historiques, would not be understood of tombs and of nothing else. But we do not take upon ourselves to dive into the motives of Lords of the Treasury or First Commissioners of Works, or to know exactly by what kinds of pressure or persuasion they are brought to say what they say and do what they do. The fact about which there is no dispute is, that on February 17, 1869,

Mr. Layard, then First Commissioner of Works, directed his Secretary, Mr. Russell, to write to the Secretary of the Society of Antiquaries, requesting him to ask the Council of the Society "to have the goodness to furnish him with a list of such Regal and other Historical Tombs or Monuments existing in Cathedrals, Churches, and other Public Places and Buildings, as in their opinion it would be desirable to place under the protection and supervision of the Government, with a view to their proper custody and preservation." Such a request of course did not commit the Government to any particular course of action; it only showed that one of its members looked on the public custody and preservation of at least one class of historical monuments as a desirable end, and that he would be thankful for any hints as to the means by which that end might be compassed. The Society of Antiquaries was of course very much pleased, and at once appointed a Committee to get together the needful information; only they guarded themselves by the proviso "that, in consenting to point out such of our Regal and Historical Monuments as in their judgment stand in need of protective supervision, they consider it not within their province to commit themselves to any opinion as to the nature of the authority under which that supervision should be exercised." We quite go along with the Society; there should be some person or body clothed with authority to look after these things, but we cannot say that we have any definite view who that person or body ought to be. We have as yet only reached a strong negative conviction that it ought not to be Mr. Ayrton. The resolution of the Society to undertake the work was presently sent to Mr. Layard, and acknowledged by him, "with his thanks," through his Secretary.

The Society, in its resolution, very prudently warned Mr. Layard that "the task of drawing up, even with approximate accuracy, such a list as that proposed in the letter from the Office of Works, was one of no small magnitude, and would of necessity occupy a considerable time." The Society found it so. Their Committee, assisted by local inquirers in various districts, among whom we find such trustworthy names as Mr. G. T. Clark, Mr. John Evans, and Mr. Greenwell, took three years in putting together a very valuable and carefully arranged list. The Committee modestly say that their list, as the first attempt of the kind, is most likely not perfect; and most likely it is not. But at any rate it is a very good beginning. The "Regal Monuments" are arranged under several classes, Kings, Queens, their Children, Brothers, &c., but we are not surprised that, as they fixed 1760 as the limit of their labours, no return was made under "Class III.", which was to consist of "Princes Consort." The other division of "Historical Monuments," not being "Regal," consists of nine classes—Archbishops, Lord High Chancellors, Lord High Treasurers, Chief Justices, Statesmen, &c., Persons eminent in Theology, Science, &c., Eminent Naval and Military Personages, Eminent Merchants, and, lastly, "other Persons of Note." It is obvious that some of these classes will leave room for differences of opinion as to who ought to be let in and who ought to be kept out, but on the whole the list seems to be very judiciously drawn up. On March 18, 1872, the work was sent into the present First Commissioner, with an explanation of the principles on which the list had been drawn up, and with the following request contained in the last paragraph:—

The Council, in conclusion, desire me to request you to express to the First Commissioner their wish to be informed whether Her Majesty's Government designs on its own part to lay this Report and Appendix on the Table of both Houses of Parliament for public information, as the Council think would be desirable. They desire to press this question on the consideration of the First Commissioner, because, if such were not the intention of the Government, there are members of the Legislature connected with or interested in the Society who would undertake to move for the production of this paper in both Houses.

On April 3 came the answer; Mr. Ayrton having seemingly devoted the intermediate time to meditations among the tombs. At last, having fully convinced himself of their worthlessness, he sets his Secretary to answer the letter of the Society of Antiquaries. In Mr. Layard's time the Secretary was directed to acknowledge the receipt of the letter "with his thanks," but no thanks are to be found in the formula dictated by Mr. Ayrton. What Mr. Ayrton wishes to tell the Society of Antiquaries is set forth in two sentences of such remarkable length as to suggest the thought that Mr. Ayrton must give his leisure moments, when he has nobody in particular to snub, to a careful study of the obsolete Kanzelstyl of Germany. It would be a shame to abridge such a masterpiece in its own kind. So here the two sentences, long as they are, are at full length:—

SIR,—I am directed by the First Commissioner of Her Majesty's Works, &c., to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th ult., and I am to inform you, for the information of the Council of the Society of Antiquaries of London, that it appears that the communication addressed to you on the 13th February 1869, by the direction of the late First Commissioner, was made without the authority of the Treasury having been at any time obtained, and that the First Commissioner has now been informed by their Lordships that they must decline to authorise him to undertake any duties in respect of the Regal and Historical Tombs or Monuments referred to in the letter above mentioned, and in the valuable Report which you have been good enough to forward.

However much it is to be regretted that the Society should have been induced to embark on such a laborious and important investigation without the sanction of the Treasury, the First Commissioner deems it right to add that their Lordships further observe, that the object contemplated could not, consistently, be accomplished without legislation, and that they have no intention of introducing a Bill, or of laying before Parliament the Report which has been made by the Sepulchral Monuments Committee.

(Signed) GEORGE RUSSELL, Secretary.

We may notice here that, though Mr. Ayrton's letter does not like Mr. Layard's, contain any thanks, it does contain something like regrets. But Mr. Ayrton's regrets are of a most remarkable kind. He does not regret that he has no means of helping the at least harmless objects of the Society of Antiquaries—objects encouraged and even suggested by his own predecessor. What he regrets is, that the Society should have done so impertinent a thing as to make a list of royal and historical monuments without first asking leave from their Lordships at the Treasury. It is evident that, in his view of things, the Society ought never to have ventured "to embark on such a laborious and important investigation without the sanction of the Treasury." That the list can be in any sense its own reward, that it could be of any use to members of the Society or to others even without the sanction of the Treasury, does not seem to have come into Mr. Ayrton's head. Yet he somehow looks on it as "important." What its importance can be from his point of view it is hard to see. All that can be made out of it is that he has some general notion that laborious and important investigations should not be embarked on without the sanction of the Treasury. So the Society of Antiquaries get their snub. Yet if Mr. Ayrton could for a moment have brought himself to be civil to anybody, the Society of Antiquaries had a special claim for civility in this matter. All that they had done, the laborious and important investigation on which they had embarked, had been done and embarked on, if not with the sanction of the Treasury, yet with more than the sanction, at the express request, of Mr. Ayrton's predecessor in office. The Society of Antiquaries were not likely to know, and we are quite sure that we do not know, the exact relation between the First Commissioner and their Lordships. When a high official like the First Commissioner asked the Society to do a certain thing, they naturally thought that that official was doing the right thing in asking them. They were not likely to stop and ask whether the First Commissioner had the sanction of the Treasury for what he was doing. They did what the late First Commissioner asked them to do, and they get snubbed by the present First Commissioner for doing it. The Society of Antiquaries ought at all events to have been civilly treated. If Mr. Ayrton wanted somebody to be rude to on that particular day, he should certainly have vented his rudeness in a letter to his predecessor. If any one was to blame, if any one made any mistake, it was clearly Mr. Layard, and not the Society. On the other hand, it is quite possible that Mr. Layard may not be to blame either. We do not know how these things are managed, but it is quite possible that Mr. Layard's notion of his official duty may be more correct than Mr. Ayrton's. At all events, Mr. Ayrton cannot always gain his ends; for, though he and their Lordships had no intention of laying the Report of the Sepulchral Monuments' Committee before Parliament, yet it has somehow got before Parliament nevertheless. We have before us the "Report of the Sepulchral Monuments' Committee, presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of Her Majesty." We have also a "Copy of Correspondence between the Society of Antiquaries and the Office of Works respecting Sepulchral Monuments," "ordered by the House of Commons to be printed." It well deserved the honour. Even in the Ayrtonian anthology, it may take its place as one of the choicest flowers.

WOMEN'S MEN.

IF songs are the expressions of a nation's political temper, novels show the current of its social morality, and what the learned would call its biological condition. When French novelists devote half their stories to the analysis of those feelings which end in breaking the seventh commandment, and the other half to the gradual evolution of the evidence which leads to the detection of a secret murderer, we may safely assume, on the one hand, that the marriage law presses heavily, and on the other that the national intellect is of that ingenious kind which takes pleasure in puzzles, and is best represented by the familiar examples of dovetailing and mosaic work. When, too, we see that their common feminine type is a creature given over as a prey to nervous fancies and an exalted imagination, of a feverish temperament and a general obscuration of plain morality in favour of a subtilizing and misleading kind of thing which she calls her besoin d'âme, we may be sure that this is the type most approved by both writer and readers, and that anything else would be unwelcome. The French novelist who should describe, as his central figure, a self-disciplined, straightforward, healthy young woman, honestly in love with her husband, rationally fond of her children, not given to dangerous musings about the need of her soul for an elective affinity outside her marriage bond, nor spending her hours in speculating on the philosophy of necessity as represented by Léon or Alphonse; who should make her absolutely impervious to the sickly sentimentalism of the inevitable celibet, and neither paltar with peril nor lament that sin should be sinful when it is so pleasant; who should paint domestic morality as we know it exists in France no less than in England, and trust for his interest to the quiet pathos of unfriendly but cleanly circumstances, would be hard put to it to make his heroine attractive and his story popular; and his readers would not be counted by tens of thousands, as were those who glistened over the sins of Madame Bovary and the puerility of Fanny. The Scandinavian type of woman, spare, stern-eyed, independent, athletic, practical, would not go down with the French reading public; whereas we may assume that the

Parisienne, as we know her in romance—feverish, subtle, casuistic, self-deluding, and always ready to sacrifice duty to sentiment—is the woman best liked by the people to whom she is offered, and that the novelist but repeats and represents the wish of his readers.

So, too, when our own novelists carry their stock puppets through the nine hundred pages held to be necessary for the due display of their follies and disasters, we may be sure that they are of the kind which finds favour in the eyes of the ordinary English reader; that the girls are the girls who please young men or do not alarm mothers, and that the men are the men that women delight in, and think the ideals of their sex. If, as it is said, the delineation of her hero is the touchstone of a woman's literary power, it must be confessed that the touchstone discloses a very feeble amount of literary power, and that the female mind has but a small perception of all that relates to man's needs and nature. It is the rarest thing possible to find a flesh-and-blood man in the pages of a woman's novel; far rarer than to meet with the ordinary young lady in the pages of a man's. They are all either prigs, ruffians, or curled darlings; each one of whom one longs to kick. They are goody men of such exalted morality that Sir Galahad himself might take a lesson from them; or they are brutes with the well-worn square jaw and beetling brow, who translate into the milder action of modern life the savage's method of wooing a woman by first knocking her senseless and then carrying her off; or they are impossible light-weights, with small hands and artistic tendencies, men who moon about a good deal, and are sure to love the wrong woman in a helpless, drifting sort of way, as if it were quite the right and manly thing to do to let themselves fall under the dominion of a passion which a little resolution could overcome. Sometimes, for a difference, these light-weights are men of tremendous pluck and quality of muscle, able to thrash a burly bargee twice their weight and development with as much ease as a steel sword can cut through one of pith. The female crowd of present novel-writers repeat these four types with undeviating constancy, so that we have learnt them all by heart; and after the first outline indicative of their attributes, we can tell who they are as certainly as we can tell Minerva by her owl, St. Catharine by her wheel, Jupiter by his thunderbolts, or St. Sebastian by his arrows. But in what form soever they elect to portray their hero, they are sure to make his love for woman his best and his dominant quality. Few women know anything of the intricacies of a man's life and emotion, save such as are connected with love. Yet, though love is certainly the strongest passion in youth, it is by no means so powerful in maturity and middle age. But the lady's hero of Italy and upwards is as much under the influence of his erotic fancies as if he were a boy of eighteen; and life holds nothing for him worth living for if he does not get the woman with whom he has fallen in love. It seems impossible for a woman to understand the loftier side of a man's nature. She knows nothing, subjectively, of his political aims, his love for abstract truth, his desire for human progress, which take him out of the narrow domestic sphere, and make him comparatively indifferent to the life of sense and emotion altogether. And when she sees this she does not tolerate it. When Newton used his lady's little finger for a tobacco-stopper, he dug his grave in the female garden of the soul; and women rarely appreciate either Dr. Johnson or Dean Swift, because of the absence in the one of anything like romantic tenderness, and its perversion in the other. All they care for is that men shall be tender and true to them, idealizing as lovers, as husbands constant and indulgent, and for this they will condone any amount of crookedness or meanness which does not make its way into the house. If he is complying and carressing there, he may be what the devil likes to make him elsewhere, so long as he is not unfaithful and never gets drunk. All the false glitter of the Corsair school is due solely to the capacity for loving ascribed to the heroes thereof. Though a man's name be "linked with one virtue and a thousand crimes," the one virtue, being love, outweighs the thousand crimes in the estimation of women and of the more effeminate kind of poets; and so long as the "heart is framed for softness," it may be "warped to wrong" without doing him much injury with them. The absolute rightness and justness of a man count for little in comparison with his tenderness, and we know of no woman whose ideal man would be one neither a saint nor a lover.

The reason why the men of a softer civilization are in general so successful with the women of the harder and more warthier countries is because of the comparative tenderness of their manners, and the larger place which love and love-making holds among them. All who know France know the Frenchman's jealous hatred of Italian men; which hatred we share here in England, only we add the Frenchman to the list. We affect to despise the arts by which the men succeed and the women are gained over; but we cannot deny their potency, nor shut our eyes to the esteem in which they are held by women. This is not saying that the chivalrous habit of deference taught by civilization is not a good thing in itself, but it is saying that it is not worth the stronger and more essentially masculine qualities. But to women the art of love-making is worth all the other virtues in a lump; indeed, it comprises them all, and without it the best are valueless. It is the crown and glory of life, the one thing to live for; and where it is not, there is no life worthy of the name. Nothing women are incapable to the charms of public fame. If a man has made himself a great reputation, he may throw the handkerchief where he likes, and he will find plenty of women to pick it up. In this case they are not too rigid in their requirements; and if his ways are a little hard and cold, they hold themselves indemnified for the loss of personal tenderness by the glory which surrounds a name which is now theirs. A woman must be exceptionally silly if she cannot take comfort in her husband's public repute for her disappointment in his private manners. But this is only with recognised and fully successful heroes. As a rule, no amount of manly virtues will excuse the want of the softer graces; and the finest fellow that ever lived, the true amoris among men, must be content to be measured by women merely according to his own estimate of them, and the power which the passion of love has over him.

Nothing surprises men more than the odd ignorance of women concerning them; and half the unhappiness in married life, at least in England, springs from that ignorance. They cannot be made to understand the differences between a man's nature and requirements and their own; and they condemn all that they cannot understand. In those few rational homes where men's sports and gatherings, undisturbed by the presence of potticoats, are not made occasions for suspicion or remonstrance, the stock of love and happiness with which married life began is more like the widow's crust than elsewhere; but unfortunately for both husbands and wives, these homes are rare; while those are common where a game at billiards in the evening is occasion for tears or penting, and deadly offence is taken at club dinners or a week's shooting. The consequence of which is deceit or dissension; and sometimes both. The woman's ideal man has none of these erratic tendencies. His business done, he comes home with the docility of a well-bred pointer sent to heel, and finds energy enough after his hard day's work for a variety of petite soies which make him more precious in her eyes than all the tact, the temper, the judgment, the uprightness he has manifested in his dealings with the outside world. And the domesticity which she claims from her husband she demands from her son. Latchkeys are her abomination, and the "gas left burning" is as a beacon light on the way of destruction. She has the profoundest suspicion of all the men whom her boy calls his friends. She never knows into what mischief they may lead him, but she is sure it is mischief if they keep him away from his home in the evening. She would prescribe the same social restraints and moral regimen for her son as for her daughter, and she thinks the energies of masculine nature require no wider field and no looser rein. But though she likes those tame and tender men whom she can tie up close to her apron-strings and lovingly imprison in the narrow domain of home, she succumbs without a struggle to the square-jawed brute of the Rochester type, the man who dominates her by the mere force of superior strength; and she is not too severe on Don Juan, if only she can flatter herself that she is the best loved, and the last. That these are the men most liked by women is shown both by their own novels and by daily observation; and it seems to us that, among the many subjects for extended study of late proposed for women, a better acquaintance with men's minds, a higher regard for the nobler kind of man, and the ability to accept love as only one of many qualities, and not always the strongest or the most praiseworthy of his impulses, would not be out of place.

NEWSPAPER GARBAGE.

THE first few weeks after Parliament is up are traditionally supposed to be somewhat trying to those who have to supply the public with its daily stock of news. The long debates which were always good for so many columns have suddenly run dry. The speeches of the recess have not yet commenced. Ministers are shooting, or yachting, or cutting down trees in the family park; and their opponents are equally bent on recruiting their wasted energies. Society and politics have undergone a temporary eclipse, and the silly season sets in with its usual severity. The gigantic gooseberry was the crude expedient of a primitive age. It satisfied the simple tastes of an unsophisticated generation, but journalists who aspire to keep pace with advancing education and intelligence feel bound apparently to provide padding of a more highly flavoured description. It is interesting to observe the development of the British penny-a-liner under the imperious conditions of "largest" and "world-wide" circulations. He has taken wings to himself, and soars above the petty level of fires and accidents, or rather we should say, conflagrations and catastrophes. He flies at the highest game, and he has cultivated with remarkable success a style of writing appropriate to his new sphere. His chief function appears to be to depict what, in the slang of his class, would probably be called the "inner life" of the Neopete Calendar. It has been discovered that a literal report of the proceedings in a criminal Court when a murderer is on his trial do not sufficiently bring out the horrible, or, speaking technically, the creeping parts of the scene. An artist in thrilling effects is employed to supplement the notes of the shorthand writer; to tell us how the poor wretch in the dock looked, or sought to have looked, as the case went on; to catalogue his tremors and twitchings, and eager, fearful glances; to describe the home-thrusts of the witnesses, and his writhing under them; and generally to pile up the agony, and give the requisite screw to the feelings of those who read the graphic narrative. The unsatisfied gentleman, who has devoted themselves to this kind of work were quite ready to go through with the job, and to "do" the last moments of the doomed man in their best style, with a powerful realistic study of his agonies and contortions when the drop fell, and curious speculations as to his state of mind; but somehow their first essays in this line were not received in a manner which encouraged a repetition of them, at least for the present. Indeed, such was the squeamishness with which they had to contend that even a spirited description of the backs of half-a-dozen grotters after a flogging gave offence to some fastidious persons. However, although debarred by a conventional prudishness, which after a time will perhaps wear off, from following the murderer to his quicklime in a nameless grave, the intrepid and ingenious liner is not without his consolation. If shut out from the end of the story, at least he can revenge himself by making the most of the beginning. We can hardly say we are surprised to find that the reporting of the loose gossip of policemen and undertakers' men has been elevated into a branch of literature in big type. This is the natural drift of the habit to which two at least of the morning papers appear to have unreservedly surrendered themselves. Inquests and police news are now treated in the style which has lately been introduced for trials at the Old Bailey, and it may be admitted that people who like to sup, or rather breakfast, on horrors are thus supplied with a sufficiently abundant meal of their favourite delicacy.

It would be difficult to imagine anything more loathsome and disgusting than the rival masses which have been hashed up by the Daily Telegraph and the Daily News out of the repulsive details of what is called the Chelsea tragedy. In order to make the most of this filthy garbage, it is served up by each paper in two different ways. Along with a shorthand report of the evidence we have a graphic and glowing narrative by the literary liner. People who like a concentrated dose, hot and strong, will apply themselves to the latter; while those who have leisure and inclination can swallow the one after the other; and this double dose may be doubled again, if anybody thinks he can stand it, by taking the Daily News as a finish to the Telegraph. The tragedy in itself appears to be only a miserable story of vulgar debauchery and drivelling despair. All the characters, incidents, and motives are of the lowest and vilest kind. From beginning to end there is not the faintest gleam of sentiment, or good feeling, or honest passion, to relieve the stupid, grovelling blackguardism of the whole business. There is a kind of awe in death which sometimes lends a strange momentary dignity to the sorriest creatures, but even this is almost wanting here. A couple of young Germans, calling themselves cousins, fled from Berlin, according to their own confession, to escape the conscription, and it is said they stole money for their flight. They reached London on the 10th inst. (at what interval after leaving Berlin does not exactly appear), spent two days at an hotel, then took up their quarters with a couple of loose women whom they met at Cremorne, went the usual round of gross and vulgar dissipation—music-halls, casinos, night-houses, and the rest of it—and on the evening of the 21st they were found in their lodgings each with a bullet through his breast. One died almost immediately, the other still survives. They seem to have drunk themselves into a state of maudlin despair, and after an afternoon of weeping and quarrelling and embracing decided to die. In everything there was the same dull stupidity and want of imagination. Their brief career of so-called pleasure appears to have been without spirit or gaiety; it was poor plodding vice and cheap debauchery, and the end was as cowardly as their first flight from Berlin. It is probable that the dead man, as the survivor asserts, shot his companion and himself too; there is no suggestion of any one else being concerned in the affair, and the letter which has been found shows that there was a preconcerted plan. The letter, which was signed by both men, states that they left Berlin with 300*l.*, and the police seem to think they are bound to trace the expenditure of this money. They are perhaps under the impression that, if they can do that, it will compensate for their not discovering the Hoxton and other murderers; but it may be doubted whether they are not putting themselves to needless trouble. The only question for the coroner's jury was whether Nagel shot May, or May shot Nagel, but even if May lives, the opinion of the jury on this point is, under the circumstances, of little practical consequence. It can hardly be worth while "to trace out," as the Telegraph says, the police are doing, "the fast life of the young men during their stay in London"; but whatever the police may do, it is at least no business of respectable journalists to pry into those unsavoury details for the sake of gratifying the prurient curiosity of a certain class of their readers. The Telegraph has thrown itself into the nasty work with characteristic impetuosity. Its labours have been rewarded by the discovery of "a Langton Street bill of fare." We have no wish to despoil our enterprising contemporary of the glorious fruit of his honest industry, and shall leave any who care to study this remarkable document to seek it in the columns where it first appeared. It is touching, however, to observe the various uses to which a great organ can devote itself; nothing comes amiss to it, and when Mr. Gladstone is out of town and the daily service of praise and worship in honour of the most pious of Ministers is for the moment suspended, it turns with equal relish to the no less congenial occupation of mastering the "inner life" of a Chelsea brothel. The artist in horrors knows the value of little details. The bullet extracted from Nagel's body, "bruised and flattened by knocking against his ribs"—how graphic this is!—is "produced by the doctor from a green silk purse;" and we are also treated to "the handing round of Paul May's blood-stained and smoke-begrimed shirt," and the exhibition of the pistol before the dead man's paramour, whose "eyes followed the weapon, her voice trembled, and sank, while an expression of pain and horror stole over her face." All this is in the highest style of art—that is, of this kind of art; but still the Daily News is not outdone. It is interesting to have the calm and dispassionate opinion of the organ of philosophical Radicalism, that one of the prostitutes who has figured in this wretched story, "though she has no pretensions to good looks, is not without a certain attractiveness of appearance," and wears "neatly-fitting gloves." There is also a fine passage in which the murdered man is depicted "chambered for two sultry nights with the corpse of the friend who had attempted to take his life," which almost beats the "Langton Street bill of fare," so triumphantly paraded by its eager rival. On the whole, our contemporaries between them have made a handsome contribution to the literature of the stews and the charnel-house.

The whole affair, as we have said, is a poor story of coarse, commonplace vice. As historians of the events of the day the newspapers were bound to report it, but this they might have done briefly and simply. All the facts lie in a nutshell. It happened however that, besides the natural horrors of the case, there was about some of its incidents a flavour of prurient suggestion which seems to have presented an irresistible temptation to the manufacturers of sensational news. There is, or used to be, a class of periodicals dealing in murders and atrocities of all kinds, which among the class that chiefly patronized them went by the name of "penny dreadfuls." If these still continue to be published, they must find their province seriously invaded by the picturesque reporters of murders and trials. The newspapers which parade those long, minute, and inexpressibly disgusting narratives cannot plead at the present moment that they are obliged to make the most of their news on account of its scantiness. August may sometimes be a dull month, but not this year. What with strikes, high prices, autumn manoeuvres, "heathens" at home, Irish riots, the coal question, the food question, the potato question, the licensing question, and ever so many other questions, the intelligent manager of a newspaper can have no difficulty in finding subjects on which the public would be glad of information. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that this odious and demoralizing trash is deliberately concocted because it is supposed to sell, and "world-wide" circulations need to be kept up to the mark by perpetual doses of strong stimulants. When the war ceased and the Commune burnt itself out, it was thought necessary to provide readers with excitements of another kind. There are no more battle-pieces for the present, and inquests and murders have to be painted in with rather strong effects to pass as a substitute.

It would perhaps be idle to argue with those who have deliberately adopted this policy that they are doing all they can to corrupt and brutalize human nature, and to degrade the tone of public sentiment. The same reasons which led to the discontinuance of public executions equally apply to the practice of describing murders and other horrible things in minute and ghastly detail. Nor perhaps would it be much to the purpose to point out that the measure of respect which is paid to the press in any country is in the respect which the press shows for itself and its work. These arguments may be met by the obvious retort that what is sought is not respect, but a large sale. There is one consideration, however, which may not be without force. Nothing is easier than to work up cheap sensations out of bloodshed and crime. It has been tried in various kinds of literature, and always with the same result. It may be true that in the first instance he who peppers the highest is surest to please; but the diseased palate demands continually an increase of the stimulants to which it has been accustomed, till at the last even the most reckless spicing fails to satisfy. The newspapers to which we have been referring are only making future difficulties for themselves by the course they are now pursuing, and perhaps it may be worth while for them to consider whether they had not better pause before it is too late. Some reflections of this kind appear to have already crossed the mind of the Daily News. The reappearance of Mr. Chaffers, and the threatened reopening of the inquiry into the early life of Lady Twiss, has inspired this virtuous print with some uneasiness. It finds itself placed "at the mercy of every spiteful or morbid mind which delights in placarding its own and others' infamy," and it admits that this is one of those things "which gently remind us that a widely diffused press is not an unmixed blessing." Of course the Daily News will feel obliged to yield to the painful necessity of printing whatever nastiness comes in its way; and it hints in unmistakable language that not even Messalina, Beatrice Cenci, Francesca of Rimini, or Madame de Warens in the box making a frank disclosure of her history, would deter it from publishing a faithful report of the proceedings. Its only consolation is that "the revelations of our own day are less abominable than they might have been"; and this must be our consolation too.

BADEN-BADEN.

THOUGH the days of the Dupre dynasty are numbered, Baden next year will be but a phantom of itself, there is this season less than the usual glitter about the "summer capital" of Europe. The F&N would make, and has sent but few and insignificant representatives. It despises the victories long assured to it of fashion, and since the eagles of the Great Nation have made so poor a show on the European stage, its peacocks are unwilling to display themselves. The absence of French notables depresses their Russian friends, leaves to American belles too great a pre-eminence, and is a portent of that Prussian morality and those Prussian manners which are to regenerate Western Europe, and meantime to sweep away the watering-place wickednesses of the German Empire. In spite, however, of the coming shadow, Baden maintains itself to the last as the brightest of Continental rendezvous. Nowhere is life easier; the only condition of enjoyment being sufficient money to pay the hotel bill without a pang, to listen with interest but without anxiety to the remarks of the croupiers, and to command a strong pair of horses for the charming excursions of the neighbourhood. Without possessing the brilliant Mediterranean beauty of Monaco, Baden has more variety of landscape, and of a type better suited to our Northern sympathies. It forms the background to entertainments which, though not as magnificent as those supplied by M. Blanc to his visitors either at Homburg or in his Southern capital, have the charm of greater unceremoniousness. Chevet does not at Baden minister to the appetites of dyspeptic and difficult guests. The Prussian Zeus does not, as at Eins, reveal himself in mufti; yet there is a livelier sparkle on the stream of life in the Southern stronghold of roulette. Amusement is at Baden treated scientifically, and it is recognized that we must not work too hard at our diversions. Nothing is obligatory, not even the morning promenade to the sound of martial music, which is a thing of necessity in places where there are real invalids to drink really efficacious mineral waters.

To do always exactly what is pleasantest would doubtless become in time as irksome as any other rule, nor could the most determined dawdler, if of English race, bear more than a month or two of total abstinence from work; but for a while the consciousness is agreeable that there is absolutely nothing expected of us, unless indeed we have brought with us those family responsibilities which will probably hamper us at Baden more than elsewhere. The atmosphere is singularly undomestic, and if a sad face is here and there to be seen, it will probably belong to some family-father told off on duty for some distasteful excursion with his belongings, or whose little ventures, or possibly his excessive caution, at trente-et-quarante are disapproved by his helpmate. The ties of relationship are sorely tried by the strain of even trivial gambling, and the worship of Fortune is unlike other cults in that, instead of binding, it loosens the social structure. We are not concerned to moralize on the fact that there is such a worship. The arguments for and against the permission of public gambling have been lately aired in various respectable French journals, and roulette has not been condemned with the unanimity that might have been expected; or at least pleas from unexpected quarters have been advanced in its favour as furnishing an outlet under police control for the irrepressible spirit of gaming. However that may be, the circle that presses round the green tables and their central piles of gold and silver when play is brisk affords curious glimpses of character. Cracks and flaws in our social polish are discoverable which, if further investigated, smell distinctly of brimstone, or whatever it be that supplies the bouquet of the nether world. Yet comedy rather than tragedy is enacted in the four salons sacred to Chance, and if now and then suffering is visible, it quickly becomes grotesque. Ever-watchful detectives and iron convention replace sufficiently for social purposes such virtues as pity and charity. Never has such equality been attained as under the Blanc and Dupressoir régimes, and the result is that dead level of vulgarity into which all enter who agree to accept the atmosphere as satisfactory. Russian prince, Borussia hero, American élégant, or British tourist, fall into it visibly as they jostle for their winnings and behave to their neighbours with all the rudeness allowable. Of course women can least withstand the influence of the place, and if there is a momentary flurry in the crowd, some fair fury is almost certainly the cause of it. In proportion as the stakes are insignificant the eagerness of the players seems to increase; and as at Baden every one plays except the townspeople, the proportion of small ventures and feverish anxiety is large. There is a freedom of speech permitted—always, however, within certain limits—which is not tolerated at Homburg or Monaco, so that, be the police ever so careful, in the agony of losing a thaler, or the despair of hearing double zero noir proclaimed, revelations of human nature are attainable as not elsewhere round the Baden bullion-traps.

Our readers, we take for granted, are not ignorant of the simple delights of trente-et-quarante, and know quite enough of the fascinating chances of roulette, but they may not have observed the faces of the players and their temporary ugliness, however well cut their features. Never was there an occupation more destructive of distinction, and in several subtle forms the ravages of even an hour's gambling betray themselves. The sudden face, bloodshot eyes, and shaking hand belong perhaps only to persons far gone, but carelessness of dress and looks, even among pretty women, and rough egotism in men ordinarily well bred, soon come of play. A great deal of "temper" is accumulated when luck is with the bank, and it shows itself in childish ways quite unworthy of our civilised superiority. Indeed an unreasonable irritability is a main source of gain to the bank. From the follies on which gambling sets, quite as much as from any chance in the game, is derived the income of those who know how to sweep into their coffers the harvest that "temper" and avidity and superstition supply.

Curious statistics of luck-worship might be collected in the neighbourhood of roulette, for though it is a faith widely practiced, nowhere else are its nature and results so tangible. Even trente-et-quarante does not lend itself to the same credulities, for it does not in the same way use numbers, and numbers have ever had a powerful influence on the imagination. Where public lotteries are allowed we know how every event of life, every combination of circumstances, is used for divination of a winning number. How exciting when every minute brings the chances of a fresh lottery! So profoundly rooted is the power of numbers that superstitions concerning them spring up in the most "positive" minds, and sacrifices which no other worship could extort are freely offered on the altar of luck. But luck being an inconstant and sometimes an implacable deity, an Ahirman rather than an Ormuzd, its votaries apply themselves continually to cheat their idol, and to circumvent fortune by the use of numbers revealed to them by some kinder deity. Hence out of the trivial event of a marble falling into a numbered place come conflicts of superstition that rouse forces in human nature little understood by the prophets of our superficial scepticism. When some favoured person wins largely on a number, his winnings are almost always immediately spent in fresh appeals to Fortune. Great is she, greater even than Mammon, and her votaries are ready to forego many things for her, even their little comforts. Fine ladies will hustle and be hustled; subscribers to Bible Societies will be busy in the unclean Sunday crowd. Even by the gayest, balls, concerts, and flirtations must be made secondary affairs if once the spirit of play descends upon them. Invalids become indifferent to temperature, and patients endure now the heat of a thousand gas-lights and a thousand guests, now the chilly draughts from the Forêt.

Yet there are pleasant sounds and gay doings outside the charmed circle of the Dupressoir magic. Strauss conducts his orchestra with energy, and himself puts in the high lights of his wild waltzes by the help of his excellent violin. He has this year been specially welcomed on his return from Boston, and the promenading crowd pressed round him to receive the passionate clangour, the wailing fury of his dance music, which suited the place and time better than did the more ambitious concerts of classical and orthodox strains. More characteristic, however, than either the theatrical entertainments or the dancing to which the Baden world is bidden are the occasional children's balls, where juvenile Europe disports itself with more originality than its elders. Let us make-believe ever so hard in natural grace and goodness, and refuse with noble pride the humiliating doctrine of original sin, yet it is undeniable that in an assembly of children severely repressive training and attention to etiquette are desirable, if not indispensable. The old Adam breaks out in the raw infant, and at the Baden ball showed itself in the rude gestures and reckless egotism of the unbroken, or badly broken, creatures that behaved by the light of nature and tramped through their Polonaise with conscious boorishness. The value of politeness became evident in the contrast of such children as had been trained to forms of respect whether for themselves or for others. We will call them old-fashioned, and think it praiseworthy to dwell on the satisfaction of watching some half-dozen pairs of miniature partners able to bow and curtsy with grace, to talk without grimace or grin, and to be at once obedient and at their ease as they were directed by the energetic master of the ceremonies. A tombola, or distribution of prizes, at the end was of course a severe trial; but good-breeding prevailed in some rare representatives of those children whose noble grace was understood by Velasquez and Vandyck.

Comfort for his visitors in their various modes of worship has not been neglected by M. Dupressoir. The elder churches are, indeed, not visibly affected by the affluence of the gambling suburb, unless the "messe des pareux," said by a French ecclesiastic during the season, be a concession to the foreign element; but a Protestant temple, a glittering Russian dome, and an English church of the latest Anglican architecture, would probably never have existed but for the adjacent worship of Fortune. The mineral waters are certainly not the attraction of Baden, for they are little used by the sixty thousand visitors, of whom but a few inquisitive souls are to be seen strolling through the Corinthian Trinkhalle and gazing at its faded frescoes. It seems impossible but that, when roulette disappears, the Dupressoir city should fall into decay. Its perfectly swept miles of walk and drive, its ornamental shrubs and fountains, its rows of stucco shops and white palaces, must require for their shining cleanliness and sparkle the stray thalers and friedrichs dropped on the tables. "There will be the same fêtes," say the Badenais; but from what byways will the guests be brought? Lovely as is the Black Forest scenery, its valleys will hardly draw strangers of the gaudy sort that now make Baden brilliant. The attractions of ruined or even habitable castles are very well by way of interlude. The Lichtenthal, its convent and oak-shaded allée, the fishing and shooting, even the races, will not attract purses enough to support the gas, the orchestra, or the magnificently whiskered footmen who now adorn the place. Demolition will fall on the "parc anglais, fait sur une montagne," of which Alfred de Musset sang when "le vrai bon ton" required.

A tout être créé, possédant équipage,
De se précipiter sur ce petit village,
Et de s'y bécotter impitoyablement.

Possibly the Greek dome may continue as brightly gilt, for Russia is an advancing Power on the European line, but we fear that yet more impassioned appeals than those now issued will be needed to the remaining English and Americans who will be requested to maintain the Anglican services. The highly decorated congregation, to the beauty of which Worth and his fellows contribute so largely will become scant and dowdy. Erring and exhausted Cook's tourists will fill the free seats, and depress the spirits of the trustees. Alas for the élégantes who, walking delicately, sought the best places in return for their florins, with contemptuous mien! Alas for the irreproachable chimney-pots, shrines of English devotion! The economic residents will ill supply the place of the Dupressoir monde. The ancient castles will least suffer by a return to former quietude. If the Margraves or widowed Margravines whose dower-house Hohenbaden has in later times been have any consciousness of earthly events, we may congratulate them on the probable removal of the restaurant that now occupies the base of their noble fortress. At all events the innumerable hotel-keepers must dread the dulness of coming summers. Meantime, the race week is imminent, shooting parties are announced, the round of amusement is at its fastest pace; they will reap this year's harvest, and then doubtless the nomad race of waiters will disperse, and their masters will lead them to fresh woods and pastures new. As it is now, the charm of Baden seems inseparably connected with the scenery provided by its Administration des Jeux. The visitor feels as an actor in a comedy; responsibilities lose their weight, every one drifts with agreeable no-meaning to uncertain issues. Taste is never shocked, convention reigns over all troublesome individuality, and replaces moral law. Society is a specimen of perfect policedom and of material orderliness. All its arrangements are complete, even to the booth for the sale of Bibles, and the Sunday ceremonies provided for those who would be otherwise unenay.

We are told that the devotees of gambling will, when Germany has cast them out, repair to the village of Saxon in the Valais, where "Rien ne va plus!" may be heard all the year round. But gold will have to work its miracles on a large scale before the sad Rhône valley, the ruinous slopes of its monotonous mountains, the fever and crétin-haunted hamlets, can be sufficiently decorated to mask the ugly accessories of the green tables. Many louis d'or will be required ere Baden successes can be assured elsewhere. But great is the louis d'or; and even in our generation, who knows that we may not witness the supreme triumph which can show us a child's fête under the same roof as the roulette table, and a throng of most respectable churches of all denominations gathered round the inevitable theatre of the exotic city that is to rise—we will hope, not like an exhalation—by the grey torrent of the upper Rhône.

THE BUTCHER'S BILL.

THE London Patriotic Society, an offshoot apparently of the once famous "Hole in the Wall," has just discovered that political economy is a conspiracy against the working classes. This is an old story with the patriots, from Jack Cade downwards. If the country were governed in a right spirit, political economy would of course be put down by Act of Parliament, supply and demand would be prohibited from interfering with the privileges of honest labour, and there would be always "seven halfpenny loaves for a penny." We gather from the report of a meeting which was held on Sunday last at Clerkenwell Green, under the auspices of the Patriotic Society, that the working-men are very much surprised and disgusted to find that the rise of wages which they have secured for themselves has been followed by a general rise in the prices of provisions and other commodities. They appear to have been under the impression that the cost of labour could be indefinitely increased while other things remained at the same prices as before; and they are naturally disconcerted at learning that the concessions they have won from their employers represent only the beginning of a sharp struggle, in which all classes of the community are endeavouring in one way or another to recover the additional charge thus imposed upon them. One of the speakers at Clerkenwell drew an affecting picture of the universal plot against the working-man. There had been, he said, a most extraordinary rise in the price of that part of mutton which was mostly used by the working classes—namely, breasts of mutton. Six years ago they were sold at 3d. a pound, and now they are 8d. Legs of beef had gone up from 3½d. to 7d. Butter was double the price it used to be. On eggs there had been an advance of 60 per cent., on lard of 50 per cent. Coals were going up alarmingly. Lucifer matches and firewood had advanced in price, and "penny savoyes had been subjected to a remarkable reduction in size." Everybody was raising prices against them, and "the publicans, who still sold their beer at 3d. a quart, appeared to be their only friends"—an opinion, we suspect, which will not be accepted without qualification by the United Kingdom Alliance. The orators found it easier to state their grievances than to propound a remedy. Resolutions were passed at random vaguely denouncing the "land and game laws," and protesting against the restrictions placed on the importation of diseased foreign cattle as "a system of Protection in the interest of home breeders—a system which, in a nation pledged to Free-trade, ought no longer to be tolerated." The value of these resolutions is not a question of theory or speculation, but of experience; and the statistics of the devastations of the cattle-plagues before any restrictions were imposed supply a conclusive proof of the public advantage which has been derived from them. Free-trade in disease would by this time have swept our flocks and herds almost utterly off the face of the land; and, apart from the effect of such a catastrophe on the retail price of meat, even patriots might be expected to understand that the ruin of a large class of the community is not exactly calculated to promote the general welfare of the nation. It is an axiom with the class of politicians from which the Patriotic Society derives its inspiration that all wrongs and grievances should be laid on the land, as they once were on the King. On reflection the patriots will probably agree that a redistribution of personal property, including the idle hoards of the Bank of England, would be of more immediate use to them than a division of the land. One of the speakers seemed to be not without doubts whether after all the question of butcher's meat was not one of domestic economy rather than of high politics, and hinted deferentially to the meeting that perhaps it might be worth while to try the effect of eating less meat, and of persuading their wives to learn cooking. We hope this gentleman will not fail to attend the "monster meeting" which is to be held in Trafalgar Square, and infuse a little common sense into the proceedings.

There can be no doubt that the price of meat is becoming a serious question, not only for the working classes, but perhaps still more for the middle classes, who have at the same time other burdens to contend with. It may be assumed that for the present, with the murrain in our pastures and stalls, the supply of meat is more likely to be diminished than increased; while, on the other hand, the prosperity of the industrial classes has undoubtedly enlarged the demand. Prices will probably go up, or at least keep up for some time to come; and consumers must therefore choose between spending more money and buying less meat. In a vast number of cases this will be Hobson's choice; but it is perhaps some consolation to reflect that buying less meat need not imply a diminution of nutriment. No people in the world consume so much flesh meat as the English, and no people consume it so wastefully. If the Patriotic Society would let the land alone for the present, and take up the practical suggestion of the member of their body who advised the working classes to give their minds to cooking, they would be doing an important service to their own class and to the country. It is perhaps forgotten that eight years ago the Privy Council directed an inquiry to be made into the dietaries of the lowest-fed classes of the population. The investigation was entrusted to Dr. Edward Smith, who examined the food of 53 households in England and Wales, of 29 in Scotland, and of 52 in Ireland. In 125 English cases the inquiry related to the poorer class of indoor workpeople, such as silk-weavers, needle-women, glove-stitchers, stocking-weavers, and shoemakers, in London and in various provincial towns; the other cases belonged almost exclusively to the agricultural population. The results brought to light were somewhat surprising. It appeared that a large body of people were actually existing, or trying to exist, on less food—that is, less carbon and nitrogen—than, according to scientific calculations, was deemed barely sufficient to "avert starvation diseases" from the unemployed operatives of Lancashire during the cotton famine. It was also discovered that as regards actual nourishment England was the worst-fed division of the kingdom. "On the whole," Dr. E. Smith reported, "there was the most nutriment, the least sum spent upon food, the least variety of food, the greatest economy in the selection of food, the most breadstuffs and milk, the least sugars, fats, meats, cheese, and tea, in Ireland. There was the least amount of nutriment, the greatest variety of food, the most costly selection of food, the least quantity of breadstuffs and milk, the greatest quantity of sugars, fats, and meats, in England." It was calculated that the Irish, who spent little more than half as much on food as the English, got fully twice as much for their money in the shape of carbon and nitrogen—the two chief elements of nutrition. Scotland followed Ireland in point of economy. Meat or bacon was eaten by 92 per cent. of all the families included in the inquiry. In England the percentage was 99, in Ireland 59, Scotland coming between the two. The quantity consumed by each adult weekly was 16 ounces in England, 10½ ounces in Scotland, and in Ireland, 4½ ounces, or only about a fourth of the English allowance.

While the English were pronounced from this point of view to be worse fed than the Irish or Scotch, the lower classes of London were similarly described as spending more and getting less than the corresponding classes in the provinces; and this was ascribed, not merely to the high prices of the metropolis, but chiefly to the injudicious choice of articles of food which were costly in proportion to the nutriment they afforded. Dr. E. Smith observed "a prevalent desire in the population of Spitalfields and Bethnal Green to obtain rapid food, such as cooked fish, herrings, trotters stewed and eaten with the broth, cockles, shrimps, mussels, black-puddings, pickled pork, liver and bacon, many of which contained but little nutriment, and in none could the weight be fairly ascertained and the nutritive value estimated." He also pointed out that the habit, very common among the poorer classes of London, of buying food in very small quantities, as, for example, bacon in pennyworths, and tea in quarter-ounces daily, necessarily caused a great waste of money, which might be avoided by a little thrift and foresight. The great disadvantage of London, as compared with country towns such as Macclesfield, Coventry, &c., is the want of milk. Of the nourishment of the agricultural labourer Dr. Smith gave, on the whole, a favourable account. The man, he thought, was usually well fed, though as much could not always be said of their families. He was startled to find that

"in Yorkshire cheesecakes and custards are given almost daily at breakfast and dinner, and the men take a nap for an hour after dinner, as at Mr. Thompson's, of Buckton"—surely an exceptional instance of bucolic luxury. It is with the population of the towns, however, and especially of London, that we are now concerned. It need hardly be observed that, wide as was the field of Dr. E. Smith's inquiry, it cannot be regarded as exhaustive or conclusive. Yet there is no reason to question the substantial soundness of his general conclusion, that the economy of food is much better understood in Ireland and Scotland than in England, and that the poorer classes of London are especially wasteful and extravagant in their selection of food. The inquiry did not extend to the better sort of mechanics and artisans, but if it had, it would no doubt have been found that their nutriment bore an utterly inadequate proportion to their expenditure. The secret of economical cooking is to be found in the Scotch kail-pot and the French pot au feu. When meat is cooked in soup, you get the salts as well as the meat. Rice and potatoes, though poor and insufficient in themselves, form a highly nutritious diet when cooked with a small morsel of meat, especially of the fat meat which the poor in their ignorant fastidiousness usually reject. Bones and scraps may be turned to very profitable account when cooked with vegetables, which absorb the fat and juices. Fish is sometimes suggested as a substitute for meat; but fish is rather a relish than a food, and contains little more nutriment than water. The labouring-classes are right in seeking to get as much flesh food as possible; but they would get more for their money if they would only understand the value of cooking it with other adjuncts. There is a melancholy waste both in the choice of flesh food and in the cooking. There is probably waste, too, in the white bread generally used, which has been pronounced by competent authorities to be dangerously deficient in the nutritive qualities essential to the support of a hard worker; but on this point the doctors are not quite agreed. Dr. E. Smith laments the amount of money which is, as he holds, wasted, and worse than wasted, upon tea. The amount of nutriment contained in an ounce of tea is infinitesimal, and medical evidence is very strong as to the deleterious consequences of the habitual use of strong, harsh, acrid tea, which has been boiled or stewed rather than infused. One of the most pressing and important wants of a town population is milk or something which should be a substitute for it. As far as we know, a substitute has yet to be invented, but if the English prejudice against buttermilk could be overcome, it would be a valuable addition to popular food, especially in the case of children. Preserved milk is dearer than fresh milk, and the principal constituent of a good deal of it seems to be, not milk, but brown sugar or honey. It is obvious that the butcher's bill is not to be cut down by fantastic resolutions to abstain from meat, which, even if they were adhered to, would not touch the permanent causes of scarcity, nor yet by wild and meaningless denunciations of what is called the "landed interest." All classes have it in their power to reduce the cost of meat by making a more thrifty and intelligent use of it, and if the present high prices have the effect of turning the public mind in this direction, there may in the long run be no reason to regret their pressure.

BALZAC'S MODESTE MIGNON.

THERE are so many turns and returns in the history of any human mind, and especially in the history of the largest and most persistently active minds, that he would be an acute critic indeed who could predict the kind of work which an author will produce in the future. No one who had read the stern and terrible tragedy of the Père Goriot would believe that an author so severe in his realism, so determined to see painful facts clearly and describe them accurately, so much disposed (as it appeared) to prefer painful facts as a subject of study, would, after ten years of further experience and intense application to labour, produce a romance so young and fresh and delicate as the history of Modeste Mignon. If the Père Goriot and Modeste Mignon were given to any ordinary critic, and he were asked to guess the age of the author when he wrote each of the two works, he would assign Modeste Mignon to the imagination of youth, and the Père Goriot to the saddened wisdom of the most advanced experience of life.

Balzac was born in May, 1799. He wrote the Père Goriot in 1834, and Modeste Mignon ten years later. The comparison of a man's life to the course of a year is a trite one; but it holds true also in this, that as in the course of the seasons there comes a brief return of summer when summer seemed already ended, so in the seasons of the mind there comes, after the hardest experience, a return of the romance of youth. The whole conception of the story of Modeste Mignon is that of a pure romance. Circumstances are brought about in the charmingly improvisé way that marks all genuine romantic composition, and the tale ends exactly as one would desire that it might have ended. The writer restrains his tendency to analysis, and becomes this time a simple and charming story-teller. A reader only partially acquainted with the range of Balzac's sympathies, and having the condensed conception of him which is generally prevalent, would find Modeste Mignon so unlike his idea of the author as to seem scarcely Balzac at all; and a few centuries hence some learned historian of literature may reject it without hesitation as spurious, and attribute it to some unknown and probably youthful writer of that school of passion and sentiment which has George Sand for its distinguished head.

Modeste Mignon is a young lady who, being brought up in a very quiet way, and looked after as closely as a respectable jeune fille always is looked after, finds her life somewhat too narrow for her intellect and imagination. She is partially of German extraction (this was necessary to account for her erratic habits as a reader), and having already access to the poets of two nations by the inheritance of two languages, finds the key of the English Byronian literature in the study of a third. It is necessary, to complete a situation of this kind, that the fervid young student should be surrounded by elderly people of rather bourgeois tastes who have settled down in that life of stupid, unprogressive tranquillity which makes provincial existence at once so safe for the nervous system and so slow. The picture of Modeste Mignon at the beginning of her adventures is a study of certain nature activities which find themselves repressed and confined by the tranquillity of the life around them, which has been cooled and solidified by time. These activities are the instincts of intellect and of sex, the desires of a fine young woman who naturally wants to be loved and married, and the aspirations of an ardent young intellect that wants a satisfying intellectual companionship. Modeste Mignon, like hundreds of young people of both sexes who live with persons older and more prosaic than themselves, finds a refuge from ennui in the imagination, and stimulus for the imagination in the works of the modern poets. The classes to whom poetry is most welcome are those who have leisure enough for dreaming, and yet whose actual life is bounded by narrow limits which cannot easily be passed. A young lady of superior natural gifts, in such a position as that of Modeste Mignon is sure to go to the poets in search of a temporary deliverance. The realm of poetry is a refuge from the dulness of a narrow life, a refuge vast enough for the imagination to roam and wander in freely.

It would be easy to treat a situation of this kind after the manner of facetious journalists. When a young woman has "everything that she can possibly require," that is, when she has material comfort, it is of course very wrong of her to be discontented, and very absurd to be aspiring after the ideal. But criticism of this kind does not reflect that it is precisely this material comfort which makes these aspirations possible, by leaving the mind free to dream, and to desire the realization of its dreams. It is scarcely possible that a farmer's lass who has to feed pigs, and is constantly occupied in a round of duties scarcely more elevating, should acquire the habit of dreaming with the immortal poets; and it is almost equally unlikely that a young woman of the world whose whole time is divided between showing herself in public and recovering from the fatigues of the exhibition, should find time for aspirations after the ideal life. But a girl in the comfortable middle-class who has neither labour nor pleasure to occupy and fatigue her is particularly liable, if she has a grain of imagination in her composition, to self-indulgent reveries in poetical reverie. It is true that these dreamings do not commonly take the direction which they took in the case of Mademoiselle Mignon. In the great majority of instances the young lady goes to religion for the poetical expansion which she needs, and her fervour disguises itself from her own criticism in something of a mystic character, till the glow of young imagination becomes the enthusiasm of saintly love and duty. When the case takes this turn, the danger, in a Roman Catholic country, is a passionate desire for the "religious life"—in other words, resolution to take conventual vows; but when the enthusiasm is rather of an intellectual than a religious kind it finds its satisfaction less easily, because such cases are less frequent and there is less provision for them in the organization of society. To speak quite plainly, whilst the poetically-religious young lady has the ceremonies of the Church to satisfy her, the ecstasies of the saints to authorize her own ecstasies by approved example and the doors of innumerable nunneries ready to open for her and her dowry, the poetically-intellectual young lady has no possible safety or satisfaction but in that rarest of all marriages, an intellectual union with a man capable of realizing her own intellectual ideal. The first, it is true, may fall in love with a priest, but then in a Catholic country she may not marry him. The second is more likely to fall in love with a poet, especially if she knows him exclusively by his writings.

What happened to Modeste Mignon has happened to many poetically-enthusiastic young ladies before her time and since. She used to read Byron and Lamartine till they fell in love with them and Modeste Mignon believed that in the poet Canalis (a poet existing only in Balzac's world of fiction) she would find the big companionship of the soul. So she began a correspondence with her poet—a correspondence which had to be conducted clandestinely and anonymously on her part, in order to escape the vigilance of her natural guardians. When her first letter reached the celebrated author he handed it to his secretary. The poet, who had received plenty of letters from female admirers, and became accustomed to that sort of demonstration, saw nothing in this to deserve his attention particularly, but the secretary liked the tone of the young lady's communication, and thought it deserved a reply. "Answer it yourself then," said the poet, "sign my name, and go to the very end of the adventure, you like. You will tell me the result three months hence." M. La Brière, the secretary, answered Modeste's letter kindly but severely, playing the part of a poet flattered by her praises yet at the same time that of a man of experience a little alarmed on her own account. In short, he reads her a lecture on the imprudence of the step she has taken in her ignorance of his personal character, and points out that a step of this kind might have been really dangerous; that a poet may have great faults and blemishes, or even vices, and ought not to be personally trusted until he is personally known. Modeste answers this letter by asking whether the poet would have written it if he had known her to be a very wealthy heiress who was resolved not to have a stupid husband. To this question La Brière replied, very sensibly, that observations were different in the world according to the rank and fortune of the men and women composing it; that a king may not stoop to pick up a piece of gold, whereas a labourer ought to retrace his steps to seek for some lost coppers, whilst each must obey the laws of economy according to his position. So the heiress of a princely house might permit herself a frankness towards a poet which would be ridiculous in the daughter of a tradesman. Modeste answers that she is the daughter of a count, and that the principal personage in her family had been a cardinal. Modeste Mignon lived at Havre; La Brière knew thus much, and went there after having managed so that a letter from him should reach the Havre post-office about the same time. He followed Modeste's maid when she received this communication, and so at last had a glimpse of his fair correspondent. After this he returns to Paris and writes to her more frankly, confessing that he has seen her, and now the correspondence on both sides becomes more and more interesting, and affectionate, and romantic. In short, M. La Brière is in love in the full sense of the word, having seen the young lady with the eyes of the flesh as well as those of the spirit, whilst she is quite ready to love him as ardently, if she could only behold him. At last she begs him to become visible, and to visit a certain church at Havre, on a certain Sunday, wearing a white robe in his button-hole. After this she is in love with him, and tells him so pretty frankly, but requires that he shall not present himself without her father's permission.

The father of Modeste, Colonel Mignon, Count de La Bastie, had been absent for some years in the East, and now returned with a large fortune. La Brière was to see him as he passed through Paris on his way from Marseilles to Havre. La Brière's position had become false and difficult enough. Modeste still supposed him to be Canalis, and in all his correspondence he had used the name of the famous poet. A trusty man of business, named Dumay, whom the Colonel had left at Havre with the especial charge to guard Modeste against lovers, suspected something from her demeanour, and with the help of her blind mother, found everything out. This Dumay came to Paris and had an interview with the real Canalis, whom he accused of keeping up this correspondence. In this way Dumay discovered the part which had been played by La Brière, and the Colonel was prepared to consider La Brière as a sort of swindler. The Colonel is, however, disarmed by the frankness of La Brière's confession, and most especially by his joy when the Colonel tells him that Modeste will have but a small fortune. Canalis, on the other hand, knows that Modeste is to be a great heiress, and regrets that he has not pursued the adventure on his own account. To satisfy both, and place Modeste and the gentlemen in right relations, the Colonel decides that they shall both go in their true characters to Havre, and make themselves as agreeable as they can, after which Modeste shall decide for herself. M. La Brière, though he had acted as secretary to his friend Canalis, was also a referee of the Court of Accounts, and therefore really in an independent position. Canalis, however, when they arrive at Havre, plays the patron as much as he can and places La Brière in the shade. Modeste, too, treats La Brière with perfect coolness, and there comes a third candidate on the scene in the person of the Duke d'Héronville, a young gentleman of very good family but reduced fortune, and small personal prestige. Canalis lets off all the fireworks of his intellect wherewith to dazzle the provincial heiress, the Duke and his female relations do all in their power to get up great aristocratic effects that they may dazzle her by aristocracy, and poor La Brière, who has nothing to dazzle her with at all, feels strongly disposed to retire from the hopeless strife. Amidst this play there is a dwarf, Butscha, who loves Modeste in a resigned way, knowing that her perfections are not for him; and this Butscha, by playing the fool and letting Canalis fancy that he has made him drunk, and pumped him of all he knows, persuades Canalis that Modeste is not an heiress after all in any great Parisian sense of the word, but only in the narrow provincial sense. Canalis does not think it worth while to sacrifice his liberty and other advantages for a woman with a moderate fortune, and tries to manage a skilful retreat. When he has got so far back in his retreat that a return is impossible, Butscha plays with him by letting him know how rich Modeste really will be after all. At last there is a splendid hunt (which has been managed by the court influence of the Duke) at a great château near Havre, and Modeste shines there in great splendour, but dismisses the Duke kindly, and, by a word skilfully introduced, lets poor La Brière know that he is definitively accepted at last.

It is impossible in so rude and meagre an outline of the story as this to give a delicately finished portrait of such a creation as Modeste Mignon, but a few words may give the key to her character. If we have understood Balzac rightly, he intended to describe a maiden richly endowed by nature, in opposition to the ideal of the jeune fille. Scott, in Diana Vernon, had a similar intention, though the characters are wholly different. Perhaps even the choice of the name (Balzac was most anxiously careful in the choice of names) may be a reply beforehand to the objections of French strictness about the conduct of a jeune fille.

He intended to say that in spite of her first anonymous advances towards Canalis she was modest then, and always. In the latter part of the story she behaves with great dignity, spirit, and address. She seems to acquire suddenly, in the wonderfully rapid way peculiar to intelligent young ladies, a knowledge of the world that baffles the experience of men. To the early romantic phase of her existence succeeds this womanly knowledge of human nature. In this Balzac is true to the usual history of the mind. The best minds begin by being romantic; all men of ability write verses in their youth. Afterwards comes acquaintance with real life, and the intelligence enters upon a more positive and critical phase. Yet in the life of the intelligence, as in the life of this beautiful girl who is the personification of it, there is a harmony between the first desires and the late fulfilment in spite of all drawbacks and disappointments. The soul fancies in her youth that she loves her poet, her Canalis, and in reality is loving another who passes under the poet's name. But what the soul loved then (not the name, but the thing) it will love still better after passing through the teaching of comparison and experience. That such a consolatory doctrine should be deducible from a novel of Balzac's, and this one of his ripest and most experienced performances, may surprise not a few readers. And yet the story of Modeste Mignon points so plainly to this moral that one almost believes it to be an allegory.

TAKING THE FIELD

THE manoeuvres so long prepared for may now be said to have at last begun. The Northern army is well on its way to the seat of war, and the Southern army, waking up from its apparent lethargy, has been busily engaged lately in pitting division against division, and thus training itself for the more serious operations which are impending. It is well that some sign of energetic life should at last have been given, for, if hope deferred maketh the heart sick, so also prolonged anticipation wears out interest. Last year the autumn manoeuvres were a novelty, the scene of action was within easy access from London, and several little sensational incidents stimulated the attention of the public. This year's peace campaign is to many like a twice-told tale; Salisbury is far off, and the army as yet has been fortunate inasmuch as its history has recorded no more important event than the unlucky disturbance of a wasps' nest. The consequence is a slight tendency to public indifference. An additional cause of this result is perhaps to be found in the too recent discovery of the unquestionable truth that autumn manoeuvres cannot by any possibility be made to resemble real war. This, in a sense and within certain limits, is undoubtedly true, as we have more than once shown; but the misfortune is that a large number of people go from one extreme to another, refuse to recognize any limits to a principle which is only true within limits, and incorrectly jump to the conclusion that the whole affair is necessarily a mere sham. Now nothing can be more easy than to make it a sham, and economical and administrative difficulties offer strong temptations to the authorities to deprive it of all realism. Unless, therefore, the public are vigilant and public opinion is outspoken, there is considerable danger that the annual autumn campaign may by imperceptible degrees degenerate into something little better than an ordinary route march wound up by a series of drills. We have on a previous occasion pointed out what amount of realism can in our opinion be advantageously imported into the affair. We shall not repeat our arguments on this occasion, but we cannot refrain from observing that the Prussians, who ought to be good judges, are, notwithstanding that they have so recently been engaged in war, about to practise their annual manoeuvres this year with as much earnestness as ever.

The arrangements on the present occasion have been generally so good, and all ranks and departments have profited so much from last year's experience, that thus far everything has gone pretty smoothly. Still, however, keen observers have found grounds for criticizing the Control—not the personnel of the department, nor even the local system of that portion of the department attached to the field army, but rather the general system as directed from Pall Mall. We hear that even on the first day's march from Aldershot some of the hired transport waggons, moving on admirable roads, showed symptoms of breaking down. A Control waggon is drawn by four good horses, but a hired waggon is only allowed a pair of miserable screws, and one at least of the latter had to be taken bodily in tow by an army service team. As both waggons carried precisely the same load, there is nothing to be said, but that either one was over-horsed or the other was under-horsed. Then, as one newspaper Correspondent justly remarks, the arrangements for the supply of forage and fuel are such that it is the contractors, not the Control officers, who get the benefit of practice and experience. Hay, corn, and wood are delivered at certain places fixed upon weeks beforehand; consequently all that the Control officers have to do is to distribute. But in war the department would have to provide as well as to distribute, and the former process is infinitely more difficult than the latter. It is clear, therefore, that the Control officers will come out of the campaign quite unpractised in a most essential portion of their duties. This fact is all the more to be regretted as the result is positive extravagance, for we are told that in some cases contractors obtain their supplies in the very districts through which the troops march, and that by direct purchase the Government might save a large sum of money.

many articles being procurable on the spot for a less price than that paid by the War Office. In this instance valuable practice and substantial economy would be the result of a different system. By this time we surely ought to have discovered the cheapest method of supplying our troops, but so little system exists, so little care and forethought are exercised, that every arrangement has to be made over again, extemporised, as it were, every time that we move a few thousand men out of their barracks. The weeks of preparation, the fuss, the correspondence, the references, and the amount of labour cast on the shoulders of executive officers for supplying during a month a force of 30,000 men, would suffice in Prussia for the supply of an entire army. But then in Prussia decentralization and the division of labour are so perfect, every want is so carefully provided for by permanent arrangements, that nothing is required from the Berlin War Office save a single telegram. With us everything has to be calculated anew on each occasion, and fixed tables of requirements for bodies of men of different strength would appear to be unknown.

The whole Prussian army can be mobilized in little more than a fortnight; we, it seems, require months for the mobilization of a force weaker than a single Prussian corps d'armée. If such is the case in time of peace, what would happen in time of war? We shrink from giving an answer. It is surely time that all this uncertainty and rule-of-thumb work should come to an end. We remarked in a former article that we were without a system of tactics; we are equally unprovided with a system of supply. But the same want of well-considered fixed arrangements is observable in everything connected with our army, and the instant that we depart in the slightest degree from barrack-yard routine, voluminous general orders have to be issued for the occasion, to be replaced by others on the next emergency. Witness the lengthy instructions which have been given out during the last fortnight. With us an officer may know exactly what he has to do one year, but his knowledge is of little advantage to him twelve months later. Everything indeed in our military system is undetermined, fleeting, confused, and sometimes contradictory, and there seems to be no immediate prospect of our emerging from this unsatisfactory state. Since we last wrote on the subject a feeble attempt has been made to give us an outline of tactics. It is laid down that on the attack of a position a brigade is to advance in the following formation—a battalion of each brigade in skirmishing order in the first line, a battalion in support in column, and a battalion, which during the present manœuvres will belong to the auxiliary forces, in reserve. It is left to the commander of the supporting battalion to approach the enemy either in line or in columns of half battalions as he may find best with reference to the ground; still the column is prescribed as the normal formation. These instructions are declared to be only provisional, it being considered necessary—such is the excuse—to practise the auxiliary forces in column movements. On service, however, a brigade would, we are told, be in one line. Yet what can be the possible use of practising troops in that which they would never be called upon to perform before an enemy? Moreover this arrangement is eminently calculated to disgust the auxiliary forces, for they are virtually proclaimed to be only fit for a third line, like the Moscow Militia at Borodino. If they are not qualified for a more advanced position, it is evident that they ought never to have been ordered or permitted to take part in the manœuvres, and would have been better employed in battalion drill at their respective head-quarters. It really would seem as if the authorities were bent on slighting and snubbing the auxiliary forces, especially the Volunteers. Of the latter, only a paltry two thousand or so are to take part in the manœuvres, and yet we are always told by the Secretary of War that on the Militia and Volunteers the successful defence of the country must in great measure depend. If these assertions are really made in sincerity, what can we think of the absurdity of having so ridiculously small a contingent of Volunteers? Mr. Cardwell may urge that he cannot induce any larger number of them to attend, but, if the fact be so, he has only himself to thank for it. We have reason to believe that twenty thousand Volunteers would have gladly come forward had they been allowed to relieve each other at the end of eight days. To this arrangement, however, he refused to assent, insisting that, save in the case of one provincial corps, they should serve for sixteen days or not at all. The impression will certainly be that he does not want any of them; for it is preposterous to suppose that any large number of men can spare sixteen days from their business or will match that time from their brief holidays. Of course it is open to him to say that he thinks it a mistake to allow auxiliary corps to take part in autumn manœuvres at all; that it is battalion and company drill rather than practice in brigade manœuvres that they require, and that the former can be better learnt in quarters than in camp. Perhaps Mr. Cardwell really does think this; but, if so, why does he not speak out honestly? If not, then the Volunteers have every reason to consider themselves slighted.

To return to the tactical instructions recently issued; they are, we think, in the main sensible, but there are two exceptions. It is certainly a retrograde movement to tell skirmishers that they must not, without support, cross a plain commanded by the enemy's cavalry. Surely level ground is the last place on which cavalry will venture to face the breacheader. Much more dangerous would it be for skirmishers to venture over open but undulating ground if any hostile cavalry were supposed to be near; for in this case cavalry might be amongst them almost before they could discharge their rifles once. Another still more extraordinary direction is given to cavalry with regard to attacks on unbroken infantry squares. The latter must not be charged by a single squadron, but three or four squadrons attacking each a different face are to be allowed to try what they can do. Surely the framers of these regulations must be a military Rip Van Winkle, who, after reading Captain Nolan's book when it first appeared, has been asleep ever since and only just awake.

While on the subject of cavalry, we wish to call attention to the sound common sense shown by the zealous Colonel of that excellent workmanlike regiment, the 2nd Life Guards. It is very certain that the less conspicuous cavalry are the better, and that no object can be more obtrusive to the eye than a glittering cuirass. Colonel Marshall has made his men cover their cuirasses with a dark composition, so that the sun's rays cannot by any possibility be reflected. It is a pity that not only cuirasses, but helmets and scabbards, should not have their perilous lustre dimmed. Less jingling on the part of the accoutrements generally, and a better method of hanging the sword, would also be an improvement. The Indian Irregular Cavalry attach their sabres to a frog suspended from the waist-belt by two short slings; thus slung they do not knock about, and they make no noise. Passing to another point, it would seem that neither cavalry nor infantry officers are well provided with large-scale maps, or else that instructions are not always sufficiently precise. We hear of an infantry advanced guard and a cavalry regiment having on two separate occasions taken the wrong road. On service such a mistake might produce serious consequences, and, as it was, much unnecessary fatigue was caused. We are glad to find that an end has been put to that unnecessary inspection before marching which has hitherto caused the men so much fatigue. At the appointed hour the troops fall in, and within ten minutes or so they start, thus being spared that standing about which is far more wearing than twice the time occupied in marching. The authorities have in some instances shown themselves less sensible in the matter of the hour of starting, which is fixed with a view to reaching the next camping ground at 9 A.M. Heat is no doubt bad for troops, but want of rest is, in the opinion of all practical military surgeons, still worse. A cavalry or artillery soldier who marches at 4.30 A.M. or 5 A.M. certainly has his usual night's rest diminished by two or three hours, and an infantry soldier is not very much better off.

REVIEWS.

HÜBNER'S LIFE OF SIXTUS V.*

BARON HÜBNER professes to have compiled his work from unpublished correspondence in the State archives of the Vatican, Simancas, Venice, Paris, Vienna, and Florence, and he has certainly collected a large mass of details bearing on the intercourse of Sixtus V. with foreign Courts. But his arrangement of his materials is not very skillful, and we doubt whether much of real interest is added to our knowledge of the life and policy of the great Pope—for such, after making all necessary deductions, he was—beyond what may be gathered from the clearer and more masterly, though far more concise, narrative of Ranke. Some important points, such as his revision of the Vulgate, which forms his principal claim to ecclesiastical distinction, though he did not live to publish it himself, are almost or altogether passed over. There is a further drawback in the entire omission, whether due to the negligence of author or of translator, of any table of contents beyond a bare catalogue of the titles of chapters; and the practical inconvenience of the omission is all the greater from the plan adopted throughout of breaking up the history of Sixtus's pontificate into separate chapters on his relations with the various European Courts, so that the same period, and sometimes the same events, are brought again and again under our notice in a new connexion. Thus, for instance, the Spanish Armada, which is the chief subject of one of the longest chapters on the Pope's "Relations with the Courts of Spain and France," does not figure at all in the contents, and the only reference to the new edition of the Bible is contained in a single page of a chapter, headed "The Pope and the King of Spain." This reminds us to add that there has been great carelessness in correcting the press, especially in Latin quotations; in one line alone we find "Biblia Sacra Vulgata editionis, Sixti V. pont. max. jussu recognita." Elsewhere the famous Jesuit theologian Laynes is transformed into Larines. We cannot think Baron Hübner a master of historical composition, but he has evidently taken pains with his task, and has also brought to it the qualification of a hearty, and on the whole well merited, admiration for the subject of his biography.

Sixtus V., like many other prominent personages of history, has been unduly praised and unduly depreciated. His fame is partly due, no doubt, to the prominent part he was called upon to take in the Catholic counter-reformation which gave its character to the latter half of the sixteenth century, and of which he was not the creator but the child. On that important movement the author dwells with the natural pride of a zealous Catholic, but with a somewhat indiscriminate enthusiasm. The Council of Trent, which was the Church's response to the challenge of

Luther, did certainly effect "a real and lasting reform" in discipline; but to speak of its "not entirely fulfilling the hopes" of its promoters by "bringing the whole flock back to the fold" is an odd way of stating, or rather of disguising, the fact that it made the breach irreparable, and only tightened the grasp of the authority of the Holy See by circumscribing its range. It finally alienated both the Protestants and the Greeks, whom the leading churchmen of the day, such as Contarini, Pole, and even the stern Caraffa, had not long before cherished the hope of conciliating. And the broad gulf fixed by the Council was indefinitely widened during the next half-century by the action of those indefatigable "priest-rulers" of the renovated Papacy, the Jesuits, in whom, notwithstanding the profound distrust of the Order which Sixtus made no pretence of concealing, our author sees only "the precious instrument" which was alone equal to coping with the new aggressions of heresy. A decree which would have virtually amounted to a suppression of the Order was already prepared, though not formally issued, when Sixtus died, and his successor lost no time in confirming them in their privileges. Into the Catholic reaction Sixtus, who had been trained from boyhood in a Franciscan convent, threw himself with unfeigned ardour; and the whole policy of his brief but eventful reign, however vacillating and capricious it may appear in detail, was in its ultimate principles throughout perfectly consistent. The child of a peasant, originally of Slavonian origin, but who dreamt that his son would raise the family to prosperity—or, as Baron Hübnér puts it, that he would become Pope—he had to depend on chance, and then on the charity of a relation already in holy orders, for the first rudiments of education. He took the Franciscan habit at nine years' old, and while still young became a famous preacher, having three future Saints, Loyola, Philip Neri, and the Grand Inquisitor, Ghislieri (afterwards Pius V.), among his hearers and admirers. Pius IV. made him an inquisitor—an office from which he had to be removed on account of his extreme severity—and theologian to the Council of Trent; and Pius V., whose first introduction to him was to examine a charge of heresy brought against his preaching, raised him to the purple. But he was under an eclipse during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., who had an old grudge against him, and for whom he retained to the last so intense an antipathy that he used even to talk of his famous reform of the Calendar as savouring of heresy, and had frequent visions of him in the flames of Purgatory. Sixtus's election to the Papacy was like that of the present Pope, the result of a compromise between rival factions, effected during an unusually short conclave, though not due, like that of Pius IX., to the veto of one of the Catholic Powers arriving too late. The right of veto, in fact, did not then exist, though it was often indirectly exercised; nor is its origin known now; but it has long been formally recognized in the Crowns of France, Austria, and Spain. It is a mistake of the author's to speak of Sixtus being elected by "adoration," or what is generally called "inspiration," instead of by a regular ballot. This method of election, which supposes spontaneous agreement of the entire Conclave without any previous discussion, is in truth a purely ideal theory; but of the instances sometimes alleged by ecclesiastical writers the last is that of Pius V. It is a curious, if not singular, fact that a lay Cardinal, Archduke Albert of Austria, who afterwards married, voted at the election of Sixtus.

The new Pope exhibited that remarkable combination of seemingly incongruous characteristics which a monastic training is apt to foster. He had all the unflinching severity of one accustomed to implicit obedience, combined with a religious exaltation which neither age nor the cares of State could altogether subdue, and which filled his soul with lofty dreams as grand in conception as they were impossible of achievement. He gave a signal proof of his strong will by the prompt suppression in his dominions of the plague of brigandage, which had attained such dimensions during the easy reign of Gregory XIII. that nobody was safe in his own house in the middle of the day. When the custodians of the city came to offer him their congratulations on the morrow of his election, they were informed that, if they failed in the administration of justice, he was resolved to have them beheaded, and three days later he insisted, against the earnest entreaty of several Cardinals, on the execution of four young men who had been seized by the police for infringing the law against bearing arms, which, however, they had used during the interregnum for the maintenance of order. Still more shocking was the execution of a Trasteverine boy simply for resisting the sbirri when they took away his donkey from him; but here again Sixtus was inexorable. A paricide was executed for a crime committed forty years before; a friar convicted of working counterfeit miracles was publicly flogged; and a mother who had sold her daughter's honour was hanged on the bridge of St. Angelo. For the time this severe policy was perfectly successful. Within two years from the accession of the new Pope brigandage had ceased, but at the end of his life, when he was less able to count on the friendly co-operation of neighbouring States, the banditti began to reappear. In other ways, and more permanently, the Pope impressed on Rome the mark of his practical genius. He did not, as is sometimes imagined, create, but he multiplied and organized the various Congregations of Cardinals for special departments of ecclesiastical and civil administration, adding to the seven more important ones already in existence eight new Congregations, of which, however, two only were for Church affairs; and by his Bull, Postquam verus, he limited the number of the Sacred College to seventy. The suppression of nepotism is another merit which has been claimed for him, but the abuse was already beginning to fall into disrepute, and Sixtus, who was rigidly disinterested in his general discharge of his high functions, actually made his favourite great-nephew, Montalto, a Cardinal at the mature age of fourteen, and soon after Secretary of State, while his younger brother became "General of the Holy Church"—i.e. of the Pontifical forces—when a child of eight. It is fair to say that the boy-Cardinal, who exercised great influence at several Conclaves, fully justified his choice, and died, in 1523, universally beloved and regretted. One other example of Sixtus's practical energy deserves to be mentioned. He had what his biographer justly calls a passion for building, though, as might be expected from his antecedents, he was wholly destitute of artistic or antiquarian tastes. And in this way, too, he has left a permanent mark, not on the ecclesiastical system, but on the material city of Rome. By raising the obelisk before St. Peter's, by opening five large streets, by bringing an abundant supply of water into the town, and by other works hitherto deemed almost impossible but achieved by him within a space of five years, he made his name remembered; nor did it for a moment concern him that he had to pull down the splendid pillars of the Therma to build his palace, or, as his architect—who seems inclined to place these demolitions to his credit—rather quaintly expresses it, to "spoil the antique ruins which obstructed the entrance to Sta. Maria de' Angeli." Baron Hübnér speaks of his works being "somewhat like the products from a manufactory," and we must confess that, both in themselves and in his way of setting about them, they remind us a little of the gigantic achievements wrung out of the slave labour at the command of the old Oriental despots. When his architect Fontana came to receive his blessing before commencing work on the obelisk, Sixtus is said to have informed him that, if any accident occurred, he should pay for it with his life. In a similar spirit, when he had resolved to make Loreto into a city, he would not listen to any suggestion of practical difficulties; valleys were to be filled up, hills levelled, and roads laid out. And the work was done as he directed. His success in increasing the resources of the Papal exchequer was again most remarkable; but it must be borne in mind that one of his chief means of accomplishing it was by greatly raising the prices of several State offices which were already venal, and exposing to sale others which had not been previously so treated, some being actually created de novo for the purpose of being sold. Such things were not of course looked upon in the same light then as they would be now, and it is indeed but a few years since bribery of judges and other high officials, who were always underpaid, was the universal practice in South Italy; as it is still, we believe, customary in Russia, unless the present Czar has succeeded in effecting a radical reform in this matter also.

We have left ourselves less space than we could wish to dwell on the foreign policy of Sixtus, in which the lofty and somewhat dreamy idealism of his mind came most conspicuously to the surface. He was always possessed with a magnificent view—it can hardly be called a scheme—of the reabsorption of Protestant Europe into the unity of the Church, and a league of all Christian princes in a new crusade to crush the Turkish Empire. Some measures he took with distinct reference to this object, such as urging the French King to enter into secret communications with Elizabeth with a view to her conversion, and himself carrying on a correspondence with the Persians and Druses about a projected attack on the Turks, for which purpose he also fitted out galleys of his own, and obtained others from Spain, while he hoped to utilize the services of King Stephen Bathori of Poland in organizing a land attack on Turkey, and bringing back the schismatic Greeks to Catholicism. Such projects were chimerical enough, but the leading idea which inspired them helped to shape the whole policy of Sixtus in his dealings with foreign States, and especially with Spain and France. The ultimate triumph of the Church was, as became his position, the one end which he always kept steadily in view, and in an age when the maxim cujus regio ejus religio was pretty generally accepted, the most obvious way of compassing it was by the return of heretical Sovereigns to the faith. It was partly on this account, and partly no doubt from a certain congeniality in her vigorous nature to his own, that Sixtus professed so hearty a regard for Elizabeth, of whose conversion, even after the defeat of the Armada and the execution of Mary Stuart, he never ceased to entertain hopes. He pitied Mary, but he liked and admired Elizabeth, of whom he once observed that "she was a brave woman, and if she were not a heretic, would be worth a whole world," while he told Pisany, the French Ambassador, that he had always indignantly rejected the proposals constantly made to him for her assassination. And this feeling seems to have been reciprocal. For though Elizabeth only laughed at his suggestions for her return to Catholicism, which came, in fact, a quarter of a century too late, she used to say, when pressed to choose a husband, that she knew of but one man worthy of her hand, and that was Sixtus V. Accordingly, though he had instigated and blessed the Spanish Armada, he never gave it more than a half-hearted support, and was anxious to forget as soon afterwards as possible that he had sanctioned it. In the same way he had a genuine regard for Henry of Navarre, whose conversion there was of course far better reason for anticipating than the English Queen's, while he thoroughly despised Henry III., till the murder of the Guise changed his contempt into detestation. From the fact he seems to have felt that the best hope of securing Catholic ascendancy in France lay in the conversion of Henry of Navarre.

and his recognition as sovereign, though he did not live to see his desires accomplished. But there was another strong personal feeling involved in his policy towards both England and France. He extremely disliked Philip II., while obliged to recognize his claims as the leading representative and zealous champion of Catholic interests in Europe; and the Spanish Ambassador Olivares, whose recall he was perpetually demanding, he detested most cordially, and not without cause. He felt therefore no sympathy with Philip's designs upon England, though it was of course better that England should become subject to the Spanish Crown than that it should remain in heresy. Still less did he desire to see France become a fief of Spain, when the interests of the Church would be as well or better served by other means; and Philip hardly affected to deny that he held this consummation to be necessary for the discharge of his "mission" as "the secular vicar of God on earth." This conflict of interests and sympathies gives to the foreign policy of Sixtus an appearance of vacillation inconsistent at first sight with his vigour and promptitude of action in matters which fell directly under his own control, but the inconsistency is more apparent than real. He could scarcely, as head of the Church, take a decided line against her most powerful civil protector, nor could he summarily discountenance what might turn out to be the only available plan for maintaining her supremacy. This will explain what looks like capricious coquetting with three rival parties in France, though he never really sympathized either with the League or with Henry III., and it also explains his uncertain attitude towards Philip II.

By far the most interesting portion of Baron Hubner's work is comprised in the later chapters of the second volume, which trace in considerable detail the successive stages of the Pope's negotiations with Philip and Henry of Navarre during the last few months of his life, when he was at once struggling for time against the importunities of their rival emissaries—which in the case of Olivares transgressed all bounds of personal and official courtesy—and against the advancing inroads of what proved to be a mortal sickness. His own legate was actually defending Paris against Henry, while he was himself convinced that the taking of the capital would be the signal for the King's recantation, when his claims to the throne of France might safely be acknowledged. The event justified his expectations, but he did not live to witness it. Worried and wearied out with the long struggle, but abating nothing of his wonted energy till within three days of his death, the brave old man expired on the evening of the 27th of August, 1590, during a violent thunder-storm, and, it was rumoured, without the Sacraments, the fact apparently being that he was too feeble at the last for confession. The Spanish Ambassador took no pains to conceal his exultation, and the Romans, who had respected, but had never loved, their stern ruler, jumped to the conclusion that, like Pius II. (Æneas Silvius) in the previous century, and Sixtus II. at an earlier period, who had also risen from a humble station to the Papacy, Sixtus had made a compact with the Evil One, who had come in thunder and lightning to seize his prey. They tore down the statues erected in his honour, and passed a resolution that henceforth no statue should be raised to a living pontiff. In the case of all these Popes alike, the angry fanaticism of their contemporaries has been condemned by the juster verdict of posterity. Sixtus had his weaknesses both as a man and a Pope, but he left his mark on his age, and we need not hesitate to endorse the judgment of his present biographer that in the main he deserved well of the Church and of humanity.

SPALDING'S TRANSLATION OF TEGNER'S FRITHIOF.

WE are glad that a translation of Tegner's Frithiof which on the whole is excellent, and in many portions deserves the highest praise, should be placed before English readers, who for the most part know nothing more of the poem than its name, and have a vague notion that Tegner was a great poet. They will find that in reading this Swedish epic they need make no effort to throw themselves into a state of feeling which is not congenial to them, and that the tale of Frithiof brings fresh evidence of the fact that a true poet speaks the languages of all ages and countries. The story itself is probably better known in this country than the poem of Tegner. Comparative mythologists have had to deal with it in the course of their work, and more than one short prose version of it has been given in collections of Teutonic and Scandinavian legends. Its chief beauty lies in its thorough simplicity and the perfectly natural character of the actors, while from first to last it exhibits scarcely a single feature which may be regarded as really repulsive.

The tale of Frithiof is the old story which, under an infinite variety of forms, has for ages stirred the deepest feelings of the human heart in every land; which in the loves of Kephale and Prokris, of Urvast and Pururavas, of Psyche and Eros, has delighted or saddened the Hindu or the Greek, and in the fortunes of Conal Gulban, of Rapunzel, and a thousand others, has swelled the treasures of Celtic and Teutonic folklore. Frithiof is the golden-haired hero who is numbered with the Fatal Children. He is born to be great, he is born to wed the maiden who was the love of his youth; but he may not win her until years have passed in danger and toils undergone at the bidding of one altogether meaner than himself, whom the will of Odin has made his master. He grows up in the house of the wise Hilding, who imparts to him the wisdom which Achilles received from Chiron; but under the same roof with the child of Thorsten Vikingsson is placed Ingeborg, the beautiful daughter of King Beld, the steadfast friend of Thorsten. These two warriors, like Grettir and Illugi, or Ramund and Luxmon, or any other of the great company of twin-souled heroes, are united by a love which death cannot chill or sever and their hope and wish are that the daughter of the one shall be wedded to the son of the other. As they live, so they die together, after giving to their children sage counsel couched in proverbs; but great though the name of Thorsten may have been he is but a thegn whose son must stand to the heirs of Beld in relation as humble as that in which the child of Amphitryon stood to Eurystheus. Of these heirs, Helgi, the elder, is a man of savage and bloodthirsty temper; the younger, Haldan, is a graceful boy in whom the spirit of the Berserk has not been awakened; and as it comes to pass that when Frithiof asks that Ingeborg may become his wife, the answer is that kings' daughters may not rightly be mated with churls, but that nevertheless he may have her if he will bring from the kingdom of Angantyr the tribute money which has been left unpaid. The dream of Frithiof is rudely broken but, though he is not a king, yet he is not as other men. His home at Frammas is a palace as gorgeous as that of Alkinoos or Tantalos or Helios himself; and he is lord of the magic treasure of Angurvadel, the sword which no living thing can withstand of the mysterious ring, and of the wonderful ship Ellide which without rudder or oars can find its way, like the Phæakian bark to its haven. In this ship he would bear away Ingeborg from the sanctuary of Baldur, in which she has been placed, to the beautiful islands of the deep blue Egean; but Ingeborg has been brought up under the laws of the old Aryan civilization, and she holds the power of a father over his child has passed on to his heir and that her allegiance to her brother, the dark and hateful Helgi, must come before her devotion to her lover. Frithiof confesses that in her obedience to law she is better than he, and departs on the tyrant's errand. On his return he finds his halls at Frammas a mass of blackened ruins. His faithful dog comes forth to meet him; his milk-white steed comes bounding to his side; but all his wealth has been eaten by the flames, and the grass is scorched from his fields. The tyrant sits in Baldur temple; and there Frithiof stuns him by flinging in his face the money which Angantyr had given to Frithiof as a gift. He when he essays to take from the arm of Baldur the ring, Wayland's ring, which he had left on the arm of Ingeborg, the image remains it as tightly as it is held by the statue of Thorgerda in the Faroese Saga, or by Venus in the story of the newly-wedded Roman in the pages of Fordun and other chroniclers. In the struggle to draw it away the image of the god falls forward into the sacrificial fire, and the temple is wrapped in flames. For this disaster or crime exile must again be the doom of Frithiof, who has one tie the less to his father's land, as Ingeborg had long since been seized and carried away by the aged King to his distant kingdom. Thither with his friend Bjorn Frithiof comes in the course of his wanderings as a Viking. With a beggar's hood thrown over his head and a beggar's mantle over his body, he enters the hall, to be flouted and jeered as Iros mocked the disguised Odysseus. The removal of the disguise reveals the hero in all his strength and beauty, and King King feels that the man before him whom he has long wished to slay. But he cannot still a certain feeling of sympathy for the brave man who has to fight with a great sorrow, and he resolves to see whether Frithiof can withstand a temptation as mighty as his grief. His own time he knows, is fast drawing to an end, and he will therefore test him by bringing him near to Ingeborg in a journey across the ice sea, and by placing himself in his power, weaponless and helpless. As they journey on, the old man says he must sleep, and that his head cannot rest in comfort except in the lap of Frithiof. Here as King is wrapped in profound sleep, a raven seated on a bough above him bids him make short work of the matter by snatching of the old man's head, while a dove on another tree bids him remember that, though his gain for the time be great, yet with the gain he gives up fair fame and honour. With a feeling of horror Frithiof hurls Angurvadel far into the wood, and King awaking from his feigned slumber tells him that his unswerving faith shall be rewarded. As for himself King declares that he cannot die peacefully in his bed. Such is not the fitting mode of departure for a warrior, and with his dagger he gives himself a mortal wound, and after some grave and wise advice leaves Ingeborg to her first and only love.

The beauty of this story few perhaps will question. It furnishes more than the framework for a great epic poem; and the special merit of Tegner is that he has adhered with scrupulous fidelity to the spirit of the tale, and has even refrained from drawing upon his imagination for its incidents or for their colouring. It has found it a tale which has come down from ages long preceding the introduction of Christianity, and he has been content to reproduce it in its heathen form, which in this instance exhibit little or no antagonism to the new faith. In his last exhortation to Frithiof, that he should reconcile himself with the sons of Beld Hilding speaks of the Baldur who dwelt in the South:—

A virgin's son
Sent by Alfather to expound the mythic runes
Wrote on the Normans' sable shields, unknown before.
Fame was his war-ory, love to men his shining sword,
And innocence ate Dove-like on his silver horn.

Pious he lived and taught, until at last he died,
And 'neath far-distant palms his grave in glory shines.
His doctrine, say they, spreadeth far from vale to vale,
Methought the hardened heart, and joins the friendly hand,
And founds the reign of peace upon the gladdened earth.
I know not well the creed, indeed, but darkly still Have I in better hours had glimpses of his teaching;
At times each human heart yearns towards it, even as mine.
One day, I feel assured, it comes and lightly waves
Its snowy dove-like wings over the Northern hills.

The poet seems to make the seer forget the Resurrection, and in the triumph of Christianity shut his eyes to the work which the sword of Olaf should do towards the winning of the victory. The conquest was doubtless furthered by the spirit of resistance to some at least of the laws which were supposed to rest on the authority of the ancient gods; and this struggle with time-honoured superstition comes out strongly in the tale of Frithiof. It is the old law which makes Ingeborg sacrifice her life to the caprice of her brother, and of this law Frithiof is thinking when he exclaims:—

Different here I find my temper, boundless passion tears my soul,
Strikes her wings upon my forehead, in a dream I downward roll;
Can I banish from my memory midnight vows, alliance sworn?
Vanished treasures—she ne'er broke them—vengeful gods my soul have torn.
Oh they hate humanity, and scatter grief on joy with zest;
Stole away my youthful rosebud, placed it in cold Winter's breast.
What doth Winter chill with rosebuds? Can he understand their price?

No! his cold, unthankful spirit clothes both bud and stalk in ice.

In these last words we have one of the many passages in which Tegner seems to go off to the mythological origin of the story which he has invested with so much of the reality of human life. It may be difficult to determine whether he here had in his mind the transformation which has converted the Ring of the Frithiof Saga into the Rinkrank of the popular story, the long-bearded old man who keeps the beautiful maiden shut up in his dungeons until his beard is caught in the framework of a door, and the destruction of his winter home leaves the maiden once more in all the splendour of spring sunshine, with its wealth of blossoms and flowers. But the tone of the old phrases which gave shape to the story is distinctly felt in the pictures of Frithiof's home at Framnäs, over which the poet has thrown all the golden glory which rests on the palace of Alkinoös, and in the description of the mysterious bracelet wrought by the limping Wayland, the Hephaistos of Northern lands:—

Heaven was designed thereon, with the fortunes of the Immortals, Twelve, like the changing months, but named by the poets the sun-house.
Alfheim too was portrayed, the castle of Frey: 'tis the sun, who,
Now-born at Christmas, commences to climb the steep slopes of heaven.
Söguabæk too was there, in whose hall ate Odin with Saga,
Drank his wine from the golden cup; but that cup was the ocean,
Coloured with gold and the glow of the morning; and Saga was spring time.
Written on verdant fields; but instead of the wines were the flowers.
Also Baldur appeared on the throne, like the sun at midsummer,
From the firmament pouring his riches, of goodness the emblem,
For Goodness is far-beaming light; but Evil is darkness.

This moral meaning, which lies close to the phrases of the old myth, and which may be discerned by a thousand analogies in the phenomena of the outward world, necessarily comes home to the heart of the poet, and the thought of the fall of the Æsir on the plain of blood suggests to the priest Hilding that

Evil dies
For ever; but the good which fell, again arises
Up from the burning world, refined and purified.
The starry garlands bright fall pale and withered down
From heaven's temple, and the earth sinks deep in ocean,
But fairer still they rise again, and lift up glad
Their flower-encircled heads high from the ocean-wave.

Nor does the poet ever forget the close connexion which exists between the hero of his story and the god Baldur; nor can the reader well fail to feel that the one is little more than a reflection of the other. Ingeborg in the Temple of the Bright God who dwells in Ganablick is as Uhas coming forth from the glowing halls of Dyaus:—

Whilst the bright sun with radiance plays,
Sheds on the flower its crimson warm,
Like to the rosy gauze whose haze
Conceals the charms of Ingeborg's form,
So long I wander on the strand,
Consumed by everlasting fire,
And, sighing, write upon the sand
Her name, with love that nought can tire.

So too, in the spirit of Æschylus, who hails the friendly night as the inheritor of vast worlds, Frithiof welcomes her as

Of gods the mother,
With pearls upon thy bridal-dress;

and Ingeborg, bidding farewell to Frithiof, bids him remember that

The mighty sun turns not away his eyes,
Though pure and holy, from two faithful lovers,
And Day's fair widow, star-beanpled Night,
Immersed in grief, with joy receives their oaths.

This parting of the lovers is, if we may make a choice where so much of exquisite beauty meets us in every page, the gem of the whole poem. In truth, Tegner was singularly happy in the choice of his subject. There is much of grandeur, and something that appeals to human sympathy, in the stories of the Volunga, and this grandeur, although it has become less rugged, is by no means lost in the Lay of the Nibelungs; but it is impossible to feel that beings like Brynild and Gudrum in the Volunga tale, and Kriemhild in the Nibelungenlied, are of the same flesh and blood with ourselves. Their crimes are so causeless, their vengeance so impossible, that we can read of them as calmly as we look on pictures painted by the clouds on the broad heavens; but whatever be the origin of the tale (and this seems obvious enough), the story of Frithiof seldom fights with the impulses of purely human feeling, and this feeling in the parting scene is brought out with all the majesty and severity of the Greek drama:—

FRITHIOF. But wherefore must we part?
Because a sleepless night hath loosed thy nerves?
INGEBORG. To save mine honour and thine own from ruin.
FRITHIOF. On man's affection resteth woman's honour.
INGEBORG. He loves not long who loves without esteem.
FRITHIOF. By light caprice esteem is never gained.
INGEBORG. The sense of right is sure a noble feeling.
FRITHIOF. But yesterday our love was not against it.
INGEBORG. No more to-day, but only 'gainst our flight.
FRITHIOF. Pressing necessity compels us. Come!
INGEBORG. Necessity is what is right and noble.
FRITHIOF. High rides the sun, and fast the time speeds past.
INGEBORG. Alas, alas! 'tis past, 'tis past for ever!
FRITHIOF. Consider well; is this thy last resolve?
INGEBORG. I have considered all; it is my last.
FRITHIOF. Maiden, farewell; farewell, King Helge's sister.

Except in this outburst of mingled grief and anger, Frithiof never speaks of Ingeborg as the sister of the man who hates and has injured him, and by the love which breaks forth unrestrained in Ingeborg's reply he is completely conquered. Further quotations would take up too much space. The whole work is a great poem, but it must be carefully studied before its beauty can be thoroughly felt. On the translation we had intended to make some remarks which would have pointed out passages which seem obscure, if not unintelligible, and some others which have been weakened, if not marred, by the mere exigencies of rhyme. All these, however, would be comprised in two or three pages; and we have no wish to dwell on petty blemishes while we feel the charm that comes with the words of a great poet.

MAURICE'S LIFE OF STEPHEN LANGTON.*

WE gather from the preface that this book is to be the first of a series of four, and that Stephen Langton is to be followed by Wat Tyler, Sir John Oldcastle, and Jack Cade. The quotation seems an odd one, but we reserve our judgment till we have the rehabilitation of Jack Cade in full before us. He has, we are told, suffered "gross and cruel misrepresentations," and his resurrection "combined some of the characteristics of the respective struggles of Tyler and Langton." When so queer a combination as this of "Tyler and Langton" is spoken of as a thing about which there can be no kind of doubt, we involuntarily rub our eyes, but we think it wiser to hold our tongues, as we know not what we may not be convinced of when we hear the arguments. Meanwhile we keep ourselves within the bounds of the known world, and look to see what Mr. Maurice has to say about the patriot Primate. And on the road it is something to read this:

That I have intended no disrespect in this to men so deservedly honoured as De Montfort and Grostete, will be clear from the allusions which I shall make to them in the introductory chapter to Wat Tyler.

It did strike us as somewhat funny that Mr. Maurice should assure us that he "intends no disrespect" to Earl Simon the Righteous and Holy Robert of Lincoln, that he looks on them as "deservedly honoured," and that he kindly purposes to make "allusions" to them in an introductory chapter to Wat Tyler. Where, we asked, can Mr. Maurice have picked up this mastery of the art of condescension? The key was found when we turned to a second preface, and there found Mr. C. H. Pearson spoken of with the bated breath of which Earl Simon and Bishop Robert are not thought worthy. This fact enlarges our knowledge of human nature. It is plain that there are people whom the grand style, the condescending style, really impresses. Mr. Maurice has his thanks for "Professor Stubbs of Oxford" and "Professor Brewer of King's College," but before Mr. Pearson he bows down. The thought suggests itself that there may be people who, in the like sort, bow down to Mr. Reeve. It is at least plain that the grand style pays. Mr. Pearson has not only found an admirer in Mr. Maurice, but an imitator, and Mr. Maurice turns about to try his hand at condescension on Earl Simon and Bishop Robert.

Yet, notwithstanding all this and notwithstanding one of those domestic dedications which, outside of the charmed circle, seem simply grotesque, there appears to be some real stuff in Mr. Maurice. He gives us the impression of one who has begun to write a little too soon, but who has at any rate really been reading. We confess that we do not exactly see his special object, either in the whole projected series or in this particular Life. We cannot say that we get up with any clearer notion of the great Archbishop than we had when we sat down. Mr. Maurice does not seem to have learned the art of giving any kind of life to his characters, or that of grouping his subordinate actions round about one central figure. We seem to be reading, not a Life of Stephen

Langton, but Mr. Maurice's notions about a rather long period of history, spanning a good while before Stephen Langton was born. But, though the result is as yet nothing very striking, yet the process by which it has been brought about has been quite of the right kind. Mr. Maurice has been reading in the right places, and he has been thinking about what he has been reading. For his own mind the process must have been one of unmixed good. But the result reminds us to some extent of a prize essay. Mr. Maurice has indeed, in one important point, got far beyond the prize essay stage. He has got beyond the stage of wondering at his authorities from a distance and quoting them second-hand, as if a Byzantine historian or a chronicler in Pertz were something more inaccessible than the Pillars of Héraklées. Otherwise his matter ranges very much with that of a good prize essay. And we know that, with one or two brilliant exceptions, a prize essay is a thing the process of composing which does the successful—sometimes the unsuccessful—competitor a great deal of good, but which is seldom worth preserving in itself. The truth is that our prize essayists and other beginners—the prize essayists at any rate not by any fault of their own—take too wide and ambitious a range of subjects. Far more would come of their labours, though the immediate result would be less showy, if their first efforts at historical composition took the form of a thorough examination of some point of detail. We have heard it suggested, and we quite go along with the suggestion, that it would be far better if, instead of the necessarily superficial essays which we now get, we had something like the exercises for the Doctor's degree in the German Universities. The subjects chosen are much narrower than those which are set for our prize essays; they are subjects which a young man really can work out, and in the working out of which he may gain habits of research and criticism which may serve him for life. The best of these exercises form really valuable monographs, and we can commonly pick up something even from an inferior one. With Mr. Maurice's evident power of real work, if he had fixed himself down steadily to illustrate some particular point in the life of Stephen Langton, or of anybody else, he would have turned out something a good deal less ambitious than a series of English "Popular Leaders," but something really more useful both to himself and to other people.

Mr. Maurice begins his story with what he calls "England's preparation for Langton's work," which is in truth a sketch of the state of things in England from the Norman Conquest onwards. In dealing with these times Mr. Maurice is a little behind his own time. He shows some honest work among the original writers; but he has not yet learned accurately to distinguish the difference in value between one writer and another, and no wonder, for he seems still, in 1872, to cleave to Thierry as his chief guide. It is amusing when we read Mr. Maurice's statement of some of the questions which have been lately raised about the never-failing subject of questions, Archbishop Thomas. These he conceives to be whether the Archbishop's name should be spelt with a "c" or without it; whether, as M. Thierry asserts, he was of pure English blood, or as Dr. Pauli believes, of Norman descent.

And he makes the matter funnier still by adding in a note, Bromton seems to support Thierry in the spelling which the latter prefers, and in the story of Becket's birth, pp. 1052-1053.

We did not at all know that any one had raised a controversy on any point so frivolous as whether the word Becket should be spelled with a c or without it. We do know something about a controversy which Mr. Maurice may possibly have in his eye, whether it is wise to call a man by a name by which, to say the least, he was not familiarly known in his own times. But Mr. Maurice ought by this time to know that the Norman descent of Thomas, as opposed to his imaginary Old-English, or half Old-English and half Saracen, descent, is no longer a question of what "Dr. Pauli believes," but a matter on which all scholars have long ago made up their minds. The days are quite gone in which it could pass for a critical process simply to patch up the romance of Thierry by a reference to the older romance which goes under the name of Bromton. All this is a pity, because Mr. Maurice thoroughly takes in the fact that Thomas, born in London of Norman parents, was practically as good an Englishman as if ten generations of his forefathers had been born in London before him. But with his way of looking at the matter, he of course fails to see what an important piece of evidence this is as to the speed with which certain classes, at least of the Norman settlers, practically became English. So at an earlier stage we find Mr. Maurice believing the legends about Abbot Frithric of St. Alban's and Abbot Ethelwige of St. Augustine's, and finding out, on the strength of a queer legend in the local history of Durham, that the pious Conqueror "offended part of the nation by his scepticism." We are quite at a loss to guess what Mr. Maurice means when he says,

St. F. Palgrave's assertion that Northumbria never recognized the son of Godwin seems hardly borne out by the circumstances of the insurrection against Tostig.

And the following is almost queerer:—

The reverence for an oath seems to have been carried to an almost superstitious extent by the English of that day. Not merely Orderic, whose English patriotism is dashed with a personal friendship and admiration for William, but chroniclers like Bromton, the author of the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," and Henry of Huntingdon, seem to think that the oath which William wrong by treachery and cunning from Harold, should have loomed the latter, &c.

Now we had always thought that the fault of the eleventh century was not a superstitious reverence for oaths, but recklessness both in taking and in breaking them. The real point in the charge against Harold was the wrong done to the holy relic. Then there is something passing strange in the notion of a personal friendship between William and Orderic, who, when William died, was a boy monk of twelve years old. We smile at the coupling of "Bromton" and the "author of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle"; but we pass on to the more serious question, Where, among the various records called the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle"—which Mr. Maurice seemingly looks on as the work of one "author"—is one word to be found about any oath plighted by Harold to William under any circumstances whatever?

It is plain then that Mr. Maurice has not yet fully learned to use his books, old or new. It is amusing to see him going at this time of day to Thierry for Anselm's defence of the sanctity of Elpheg, who figures, Thierry-fashion, as "Elpheg." But he quite takes in Anselm's position, and in like manner he throughout shows a very respectable power of understanding history, as soon as he has mastered the preliminary art—the drudgery, some people may perhaps call it—of learning how to deal with his authorities, to rate them at their respective values, and to know what really is in them and what is not. To this last end Mr. Maurice would do well to cultivate the art of accurate translation. We were astounded at reading that the English of the eleventh century, "as William of Malmesbury sneeringly says, 'wasted all their time on religion.'" William's words, in which it is impossible to see any trace of a sneer, are, "Pro otio quod actabant, exercitium armorum in secundis ponentes, omnem in religione operam insumpserunt." And he should leave off the habit of going to inferior and second-hand writers to prove propositions about which there can be no manner of doubt. It is amusing to read, "The greater part of the bishops, we are informed by the 'Chronique de Normandie,' were Normans at the time of William I.'s death." We do not know for certain, but it is very likely that we might be "informed" of the same fact by Goldsmith, Pinnoek, or Mrs. Markham.

We look on to the part of the book which more directly concerns its subject, and we find, amid evident capacity for historical thought, the same incapacity for grappling with detail. That is to say, Mr. Maurice has begun to be a teacher while he is as yet only a learner, though a decidedly promising one. We commend him for several times daring to hold his own against his master Mr. Pearson on points where he is himself clearly right and Mr. Pearson clearly wrong. But we are amused at the prostration of spirit always shown at Mr. Pearson's name, and the apologies with which Mr. Maurice thinks it needful to excuse himself for not following the oracle in everything. A small proportion of the same reverence transferred from Mr. Pearson to Dr. Shirley might have saved Mr. Maurice from his harsh judgment of Hubert of Burgh. But, as our object is reformation and not destruction, as we wish to point out to Mr. Maurice the way by which he may some day win for himself a place among historical scholars, we must quote a few more instances of his way of dealing with details. In p. 244 he translates part of a letter printed in Dr. Shirley's Royal and Historical Letters, i. 20, addressed to Peter Bishop of Winchester, William Marshal Earl of Pembroke, and Hubert of Burgh, by the "justitarii domini Regis itinerantes in comitatu Lincolnie," who were Hugh of Wells, Bishop of Lincoln, and others. Mr. Maurice calls them "the justices of Lincolnshire," a name which is, to say the least, misleading, as it suggests the notion of modern justices of the peace. "Ad honorem regis majestatis" is not well rendered by "the honour of his Majesty," which suggests the notion of "Majesty" as a fixed and formal title. And it is quite beyond us to guess why the words "scimus quod homines sumus" should be turned into "we know that we are new." Here possibly the printer may be in fault. In speaking of Langton's Council of Oxford in 1222, Mr. Maurice quotes a decree by which certain persons were appointed in each deanery, "who, at the command of the Archbishop or his official, may denounce to them the public excesses of prelates, priests, and other clergy." On this Mr. Maurice amusingly comments:—

Whether or no this provision is considered wise, it shows at all events that, at a time when the partisanship of the bishops for their order was carried to excess, Langton was very conscious of the fact that they too needed the control of the law.

Mr. Maurice, it would seem, thinks that prelati means bishops only, though it could hardly be needful to set people in each rural deanery to look after the bishops. In the decrees of the Council of Westminster a few years later we read of "episcopi, abbates, et prelati alii," and the word is certainly used so as to take in holders of any considerable ecclesiastical preferment at least down to a canon residentiary. It is more serious when we read in p. 225 that "the barons of Yorkshire demanded of Hubert de Burgh that the King should not levy taxes on them except in a Parliament north of the Trent." This is in no way borne out by the letter (Shirley, i. 151) to which Mr. Maurice refers. What the Yorkshire barons and freeholders in general complain of is, that they were called on to pay a tax which had been granted in an assembly to which they had not been summoned. They offered to pay it even then if the King, who seems to have been coming to York, would summon them there. It is odd too for one who has a good deal to say about Gualdus Cambrensis to call him in one place "Bishop of St. David's" and "the worthy Bishop."

Lastly, to go back to the Council of Oxford, Mr. Maurice tells us that Langton settled the disputes between the Bishops of London and the Abbots of Westminster "in a way which, I believe, few have cause to regret, by freeing the Abbey of Westminster from the jurisdiction of the bishopric of London." Alas, we cannot help thinking that, if Langton had forbore so to do, we might have been spared a good deal of the nonsense which we have for some time past heard about the peculiar position and dignity of the collegiate church of St. Peter at Westminster.

WOODWARD AND CATES'S ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CHRONOLOGY.*

THE fruits of the scholarlike and unsparing toil of the late Librarian to the Queen at Windsor come before the public too late for the reward of the accomplished and laborious writer. All that is now to be paid in return for so much solid and conscientious service to literature is cordial and ungrudging recognition on the part of those who have the means of estimating its value. We had occasion not long ago to speak of Mr. Woodward's praiseworthy labours in the translation of M. Elisée Reclus's excellent work on the Earth. A volume more original in its scope, as well as wider and more laborious in its execution, now calls for our appreciation. Twenty years have elapsed since the design of the Encyclopedia of Chronology was projected and set on foot by the author, and we cannot doubt that from that time the compilation of the materials which make up its rich and multifarious contents filled no small share of his time and thought. The work combines in one the plan of a full and trustworthy book of reference for chronology, both for students and general readers, with a copious and carefully drawn up biographical date-book. Without treating directly of mathematical or technical chronology, it aims at filling a void long felt in literature by massing together in the form most convenient for reference the leading events of history, and the principal stages of growth in knowledge or discovery, with the names of the men with whom such date-points in the development of the world connect themselves. The alphabetical arrangement of its contents makes it easy to turn at once to the events which mark the rise, progress, and fall of States, with their alliances, wars, and treaties of peace, the dates of discoveries in every department of science, of inventions and improvements, mechanical, domestic, and economical. Admirable terseness characterizes every article, useless detail being rigidly excluded, and just so much reference to authorities admitted as may guide the student to further research without cumbering or confusing the text. Going back to the earliest times, the design of the work admits subjects of mythical or doubtful date, with the reserve that befits a manual of chronology; while not a few topics relating to literature or history which are of prime interest in their way are excluded because, vexatious as it may be deemed, of the absence of any ascertainable date. In the case of the dates of early Biblical history adopted from Usher, which have been, without a shadow of authority or reason, for generations past foisted by our privileged printers into the margins or headings of our Bibles, Mr. Woodward has waived his private conviction in deference to the probable expectation of those who do not like to miss what is usual. Side by side, however, with these figures are placed such dates as are derived by other authorities from the study of independent or concurrent sources of history, all being referred to their proper grounds of proof at the foot of the article. The same plan has been adopted in all cases in which it seemed desirable to furnish the student with a comparative estimate of the value of contradictory dates, or with a critical knowledge of the grounds on which they rest. Names and stories simply mythical have been either omitted altogether or expressly indicated as such, and where only a probable or conjectural date can be assigned, a mark of interrogation is appended. With every regard to exhaustive fulness, it has been sought to avoid crowding the page with trumpery or insignificant names. With very few exceptions, and those justifiable on public rather than on personal grounds, living characters have been shut out.

Twelve years ago Mr. W. L. R. Cates, editor of the Dictionary of General Biography, was invited by Mr. Woodward to take a share in the undertaking, and upon the sudden death of the projector in October 1869, he succeeded him in the conduct of the work, to which he had indeed contributed the larger proportion from the time of his friend's appointment as Royal Librarian. The manuscript has further, we are told, since the loss of the counsel and co-operation of Mr. Woodward, passed through the hands of Mr. G. W. Cox, whose name may be taken as a guarantee for critical judgment and scholarlike supervision. That pedantic formalism has not been suffered to overrule time-honoured usage or harmless prejudice in such matters as the spelling of Greek proper names is perhaps one sign of the exercise of liberal and judicious authority. A recognized scholar need have no fear in letting us keep our familiar "Thucydides" or "Pericles," giving the more literal equivalents Thoukudides, &c., in brackets, though he may seem to waver in the cases of "Cylon" and "Kymon," whilst he will cheerfully abide such tests as may be applied to his general faithfulness to facts and critical sifting of evidence. Articles of the more prominent and comprehensive class, like those of States kingdoms, or treaties, approach in fact closely to the Encyclopædia of continuous précis-writing, and that on the widest possible scale. Classical learning, historical reading and acumen, with power of political and juridical analysis, are here called into play from first to last, controlled by a skill in compression and a clearness of statement which are given but to few. As a model of this skeleton form of treating great questions of history we might point to the series of articles in which Rome is handled under connected headings, "Wars," "Leagues and Treaties," "City," "Emperors," "Councils"; "Popes" having a heading for themselves apart. If anything can be expected to make clear to a reader of ordinary intelligence that historical puzzle over which so many would-be public guides or pretenders to learning get hopelessly muddled, the Holy Roman Empire, it is the succinct and lucid epitome which he will here take up, after having traced the line of Emperors from Augustus to Romulus Augustulus, overthrown by Odoacer A.D. 476:—

Romans, Emperors of the, and Kings of Germany.—[Rome, Emperors of]—the Empire restored by Charles the Great, 800—Louis (Ludwig) le Debonnaire, (son,) 814—Lothaire I., (son,) 840—Louis II., (son,) 855—Charles II., the Bald, 875—Charles the Fat, 876—on his death, disintegration of his dominions, 888.

• Empire revived as HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE, by Otto the Great, 962—Otto II., (son,) 973—Otto III., (son,) 983—Henry II., (DUKE OF BAVARIA,) 1002—Conrad II., the Salic, 1024—Henry III., (son,) 1035—Henry IV., (son,) 1056—Henry V., (son,) 1105—Lothaire II., (DUKE OF SAXONY,) 1125.

House of Hohenstauffen: Conrad III., 1138—Frederick I. Barbarossa, 1152—Henry VI., (son,) 1191—Philip, (brother,) 1198—Otto IV. (COUNT OF POITOU,) 1198—Frederick II., 1212—Conrad IV., (son,) 1250—William, (COUNT OF HOLLAND,) 1250—Interregnum, 1256—Richard, (EARL OF CORNWALL,) and Ailnoth X., (of Castile,) titular emperors, 1257.

House of Hapsburg: Rudolph of Hapsburg, 1273—Adolphus of Nassau, 1292—Albert I., (son of Rudolph,) 1298—Henry VII., (of Luxemburg,) 1308—on his death, Aug. 1313, interregnum, till Oct. 1314—when a double election took place, of Frederick III. (DUKE OF AUSTRIA) and Louis V. (DUKE OF BAVARIA). Louis alone, on death of Frederick, 1330—Charles IV. of Luxemburg, 1347—Wenceslaus, 1378—Rupert, 1400—Sigismund, 1410—Albert II., 1438—Frederick IV., 1440—Maximilian I., (son,) 1493—Charles V., (of Spain,) 1519—Ferdinand I., (brother,) 1558—Maximilian II., (son,) 1564—Rudolph II., (son,) 1576—Matthias, (brother,) 1612—Ferdinand II., 1619—Ferdinand III., (son,) 1637—Leopold I., (son,) 1658—Joseph I., (son,) 1705—Charles VI., (son) 1711—Charles VII., 1742—Francis I., 1745—Joseph II., (son,) 1765—Leopold II., (brother,) 1790—Francis II., (son,) 1792—extinction of the Empire on his renunciation, 6 Aug. 1806. [Austria.]

A cross reference to "Austria," "German Confederation, der Deutsche Bund," and "North German Confederation," will show that the most recent light has been brought to bear upon the problem, and may for the future be the means of sparing leading journalists their terrible exercise of mind between the rival claims of existing Hapsburgs and Hohenrollerns to the Imperial crown of Germany. The knot of the Schleswig-Holstein difficulty having been cut by the sword ten years ago, there has been a practical end put to a juridical or historical problem which was said in its time to have driven more than one German professor mad. Yet, should any interest still linger about a puzzle of so long standing, the data for following each phase of the disputed title, whether by way of cession, treaty, or inherited right, are ready to the student's hand in Mr. Woodward's clearly drawn out chronological epitome, from the incorporation of the Duchy of Schleswig with the Empire under Henry the Fowler (A.D. 930) to its independence under Conrad II. in 1027, and its junction with Holstein under Duke Henry II. on failure of the male line of Duke Abel, 1375, from which point the article "Holstein" will help in throwing light upon the dark windings of the disputed succession. Under "Austria (Austria, Oesterreich, Oestrich, East France, Metz)" a flood of light is shed within the space of a column or so upon another chapter of history upon which the popular mind may be said to be exceptionally bewildered and liable to be misled by sciolists or crotchet-mongers: while "France, Kingdom of," "Gauls," "Franks," with cross references to the names of Emperors and Kings will together furnish a kind of skeleton map of the entire modern history of Western Europe. Matter of this sort, dry bones as it may seem to the ordinary reader, is of priceless value to the serious student, whether to guide and steady his steps as he toils on through the piled-up masses of original material, or to lie at his elbow for the refreshing and correcting of memory as he looks back upon the progress he has made. That books of this class may be perverted to the purposes of cram is no more than can be said of books of reference of whatever kind. The best safeguard against misuse in this direction will be found in the severity of style as well as in the strict limits as to facts which the authors or compilers of the Encyclopedia of Chronology have throughout imposed upon themselves. Nothing of the clasp-trap of epitome writers or the mechanical tricks of a mnemonic technica is to be traced in its columns. Comprising within its 1,500 pages something like, as we should judge, 20,000 articles, it may be expected to supersede every manual of its class as a treasury of accurate and trustworthy knowledge. The care and assiduity with which it has been brought down to the most recent dates may be tested by the copious appendix, which includes the deaths of Mazzini, Lord Mayo, and Professor Manning. We cannot pretend to have gone through the vast and miscellaneous contents of the book with anything like a systematic or exhaustive scrutiny. But such a process is no more needed in order to judge of its merits than it is necessary to get through a whole cheese order to pass judgment upon its quality. Both to the original compiler, and to those in whose hands it has been carried to completion, the thanks of every class of readers are fairly due.

THE EARLY LIFE OF MR. JUSTICE MAULE.*

MISS LEATHLEY'S sketch of the early life of her uncle, Sir W. H. Maule, is brief and tantalizing. It is only a fragment of biography, and leaves off at the point at which the chief interest of a biography is usually supposed to be just commencing. Sir W. H. Maule died in 1858, in his seventieth year; but this Memoir breaks off at the end of 1814, when he was making his first briefless journeys on circuit, and was known only as a quiet and rather eccentric young man, who had distinguished himself at Cambridge, and who showed little aptitude or relish for the profession he had chosen. In Miss Leathley's opinion, "the chief interest of his life ended" with his mother's death; "there were henceforward no great joys and sorrows, no wonderful triumphs or successes, or what perhaps may be yet more interesting, no great struggles or successes." How he made his way at the Bar, rose to the Bench, and proved himself one of the ablest Judges and most remarkable men of his day, are circumstances which Miss Leathley does not think it worth while to mention even in the slightest outline. Probably no one would be more astonished than the late Mr. Justice Maule to find himself made the subject of a good little story for the young, with a moral showing "the great influence children have over the happiness of their parents, and how in promoting that they most surely promote also their own welfare." It is true that in her dedication to Sir E. Ryan, Miss Leathley speaks of her own incapacity to write a complete life of a man of such varied powers; but it does not appear that she applied to any of Sir W. Maule's old friends to undertake the task, or to assist in it. For Miss Leathley's Memoir, however, such as it is, we are not disposed to be ungrateful. It is tantalizing in breaking off so abruptly at a critical point, and it is, from its narrow domestic range, imperfect even as an account of Maule's early years—for example, as regards his life at college. A great deal of it might with advantage have been omitted. Many of the letters, especially towards the end of the volume, are purely formal, or relate to trivial matters, and it is hardly a sufficient excuse for printing them that they happened to turn up in a bundle of family papers. Still the Memoir is extremely interesting as far as it goes, and throws a good deal of light on the character and career of a remarkable man who was sometimes a puzzle to his contemporaries.

William Henry Maule was the second son of Mr. Henry Maule, of Edmonton, whose grandfather had a good estate at Ecton, in Northamptonshire. The estate seems to have been gradually lost, and Henry's share barely sufficed to finish his education and start him in the world. He established himself as a doctor at Edmonton, married Hannah Rawson, "of the elder line of the Yorkshire Rawsons," and managed to provide comfortably for his family, but not without close thrift, and much anxiety arising from war taxes and high prices. Mrs. Maule is described as a superior and charming woman—"superior from her natural qualities, and charming from the charms of nature, which had somewhat resisted the restraints of cultivation." As a child, we are told, she delighted in nature, and to run wild in woods. She seems to have been a quick, bright, warm-hearted woman, and William probably inherited a good deal of her energy and independence, together with a share of the melancholy which marked his father's disposition. The influence that made the deepest impression on the lad's character was that of his uncle John, his father's elder brother, a clever and eccentric man, severe in manner and cynical in humour, who, in addition to the duties of a living of Greenford which he held from his college, took charge of a few pupils, including, for a time, his nephew William. The Rev. John Maule was a scholar of the old school, who insisted upon thoroughness and minute accuracy in everything. He had great faith in rigid discipline, and believed that a boy could be "made" to learn anything if he was only kept firmly to his task. William, he wrote to his brother, was to be taught arithmetic, "by which I mean the more abstruse and difficult parts of it, and to be made ready and quick with it"; as for "his Latin and Greek, and writing Latin and verses, he should be made to keep up that, and to improve in them"; and, again, he must stick to "mathematics, Euclid, &c., and have a taste for them—that is, be made to learn them." This was the constant burden of his letters, and the first principle of his system of teaching. Although he would never have admitted it to the boy himself, he wrote privately to his father that he was "extraordinarily quick and ready," and was evidently proud of him. Yet such was the severity of his discipline that William once ran away from him, and was only persuaded to return at the entreaty of his uncle, who declared he missed him so much in looking after the younger pupils that, if he did not come back, he should have to give up taking any more.

From boyhood William Maule was remarkable for his quickness of apprehension and prodigious memory; it seemed as if he could pick up anything without the least trouble, and remember it for ever afterwards. In after years he used to astonish his friends by the vast amount of classical literature he carried textually in his head, so that he could begin at almost any point of certain works and recite straight on. He could get even an index by heart, and repeat it without a blunder. His natural gifts in this way were no doubt strengthened and sharpened by his uncle's discipline. One of his schoolfellows has described him as "not a great reader, and generally more inclined for amusement, or fun, or pleasure, than study." "His memory was always most excellent," says the same informant, "and his quickness very remarkable; and he must at that early period of his life have had great penetration and judgment in discerning and appreciating the meaning and spirit of what he treasured in his recollection, for I have heard him often very closely pressed by his uncle, who was an excellent scholar in Greek and Latin, for the very marrow of the most occult passages of the classic authors in use by us, and have almost always seen that his answers were satisfactory, and such in general as could not have been given by any of his seniors." Mr. Maule always took his meals with his pupils, and being of "a merry, witty turn himself," the conversation was frank and unrestrained; and the blunt, cynical humour which the nephew displayed in later years was probably developed under the uncle's influence. The Rev. Mr. Maule died at the end of 1804, and William, at the age of sixteen, found his school life abruptly terminated. His father, who had two other sons on his hands, and was in very low spirits at the time, did not see how he could afford to do anything for him. After remaining at home for a few months, studying by himself, he accepted a situation as tutor to the children of Mrs. Head, a daughter of Mrs. Priscilla Wakefield, a Quaker lady who was well known at that time for her views on education.

The Heads, who were also Quakers, lived at Ipswich, and William gave his mother an amusing and characteristic account of his journey, and of the family with whom he was domesticated. On the road to London he found it no easy matter to get his pony past the haycocks, and "thought it very strange for a horse to be frightened at a load of hay, till I remembered having seen people frightened at a drove of oxen who had no objection to a dinner of beef." He had a kind welcome at Ipswich, but he was surprised when Mrs. Head, on showing him to his room, observed, "There is a little boy sleeps with you; you must help him dress in the morning." "And truly," he adds, "the very first thing I heard in the morning was the little urchin crying out, 'Wilt thee button my hind clothes?'" Amongst other things, his business consisted in calling his pupils at seven in the morning, in seeing them wash their faces and comb their hair, in seeing them to bed and taking their candle away, and in dressing the little one in the morning. Mrs. Head had her "system," and it was the reverse of the Rev. J. Maule's. She objected to force, and allowed no influence but persuasion. "She thinks," her tutor says, "Latin and Greek all very well in their way, but greatly approves of the general knowledge which enlarges the mind, and which some people (who have had no education but that of a public school and a University) call a smattering"; and it was, he suspected, a natural consequence of this system that the children were totally ignorant of everything. One of Mrs. Head's maxims was that "it is possible for a child to be a good Latin scholar without exactly knowing how to decline hic, hæc, hoc; for it is not that which makes a scholar, but the general knowledge of the language"—a maxim, we suspect, not universally discredited at the present day even by parents who are not Quakers. In accordance with this precept Mrs. Head occasionally heard the children their lessons, and "taught them a few false quantities," which the tutor did not feel bound to correct when she made them, as he had not undertaken to teach her Latin. It is easy to imagine the contempt of a scholar brought up at the feet of the Rev. J. Maule for such a system as this. Nor did the tutor think more highly of the moral than of the intellectual training of the Head family. He quotes an observation of his father's, that a private education made poor devils of boys, and that a public education made them sad dogs, and adds from his own experience, "I am convinced that this observation is well founded; poorer devils than my pupils even Mrs. Trimmer herself could not wish for. It is my private opinion that one sad dog is worth forty poor devils."

At this time young Maule—he was barely seventeen—used to look forward to the day when he would be "an old codger in a brown wig," and say to his grandchildren, "Ah, boys, boys! before I was your age I was out upon the world; but things are altered now." He was already at work upon an index to Homer, and calculated hopefully that it would be finished in about a couple of years, and might perhaps bring in twenty or thirty pounds—a calculation sadly disturbed by a hint from one of his friends that there was an index already. He was also grinding away at Greek, Latin, and Euclid, whenever he could snatch an hour for himself. He wore old shoes when teaching, pinched and saved as much as possible, and found it necessary, being "not over cool by nature," to make it his continual study to acquire a habit of coolness and self-possession. Although he made light of his troubles when writing home, it is evident that he chafed at the drudgery imposed on him, and at the fussy meddling and ridiculous pretensions of the silly woman whose spoilt children he was expected to lick into shape, while she herself did all she could to make them worse even than they were. However, a release was not long in coming. His father's circumstances and spirits had both improved, and on the advice of an old friend of the family, it was resolved to send William to Cambridge; and he was entered at Trinity in October, 1806. The domestic records of his college career are scanty. His own letters do not seem to have been preserved, and Miss Leathley, who disdains to go beyond the sacred limits of the family, is driven to conjecture what Maule said of himself in his letters to his friends from the answers he received. To any one else it would have appeared more natural and satisfactory to apply for information to one or other of Maule's old college friends, some of whom no doubt still survive. We got casual glimpses of the young student struggling to keep down expenses, reading diligently—"a hard fagger," his friends called him—and taking high places in the examinations. He was Senior Wrangler in 1810, and in the same year carried off the first Smith prize. One of his rivals for the wranglership who knew his powers when he exerted himself had augured hopefully on his own account from the fact that Maule was never out of bed till a late hour in the morning. He was not aware that Maule's favourite method of pursuing his studies was in bed. He used to read for hours after he went to bed at night, and in this way reconciled his love of ease with his appetite for books. According to a semi-official rumour of the period, the marks obtained by the two Wranglers at the head of the list on this occasion were 1,600 and 900. Maule won his fellowship in the following year, and Mrs. Maule, when she received the delightful intelligence that she was the mother of a Fellow of Trinity, confessed that she was "too well pleased to write with any decorum." He took pupils, but found teaching very disagreeable, the only consolation being, as he said, that they brought money, and few people were so fortunate as to be paid for doing agreeable things. He had already chosen the law as a profession, but it was with some reluctance that he turned from "the spacious, cool rooms, shady walks, and large libraries" of Cambridge to the dingy office of the special pleader. He went his first circuit in the summer of 1814, and at Uxbridge he had the satisfaction of receiving his first briefs and fees—a couple of briefs and three guineas. His younger brother Frederick had died the year before, and he now returned from circuit to find his mother on her death-bed. The shock was a severe one, for a keen sensibility was veiled under his blunt and independent manners, and he had always been devoted to his mother. The desire of pleasing her had been his strongest motive for exertion, and it is not improbable that the kind of moody indifference and somewhat cynical disregard of conventionalities which he afterwards displayed may be in some measure attributed to the effect of this loss.

Miss Leathley, as we have said, does not carry the Memoir of her uncle beyond his first circuit; and we cannot presume to supply the deficiency. Those who knew anything of Sir W. Maule will be able without much difficulty to trace the roots of his character in the story of his early years. His power of quiet humour and sarcasm, his pithy language and flow of apt and easy illustration, are shown even in his boyish letters. His tutorship with the Heads at Ipswich is an example of the good sense and resolute philosophy with which he took things as they came and made the best of them, doing whatever work fell to his share thoroughly and steadfastly, without any fuss or effort, or any expectation of great results. It was in precisely the same spirit that he went to Cambridge, and that he afterwards pushed his way at the Bar. He was not only one of the ablest, but, though almost destitute of ambition, one of the most successful, men of his day. Babbage, it is true, used to lament that one who might have become the first mathematician in Europe should have thrown himself away upon the law; but at least Maule's sterling qualities, notwithstanding serious defects of manner and temperament, were fully recognized in the profession to which he devoted himself. What was most remarkable about him was the apparent ease with which he mastered anything he took in hand. He seemed to have no love of work for its own sake, no enthusiasm for learning, and to prefer lounging and amusement to serious application; but when work had to be done it never found him wanting either in industry or power. His quickness, his keen common sense that stripped the husks from things and reduced knowledge to its substantial elements, and his prodigious memory, made a few hours' study in bed worth more to him than days of labour to others. There was something of Montaigne both in his character and his humour. He had a kindly pity, not devoid of cynicism, for the weaknesses and frailties of humanity, which made him, it was thought, sometimes too lenient as a judge, and too much disposed to strain a point on behalf of the poor and ignorant. No man had less of intellectual arrogance, but he seemed sometimes to be looking down on the world with an odd mixture of toleration and contempt, as if the people in it were a poor set, and too much must not be expected from them. His irony was the distraction of county juries. So many good things have been attributed to Sir W. Maule in the gossip of the Courts that it would perhaps be difficult in all cases to determine how far the putative parentage was genuine; but after the most liberal winnowing enough would remain to form a rich collection. We can only hope that Miss Leathley's Memoir will some day be followed by a complete and adequate biography of a very able and distinguished man.

LANG'S POEMS.*

MR. LANG'S attractive binding, and his even more attractive title, do not blind us to the fact that he has missed the opportunity of producing a good book. So far as the French translations are concerned, we have a book which is too brief for a good anthology, too meagre to be regarded as a series of specimens of any particular author, and which disappoints all the more because the handling of what actually has been translated is always pleasant and sometimes excellent, justifying the belief that a much ampler and more satisfactory introduction to the poets of his choice might have come from his pen.

The plan of the book as it stands is extremely sketchy. A series of translations from the older French poets comes first, and later in the volume there are some further specimens of poets in the nineteenth century. The rest of the space is filled with original lyrics, all written in the manner of a student of Ronsard or of the classical sources of Ronsard's lyrics, approached in his spirit and used after his method. Mr. Lang's choice of nineteenth-century poets led him to Alfred de Musset, Gérard de Nerval, and Henri Murger, all of whom were alive as lately as twenty years ago, and to Victor Hugo. We have nothing to say against this selection; but why these, and these only? Any writer is free to follow his own whims and preferences in work of this kind; but when such work is collected together and published in a set form, something more of seriousness and completeness is reasonably looked for in the design. It must just be added, in passing, that not a single note from the French lyre is given us between the Ronsard epoch—the Elizabethan era in our own literature—and the middle of the present century. But in the translations which Mr. Lang has produced in his own casual way there is a very real charm and genuine merit; as in these two stanzas from one of his three little excerpts out of Victor Hugo:

I now am bold to say to the swift changing hours,
I pass, pass upon your way, for I grow never old,
Fleet to the dark abyss with all your fading flowers,
One rose that none may pluck, within my heart I hold.
Your flying wings may anite, but they can never spill
The cup fulfilled of love, from which my lips are wet;
My heart has far more fire than you have frost to chill,
My soul more love than you can make my soul forget.

And these lines from Gérard de Nerval on the effect of "An Old Tune" are vocal with just the right kind of rhythm:—

There is an air for which I would disown
Mozart's, Rossini's, Weber's melodies,—
A sweet sad air that languishes and sighs,
And keeps its secret charm for me alone.
Whenever I hear that music vague and old,
Two hundred years are mist that rolls away;
The thirteenth Louis reigns, and I behold
A green land golden in the dying day.
An old red castle, strong with stony towers,
The windows gay with many coloured glass;
Wide plains, and rivers flowing among flowers,
That bathe the castle basement as they pass.

When we take the long leap back from De Nerval and De Musset to the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, we find seven lyrical writers passed before us—Charles of Orleans, François Villon, Du Bellay, Belleau, Ronsard, Tahureau, and Passerat. The last, as Mr. Lang says, was more of a political satirist than a poet; but if we confine ourselves to the other six, we find that they represent two distinct schools of the French Muse. Charles of Orleans, father of Louis XII., who was taken prisoner at Agincourt, and lived for five-and-twenty years in England, died in 1465; and Villon died about 1470. These two men, then, belong to the pre-Renaissance period; they represent the epoch when the literature of the Langue d'Oïl was still under the influence of the Provençal spirit in the Langue d'Oc, which had received its deathblow less than two centuries before. Those modes of the European imagination to which Villemain has given the names of the "Mythologie chevaleresque" and the "Mythologie allégorique," and which in the thirteenth century had given birth to the Roman de la Rose, were as yet unexhausted in the time of Charles and of Villon. But with Ronsard and Du Bellay, and the rest of the famous Pleiad, or septet of reformers, to which they belonged, all was different. In them were concentrated the influences of the great Italian writers, and also the stress of Renaissance enthusiasm for ancient models, running into an extravagance analogous to that of Euphuism—an extravagance which was destined to be by and by curbed and counteracted by Malherbe. These and other points of contrast between the two schools might very well have been brought out by Mr. Lang in two ways—first, by an expansion of his excessively brief and unsatisfactory notes; and, secondly, by a larger and better arranged selection in each case. So much for the question of the schools or epochs of these poets. To take the poets themselves, surely one little spring song and one short rondo are very scant measure by way of giving some idea of Charles of Orleans, the poet patron of French verse in the fifteenth century. In an interesting volume of Studies on French poets, Mr. Walter Reesant divides the verses of Charles into four sets or departments—(1) Against melancholy, "Soing, Soucy, et Ennuy"; (2) Invocations of grace and kindness from his mistress; (3) Poems on our death; (4) The regrets of exile, written perhaps mostly in England. Admitting the monotony of his Lyrics, Mr. Besant points to the element of monotony without tediousness in certain memorable successions of poems, as in Petrarch, in the sonnets of Shakespeare, and the cantos of Le Mémorial; and he remarks that, though the little éclogues of Charles come longo intervallo behind these, to say that they are monotonous is not to pronounce their condemnation. What we complain of in Mr. Lang is that either in note nor translated extract does he give us anything distinctive about Charles. There is nothing to create an idea of his chivalrous and generous refinement—"ingénue, familière, sans voir jamais rien de bas"—or to mark him off in this respect from his "Bohemian" contemporary Villon, who was in many ways the exact opposite of Charles. It would have been a very decided addition to the value of a book like Mr. Lang's to have a brief digest introduced of some of Sainte-Beuve's criticisms on these early French poets. Villon's life was indeed unspeakably worthless; but he had a real gift of song; and Sainte-Beuve seems to regard his influence on French poetry as one of very great power. It is an influence which he in large measure regrets; for it is the influence of the esprit gaulois, of mockery and railery, of the "péchant pour le badinage," which has so often hindered the worth of dignity and nobility of tone in French literature. It has been said that Villon's influence on Marot, and through Marot on La Fontaine, is evidence enough of his importance in French poetry; and so it probably is, in spite of the fact that, like some other roystering poets, he has had the most made of his genius, if not more than the most. Mr. Lang has given us the song written by Villon for himself and other gallows-birds who were just then expecting to be hanged, and this "Ballad of the Gibbet" is translated with his usual merit, though we totally fail to detect the spirit of mockery which the critics remark in it. There is at any rate not much mockery about this stanza:—

Listen, we pray you, and look not in scorn,
Though justly, in sooth, we are cast to die;
Ye wot no man so wise is born
That keeps his wisdom constantly.
Be ye then merciful, and cry
To Mary's Son that is pitous,
That his mercy take no stain from us,
Having us out of the fiery place.
We are but dead, let no soul deny
To pray God succour us of His grace.

If Villon's long satirical and pathetic poem called Le Grand Testament Mr. Lang takes no account whatever. We wonder that he did not think it worth while to translate the ballad in the Grand Testament beginning

Dietes moy, où, n'en quel pays
Est Flora, la belle Romaine.

Mr. Lang's own sonnet on Villon, included among a few at the end of his volume, some on pictures and some on poets, is, we think, a very striking and powerful one. After a sort of catalogue of "dead delights" and "departed desires," the sonnet ends thus:—

All this your master Villon knew and sung;
Despised delights, and faint foredone desire;
And shame, a deathless worm, a quenchless fire;
And laughter from the heart's last sorrow wrung,
When half-repentance but makes evil whole,
And prayer that cannot help wears out the soul.

Of Du Bellay, between whom and the late poet Clough an ingenious parallel is drawn, we should have been very glad to see more translated remains. His sonnet "To Heavenly Beauty" is a noble poem, very worthily translated. The chief thought has appeared and reappeared in literature since the time of Plato, and very likely had some unrecorded expositors before his time. As mortal life is but a day in the Eternal, so mortal beauty is but a faint reflection and transient image of the Real:—

My soul, that my sad body doth restrain,
Why of the moment's pleasure art thou fain?
Nay, thou hast wings, nay, seek another stay.
There is the joy whereto each soul aspires,
And there the rest that all the world desires,
And there is love, and peace, and gracious mirth;
And there in the most highest heavens shalt thou
Behold the Very Beauty, whereof now
Thou worshippest the shadow upon earth.

The original sonnet was written in 1550, and we own that we should feel more kindly towards Mr. Lang if he had bestowed himself to give us a worthier series of Du Bellay's remains; also if he had thought it worth his pains to indicate by more thoughtful extracts, if not to expound in a short essay, the reasons of Ronsard's enormous popularity, the suggestions of which in Mr. Swinburne's "Chasteland" are not in the least in excess of the age. Sainte-Beuve has not only reviewed but edited Ronsard, and we have small sympathy with that self-regarding mode of composing a published book which limits its scope to that which has given the author immediate pleasure, and makes no attempt, or a very inadequate one, to satisfy the natural wants and inquiries of anyone who reads with interest and activity. As a final question, we will ask why is no place at all in the volume given to Saint-Johns and to Marot?

We have said enough to indicate fully our own view of Mr. Lang's merits and shortcomings as a translator and as an anthologist. We have not said quite all that we should like to do in commendation of his own verses. To some extent such words of praise must be circumscribed, because, as we before hinted, these lyrics were clearly written under the inspiration of the school of poets whom their writer was translating, and often so much in their manner as to make it hard to speak of them as quite original. There are in the book, however, two series of short poems, the first called "Ave," and the other "Hesperotheren," parts of which strike us as possessing singular delicacy and beauty. In the first series, especially, there occurs a little poem called "Metempsychosis," which very finely describes the adapting power with which an engrossing love presses all kinds of sights and impressions into its own service. It is a phase of the same thought that is found in Coleridge's Genesis and in the Le Mémorial canto beginning "Thy voice is on the rolling air." These suggestive impressions may be drawn from sights of the passing moment, or from remains of the most distant past; and the few following words beautifully express that last thought:—

From all sweet art, and out of all "old rhyme,"
Thine eyes and lips are light and song to me;
The shadows of the beauty of all time,
Carven and sung, are only shapes of thee;
Alas, the shadowy shapes! ah, sweet my dear,
Shall life or death bring all thy being near?

We should like to say something of a poem in the other series, called "Circe's Island Revisited"; but we must here part from Mr. Lang, with the hope that in any future work he will, to the grace and lightness of the poets of the Pleiad, add something of their energy and diligence.

A BATCH OF BOOKS ON THE WAR.*

WE purposely put at the head of our list in this notice the Engineer's journal of the campaign of Metz. Few events in history have been so prolific of personal recollections on the part of those who shared in them as the disastrous campaign of the Army of the Rhine, and its fatal investment. Such hastily written works as those which the French and Belgian presses sent out last year are not always worth a special study; nor are they even sound material for history, composed as they have been too frequently under the influence of passion and personal prejudice, and sent out so near to the time of action as to allow the authors no space wherein to weigh their judgments, and yet long enough after the event to lose the vividness which delineation on the spot lends to the simplest narrative of an eye-witness of great affairs. The work which we have now before us is a striking exception to this rule. We may call attention to it even at this late date for its honesty of purpose and execution, as well as because issuing from a captive author through an obscure foreign publisher, it has escaped the notice it deserves in this country as well as in France.

The incidents which the author of "Three Months with the Army at Metz" paints are well known in their general outlines; nor will the commentary which he freely offers on them affect the general verdict of history, being at times hardly more trustworthy in its forecasts than the guesses of Special Correspondents. Indeed this Engineer's journal reflects just the current opinion of the professional public inside the camp of Bazaine as those did the opinion of the uninformed public outside who were staring at what they could not understand. It is not for his general narrative or criticisms that his little work should be studied, but for the minute touches of description and the hints on professional details which would often be petty in their value were it not for the close realism which plants us side by side with the young writer in the scenes he pictures. We see the gush of hopeful expectation with which the army made the confused advance on the Saar that so many of its members fancied to be preliminary to fresh glories for the eagles of France. We find the Staff from the first failing in the necessary activity and foresight, as well as in the technical knowledge which they needed the aid of the engineers to supplement. We trace the effects of Napoleon's and Leboeuf's indecision manifesting themselves hourly more and more among the very commonplace creatures who had been thrust into the charge of divisions under the rotten system of the Second Empire. We watch with fresh surprise the utter collapse of all order and discipline which ensued on the instant when the defeats of Forbach and Woerth gave the general signal to fall back.

Bazaine steps forward on the scene, and at first is gladly hailed as the best available man, an honest appointment, the hoped-for saviour of the army. But he soon disappoints the expectations of the author, not less than of others. And even at the first intimation of his being chosen, the accompanying announcement that "the Emperor would continue to direct the operations" spoilt any good effect anticipated from the change of command. Napoleon was ignorant how low he had fallen in the estimation of his troops. It is significant enough of the vicious condition of their organization that we find the Engineer writing on the fatal 14th August, just before the battle of Borny, "The army is on the march, the order being to pass the Moselle and camp on the other side of Metz. But the movement is very slow; both because on our side all movements are so, and because on this special occasion the bridges placed across the Moselle are not numerous enough." This, it should be remembered, was after the army had been lying five days, apparently doing nothing, about the city where the chief engineer school and depot of France had been, and where there was no lack of private supplies of timber and boats.

But this improvidence and mal-arrangement were far outdone during the succeeding days. The Engineer Staff had gone into the field destitute of proper maps or instruments, the officer who acted as custodian to the stock stored at the arsenal establishment in Metz having refused to supply them without proper authority:—

He looked, I imagine [says our Engineer], upon the arsenal as a museum in which everything that was useful was to be kept stored, but all marked with the inviolable inscription, "Not on any account to be touched." He must have had the satisfaction of surrendering his stores to the enemy in an admirable condition.

This touch of satire is the more striking because the author of the 'Three Months' journal is in general of a matter-of-fact turn of mind. However, the immediate result of this ill-placed care was that when the Engineers had got beyond the limits of their ordinary college walks of former years, they had to guide themselves in their duties by borrowed maps or none at all. Our hero lost his way once when scarcely out of sight of the city; and a little later, just before the battle of Gravelotte, he was sent by his general to bring up supplies to his corps (the Third) by finding a road where no road existed, through the steep and wood-covered sides of the valley of Montvaux which lay close to the rear, and completely cut off all approach for wheeled carriages on that side. This attempt of his was made in pursuance of an order of Lebœuf's, who, it will be remembered, commanded the Third Corps from the time of Decaen's fatal wound at Borny. We may say briefly that, if any one wishes to know what a thoroughly incompetent officer the Marshal was whom Napoleon III. had selected for his War Minister, he has only to study the pages of the Engineer's journal, which abound with revelations on this point. To stand still just within range of the enemy's shells so as to prove his animal courage, but to give no orders at all to any one, or at most only an occasional order which was wholly impracticable—such seems to have been the part constantly played by the Marshal during the actions of the 16th, 18th, and 31st August. Nor is the revelation made of the incompetency of the junior Staff officers at all out of keeping with what is shown of their chief. It is natural in a professional point of view that the writer should take pains to show how constantly from the first they were compelled to delegate functions which they should have personally performed to the ill-mounted and hitherto neglected Engineer officers attached to the divisional Staff. Something of this character has been observed in other armies than the French, where the Staff has been ill chosen, or allowed to rust entirely in time of peace. But it is to be hoped that such incidents could not repeat themselves elsewhere as this recorded of Marshal Lebœuf and his aides in the crisis of the battle of Gravelotte:—

At the other side of the valley which separated us from the Etain road we saw near Gravelotte large masses of the enemy. "Bring me up some mitrailleuses," said the Marshal. A major of Artillery whispered below his voice to Colonel R— that as the enemy was at least 3,000 yards off, it was not possible to reach him. Yet nobody dared make this remark to the Marshal, and the mitrailleuses were brought up, though they were not served, and only attracted the attention of the enemy, who directed his shells upon them.

Such is but one of a dozen instances that might be quoted in proof of the charges against the French generals. Bazaine's own conduct after the investment is largely criticized, and it is proved, we might almost say demonstrated, that the attempt to break out on the 31st August failed simply because he from the first never made it seriously, being probably determined to keep his passive attitude around the works of Metz, and wait upon events. The opinions long since expressed on this subject in our columns are abundantly justified by the Engineer's journal, which may be commended to our readers as the most faithful picture that has reached us of the inner side of the events which led to the most shameful capitulation of history. The work before us may be warmly recommended to all classes of readers; to professional students it forms an especially valuable commentary on the melancholy story of the Army of the Rhine.

The most striking study of strategy in the late war is admitted to be furnished by the operations of Manteuffel at its close, and we are not likely to have a better account of those until Colonel von Verdy's great work draws to its close than that of Count Wartensleben. Colonel Wright, from his English education and German military training, has peculiar facilities as a translator, and has done full justice to a somewhat dry original. Indeed we confess to finding his version more agreeable than the German itself, which reached us some time since. The most interesting point specially brought to notice is that Manteuffel deliberately aimed rather at driving Olinchant and the relics of Bourbaki's force over into Switzerland than at capturing them himself; Germany being in fact at the time so overloaded with prisoners that it was desirable not to add to their number. Count Wartensleben takes very proper pains to clear his chief of Gambetta's foolish charge, made probably in the first heat of disappointment, that the saillies Convention was violated by the continuance of the war in a district reserved from its operation. We could wish that he had done the same justice to the loyalty and firmness with which the Swiss General Herzog conducted his difficult share in the operations, and to the good spirit and endurance shown by the raw cantonal militia of the Confederation.

The next work on our list is one which only the cacoethes of publishing which seized the Paris press when the world was reopened by peace to its long-restrained enterprise could have justified any private firm in sending out. The details of the conduct of the marine force during the siege of Paris will of course interest all connected with the brave men who served in it, and may furnish valuable material to future historians; but they cannot be expected to attract the general reader. It is to be gathered from Admiral Noury's story that the good conduct of the naval forces was due more to an ample but judicious use of rewards, and to an excellent spirit of camaraderie between officers and men, than to any specially severe discipline. Like most other writers of note on the events of the siege, he condemns unhesitatingly the weak and wavering conduct of Trochu towards the Reds shut up with him. On such points his evidence is very valuable; and the rich atlas which illustrates the narrative will serve for many other works than that of the laborious and gallant writer.

Count de la Chapelle's study of the Military Forces of France in 1870 is a painstaking exposure of the vital defect of the army of the Second Empire—its miserable want, not so much of men or material, as of organization. It can hardly be too earnestly commended to our own army reformers. From the keen-sighted artilleryman who is levelling his aim at the War Office under cover of the graphic story now appearing in "Blackwood," down to the slightest writer of "Occasional Notes" in a military weekly, all may learn something towards the completion of their task from the Count's revelations.

Last, but not least, on our list is the authorised War Office translation of the famous Stoffel Reports by Captain Home, R.E., who has done a valuable service to our general and military libraries by giving us a really good version of the most prophetic utterances ever wasted on a misguided Administration. The War Office deserves credit for having undertaken this task, and Messrs. Harrison have executed their portion of it with very praiseworthy care. We cannot too strongly recommend the study of the Stoffel Reports in Captain Home's vigorous English to all who have not read them in the original.

CATTLE, SHEEP, AND DEER.*

MR. MACDONALD has a practical knowledge of the subjects upon which he writes, and his published works, whose name, to judge by the title-page, is legion, ought to be a warranty for his literary powers. The chief defect of the present volume is the length to which it is spun out by extracts and quotations from other writers upon farming, and from letters, articles, and reviews in the newspapers, the gist of which might much more conveniently have been given in a condensed form. As it is, the author's place is somewhere—and at a wide interval—between the exhaustive Book of the Farm of the veteran Henry Stephens, and the light and lively Handy-books of Mr. Holt Beavor, in whose entertaining Notes on Fields and Cattle there is as much information, in the space of some two hundred small pages, as in the bulky contents of Mr. Macdonald's seven hundred large ones. But the subject is one of much importance; and if by such works farmers as a body can be stimulated to apply themselves more intelligently and scientifically to cattle-breeding and cattle-feeding, and to substitute system for mere haphazard, there will be the surer grounds for hope that Great Britain may yet grow the chief portion of her own mutton, and by her own supplies repair the damage done by recent epidemics amongst her larger cattle. In Mr. Macdonald's work three chapters are devoted to the breeding and feeding of cattle, with collateral information as to the best means of turning them to profit. Two more chapters discuss the management of sheep, and the rest of the volume—except a brief appendix on the management of cattle and sheep in health and in disease—is given to the subject of deer, with remarks upon the game-laws. The interest of this last division of the book strikes us as of a distinct and separate nature; and therefore in the present article we shall confine ourselves to that part of the volume which concerns the more familiar kinds of animal food.

We suppose it is vain to hope that any writer of Mr. Macdonald's calibre will ever understand that the history of sheep and cattle before the days of the patriarchs may be dispensed with. Though it may be not generally known that "the native country of the ox, reckoning from the time of the Flood, was the plain of Ararat," most readers will forgive the omission of such archaeological information, and will even excuse silence on the difficult question of the "parent race of the ox," in consideration of fuller and more particular light being thrown upon matters of more immediate importance, such as the influence of climate upon cattle-breeding, at which topic the * Cattle, Sheep, and Deer. By Duncan George Fyvie Macdonald, LL.D., &c. London: Bell & Sons. 1872.

Mr. Macdonald early in his first chapter, and the reclamation of the degraded land for pasture. Mr. Macdonald justly attaches great importance to the draining of hill-pastures, till of late so utterly neglected, and he shows (pp. 17-19) how much can be done with them—supposing the land not to be radically moss-land, which gives way after draining to absolute sterility—“by judicious grass-sowing to promote a material increase of stock produce. The use of Italian rye-grass to increase this produce, and of clover, lucerne, sainfoin, &c., is enforced; and tables from Peter Lawson's Agronomy-graphia—a hard compound word, coined, we presume, to represent the whole range of unartificial grass seeds—are given to show what improvement light, medium, and heavy soils are capable of. Of wholesome manures Mr. Macdonald puts “bones” in the first rank, with justice, if we accept his comparative amounts of the nitrogen, phosphoric acid, and lime returns to the soil in the excrement of animals fed upon it, and in an equal proportion of the bones of such animals themselves. The principal value of bones is in the phosphates they contain, and in their action on the land when accelerated by admixture with half their weight of sulphuric acid diluted with three or four times its bulk of water. “By the free use of finely crushed manure, a Cheshire dairy farmer has been able to increase his head of stock from twenty to forty” (p. 27). Next to bones and dung our author classes guano and gypsum, but with reserve and caution as to the use of these stimulants. “The incautious application of guano to grass has been often known to spoil, for a time, good pasture-land by developing a coarse and unpalatable herbage”; still the more common error of farmers as to grass-land is rather on the side of deficiency than excess in “giving back an adequate return for the essential materials removed in the shape of hay and crops.” There is wisdom in the author's remarks upon so-called composts, which, on the strength of the sound axiom that mild and diluted manures are best for light land, are so mixed not infrequently as to be little else than mere rubbish and unrotted vegetable refuse, a farrago of weeds and seeds. Of liquid manures for grass land it is obvious that he cannot speak too highly.

In the second chapter, which is devoted to the management of cattle, the rearing of young stock, the arrangement of farmsteadings, and the domestic industries of butter and cheese making, the chief interest will be found to centre in dairy management. As to the vexed question of “breeding in and in,” so much has been written and printed already that most folks will be content to agree with the practical and successful member for Aberdeenshire, Mr. McCombie, and to adopt a middle course, stopping short in good time, lest that which is gained in breed and quality should be lost in quantity and in constitution. That a continued “breeding in and in” is against nature as well as against experience, is corroborated rather appositely in a later portion of the volume by Mr. Macdonald's reference to his father's diary of three visits to St. Kilda at the request of the S. P. C. K. in 1822 and 1824. The mortality of young children in that island was excessive fifty years ago; it has now increased to the ratio of eight in ten. Though other explanations of this startling fact are offered, it is probably referable, as the author suggests, “to the continued intermarrying of a population already too closely related.” On the water question, too, Mr. Macdonald has some very wholesome words for the professional and amateur farmer in pp. 108-16, and words which need not the enhancement of pages of quotation elsewhere about the sufferings of a traveller in the desert. Anyone who has seen poor brutes waiting in a cattle-truck at a railway station all through a broiling day ought to agitate for an adequate supply of water for farmsteads, homesteads, and pasture-lands, and the frugal management of it “by a system of drainage that shall fall in with nature and not oppose it.” Though it may be difficult to relieve the thirst of animals in railway transit, a little mechanical skill would furnish the poor creatures in their homes with a constant supply of pure fresh water in lieu of the miserable puddles at which too frequently they are doomed to the sufferings of Tantalus. And if humanity cannot hasten this reform, self-interest ought to co-operate in recommending it; for experiments have proved that, whereas animals cannot live beyond a few days without water, the stomach becoming worn out for lack of mixture of water with the solid aliment, on the other hand sheep and horses have lived for a much longer term without solid food upon water, which is a large constituent of organic bodies.

Probably there is no portion of the whole range of farming in which so many readers have an interest as “dairy-farming.” And dairy-farming depends for its credit on cleanliness, and for its profit on judicious management. The young farmer who looks about for a helpmate will do better if he chooses a “neat-handed Phillis” who has got a reputation in the dairy than if he mates with a damsel who can play the piano, or outshine her companions at the farmers' balls. Perhaps Mr. Macdonald's description of the ideal dairy is open to the objection that it is too spick-and-span to be every one's dairy, like the beautiful and perfect building devoted to that purpose at Shipley, in Nottinghamshire, the seat of Mr. Miller Mundy, which is really worth a visit, not the less for the exquisite taste of the appointments and surroundings of this rural temple, than for the completeness and nice arrangement of the essentials and accessories for churning, washing, scrubbing, and for storing away the butter when made. It is true that in this case, as in others, the proverb Non curis homini has some force. But the general lesson which a model teaches need not be thrown away, and if we cannot afford Dutch tiles for the walls, glazed tiles set in asphalt for the floor, and rural nymphs and goddesses painted on the ceiling, still it is worth while taking a hint about a northern aspect, a thatched roof, a ventilator in the ceiling, and double lattice windows, into the opening of which wire-gauze blinds may be fitted; indeed the error committed in putting the dairy in the wrong place in house-building is often irremediable. Amongst a fund of information about milk and cream and kindred matters our author gives a full account of the process of making “clotted” or “clouted” cream, and a little further on the Devonshire mode of making butter. The latter is as follows:—

The milk, instead of being set for the cream to rise, is placed in tin or earthen pans, holding about eleven or twelve quarts each. Twelve hours after milking, these pans are placed on a broad iron plate, heated by a small furnace. The milk is not allowed to boil, but a thick scum rises to the surface. As soon as small bubbles begin to appear where a portion of this scum is removed with a spoon, the milk is taken off and allowed to cool. The thick part is taken off the surface; and this is called “clouted” cream; it is a sweet pleasant substance, more solid than cream, but not so solid as butter, and is generally considered a dainty.

It is possible that just at present such quotations may recall the adage of “sour grapes,” seeing that all around us as we write the “foot and mouth disease” is in possession, and the cattle plague—it may be—in prospect. In such case, perhaps, it were more opportune to refer the reader to the notice of the Anglo-Swiss Company's method of preserving milk at their factory on the Lake of Zug (p. 125). Yet it is not waste of time to learn why it is that Irish butter is so inferior in quality and in value to French or Sussex, or indeed to any English butter from dairy counties—to wit, because of “careless feeding, irregular milking, dirty dealing with the milk and with the butter, filthy floors, foul air, tainted pans, and bad packing.” With such a bad reputation “the best ‘Cloumel’ does not command within 20s. a cwt. of the market-price of either Normandy or Dorset.” Could we quote a wholesaler “verbum sap.” on cleanliness in the dairy? Those who are curious or particular as to cheese will find much to interest them in the pages devoted to this subject, which distinguish the different sorts according to the materials used, and explain the terminology which many cheese-eaters use without understanding. Single Gloucester is made of skimmed milk or of the milk deprived of half the cream. It is usually marked for distinction with a heart. Double Gloucester, a cheese that pleases almost every palate, is made of the whole milk and cream. The secret of its excellence is referred to the good quality of the natural grasses in Gloucestershire pastures, and to the nearness of the fields to the farmhouses, so that the milk is but little agitated, and gets set before it is cooled below its proper temperature. “Stilton” is made by adding the cream of one day to the entire milk of the next. Mr. Macdonald is right in thinking that it is finest in flavour when not ripened artificially. The fashionable Gruyère comes from a bailiwick in the Swiss canton of Fribourg, and owes its flavour to the dried herb of “Melilotus officinalis” (p. 156). Cheddar cheese is perhaps the most universally popular; and, this being so, it is satisfactory to know that its making is by no means restricted to the district whence it takes its name. Like Burton ale, it is made in other places, under certain conditions. The system of Cheddar cheese-making has spread to Scotland and America, is established in the Derbyshire Factory, which is an English reproduction of the American system of associated dairies, and depends for success, in whatever region it may be tried, mainly upon care and skill.

Our limits are so nearly reached that we cannot glance at the array of short-horns, middle-horns, long-horns, and polled cattle, which Mr. Macdonald parades in Chapter III. But this is the less important, as former articles on Mr. Bevor's books, and the valuable little volume of Mr. McCombie, have gone over the ground. Our readers are familiar—if they have visited the Islington Hall shows—with the Kylers, the Galloways, and the fine polled breed of “Angus” cattle. They ought still more to be at home with the points of the Hereford, the Devon, and the improved Durham or Teeswater breeds. But, if not, they will find abundance of detail in these pages as to the differentials of these and other breeds. The same may be said of the chapters upon sheep, about which Mr. Macdonald is peculiarly at home. His pros and cons touching the “deer v. sheep” question are well worth hearing. It pays highland landowners better, very considerably better, to put their mountains and glens “under deer than under sheep.” Whilst the 1,320,000 acres of Scotch deer-forest give an annual rent of 71,500*l.*, the same ground allotted to sheep farming would only rent for 55,000*l.* The deer would pay 16,500*l.* more than the sheep. But the loss to the nation thereby would, according to Mr. Macdonald's figures, be not less than 343,000*l.* This is one view of the subject, but it must not be supposed that, even as regards national interests, there is not much to be said on the other side, as will perhaps be apparent when the House of Commons has concluded its inquiry. The question of large and small holdings is connected with this, and is also discussed in this book. We could wish that, especially at the present time, the author had devoted to the “foot and mouth” disease more space than a quarter of a page in the appendix, and more thought than is contained in his meagre and second-hand information on the subject. Perhaps we may recur to his “deer” on another occasion.

ROUGH BUT TRUE.*

MR. VERNON ST. CLAIR is determined that there shall be no ambiguity about his principal personages. Black is black in his eyes and has no high lights, and white is white without shadows. When he sits down to write of a bad person, you feel that he is in earnest and by no means inclined to cheat the devil of his due; and his virtuous people leave nothing to be desired. To be sure, he does condescend a little sometimes to the human weakness of an uncertain central point, and attempts a more complicated set of motives in some of his characters; but this is rare; and even when he does so, we are left rather doubtful as to what would be his own nomenclature, and how he would catalogue his hybrids were he to set about it. His hero, for example, Charlie Harding—where would he be and the scientific classifier of humanity niche him? He is neither saint nor sinner, but between both; a kind of moral quadron of mixed complexion difficult to specify. He is evidently a young gentleman of good impulses, if a trifle feather-brained. He is generous too; for we read of his giving a girl on the platform at Glasgow a sovereign, because his friend, the Hon. Cecil Morecambe, insulted her more grossly than the worst ruffian in St. Giles's would have done; and when he has only three hundred pounds in the world he writes a cheque offhand for a hundred at the Holborn, which he hands to a friend's discarded mistress who has come there to try to get twenty. Frequenter of this soiled dovecote as he is, and intimate with kept women, he is yet a youth of such sweet ingenuousness, such Arcadian simplicity, that, thinking no evil, and apparently foreseeing none to follow from the questionableness of appearances, he takes a young lady home with him to his lodgings to pass the night there, because his first endeavours to rouse the servants of her father's house have failed. These two incidents are refreshing to read for people who, like ourselves, imagine that close familiarity with the peculiar world haunting casinos and the like places would soon take all the innocence out of our boys, and make them cynics, if it left them knowledge. With Charlie Harding it does neither the one nor the other. Read by the light of these two facts alone, we should pronounce this young man to be a gem of the first water; but when we come to his dealings with Miss Esther Jones of the black hair and haughty head, and with her father the tailor, to his coarseness of speech, his obtuseness and want of refinement in his choice of friends and associates, and his extravagance and inconsequence about money, we are thrown off this theory, and hold him to be only paste—very badly done.

If, however, the hero is a trifle vague, no one can have any misgivings about the heroine. To what shall we liken her? I'ure as "snow minaret on Alpine steep"; beautiful as the loveliest flaxen-wigged doll in a bazaar; sweet, if unsubstantial, as a barley-sugar ornament; innocent as a French ingénue; natural as a classic nymph—in her we presumably have Mr. Vernon St. Clair's ideal of practical and rational womanhood. Nothing can exceed the gushing simplicity of this young lady of seventeen. She goes to her first ball, which "the Duke" calls quite affably "a hop"; and after having made many pretty little demurrers about her dress, declaring that she could not wear flowers, and that she had never heard of a dress with roses and lilies on it, she proves her conversational powers by answering, when asked whether she likes Patti or Nilsson best, that "she did not know how Nilsson tasted, but that she was very fond of oyster-patty, and that Jess at home could make first-rate ones." Then she tells Charlie, with whom she is virginally in love, that she had been very unhappy when he went away, and that she had prayed to the Holy Virgin to take care of him and send him back to her. After this she is pulled to pieces by some ill-natured women, who are what they would make her appear; then Miss Crookshank, her chaperon and companion, and the demon of the story, leaves her in the care of Charlie to wrap up and drive home in his trap after four more dances, while she goes home in the carriage alone, drinks neat whisky, sends the servants to bed, and sits up for her charge and Mr. Charlie. When they drive up to the door she will not hear them, rap and ring as loudly as they may; on which Nelly begins to cry as she sits holding the reins in the dog-cart; and Charlie, in perfect innocence and good faith, proposes that she shall go home to his crib—where he has not even a servant—and sleep there. "Oh yes!" said Nelly, clapping her hands with pleasure. "How stupid it was of us not to have thought of it before. And I'll go to bed after all!" she added, smiling through her tears. All this Miss Crookshank hears, rejoicing at the prospect of Nelly's apparent ruin; making sure that the Laird, her father, will not upbraid her, Lavinia, for deserting her charge, nor Charlie for his crime, but that he will instantly turn Nelly out of doors when he hears what she has done, and end by marrying herself. It all comes about as she foresees; and Nelly, greatly wondering what crime she has committed, is sent adrift like a vagrant by the father who, a few pages ago, loves her so much that he cries when he looks at her. Carrying a crucifix under her cloak, Nelly in tears sets off to London, accompanied by Sandy, an old retainer whose "face was covered with dirty red hair, which immediately brought to one's mind an uncared for garden which has become overrun with weeds," and who is the "rough but true" of the title. And there, after sundry actions of a highly ingenuous character, she gets the inevitable cough, is nursed by

Maudie, no longer a frequenter of the Holborn but a hospital nurse, and dies sweetly, forgiving everybody. Before she dies, however, she makes it clear to herself and Charlie that she has been along been in love with him; but, being an ingénue of the weak type, she was ignorant of her own feelings until now. What she asks him to call any little daughter he may have by her name, Charlie finds out that he loves her too, and cries; but he does not seem aware that it was by him she had come to her present state, which also, for a young man who was wont to give diamond lockets to kept women, was a highly creditable feat of the barley-sugar kind. What makes this love passage the more edifying is that Charlie has married Esther, the tailor's daughter with black hair, a transparent body of black crape, and a proud head. Esther in time becomes Lady Prospects, and goes about in a "luxurious carriage bowing and smiling to friends at every step, but without one smile for her father." Not that she does not love him; for we are told elsewhere, with praiseworthy condescension to human weakness, that "this elegant and fashionable girl loved the vulgar, ignorant, hard man, perhaps because he was her father, or perhaps because he was never hard to her, and she only saw that he loved her"; but "if the world," says our author, with that nice discrimination which belongs to him, "knew that that little man who is slaving night and day to add to her wealth was her father, it would look coldly on her, and she would lose her standing."

One of the peculiarities of this book is the facility with which every one sheds tears on the smallest occasion, and at the shortest notice. Nelly of course sobs, weeps, or has tears in her "large," her "glorious," her "great big eyes," nearly as often as she appears on the scene; the Laird, her father, breaks down and cries with noisy demonstration when Miss Crookshank comes into his study and he remembers his dead wife. Then, mastering his emotion, he says in apology, "You see I'm an old man, nigh upon threescore." When the companion, to make matters more cheerful, "after a few minutes of suppressed agony," strikes the notes of an old cottage piano "as if inspired," and breaks out "into that melancholy song 'I Cannot Sing the Old Song,'" she hears "the Laird sobbing as if his heart would break, and then she broke down and buried her face in her handkerchief." This is pretty well for one sitting. The old Laird is always at this kind of thing. He meanders through the pages like a masculine Niobe; and all the other men follow suit. Even old Rough-and-True, with his face like a garden overrun with weeds, cries when he thinks of Nelly's seraphic sweetness. So do the female servants. But one of the most notable bursts of grief is in the case of the maid Marget, who, when she saw Nelly's ball dress, held up her hands, ejaculated "Guid preserve us!" and burst into tears:—

The sight of the pure, white, shimmering, spotless robe on the bed, with a cloud of tulle thrown over the body, and a bouquet fastening it in front, each flower of which conveyed the idea of purity, quite overcame her, and filled her with the same feeling that brings tears to the eyes of most educated minds when they read an exquisitely written tale of woe, or when they hear a song, every sad note of which calls up memories of those dear ones, and of the days that are no more.

We congratulate the author on this passage. What with tears in the eyes of educated minds, and the parallelism between a white satin ball dress and an exquisitely written tale of woe, we know of nothing more delightful in its way. Mr. Jones, the tailor, cries too, because his daughter, who loves him, regrets that he is a tailor and wishes he was not one, as she stamps her feet; the doctor of the district cries because Nelly asks to stay with a little peasant child who is dying of fever, and instead of forbidding, as he ought, consents, feeling "sure she will not catch the fever"—though he would not say why—a rather weak conclusion on the part of a doctor; and though Sandy and the Laird do not blubber audibly, as they sit all night on a large white stone outside the cottage door, they have husky voices, and show other signs of imperfect lachrymal excitement. But it does not occur to either of them to take any rational steps for the protection of the girl they adore in this wise:—

The one with his noble face and dark hair, which was fast becoming silvered, and his stately head and shoulders bent forward, gazing at the light a short distance off, anxious to hear if it were only his daughter's footstep in that sick room; the other, half sitting and half crouching, with his ill-proportioned limbs under him, and his rough, hair-covered head and face bent forward, listening and gazing at the cottage with the rapt devotional expression one sees on the face of a poor pious country Roman Catholic peasant girl, who for the first time enters one of the grand cathedrals with which the Continent abounds, and kneeling before a figure of the Virgin, made perfect by the device of man's hand, pours forth her impassioned petition.

The demon of the story is Miss Crookshank, who makes an undeniable counterfoil to all this ecstatic loveliness of mind and body. She is as vile as the rest are perfect; and from the first schemes, not only to marry the father, who still literally weeps for the loss of his wife, but also, with very unnecessary villany, to ruin the daughter. She succeeds in both enterprises; and offers us the sad spectacle of crime triumphant and left a widow with a handsome income. But we will not dwell on the dark side of this heavenly-minded book. Even snow has its shadows, and barley-sugar is not free from impurities; whereas we accept Miss Lavinia Crookshank as a possible inmate of the same world as that which produces Miss Nelly Campbell and other allied specimens of literary confectionery, scarcely knowing which is the more offensive of the two, garbage or sweetstuff. As a last specimen of our author's style we conclude with his peroration, which we expect will be vastly popular among millinery circles, where it will be pronounced "elegant and heavenly":—

Farewell, thou parent of women! We may meet, Nelly dearest, in that * Rough but True. A Novel. By Vernon St. Clair. 2 vol. London: Stanley Brothers.

home to which thou hast gone; but while I live on in this world, which was so cruel to thee, and I reflect how thou and the friends of my youth are banished for ever from my earthly vision, though never parted from my heart, I cry aloud, in the words of him who knew the human heart so well—

"When I remember all
The friends so linked together
I've seen around me fall
Like leaves in wintry weather,
I feel like one who stands alone
Some banquet-hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled, whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed."

To say anything after this would be to gild refined gold and paint the lily.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON MATRICULATION EXAMINATION.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

TWO CLASSES are held at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in each year, for the convenience of Gentlemen, who are preparing for the Matriculation Examination at the University of London—from October to June, and from March to June.

1. CLASSICAL, FRENCH, ENGLISH, MODERN GEOGRAPHY, and ENGLISH HISTORY—MALCOLM LAING, M.A., Trin. Coll., Cambridge.

2. MATHEMATICS and NATURAL PHILOSOPHY—The Rev. E. S. CARLON, B.A., Trin. Coll., Cambridge.

3. CHEMISTRY—H. E. ARMSTRONG, Ph.D.

Fee for the Course of Three Months ..... 10 Guineas.

Fee for 1 or 2 ..... 5 Guineas.

Fee for 3 ..... 3 Guineas.

The Class is not restricted to Students of the Hospital.

Mr. LAING is prepared to hold a Class also for the Preliminary Examinations in Arts at the Royal College of Surgeons in Apothecaries Hall.

PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC EXAMINATION.

A CLASS in the Subjects required for the Preliminary Scientific Examination is held from January to July, and includes all the Subjects required, as follows:

CHEMISTRY—H. E. ARMSTRONG, Ph.D.

BOTANY—Rev. G. HENLOW, M.A. Cantab, Lecturer on Botany to the Hospital.

ZOOLOGY and COMPARATIVE ANATOMY—W. S. CHURCH, M.D., Oxon, Lecturer on Comparative Anatomy to the Hospital (late Lecturer in Anatomy at Christ Church, Oxford).

MECHANICAL and NATURAL PHILOSOPHY—P. J. HENSLEY, M.D., Cantab, Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge; Tutor to the Hospital.

Fee to Students of the Hospital ..... 4 Guineas.

Fee to others ..... 10 Guineas.

Fee for any Single Subject ..... 3 Guineas.

For further information application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital.

DEPARTMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.

The Hon. Professor, E. J. FORTY, Esq., A.R.A., will deliver an Introductory LECTURE, open to the Public, at 7 P.M., on Wednesday, October 2.

The CLASSES for Drawing, Painting, and Sculpture, will begin at the following morning, at 9 A.M.

The late Mr. FREDERICK LEY, by his Will, founded SIX SCHOLARSHIPS of £20 per annum, each tenable for Three Years, by students of the College, for proficiency in Drawing, Painting, or Sculpture. Two of these Scholarships may be awarded in 1873, the competition for which will be limited to those who enter the Fine Arts Classes before November 16 next, or when open on June 1, 1873, and to those who pass the examination.

Programme, containing full information respecting these Scholarships, and the Regulations relating to the College Scholarships and Prizes, with other particulars, may be obtained on application at the College, Dover Street, W.C.

August, 1872. JOHN ROBBINS, B.A., Secretary to the Council.

THE MEETING OF THE EMPERORS.

THE great meeting at Berlin so long announced and so anxiously discussed is now really taking place. The Czar has arrived at Berlin, and the Emperor of AUSTRIA is close at hand. Naturally the Germans are proud of the occasion, and desire to represent its meaning in the most favourable colours. A semi-official journal has been instructed to declare that the EMPERORS only meet to give a pledge and guarantee of prolonged peace, and that when they see the German troops defiling before them, they will recognize that the German army is the natural champion of European peace. On the other hand, some foreign critics sneer at the meeting and its official interpretation, and think that it can have no peaceful significance whatever. There is in this some exaggeration on both sides. It is absurd to think that two foreign Sovereigns looking at the representative troops of the finest army in the world can see a guarantee of peace in the perfection of the machinery of war. The German army is meant for war, and the only question is to what purposes it is likely to be put. But in a standpoint of war there is some ground for saying that a foreigner may find materials for the anticipation of peace in the contemplation of the German army. For he might reflect, if he pleased, that the army is great chiefly because it is a national army, is in sympathy with the German nation, and is only likely to be used for purposes approved of by Germany. Now the wish entertained by the Germans is unmistakable. It is true that, as regards France, Germany has got all that it wanted, and only wishes to keep what it has got. But this is not all. The Germans have a deep sense of the miseries of war. Proud as they are of what they did in the French war, they have shown themselves singularly free from the intoxication of military glory. They have just given a proof of this by the very quiet and unostentatious way in which they have kept the anniversary of Sedan; and they showed it abundantly in the months following the conclusion of peace by the mode in which they received the troops coming back from France as friends returning home, not as military heroes. It also, we think, shows a misunderstanding of Continental affairs to treat this meeting of the EMPERORS as having no probable influence on the maintenance of the peace of Europe. It is not that the EMPERORS are likely to concert any measures which will make war impossible. It is the outward and visible sign of their meeting that tends to preserve peace. From what quarter does war threaten in Europe? From three quarters; from the desire of revenge in France, from the restlessness of the Danubian populations, and from the intrigues of the Ultramontanes. The meeting of the EMPERORS is a peaceful manifesto in the sense that it quietly proclaims that France is not for the present to be encouraged in its desire for revenge by an Austrian or Russian alliance, that Austria and Russia prefer that the Danubian populations should keep quiet, and that Germany and Italy will fight out their quarrel with the Church undisturbed by Russia or Austria. Let us suppose that the contrary of that which has happened had taken place—that the Emperor of AUSTRIA had persevered in his resolution not to go to Berlin, and that the Czar had held aloof. We should have seen a mounting and clapping of hands there, and in France, and in Ultramontane circles, and among the friends of the Serbs and the Wallachs and other such people, would have picked up their ears and grown impatient. The meeting of the EMPERORS does but maintain things as they are, but then it would those who would like to bring on a rapid change that such a change is not to the immediate prospect of the Emperor of Austria.

Of course France and Russia may quarrel hereafter, but such a quarrel, and of course, would be a very different thing from the present one.

sympathy, are not of eternal force. We may quarrel some day with the Americans, or, to use the language of greater probability, they may choose some day to quarrel with us, although we have now put ourselves on the best possible footing with them, and shall soon perhaps have to pay a good round sum for the restoration of their good opinion. But no one can say that for the creatures of a day terminations of quarrels and new starts in friendship are valueless. And it so happens that the causes of possible war in Europe are, so far as can be seen at present, peculiarly of a kind which can be made immediate or distant according to the wishes of the different great Powers of the Centre and the East. If Russia liked to encourage France, to patronise her, to show special attention to her Government, to set official journals to write up everything French, the agitation and uneasiness of France would be extreme; hopes would be formed of a speedy revenge, and the Rhine would be once more talked of as a natural boundary. If Russia does not mean to stir up France, and does not wish to compromise herself by the foreshadowing of a French alliance, it is the greatest possible kindness to France to let this be known, and the presence of the Czar at Berlin is a means of making it known far more effectual than a hundred despatches or official statements. There are thousands of restless spirits in the provinces of Austria or on her borders that only want a signal from Russia to rush into sedition, revolt, or war, and the assurance given by the meeting of the Czar with the Emperor of AUSTRIA that Russia does not want them to move, is the best possible means of intimating the present views of the Court of St. Petersburg. Southern Germany is agitated by the Ultramontane struggle, and abundant intrigues are on foot to bring about a disruption of the German Empire by fomenting religious dissensions. The King of BAVARIA has even attempted to form a distinctly Ultramontane Ministry. It is true that his endeavours do not as yet seem likely to be very successful; and if it is true that the secret of his change of views is to be found in the irritation with which he viewed the enthusiastic reception given by his subjects to the Crown Prince of Prussia, the real leaning of Bavaria is tolerably well ascertained, and the upholders of the German Empire have not much reason for disquiet. But as it is Austria on whom Bavaria must rely if she ventures to break with Germany, and as it is in Austria that the Ultramontane leaders hope to find the basis of their movements, it is of no slight significance that the Emperor of AUSTRIA, who for years has held aloof from Berlin, chooses as the moment of his first visit the exact period when Prussia, in alliance with Italy, has challenged Rome to do its worst, and has assumed the headship of the forces in Europe that are prepared to do battle with the Papacy.

Critics must criticize, and as the great Prussian Minister is now supposed to be at the bottom of everything that goes on in Europe, a stream of light criticism has been recently poured on Prince BISMARCK. It is unpleasant to think that any one is uniformly successful, and efforts have been made to show that this meeting of the EMPERORS is really a defeat for the German CHANCELLOR. He is even supposed by imaginative Viennese to have formed a deep scheme for embroiling Austria with Rome, and then turning round and making separate terms with his clerical antagonists. The Emperor of AUSTRIA, alive to these perfidious machinations, goes to Berlin to disconcert them. Others are in Prince BISMARCK's present policy an over-estimate, a needless talking thought for the morrow, which reminds one of a similar mistake which, after the event, they have discovered in the policy of the unfortunate MARSHAL EL, whose error has hitherto been supposed to be rather in the direction of insufficient forethought and preparation. Of Prince BISMARCK's secret schemes we know nothing, and believe, if possible, less. That the meeting of the EMPERORS is doomed to be a failure, and that the failure will be due to Prince BISMARCK's not possessing that calmness and easiness of temperament which is happily the portion of English journalists, are assumptions entirely resting on the general conception entertained of the purposes of the meeting. If the main purpose of the meeting is simply that the EMPERORS shall meet, and thereby give a general but significant intimation that they do not wish the disturbing forces they could not in motion to operate, there is every probability that the object of the meeting will be obtained, and Prince BISMARCK will at least have the satisfaction of having allayed an uneasiness that might have interfered seriously with the progress of that prosperity which Germany is beginning to enjoy. If it is supposed that at the meeting the most irritating and delicate questions that could be raised between the three Powers will be raised, discussed in detail, and an attempt made to settle them, no doubt a meeting that began with sunshine might easily end in storm. It is not to be supposed that the EMPERORS will meet, and still less that Prince GORTCHAKOFF, if he comes to Berlin, Prince BISMARCK, and Count ANDRASSY will be placed in close communication, without some political discussion going on. There will be an interchange of views, but in all probability there will be no more. If Russia and Austria wish for the present to be on friendly terms, it will be easy to convey the reciprocal assurance of a good understanding, and it would be foolish to endanger this good understanding at the outset by exacting specific undertakings that the Czechs shall not be stirred up in Bohemia, or that the discontent of Russian Poland shall not be fomented from Galicia. Prince BISMARCK and Count ANDRASSY can confer on the general relations of the Church to the civil power, and on the fortunes of exiled Jesuits, without the former giving any indication of his Machiavellian schemes, or the latter entering into engagements which the influence of the clerical party in Austria would make it impossible for him to carry out. The representatives of all these Powers may cast a glance at Turkey, and at the dangers likely to arise on the one hand from the arming of the neighbouring Christian populations, and on the other from the possible consequences of the intended change in the order of succession to the Turkish throne, without joining in the everlasting battle of the Churches, or fighting over the quarrels of Patriarchs. In short, if the meeting is intended to signify a general disapprobation of the champions of discontent, and to afford an opportunity of friendly conference, it promises to effect its object. If it were converted into an opportunity of settling or trying to settle vexatious details of policy, it would probably end in a collapse; but until Prince BISMARCK has actually made the mistake of giving it a character which would stamp it with failure, he deserves to have credit given him for knowing what he is about, and to have it supposed that, with an excellent game to play, he will not insist on playing a very bad one.

RAILWAY PROSPECTS.

NEARLY all the half-yearly meetings of Railway Companies have passed off in the midst of general and well-founded satisfaction. The attendants on such occasions are comparatively few, except when depression or disaster suggests remonstrance and inquiry. Judicious men of business are seldom inclined to waste their time in listening to statements which they can read at their leisure, nor is it their habit to discuss matters of business in public. If misfortune is impending, it is better to sell shares before an anticipated fall than to foretell and probably accelerate the misfortune. The non-official speakers at railway meetings are generally either persons who are anxious for opportunities of hearing their own voices, or advocates of crochets such as the uniform expediency of closing the capital account. On recent occasions they have for the most part judiciously contented themselves with complimentary phrases addressed to the Directors; and some of them perhaps have discovered that it is rather advantageous than otherwise to invest capital in profitable undertakings. No Board has had better reason for complacency than that of the Great Western, which has within five years advanced from a condition in which preference dividends were paid by deferred warrants to a dividend on ordinary stock of 5½ per cent. In time of adversity numerous wiseacres were in the habit of lamenting over the heavy fixed charges which were supposed to press with unsupportable weight on the resources of the shareholders; and it seemed almost useless to explain that to the owners of an improving property it is desirable to have as few partners as possible in the increasing profits. The large dividends of some of the French railways are earned on a small portion of the entire capital; as much as ninety per cent. of the whole amount having in some instances been raised in the form of bonds or mortgages. The Debt of English Railway Companies is, according to the Companies Act, which has the force of law, limited by the special Acts to one-third of the share capital; but Companies which have formerly paid only small dividends have in almost all cases been obliged to raise capital by the issue of preference shares. The Great Western ordinary stock forms only about a third of the total amount; and consequently every pound of additional net profit, after the fixed charges have been covered, is multiplied by three before it reaches the pockets of the proprietors. The abandonment of the broad gauge on all parts of the system, except between London and Bristol, has removed the principal impediment to the success of the Great Western Railway. When railways were first established the 8-foot gauge was in many respects preferable to the width of 4 feet 8½ inches, which had been adopted for no better reason than that it was the gauge of the old mail-coaches. Improvements in boilers and machinery have since made the narrow-gauge engine as powerful as the broad-gauge engine of thirty years ago; but with full trainloads the working expenses on the broad gauge would still be smaller than on the ordinary line. The fatal objection to the plan was that, as the rival system had got the start, the Great Western lines were isolated for purposes of exchange of goods or minerals. Even in South Wales the greater number of coal lines have been made on the narrow gauge; and consequently they could not for practical purposes communicate with the Great Western. The change of gauge was effected from Didcot to Milford Haven early in the present year in the course of two or three weeks, and without even a temporary interruption of the traffic. The completeness of railway organization was never more remarkably illustrated. There can be little doubt that in a short time the Great Western Company will arrange with the Bristol and Exeter and the South Devon the discontinuance of a system which involves the maintenance and renewal of two different establishments of rolling stock.

The Chairmen of Companies have for the most part said little of the recommendations of the Select Committee on Amalgamation. The London and North-Western and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Companies have anticipated the decision of Parliament by acting on their agreement, and even by throwing the earnings into a common purse, and dividing the profits according to a calculated proportion. The continuance of the practice depends on the unanimous acquiescence of the shareholders of both Companies, as any owner of stock to the smallest amount might by legal proceedings reopen the accounts if he thought that his proportion of dividend was insufficient. In this, as in all similar cases, prosperity sanctions legal irregularity; and contented shareholders in either Company are not certain that they would gain anything by disputing the acts of the Board. Experience shows that sooner or later voluntary agreements to divide profits are dissolved either by the opposition of shareholders or by some dissension between the railroads; yet the possibility of non-compulsory amalgamation is one of the elements of the question which will probably in the next Session be submitted to Parliament. A singular comment on the most definite recommendation of the Committee is furnished by an announcement which appeared in the papers on Monday last. It is stated that the Bridgewater Canals belonging to Lord ELLERRE have been sold to Mr. PRICE, Chairman of the Midland Company, and to Sir EDWARD WATKIN, Chairman of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Company. It is of course possible that the purchasers may have engaged in a private speculation; but it is generally understood that Railway Directors and Chairmen act in similar matters as trustees for their Companies. The Bridgewater Canals traverse the district which is principally occupied by the London and North-Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways, and if they should fall into the hands of rival Companies they will probably introduce an active competition. On the assumption that the canals are to belong to private owners or to an independent Company, no effect will be effected in their relation to the neighbouring railways. Some dissatisfaction will perhaps have been caused by the avowed determination of several Boards to raise their rates on goods in consequence of the great increase in wages and in the price of materials. The cost of coal has doubled within a few months, and in other respects the working expenses have largely increased. Only a portion of the enormous price of iron and steel will involve loss to the Companies, because the value of the old rails has risen in proportion to the cost of renewals. It will soon appear whether the advance of rates is profitable, as it seems to be undoubtedly equitable. Different opinions are expressed as to the economical result of the encouragement which has lately been afforded to third-class passenger traffic. The total number of passengers has of course increased more rapidly than the gross receipts, and the second-class traffic has naturally diminished. There is but one opinion among Directors and shareholders as to the harshness of the Government in levying on third-class first trains the passenger duty from which Parliamentary trains are legally exempt. Unless relief is given, it will evidently be necessary to add the duty to the fare; and it may be remembered that a tax on one kind of locomotion only is utterly anomalous.

The Metropolitan Railway meeting recalled the memory of the painful exposures which were so often made in 1866 and in the following years. While other Companies have been gradually earning larger and larger dividends, the income of the Metropolitan shareholders has fallen from seven or six per cent. to a nominal amount, which, according to the statements of the Chairman, had not been fairly earned. It is impossible not to suspect that the earlier dividends were improperly declared, inasmuch as the traffic of the line has steadily improved, while there has been no exceptional increase of expenses. The reported defalcations of an officer of the Company appear to have been trifling in amount, and to have had nothing to do with the recent collapse. The alleged negligence and miscalculation of the Directors seem to have had more serious results. To permanent holders of stock it may have mattered little whether excessive dividends were declared when the funds of the Company ought rather to have been applied to the discharge of liabilities. In all such cases the main sufferers are purchasers who have been deluded by a market price based on a division of imaginary profits. It seems that large amounts are still due for legal and engineering expenses; and of course the burden will fall on the actual shareholders. The distress which is caused to the poorer classes of investors by the discontinuance or reduction of an income on which they had reckoned can scarcely be estimated by wealthy speculators in stocks and shares. The Metropolitan Railway, notwithstanding its enormous traffic, is subject to the disadvantage of excessive cost of construction, and to competition which compels it to charge low passenger fares. In some places its traffic is threatened by tramways, and omnibuses still convey large numbers of passengers. A serious loss to the Metropolitan Railway, and a great public inconvenience, has been caused by the non-completion of the inner circle of railways, and by the consequent break between the Mansion House and Moorgate Street. The result is that the District Railway, which would, if the original plan had been carried out, have fed the Metropolitan line, now merely competes with it between the City and the Western suburbs. The example of other Companies suggests the hope that the Metropolitan Company may hereafter produce profit to its owners as well as accommodation to the inhabitants of London; but for the present the prospects of the shareholders are not brilliant.

THE FOURTH OF SEPTEMBER.

THE Republic of M. THIERS has this advantage over some of the Governments which have preceded it, that it can forbid political banquets without giving occasion to revolution, or even to riot. Perhaps we shall not be far wrong in setting down the President's objection to celebrating the Fourth of September by a dinner to motives of taste rather than of policy. No doubt some imprudent things would have been said, and it is even possible that M. THIERS might have been placed in the inconvenient predicament of having to adopt or disavow some needlessly decisive assertion that in France, as elsewhere, a Republic is a Republic. But against this is to be set the fact that any display of rejoicing at the fall of a former Government is more or less of a compliment to the Government which has taken its place. The one of the advanced Republican party at present is to associate themselves as far as possible with M. THIERS, and though the Communists are an exception to this rule, it is highly improbable that any appreciable number of them would have run the risk of making a public appearance. With a little address, therefore, the glory of the proposed banquet might have been made to rest on M. THIERS's head, and though nominally held to celebrate the Republic proclaimed in September 1870, they would really have earned to the benefit of the Republic which exists without being proclaimed in September 1872.

Upon grounds of taste and good feeling the objections to these banquets were insuperable. It is quite possible to hold that on the balance of loss and gain France has profited by the fall of the Empire, and yet to feel that, considering the tremendous price she has paid for the advantage, there is something indecent in making the anniversary an occasion of deliberate festivity. If France herself had not accepted the rule of NAPOLEON III., if it had been imposed on her by a foreign enemy, or even by the accidental triumph of a domestic faction, the case would have been different. The nation might then have openly welcomed its deliverance, because, whatever cause for mourning the sufferings it involved had left behind them, it would have had nothing to repent of on its own account. But the Second Empire was not the creation either of a foreign enemy or of a domestic faction; it was the creation of the French people themselves—the offspring of their own shortsightedness, their own cowardice, their own cynicism, their own avarice. The factors which produced it were the democratic worship of names, and the conservative worship of material interests. Republican extravagance generated Conservative terror, and Conservative terror suggested that to surrender liberty was easier and more profitable than to maintain and guide it. The reaction that followed upon the news of Sedan was not a deliverance but a repentance, and even as a repentance it was not of the noblest kind. It was the conviction that the Empire had not paid, that the French people had sold their freedom and never pocketed the purchase-money, that the bargain had proved to be one-sided, that the sovereign they had chosen, though he had been King, Stork to his own subjects, had remained King Log to the enemies of France, that sent the Napoleonic dynasty into exile. There is no matter for festivity in this. There is matter indeed for solid satisfaction that the eyes of Frenchmen have been opened even at such terrible cost to themselves. But this satisfaction is so mixed up with the recollection of the wilful blindness which made such an enlightenment necessary, that it ought to be attended as much by shame as by rejoicing. M. THIERS has too often arraigned his countrymen for the supineness or the complacency with which they accepted the Empire not to feel some scorn for the readiness they now show to dance over their fallen idol as often as an occasion presents itself.

M. GAMETTA, in want apparently of a good plea for not attending any of the proposed banquets, has devised the theory that the 22nd of September, 1792, rather than the 4th of September, 1870, is the birthday of the French Republic. How far he is right as to the former date must depend on the degree in which the present Republic is identical with the Republic of the last century. When the beginning and the end of the Government set up in 1792 are taken into account, the horrors amid which it had its origin, the despotism before which it finally prostrated itself, it is difficult to comprehend M. GAMETTA's desire to mix up the Republic of which he looks forward to being the head with the cloudy glories of eighty years back. The permanent influences of the French Revolution are not to be looked for in the political institutions which it founded. The history of their own country yields French Republicans little but warning. In so far, however, as he objects to the Fourth of September, 1870, being chosen as an anniversary, M. GAMETTA's unwillingness is intelligible enough. That day has none of the characteristics which ought to mark such a date. The proclamation was the work of a chance crowd; the members of the Provisional Government were the men who happened at the moment to be deputies for Paris. In a sense, too, the Fourth of September was the birthday of the Commune equally with the Republic. The men who welcomed the latter with frantic acclamations were ready to overthrow it a month or two later, and actually did their best to overthrow it six months later. Politically speaking, 1870 is only a negative era. It will be known hereafter by what it deposed, not by what it set up. It is only misleading to imply that this or any other past date can supply a real starting point for the French Republic. If that Republic is to become the permanent Government of France, it must be by dissociating itself from the Republics that have existed in France heretofore, by building up the constitutional fabric on a very different base, and completing the superstructure in a very different style. There is good reason to believe that M. GAMETTA thoroughly appreciates the truth of this. But the love of sensational chronology which he shares with so many of his countrymen has led him to link on the Republic that now is with the first essay of the French nation in the same direction. The best chance that the new Republic has is the want of identity with those former Republics which have been tried and found wanting. The attempt to deduce an imaginary pedigree from one to the other would be a serious political blunder if it were anything more than a piece of phrase-making.

While Republicans have been talking about celebrating the Fourth of September, another political party has been making preparation for turning to account an anniversary of a very different kind. The devotees who are thronging the roads to Salette might care but little if left to themselves about this or that form of government. But the clergy who organize and direct the pilgrimage take care that this indifference shall not long continue undisturbed. It would be difficult probably to define precisely where devotion to the POPE ends and devotion to the Count of CHAMBORD begins; but there seems to be a Legitimist character thrown over the whole movement, and a persistent determination to mix up the idea of national glory with the ideas of a religious revival and a BOURBON restoration. Processional hymns and fervid sermons are no bad engines for the diffusion of political excitement, and by all accounts they will be in active use in Dauphiné throughout the present month. The clergy who play this part are in most cases quite guiltless of any engrossing political enthusiasm. In himself the Count of CHAMBORD is no more to them than the Count of PARIS or M. THIERS. Their adherence to the Legitimist cause is explained by the fact that the temporal power of the POPE is in a certain sense bound up with it. They would probably find that success brought disappointment with it, and that if the Count of CHAMBORD were seated on the throne of France to-morrow, the white flag would be no nearer the gates of Rome than the tricolour is now. But at all events the Legitimists are the only party who even pretend that they will do anything for the POPE, and a doubtful chance is better than no chance at all. For the present, therefore, the sympathies of the Ultramontane section of the French clergy are Legitimist, just as in 1849 they were Republican, and a few years later Bonapartist. It is one of the worst consequences of the exaggerated value which the present POPE sets, and has taught others to set, on the maintenance of his position as a temporal sovereign, that in every Catholic country the most active section of the clergy are accustomed to determine their line in home politics by purely foreign considerations.

HOME POLITICS.

EVEN in a time of political quiet and at the duller season of the year there are sure in a country of so much political activity as England to be some questions kept alive and urged by the mere force of circumstances nearer to a solution. Everything seems now as tranquil as possible, and candidates and chairmen are thought to be exceptionally lucky if they can put on the appearance of having something to say. Still politics cannot be forced into the background, and two subjects of paramount importance are every day asserting their claim on public attention. These are the working of the Ballot Bill, and the immediate future of the various classes interested in the cultivation of the soil. It is quite true that the mention of the landed interests immediately calls up the memory of the agricultural strikes that have been going on with varied fortunes for some months; and it is obvious that the strike of farm-labourers is only one of many strikes framed on the same principles and raising the same issues. But the strikes of other labourers have no immediate connexion with politics, or, if they have any, the problem they suggest is mainly the same as that of the working of the Ballot Bill. As this Bill may not improbably diminish general political interest, and deaden the feelings which have hitherto formed the motive power of the two great political parties, it may increase the temporary importance of every special form of agitation, and workmen may view an election chiefly as a means of gaining an economic end, just as different fanatics swoop down on vacant constituencies to push their narrow views about Contagious Diseases or the Permissive Liquor Bill. But in the main the strikes of trade workmen are not at present a source of political capital to either party. The interest they excite is very great and very legitimate, and a writer in Fraser with the well-known initials of "W. R. G." suggests that any merging a well-constructed strike might starve London; to which an energetic contemporary replies that in such a case the duty of the unhappy Mr. BAUCK would be to order bread to be baked and meat to be supplied at the point of the bayonet. It is in real life much more interesting to us to consider whether there is any appreciable chance of finding ourselves among the speculators to eat than to speculate on the chances of the French election, or to ponder over the perplexities suggested by the relations of landlords, farmers, and labourers. But when we are talking of politics we must keep to things that are obviously connected with the action of political parties, and trading strikes are not among these things. Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON has suddenly appeared in the Fortnightly as the prophet and poet of capitalists, denouncing all co-operative nostrums, and arguing that the solution of all difficulties between employers and artisans is to be found in the system of keeping machinery going for sixteen hours a day, with two relays of men, each working eight hours. This may or may not be a sound suggestion, but nothing like a party struggle is connected with it. At Preston the Conservative candidate seemed inclined to make himself popular by advocating a compulsory eight hours system. But a wiser friend, the sitting Conservative member, explained that this could never be applied to adult men, and that he was totally against the interference of the Legislature with the contracts of persons fitted to take care of themselves; and Mr. HOLKER boiled down his views into saying that he only meant that women and children should not be allowed to work for more than eight hours, and that this restriction on their toil should only be imposed if it could be clearly shown that it would cause no damage to trade. This is surely a platform on which the lambs and lions of Preston might lie down together. Politicians of all parties might agree so far, and nothing could show better than the utterance of such a platitude that trade strikes cannot be made to bring grist to the Conservative any more than to the Liberal mill.

But it is quite otherwise with agricultural strikes. It is, indeed, as Lord DEARBY showed last week, quite as easy to utter platitudes about them as about anything else; to say that the labourers will lose as well as gain by them; that prosperity is often followed by reverses; that when people are well off they marry, and that, when pressure comes, to be married often means to be very poor. All this is perfectly true, but so far agricultural strikes are like any other strikes. Those who strike run a risk, and so do those who combat the strike. But agricultural strikes are unlike other strikes in one way, and that is, in their close connexion with politics. They are but one feature of a great change which is rapidly coming over the labourer, the farmer, the landowner, and the distribution of political power. Sir JOHN PAKINGTON, in his very hazy way, showed in his recent speech that he understood this; and it may be added that he was anxious that this great change should be effected under the auspices of the Conservative party. Everything tends to show that the next great battle of parties will be fought over some of the many questions which the present relations of landowners, farmers, and labourers suggest. It ought to be kept in mind that if the Conservatives are to be in office in order to carry those schemes of semi-socialistic benevolence which Sir JOHN PAKINGTON favours, Mr. GLADSTONE will be out of office. Let us suppose that such a state of things now existed, and consider the points which are actually being raised, or which would be raised directly Mr. GLADSTONE was leader of the Opposition, and Mr. DISRAELI was in office to dish the Gladstonites. The landlords have wisely or unwisely raised the large question of local taxation, and it is obvious that one effect of this must be that a controversy will be raised between them and the urban population, and between them and the farmers. The farmers have begun to ask for a tenant-right little short of that granted to Ireland, for leave to destroy ground game, and in some instances for the abolition of primogeniture and entail. The labourers ask for the utmost money value of their daily labour. Sir JOHN PAKINGTON accepts it all. He is ready to please everybody, and he advises the landowners to give up frankly all that they as yet retain of a feudal position, and to view the whole matter from a commercial point of view. The landowner, in short, is to be a resident receiver of rents, asking for nothing more and doing nothing more than if he were a fundholder resident in the neighbourhood. This would amount to a revolution in the habits of rural England, and to a redistribution of political power. Landlords of Sir JOHN PAKINGTON's way of thinking see this, but they think that it may be made to work not injuriously to the Conservatives. Sir JOHN PAKINGTON advised that landlords, farmers, and labourers should all pull together. The landlords—that is the Conservative party—should, in his opinion, welcome the change, but initiate it; and it is quite possible that the Conservative party might endeavour to carry out the measures by which the farmer should be the owner of the soil, and the labourer be placed in a position of uncertainty as to his rights. It is a very hazy way of thinking, but it is a way of thinking that is not without its merits.

ward the Conservatives must give political power to those whom they would thus benefit. They must neutralize the effect of the Ballot by making tenants their political friends, and they must give votes to the labourers. If they do not do this, Mr. Gladstone directly he is in opposition will try either to force them to do it, or to leave the ground open to him for doing it. To "dish" him they must anticipate him, and their history warrants the expectation that they would not throw away the opportunity of winning a party triumph.

English labourers have been treated with much ignorant kindness, and they are proverbially a dull, slow set of men; yet they have learnt, and have dared to strike. English farmers are very dependant on their landlords; they in many cases hold the land at low rents, and they often farm so nearly at a loss that they can scarcely afford to agitate; yet there are abundant signs that they think farming does not under our present laws get a fair chance, and the example of the labourers is sure to tell on them. There is a not inconsiderable chance that the landowners, feeling that the battle is going against them, might acquiesce in a change if it were so shaped as to give them the comfort of seeing their party benefited. But this is not all. The Conservatives, in order to gain and maintain power, must win seats in boroughs and large towns. One very obvious effect of the Ballot will be, as we have said, to make men vote or not according as they feel keenly on special subjects. In the old days voters were kept together, and all that they knew was that they were blue or yellow, and had to vote according to their colours. In the course of time a new form of party organization may be established, and voters may have even less real liberty of choice than they used to have. But in all probability the first few years of the Ballot will be years of party disorganization, when men will not think of party or of principles or of the British Empire, but of something that comes home to their daily life and their own narrow experience. One of the primary subjects of interest to a poor elector will be, how to get enough to eat. He will have bread enough, and he will be told and believe that he has got his bread in spite of the landlords. But he will not have meat enough, and for this he will try to believe the landlords responsible. He will be told that in two ways the landlords make meat dear—by feeding game on crops available for the use of man, and by preventing tenants from embarking capital in cultivation to the best advantage. There is just enough truth, or show of truth, in both statements to make them dangerous, and the qualifications and explanations by which they ought to be accompanied are not very easily given to poor illiterate men on the point of rushing to the ballot-box in order to get cheap meat. The Conservatives will thus, if their prospects of political power coincide in time with a season of scarcity or commercial depression, have an additional motive for coming forward as the real reformers of all that is wrong with regard to the land. Primogeniture and entail will probably be dropped out of the discussion as of remote interest, and as too intimately connected with the existence of the House of Lords to be dealt with by Conservatives. But it is by no means improbable that when the Conservatives have seriously to face the conditions under which they must hold power under the reign of the Ballot, they will see that either they must carry or must let Mr. Gladstone carry measures for giving tenant-right to farmers, for limiting ground game, for compulsory improvement of cottages, for giving the franchise to rural householders, and for relieving the landowner from all burdens beyond those which he would bear if he had an equal income from any other source, apart of course from ancient taxation subject to which the land came into his hands. It is some comfort, however, to think that questions so important as these cannot be settled wholly by the leaders of political parties. The Ballot, which will make parties less powerful, and therefore inclined to bid more highly for support in various quarters, will also allow free discussion a better chance of effecting practical results. What is above all things desirable is that such matters should be calmly and deliberately discussed, with no prepossession for landowners or farmers or labourers, or against them, but with a sense of the vast issues opened, and with an anxiety to bring the fullest experience and the utmost accuracy of thought and language to throw light on the subject of controversy.

SPAIN.

If the small but formidable party of assassins will allow the King of Spain a fair trial, he seems to offer the country a reasonable prospect of a good and permanent Government. He is young, able, and personally brave; he has already proved his attachment to constitutional liberty; and he belongs to one of the best and most vigorous of the royal races of Europe. In his late tour he has had the opportunity of impressing on the population of several provinces the fact of his existence; and the applause which was naturally excited by his escape from imminent danger may perhaps subside into a lasting feeling of good will. Although England has no special interest in the dynasty or form of government which may be established in Spain, the complimentary attendance of Admiral YELVERTON and his fleet on King AMADEO showed excellent taste and judgment. Every nation is for ceremonial purposes represented by its Government for the time being; and the courtesies which were immediately rendered to the King were also addressed to Spain. Fleets and armies are so much more ornamental than any part of the apparatus of civil life, that they naturally form the most conspicuous element in all international solemnities. A review of as many troops as can be assembled is the recognized entertainment offered in Continental capitals to foreign princes; and enormous ironclad ships with broadsides fired by electrical batteries are still rarer decorations of friendly intercourse. It is perhaps better not to inquire too closely into the peaceful attributes of implements of war. Broadbides, and the ships from which they are fired, are contrived for the primary object of killing or drowning any obnoxious foreigners who may require summary treatment at sea; but if they serve the incidental purpose of amusing the leisure of a friendly potentate, it is well that warlike preparations should have a harmless side. According to newspaper reports, Prince FREDERICK CHARLES of Prussia, during his recent inspection of the German positions in France, expressed a sympathetic interest in the artillery experiments which M. THIERS has been instituting at Trouville. It is impossible to carry further the conventional civilities of neighbouring nations, inasmuch as it is understood on all sides that the bronze breechloaders which are hereafter to constitute the French artillery are principally, if not exclusively, designed for employment in future campaigns against the German armies. Fortunately no similar anticipation could have disturbed the exchange of civilities between the King of Spain and the English Admiral. No Armada is likely to attempt the restoration of the true faith in England, nor has any merchant captain in the Spanish Main reason to dread the mythical fate of the unhappy JENKINS.

While the King has been cultivating popularity in the North, the general election has proceeded with results highly favourable to the present Ministry. Señor ZORRILLA has, it may be hoped, kept his promise of abstaining from the irregular interference with the elections which was commonly practised by his predecessors; yet, if the returns are accurately recorded, he has secured a majority of three-fourths of the Congress against all the hostile factions. About eighty Republicans, with a mere sprinkling of Conservatives, are opposed to a compact mass of more than three hundred Progressists or Radicals, who are probably upholders of the present Government. The only defect of the victory is that it looks too complete. SAGASTA had a large majority in the last Cortes, composed of Moderate members, with a certain number of Progressist seceders. It was asserted that the former election had been unscrupulously controlled; but the electoral institutions of Spain must be singularly unsound if a Minister can return a Parliamentary majority in direct defiance of public opinion. There would be much reason to regret the exclusion from the Cortes of TOPETE and SERRANO, who are among the most respectable, if they are not the most popular, of Spanish politicians. The absence or paucity of Carlist members may probably be explained by the late insurrection and its failure. The Republicans, on the other hand, notwithstanding their boasts of approaching triumph, have probably exhausted their strength in returning a fourth part of the Congress. They have undoubtedly proved that Spain's denunciation of a Republic without Republicans no longer describes the state of Spanish opinion. Unless their tactics are profoundly changed, the Republicans will employ their resources in embarrassing the Government, and not in attempting to control its policy. They will consequently be powerless against a united majority; but if the Ministerial party allows itself to be split up by intrigues and factions, the Republicans may easily become formidable.

From the various Pretenders there is for the present nothing to fear. The partisans of DON CARLOS, allied with a large section of the clergy, have learnt by experience, as they might have calculated with the aid of ordinary foresight, that they are at the utmost able to create troublesome disturbances in two or three of the remoter provinces. The numerous priests who put themselves at the head of armed bands displayed at the same time an antique or mediæval sincerity and a hopeless incapacity of appreciating the conditions of modern war or peace. Since PRIAM armed himself to defend burning Troy, more unsuitable and useless defenders have never rallied round the banner of a hopeless cause. The strain which the Carlist bands succeeded in applying to the military resources of the Government would, if it had been more effectual, have only facilitated the success of a Republican insurrection. The adherents of the BOURBON dynasty are better able to calculate political and military chances, and they are not likely to engage in wanton and ostentatious defiance of law and order. The Duke of MONTPENSIER, who is the actual representative of the party, commands no popular enthusiasm, nor would a Regency conducted on behalf of a Pretender who is under age be a form of government likely to attract and impress the general imagination. The only chance of the Alfonsists would be during the anarchy which might probably ensue from the overthrow of the present Government by the Republicans. An exhaustive experience of revolutions might perhaps suggest the convenience of trying once more the dynasty which was overthrown at the commencement of the series. The son of Queen ISABELLA would not, like Don CARLOS, be pledged to the establishment of an Ultramontane despotism, although his mother was one of the most thoroughgoing and unscrupulous of devotees. As the only remaining alternative for a Jacobin Republic, a BOURBON Monarchy might perhaps be found acceptable; but the supporters of Don ALFONSO have nothing to allege against the present KING, except that he is a foreigner; and the Duke of MONTPENSIER is a Frenchman.

The greatest service which ZORRILLA can render to the KING and country is to remain in office for four or five consecutive years. Any tolerable Government is better than incessant change which destroys all authority; and experience shows that in all countries the possession of power tends for the time to produce a certain kind of honesty. It is not the owner of an estate who is ready to pull down the fences. In countries like Spain Kings are, on the average, more patriotic than Ministers, and Ministers than leaders of Opposition or military conspirators. In less than two years King AMADEO has been served by six or seven Cabinets, some of them with an apparent Parliamentary majority. Before his accession PRIAM had maintained himself in power from the revolution to his death; and consequently friends and enemies had become accustomed to trust, to fear, and to obey. To a moderately permanent Ministry it will matter little whether its professed principles are Moderate or Progressist. The Constitution is so democratic that it is impossible to propose any changes in a Liberal direction; and the business of a Spanish Government is not to alter institutions, but to maintain order and to pay its way. Financial difficulties will give way to upright administration and to the material prosperity which will inevitably result from the establishment of confidence and prosperity. The same taxes in Spain now produce double the returns of thirty years ago, because the increase of wealth in Spain has during that time been perhaps more rapid than in any other part of Europe. The financial discredit which renders it difficult to discount the resources of Spain has been exclusively caused by the blunders or dishonesty of incapable financiers. Good faith at home and abroad, combined with internal order, would confirm and accelerate the economic progress of the country. Señor RUM GOMEZ, now Minister of Finance, bears a fair reputation, and it is said that he has already projected some financial reforms. The most difficult problem for Spanish statesmen is presented by the chronic disaffection of Cuba. All parties are equally pledged to retain the colony; but the embarrassment which is caused by the incessant demand for military reinforcements weakens the position of every successive Ministry. Any Government which should lose or surrender the island would instantly fall before the public indignation, though ultimately the separation might perhaps be advantageous to Spain. If the KING and his Ministers were to succeed in crushing or conciliating the insurgents, they would both establish a claim to national gratitude and deliver themselves from their most pressing difficulty. If the rebellion smoulders on, the partisans of ALFONSO will not fail to remind their countrymen that the insurrection was contemporaneous with the Revolution of September.

INCOME-TAX AGITATORS.

DURING thirty years no long interval has elapsed without the recurrence of a more or less active opposition to the Income-tax. Sir ROBERT PEEL, who had freshly in his recollection the repeal of the tax in 1816, neither expected nor wished to obtain a permanent source of revenue when he reimposed it in 1842 for the purpose of reforming the fiscal system. Eleven years later Mr. GLADSTONE undertook in perfect good faith to provide for the extinction of the Income-tax in 1860; and his antipathy to the Russian war was greatly aggravated by the consequent inability of the Government of the day to redeem his pledge; yet no financier has in later years shown greater recklessness in increasing the amount whenever additional resources were required. In the very year which was to have witnessed the abolition of the tax Mr. GLADSTONE raised it from 9d. to 10d., to cover the reductions of indirect taxation under the provisions of the French Treaty, and in compensation for the proposed repeal of the paper duty. The percentage had afterwards gradually been reduced to 4d. in the pound when, under the virtual dictation of Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. DISRAELI and Mr. WARD HUNT, having no financial policy of their own, charged the Income-tax payer with the cost of the Abyssinian war. In 1871 Mr. LOWE, in open disregard of his own avowed principles, extorted a similar benevolence in resentment for the defeat of his match-tax and his perverse attempt to alter the Succession Duty. The relief which has been conceded in the present year will not be felt by contributors under Schedule D before the beginning of 1873; and it is said that, at the instigation of the Government, the surveyors have lately caused much irritation by their vigilant supervision of the returns of income. There are consequently symptoms of a revival of agitation in the form of local associations for the repeal of the tax, and of the occasional reproduction of pamphlets of popular commonplaces and fallacies. That the opposition to the tax is not for the moment formidable may be inferred from the fate of a late motion by Mr. R. B. SHERIDAN, "that the country having declared its irreconcilable hostility and war to the knife against Schedule D, no modification or rearrangement will satisfy the public." The irreconcilable hostility of the House of Commons was represented by a count-out, which can only by a bold figure of speech be described as "war to the knife." Pressed by frequent reiteration of simple propositions in political economy, politicians in and out of Parliament have at last begun partially to understand both the advantages of a certain amount of direct taxation, and the injustice and difficulty of distinguishing for fiscal purposes between one sovereign and another. All adjustments of wages and of profits are made on the assumption that the same amount of money, however wealth may be distributed, has a fixed value, irrespectively of the manner in which it may have been acquired. An Income-tax of 4d. in the pound leaves 19s. 8d. to the taxpayer without affecting the proportions of income enjoyed by different classes. Nevertheless judicious students or practitioners of finance are inclined to avoid as far as possible any of the unpopularity which might result from the strict enforcement of theoretical justice. An equal deduction from all incomes leaves the relative condition of rich and poor unaltered; but the smallest contributors are naturally the most sensitive. The deductions which are allowed to the recipients of small incomes may accordingly be regarded as a pardonable compromise. The total or partial exemption of larger incomes on the irrelevant ground that they are acquired in a particular manner was always indefensible; and it would become scandalously iniquitous at a time when fixed incomes are constantly becoming less valuable in comparison with earnings and profits.

The author of a recent pamphlet on the hackneyed topic has, with an originality not to be found in his arguments, happily thought of reprinting a pamphlet which was originally published in 1816 under the alarming title of Realist, or the Ruined. At that time the resistance was successful, and the widely-spread ruin or distress which followed the termination of the war could consequently not be attributed to the continuance of the Income-tax. The Ministers of the day, including Mr. VANSITTART, whose financial qualifications were not of a high order, committed a grave mistake in proposing to maintain the war percentage of two shillings in the pound. Lord BROUGHAM long afterwards recalled with complacency the effect which he produced in the House of Commons by quoting the words of the Act, which imposed the tax during the continuance of the war, and no longer. Whether it was for the public interest that the tax should be wholly abolished was to him a matter of much less moment than a theoretical triumph. In those days a defeat of the Government was an almost unknown novelty; but Mr. VASSITTART's proposal was rejected by a majority of thirty-seven. It would have been easy to select a dozen taxes then existing which were more onerous, more injurious to trade, and in every sense more objectionable than a moderate tax upon income; but the scheme of the Government had included the payment of a large amount to the Sinking Fund, and Parliament judged rightly in refusing to raise a revenue for the unnecessary purpose of reducing the National Debt. Six-and-twenty years elapsed before a wise and patriotic Minister found himself strong enough to reverse the policy which had been adopted in 1816. A total repeal of the tax would now be as unpopular as it would be unwise; and indeed the agitation for the imposition of additional burdens on realized property is more formidable than any demand for the abolition of the Income-tax; yet writers of pamphlets who are only anxious to procure exemption or relief for traders generally think it expedient to extend their liberality to all the Schedules. In 1816 the patriots who proposed to themselves the alternative of resistance or ruin still clung with their contemporaries to the tradition of the eighteenth century, that property was as sacred as liberty. The majority which cheered Mr. BROUGHAM's quotation of the words of the Act was more deeply interested in rents and dividends than in the profits of trade. The pamphlet which is now republished enters into an elaborate calculation of the loss which the fundholder incurs by the tax, even if it increases the saleable value of his stock. Probably few members of Lord CASTLEBROUGH's House of Commons had troubled themselves with the demonstration that uniform annual payments equalize the tax on an income of two years' or of thirty years' purchase; but a proposal to give a bonus to bankers, brewers, and shopkeepers at the expense of country gentlemen would not have been favourably received. The most interesting part of the old pamphlet is a report of a debate in the Common Council on a proposed petition for the repeal of the Income-tax. The shadowy memory of half-forgotten demagogues is for the moment recalled by the names of WOOD, WATTHMAN, and WHITTLE HARVEY; and it is interesting to learn from Mr. HARVEY's speech that AUGUSTUS, "by subjecting every species of real and personal property to a permanent assessment, finally triumphed over the remaining liberties of his subjects." It would be difficult to persuade a degenerate Corporation in the present day that Mr. LOWE, by means of fourpence in the pound, is about to triumph over the remaining liberties of the QUEEN's subjects in imitation of AUGUSTUS.

Although agitators against Schedule D never listen to the exposure of their blunders by arguments which they would probably be incapable of understanding, they will gradually find that the numerical strength which they substitute for reason has, by recent political changes, become relatively smaller. The dominant portion of the constituencies created by Mr. DISRAELI is entirely indifferent to a tax which affected a perceptible minority of the ten-pound householders. As the writer of the present pamphlet not unreasonably complains, the highly paid artisans of the North systematically evade the payment of their quota of direct taxation. The curate, the clerk, the Dissenting minister, and the widowed annuitant enjoy the privilege of paying for the mechanic who is every day engaged in making the commodities which he produces scarcer and dearer. It is therefore highly improbable that the working classes, though they may be ready to join in any clamour against existing legislation, should seriously concern themselves with the removal or reduction of the taxes upon the profits of traders. If they were consulted they would, as Mr. FAWCETT reasonably apprehends, prefer the removal of the taxes on consumption to which alone they contribute. The Financial Reform Association of Liverpool has been for many years engaged in an unsuccessful attempt to substitute direct taxes on realized property for Customs and Excise. It is but fair to admit that the projectors of the scheme also advocate a small charge upon wages and other earnings; but if their project were nominally adopted as a whole, the workmen would, as at present, contrive to escape from their share of the burden. If trading capitalists, large and small, wish to retain any connexion between the duty of paying taxes and the right of spending public money, they will not engage in a vexatious squabble with the possessors of fixed incomes.

"HIGH CHURCH SECESSIONISTS."

IT has been assumed that if any change either in the matter of the Athanasian Creed, or in the extent of the obligation to recite it in the public services of the Church, is made by Parliament or by Convocation, Dr. PUSEY and Archdeacon DENISON will head a High Church secession. As regards Archdeacon DENISON the assumption seems to be altogether incorrect. At least all that he has pledged himself to do is to "ask to be admitted a member of the Liberation Society." Whether any members of the Church of England as by law established are now members of the Liberation Society we do not know, but there is no more reason, in point of strict logic, why they should not be than there lately was why an Englishman recognizing the authority of the unreformed Parliament should not be a member of the Reform League. Archdeacon DENISON may be exceedingly anxious to see the Church of England disestablished without having any intention of leaving the Church which he wishes to see thus dealt with. Indeed the Archdeacon's affiliation to the Liberation Society, if it ever takes place, will be rather an indication that he does not mean to secede. If he had made up his mind to leave the Church of England, it would be a matter of indifference to him whether it were disestablished or not. As regards Dr. PUSEY, it is not so easy to say whether his words do or do not imply an intention to secede. But before giving them the former meaning, it would be well to be quite sure that they will bear no other. Dr. PUSEY's object, it must be remembered, is to prevent any change being made, and he naturally uses the strongest language which he can employ without consciously overstating the truth. Ecclesiastical revolutions commonly leave a loophole for those whose second thoughts are less trenchant than their first; and should any compromise be arrived at with respect to the Athanasian Creed, Dr. PUSEY may see in it a ground for remaining where he is without any sacrifice of consistency. Meanwhile it ought not to be forgotten that those of the clergy who wish both the Creed and its use to be retained have more reason to complain of its alteration or excision than those who wish the Creed to be altered or omitted have to complain of its retention in its present form. Dr. PUSEY and Archdeacon DENISON only ask that they should be allowed to carry out the contract into which they entered at their ordination. It may be right or expedient that this contract should be modified, but it may fairly be urged that those who assert this cannot feel so strongly upon the subject as those who deny it. The Athanasian Creed is no worse now than it was when the Dean of WESTMINSTER took orders. If he was able to accept it then, he must, unless he will confess that his opinions have changed in the meantime, be able to accept it to-day. Dr. PUSEY, on the other hand, may plead that if the Athanasian Creed had not occupied its present place in the Prayer-Book, he would never have become a minister of the Church of England, and consequently cannot be expected to remain one. A conscience which, having all along accepted the Athanasian Creed, now objects to be deprived of it, is more intelligible than a conscience which, having all along accepted the Creed, suddenly becomes too tender to put up with it any longer.

A writer in the Pall Mall Gazette, who interprets Dr. PUSEY and Archdeacon DENISON's declarations as equivalent to an announcement of a High Church secession on the event of the Athanasian Creed being touched, indulges in some speculations as to the bearing of such an event on the disestablishment of the Church of England. His opinion is that a secession of ultra High Churchmen would do nothing at all to weaken the Establishment, and that it is by no means clear that it would not strengthen it. His reasons for this conclusion are not set out, but as he lays much stress on the unpopularity of High Church views, and expresses great doubt whether Dr. PUSEY would be followed even by so many as several hundred clergymen, it is probable that he thinks the secession in question would only remove a small number of "fire-brands," and thereby make moderate men of all parties still more contented with the Established Church than they are at present. No doubt this is one among the contingencies which an actuary calculating the life of the Established Church would have to take into account. But the writer leaves out of sight some other contingencies which, in our opinion, have a better claim to be noticed. Even if a High Church secession were at first of very small dimensions, it is by no means clear that it would long remain so. Granting that there are but few "ultra" High Churchmen, the presence of such men in the Established Church constitutes a sort of breakwater, the removal of which would be very disturbing to many moderate High Churchmen. So long as they remain in the Established Church their presence acts as a guarantee that if any attack is made against High Church doctrines, it will, as a matter of prudence, be directed against those on which the High Church party are most likely to be divided among themselves. But if once the ultra section of the party is got rid of, the moderate section will be brought face to face with their Low Church opponents; and if the latter have lent their aid to the Broad Church in excising the Athanasian Creed, they will naturally expect their aid in return in modifying the Baptismal Service and the Service for the Visitation of the Sick. It would be natural to seek compensation for those lost in one direction by greater comprehension in other directions. If some men are kept out of the Established Church by the Damnable Clauses, others are kept out by the statements in the Prayer-Book about Baptismal Regeneration and Priestly Absolution. It is hard to believe that if the process of change were once to begin it would stop short at the Athanasian Creed, and if it went further it would certainly involve matters which might lead to a moderate as well as to an ultra High Church secession. Supposing that the moderate High Churchmen were to foresee this from the first—which is not crediting them with any extraordinary amount of wisdom—they might prefer making common cause with the ultras at starting, instead of waiting till they were forced to follow or imitate them afterwards. The writer in the Pall Mall Gazette goes on to say that there is one difficulty about the disestablishment of the Church of England which ought "to make even 'such men as Dr. PUSEY and Archdeacon DENISON hesitate.' This difficulty is 'what is to be done with the property.' It appears to us that, so far as this consideration weighs with High Churchmen at all, it is likely to make them eager to hurry disestablishment rather than anxious to postpone it; assuming, of course, that they believe it will come some day. The debates upon the disestablishment of the Irish Church brought out certain tolerably clear principles by which the work of disendowment was to be regulated. It would be very difficult to disregard these principles if the disestablishment of the Church of England followed at all closely upon the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland. But if the two events should be separated by a very long interval, it is possible, if not probable, that the process in the second case would be carried out in a manner far less favourable to the Disestablished Church. To put the same point in another form, a High Churchman might prefer to see the Church of England disestablished by Mr. GLADSTONE rather than by Mr. LOWE. Or he might think that, if disestablishment took place now, the desire to get the private endowments out of the grasp of the State would induce all parties—as on a much smaller scale it did in Ireland—to lay aside their differences for the moment, and to present a united front until the disestablished Church had got all that was to come to it. How long even this momentary truce might be possible no one can say, but it would be an obvious advantage to all parties that disestablishment, if it comes at all, should come while it is still possible.

The result of these reflections is that it is extremely unsafe to assume either that a High Church secession would be a very small one, or that High Churchmen can be trusted, in consideration of the difficulty of disposing of Church property, not to make common cause with Mr. MIALL. It is a further question, of course, to what extent a considerable High Church secession, or a considerable movement on the part of the High Church party in favour of disestablishment, would tend to promote that end. The writer of the article which has suggested these remarks would probably say that neither incident would do much in this way. In that case he does not, as it seems to us, attach sufficient importance to the impetus that would be given to the assault upon an existing system by the sudden withdrawal of one of the chief practical arguments in its favour. The void left by a High Church secession would not be likely to be supplied by any important additions from without; for the Dissenting objection to the Established Church is rather an objection to an Established Church as such than an objection to the particular Church established in this country. The loss of doctrinal comprehensiveness, therefore, would not be made good by any considerable addition in the way of numerical comprehensiveness, and with the disappearance of that characteristic would disappear the principal reason why a particular religious body should be invested with immense wealth and exclusive privileges. It would be prudent, before attempting to dispense with any part of the fabric of the Established Church, to be quite sure that the exact position of the corner-stone has been ascertained.

THE STRIKES.

THE builders' strike of 1872 has resulted, like the more desperate and embittered strike of 1859, in what is practically a surrender on the part of the men. At the end of a couple of months the carpenters, who originated the movement, have found themselves unable to hold out any longer, and have thankfully accepted the terms which they rejected in the early days of the conflict. They have gained something, it is true—an increase of wages and reduction of hours; but they might have obtained these concessions almost at the commencement of the struggle, and the price they have paid for them can never be recovered. They have consumed their savings and the funds of their Union, and they have also the satisfaction of knowing that they have, by the losses inflicted on their employers, diminished the stock of capital which is available for building operations. The moment chosen for the strike was scarcely opportune, and the demands of the men betrayed their usual ignorance of commercial laws. It was impossible that an increase in the cost of building to the amount of something like 5s. a week for every man engaged could be suddenly and immediately enforced. The rise in the expenses of living justified the application for an advance of wages; but when people want to make more money, they usually expect to have to do more, or at least not less, work in order to obtain it. On the other hand, there are few tradesmen, we imagine, who, being in possession of a commodity which is selling at a premium, are not anxious to dispose of as large a quantity of it as possible while the market is so favourable to them. If the calculations of the carpenters as to the value of their labour had been correct, their natural policy would have been to make hay while the sun shone, and to prolong rather than reduce their hours of work. It was admitted, however, that the supply of labour was actually in excess of the demand, and that the object of the Union was, by restrictions as to hours, piece-work, over-time, &c., to produce an artificial scarcity, and to compel the employment of three men to do two men's work.

It appears from the discussions which have taken place among the workmen, that the strike was in the nature of a dynastic coup; it was intended to divert attention from domestic strife, and to confirm the authority of the leaders of the Union. It was expected that the members of the Union would close up their ranks in the face of the common foe, that non-Unionists would be driven into the Society for the sake of relief during the strike, and that other Unions would heartily co-operate in an assault on the great enemy of labour, capital. Unfortunately everything has turned out exactly the reverse. The carpenters have been deserted by the other trades on whose support they reckoned, and while non-Unionists have not come in, Unionists have shown a dangerous tendency to go out, or at least to pursue their own interests in defiance of the edicts of the Union. The practice of "picketing," or setting bullies to watch a shop from which the workmen have been called out on strike, with a view to intimidate those who continue to work there, has now been brought within the criminal law; and Mr. OGDEN's prediction, that without pickets strikes could not be successfully maintained, has apparently received a practical confirmation. It is announced that "the Society men who went in 'black' during the struggle are all to be summoned before their respective lodges, and unless extenuating circumstances can be shown, such as the pressing wants of a large family, &c., they will be either heavily fined or expelled from the Society." Of course as long as men choose to enrol themselves in a Union, and pledge themselves to obey its rules, they must be prepared to suffer for their disobedience; but it is probable that the result of this contest will suggest some serious reflections both to Unionists and non-Unionists which may not prove favourable to the continued influence of these Societies. It is impossible not to see that if the leaders of the carpenters had had in view only the pecuniary interests of the class they represented they would at once have joined with the masons in accepting the compromise which was offered by the masters. "Nine hours at ninepence" was too much to expect at once, and the masons showed their practical sagacity in being content with eightpence-halfpenny an hour, and a reduction of hours to fifty-two in the summer and forty-eight in the winter. The carpenters are very glad to get these terms now, and they might have had them weeks ago if their leaders' amour propre had not been in question. The idea of reducing the hours in winter is not a new one. It has for years past been repeatedly proposed by the masters, but it suited the policy of the Unions to uphold the system of making men work in the dark, which provided employment and wages without diminishing the amount of work to be done. The strike and lock-out are now alike at an end, but the season for active building operations is almost over, and the masters will probably have neither the inclination nor the means to make work for their men after what has happened. Only urgent and necessary work will be done. The general rise in prices may possibly force up rents in some degree, but it will certainly operate as a check upon building. People will have to be content with such houses as they have, and will be unable to indulge in the costly amusement of constructing new ones.

The conflict which has just terminated in the building trade or trades appears to offer some useful lessons both to masters and men. In this instance, as in the case of the engineers' strike at Newcastle, the terms offered by the masters in the early part of the strike were first rejected, and then after a time accepted, by the men. This would seem to show that the strength of the men lies in the beginning of the contest, and is exhausted as it proceeds. We are not now speaking merely of the capacity of the men for endurance, though of course that too wears out, but of their power over their employers. It is the breaking up of contracts and the suspension of work which employers dread; but when the first shock of this is over, they have time to make their arrangements, and the continuance of the strike is of comparatively little moment to them. They have suffered the worst, and can afford to bide their time. When it comes to be a question of which side can hold out longer than the other, the capitalist is sure to have the best of it. His plant lies idle on his hands, but he has no difficulty in investing his floating capital; he loses, but his losses are nothing to those of his men, whose labour is confined to the one groove, and who cannot distribute it throughout the world as he can his money. However much we may sympathize with the men in certain cases, no amount of sympathy or sentiment will get rid of hard facts like these. Nobody nowadays disputes the right of the men to strike and to exact the highest wages within their reach; the only question is whether the tactics of the Unions really advance the interests of the working classes. The Trade Unions Commissioners who inquired into the subject a few years ago, and who were as a body remarkable for their impartiality and breadth of view, came to the conclusion that it was doubtful whether the net earnings of the workmen connected with Unions had not on the whole been diminished rather than increased through the agency of the Unions; while it was unquestionable that in many cases large bodies of unskilled labourers, in numbers far exceeding those of the Unionists, were rendered destitute by strikes which they had no means of preventing or controlling. Mr. BRASSEY has shown that, without any assistance from Unions, wages have risen in various foreign countries at least as much as in England, and there is no reason to suppose that the present rate of wages in this country would not have been attained under the gradual influence of natural causes. The inference would seem to be irresistible, that the heavy cost of strikes has been a dead loss to the workmen who have to pay for them. In one sense strikes are only a commonplace of everyday life. Everybody may be said to strike who refuses to buy or sell on terms which do not satisfy him; but reasonable people are not in the habit of carrying out their principle to the extent of shutting up shop altogether because they cannot command exactly their own conditions. If they cannot get them in one quarter, they try another; and, if they still fail, they take the best they can get. Co-operation is often, and very properly, recommended to working-men as the most effectual means of promoting their interests; but if they could only be brought to understand what co-operation means, the knowledge of the principle might almost be enough for them without working it out in practice. Co-operation is simply a reversal of the formal relations between the manager of a business and his workmen. Instead of the manager hiring the workmen, and taking his chance of a profit, the workmen hire a manager, pay him a salary, and take their chance of a profit. But no arrangement of this kind will alter the fact that the sort of qualities which are required in a manager have to be highly paid for, and that no manager can do his work properly without the authority of a master. If a workman does not like his employer, let him seek another, or join with his fellows in appointing a manager after his own heart. In this way co-operation supplies a practical solution of the problem; but a strike can never be otherwise than wasteful and mischievous. On the other hand, the master builders appear to have committed the same error as the proprietors of the Newcastle engine-factories, in deferring their arrangements until the strike had actually commenced; if they had offered them earlier, the strike might have been averted, and at any rate the masters would have appealed successfully to the sympathies of a large body of the men. It is amazing that employers should fail to see that the only way to cope with the Unions and to diminish their noxious influence is to render their action as far as possible unnecessary.

A well-known writer on economical questions, who is evidently very much alarmed at the prevalence of strikes, entreats the public to realize without delay and without reserve the full significance of the general disturbance of the labour-market; but the public, we should think, can hardly avoid doing so, seeing that strikes are continually breaking out on every hand, and that some of them press us very closely in our daily wants. The London bakers are now threatening to strike, and have even gone so far as to fix the day upon which they will suspend their services if their demands are not complied with. They ask for an increase of wages to the amount of 3s. each, the reduction of their hours of work to twelve a day, from 4 A.M. to 4 P.M., the abolition of Sunday baking, and the acceptance by the masters of a Union ticket as a certificate of character. The masters are willing to agree to an increase of wages, but object to a uniform advance of 3s. to every workman, good, bad, and indifferent. They accept a day of twelve hours, but hold that employers should be allowed to fix the hour at which the day should begin to be reckoned according to the exigencies of their business. The masters also point out that the baking of Sunday dinners is a great convenience to the working classes, and that the Union ticket cannot be accepted for what it does not pretend to be—a certificate of character. The ticket proves only that the holder pays certain fees to a Society which makes no attempt to ascertain whether he is a skilled workman or a person of good character. It is hard to say whether, considering the sort of work they have to do, and the small mechanical skill required for it, the bakers are or are not badly paid. Their wages seem to range from 20s. to 30s. a week, with allowances in bread worth 2s. or 3s. more, and if the masters, instead of reserving the question of the exact amount of the increase they are willing to give, would put their decision into plain figures at once, this part of the case would probably be settled without much difficulty. There can be no doubt that at present the bakers' hours are exceedingly long and exhausting. In the better class of shops they begin towards midnight and work till noon, and some of them till one or two o'clock next day; but those who have the longer hours are not confined to the bakehouse all the time, for they assist in the delivery of bread. In what are known as "cutting" shops the men are sometimes shut up in close, stifling, foul-smelling bakehouses from eleven o'clock one night till five or six o'clock the next. They are not continuously at work during these hours, for there are intervals when the bread is in the oven and can be left to itself, and then they can snatch a little sleep. But mere confinement in such an atmosphere for so many hours together must necessarily be injurious. Fastidious persons had perhaps better not go too deeply into the mysteries of bread-making; and it may be doubted whether the operatives are wise in raising an agitation which will direct the minds both of their employers and of the public to the substitution of machinery for human labour. There are already several large establishments in which bread is made wholly by machinery, and it is probable that as soon as people begin to reflect seriously on the matter, and to realize the processes by which bread is usually made, they will insist upon the general adoption of machinery. A strike which led to this result, and which also taught people to appreciate the economy and wholesomeness of stale bread, would certainly not be without good results. Unless the bakers of London are in close league with the bakers of the United Kingdom, all they can do is, for a short time, to deprive the public of new bread, smoking hot. The result of a strike in London will simply be to promote activity in provincial bakehouses. The doctors tell us that bread should not be eaten till it is a day old; and bread two or three days old, if properly kept, is not unpleasant to eat. If the bakers carry out their threat, a great diminution of dyspepsia may be looked for.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH ACT IN COUNTRY PLACES.

IN the great majority of cases the Sanitary authorities created by the Public Health Act will have already held their first meeting, or are about to hold it to-day. As regards rural authorities, the 13th section of the Act supplies a very simple test by which to judge how far they are really anxious to discharge their new functions properly. They are empowered to delegate all their powers to a Committee of their own body. Further, the rural Sanitary authority, or the Committee appointed by it, if there be one, may form for any parish within its district a parochial Committee, consisting either wholly of members of the Sanitary authority, or partly of them and partly of such other persons contributing to the sanitary rate as the Sanitary authority may appoint. The creation of the first kind of Committee is an indispensable condition of the prosecution of any really useful work. The new duties imposed upon the Boards of Guardians are too important to be safely committed to a numerous and shifting body. The good that is done by one section of the Guardians at one meeting might, so far as the law allows, be undone by another section at the next meeting. In sanitary matters a Board of Guardians left wholly to itself would too often be like a House of Commons with no Cabinet to prepare measures or suggest the order of business. The creation of Committees of the second kind will be especially useful during the period between the passing of the Act and the next election of the Sanitary authority. The existing Boards of Guardians have been chosen for other qualifications than sanitary zeal or knowledge, and it does not follow that the man who possesses the confidence of the ratepayers in matters relating to the relief of the poor would equally possess it in matters relating to public health. In many parishes, therefore, the additional members of the parochial Committee appointed under this 13th section will be the persons who, if a new election of Guardians had been immediately ordered, would have been members of the Sanitary authority itself. In other cases again—and this reason for the appointment of parochial Committees will be permanent—there will be persons in a parish qualified and willing to take part in administering the sanitary laws, but not equally qualified or not equally willing to discharge the duties of a Guardian of the poor. In working a statute to the efficacy of which the hearty co-operation of the public is especially needful, it is of great importance that those auxiliary forces should be carefully utilized. Every ratepayer in a rural sanitary district may soon know therefore whether the Sanitary authority to which he is subject is in earnest about its work. If it is, he will hear that the Board of Guardians has delegated its authority to a Sanitary Committee, and that this Sanitary Committee has appointed parochial Sub-Committees to act as its agents for all the important parishes within its district.

It may be convenient to specify some of the powers possessed by the Sanitary authority and its agents in country places. The Boards of Guardians are authorised to construct such sewers as they may think necessary for keeping their district properly drained, and they may require the owner of any house situated within a hundred feet of a sewer to make a sufficient drain emptying into it. They are bound to see that all waterclosets and cesspools within their district are so kept as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health. For this purpose their officers may enter any premises and examine the drains, and, in the event of their being found to be in bad condition, the Sanitary authority is to order the owner or occupier of the house to do all that is necessary to put them in proper repair. If the owner or occupier neglects this order, he will be liable to a penalty of ten shillings a day, and the Sanitary authority may, if it pleases, execute the works for him, and summarily recover the cost. Upon complaint of a nuisance being made by any aggrieved person, or by two householders of the parish, the Guardians may order their officer to enter any private premises in order to ascertain whether the nuisance exists, or to execute or inspect any works ordered by the justices for its removal. Under the head of nuisances are included dirty premises, foul pools, ditches, or ash-pits, animals dirtily kept, foul accumulations, overcrowded houses, unventilated workshops, chimneys, other than those of private houses, sending forth black smoke, and gas washings sent into any stream or pond—provided that the existence and the annoying or injurious character of the alleged nuisance be proved to the satisfaction of the justices. As regards the supply of water, the Sanitary authority in country places, besides the power which it possesses in common with the Sanitary authorities in towns of constructing water-works, has the power of supplying its district with water by digging wells or making and maintaining reservoirs; and wherever any house is without a sufficient supply of water, and such a supply can be furnished at a cost of two pence per week, the Sanitary authority is bound to give notice to the owner requiring him to obtain such a supply, or, if he neglects to comply with this notice, the Sanitary authority may itself supply the water and charge him with the prescribed water-rate.

We do not pretend to say that these powers are all that the rural Sanitary authorities will be found to require. But we do say that, if these powers were energetically exercised, the sanitary condition of England would be radically changed. If every village were properly drained, sufficiently supplied with water, and protected against the accumulation or discharge of noxious matters on or from private premises, the chief preventable causes of ill-health would be removed. There is no part of the country in which there is not at the present time an authority capable of taking all the steps which have been enumerated, and in every case this authority, if sluggish or obstructive, can be removed at the next local election by the act of the ratepayers. Wherever in future any Poor Law Union is without water or without drainage, or without, as regards the cottages contained in it, proper provision for health and decency, it will be so at the will and pleasure of a majority of the inhabitants. And as regards some at least of these advantages, even a minority will be able to insist on them. Wherever indeed the Sanitary authorities are only authorised to act, the discretion vested in them by the existing laws is far too unlimited. In some cases it ought to be altogether taken away; in all it ought to be subject within certain limits to the control of the Local Government Board, supposing an appeal to be made to them. There is no need, however, to regret that the Act which has just been passed is not more extensive in its scope. At first all sanitary administration must be tentative, and it is well that the early experiments should be tried by men who wish to see them answer, rather than by men who wish to see them fail. When it is clearly seen what an energetic and intelligent Board of Guardians can do, we shall be in a much better position for determining what every Board of Guardians ought to be made to do. In the meantime it will be very useful to know what a Board of Guardians which is neither energetic nor intelligent can be made to do as the law now stands. For this purpose there is urgent need of volunteer parochial Committees such as were suggested in a former article. Wherever the Sanitary authority does not appoint a parochial Committee of its own, or wherever this parochial Committee shows any indisposition to use its powers, a volunteer Committee ought to be set up. The functions of this amateur organization would be three—to investigate the sanitary state of the parish, so far as a body armed with no public authority can undertake this; to bring such sanitary defects as it can discover before the notice of the Board of Guardians; and to communicate with the Local Government Board in the event of the Board of Guardians not using the powers vested in them, so as to ascertain by actual trial what they can and what they cannot be compelled to do. In some cases the intervention of such a Committee would be sufficient to stir the local authority into action; in some there would be such a clear neglect of duty as would bring the defaulting guardians within the grasp of the central authority; in all cases valuable data for future legislation would be stored up. The first volume of the Second Report of the Sanitary Commission contains a summary of the existing sanitary law which, though far from perfect in arrangement, will yet give the members of a volunteer Committee all the information they want to enable them to play their part. And a more useful part they may be assured it is not possible for persons of capacity and influence to play at the present time.

CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL.

THE metropolitan church of Canterbury has just had a narrow escape from the fate which befel a large part of it just two years short of seven hundred years back. On the one hand, there seems to have been a strange lack of preparation for an accident which is just as likely to happen now as it was in the twelfth century, but which we are now much better able to deal with when it does happen than men were in the twelfth century. On the other hand, a most creditable amount of zeal seems to have been shown by all who were called on to do anything to check the mischief, whether officially belonging to the church or not. Now the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury contrived to be so ill provided for a sudden emergency as the newspapers make them out to have been we will not pretend to say till we hear what they have to plead on their own side. First, then, the preparations seem to have been strangely inadequate; but it is perhaps in capital nature, as in human nature in general, to wait till the door till the steed is stolen. We gather from the newspaper reports that the wooden roof over a large part of the eastern portion of the church has been burned, but that, happily, no damage has been done to the stone vault below. When the fact is itself made this article seems almost needless, and, of course, which we do not remember that it is any great thing at Canterbury, a bad accident to the twelfth century. It is very much the same as one of any other century. As for the wooden roof, we do not remember whether that of Canterbury is ancient or not, but in any case, where there is a stone vault, the timber above becomes a matter of quite secondary value. Of course a great end of a stone vault is as a defence against fire, to provide that, if the outer roof of wood should happen to be burned off, the building may still not remain roofless. A stone vault cannot, in any strict sense, burn, but it is satisfactory to know that in this case it has not been injured by the burning of the wooden roof over it. It is also no small comfort to hear that the precious stained glass is not hurt. The loss would indeed be a loss which could never be made good. A capital, or a moulding, or the tracery of a window can be made now as well as it ever could. All that the modern work lacks is the historical association. But the art of glass-staining is as much a lost art as the art of writing prayers. When we look at the glass of Canterbury and Rheims, or even at the later glass of Fairford and King's College Chapel, and then turn to the stuff which goes by the name of stained glass nowadays, we feel that there are some things in which the skill of man has not gone forward.

The danger from which the mother church of England has thus happily escaped has naturally called men's minds to its past history, and above all to former cases when it has either escaped or suffered from accidents the same as the present. But it is curious to see that the popular mind, on thinking of Canterbury Cathedral in connexion with fires, seems always to go back to that particular fire which caused the eastern part of the church to assume its present shape, and seems quite to forget that earlier, and certainly more memorable, fire to which the present building as a whole owes its being. The fabric of Christ Church, like most other ancient buildings, has gone through perils of fire more than once, and it has more than once suffered far more severely than it has now. Yet the continuous existence of the fabric of Christ Church has been more nearly unbroken than that of most other great churches. No church has gone through more changes in detail, more additions and rebuildings of particular parts, but from the days of Roman Christianity to our own here has been only one absolute rebuilding of the whole minster from the ground. On a dark day for England, on December 6, 1067, the day when William set sail at Dieppe to chastise the English goaded into revolt by the oppressions, not of his own rule, but of that of Odo Bayeux and William Fitz-Osbern, the metropolitan church was destroyed by fire, or at least so greatly damaged that Lanfranc either found it really necessary, or gladly seized the opportunity, to rebuild the church after his own fashion. We shall not be wrong in saying that only two churches have stood on the site which to Englishmen is the most venerable of all sites. The church which was burned in 1067 was, by an unbroken personality, the church of Augustine and of days before Augustine; the church which has just now been saved from a like fate we may without much violence of speech call the church of Lanfranc. Since the days of Lanfranc the church has been altogether changed in detail, but it has never been wholly rebuilt from the ground. The remains of Lanfranc's work which still survive are small indeed; but some remains do survive, and Lanfranc's ground-plan has still a visible effect on the portions and arrangements of the present building. So it was on the other side. The church whose ruins Lanfranc swept away may have retained as few traces of the Roman Basilica whose ruins Augustine preserved as the present fabric at Christ Church now retains of the work of Lanfranc. But the same sort of continuity existed as in the later case. The church had been repaired and enlarged—particular parts may well have been altogether reconstructed—but there was no general rebuilding from the ground. It must have needed a good deal of change to turn any Roman building, whether originally of heathen or Christian birth, into the minster of the German type with an apse at each end which was burned down in 1067. Still the church of Stigand was by personal identity the church of Augustine, and the church of Augustine was the Basilica of the Roman. On either side of the fire which causes the gap between the earlier and the later church of Canterbury there was a famous gap which in each case caused no small damage, but which in either case involved the rebuilding of the whole fabric. The fire of 1067 swept away everything, or at least the Lombard Prioate made it an excuse for sweeping away everything; but everything was not swept away either by the fire of Thurkill's Danes in 1011, or yet by the more famous fire of 1174, whose memory lives in the graphic pages of Gervase and William. Augustine found the Roman Church ruined and forsaken; but not wholly destroyed, using the days of English heathendom. His work was to repair, enlarge, to enlarge and modify, but not to rebuild. But between the Roman and the English Church of Canterbury the connexion is purely physical. The ruined walls of the Roman building were repaired, and the site which had been holy in the eyes of the Roman became holy in the eyes of the Englishmen. But there is no such connexion, no such unbroken identity of foundation, as when British Yng-Vidinn one and the same with English Hæthendun. That in the tenth century came the great reformation under Odo. The roof was renewed; the walls were thickened; the choir being perhaps added or made more lofty—its shape probably assumed the plan and outline which Gervase describes it, but there was no rebuilding from the ground. The walls were and the two old damaged, and destroyed much in the way of things and moveable goods; but this again did not involve any rebuilding. The church of Augustine—the church older than Augustine—went on till the fire of 1067 made it give way to the church of Lanfranc.

The church of Lanfranc was a building of moderate size, small as compared with the gigantic piles which other prelates at London, Winchester, and St. Albans began to build, but were not always able to finish. Lanfranc, on the other hand, finished his church from one end to the other in the comparatively short space of seven years. In size and plan he modelled it according to the church which he had left behind at Caen, the still unfinished minster of St. Stephen. The effect of this model is still to be seen in the present building. Every one who has looked even carelessly at the church of Canterbury must have noticed how short and tall both the nave and what should be the principal transept, that which supports the central tower, seem in comparison with the vast extent of work to the east of them, including that eastern transept which throws the true crossing into insignificance. This is because the nave and transept still keep the ground-plan of Lanfranc's building, though but little of his masonry, and nothing of his ornamental work, now remains. His choir, short after the usual pattern of early Norman choirs, began to be despised even in the time of his successor, and a long eastern limb, including the eastern transepts and towers, arose under Conrad and Ernulf in the first half of the twelfth century. Then came the fire of 1174, and its consequence, the raising, the remodelling, the translating into a more advanced style, but not the complete rebuilding, under the hands of the two Williams—William of Sens and William the Englishman. Lastly, the addition of the chapel commonly known as Becket's Crown completed the building to the east, leaving the nave, transepts, and three towers of Lanfranc's work untouched till late in the fourteenth century. Considerably lower as they must have been than the eastern part, it is almost wonderful that they lasted so long. One of the western towers, as is well known, lasted till our own days; some have thought that it might even have been kept till now. As it is, nothing remains of Lanfranc's work but some small portions of the walls, which have no effect on the general appearance of the building. Still, as we have seen, there has never been any complete rebuilding of the whole church since Lanfranc's time, and the proportions of Lanfranc's building have still a most important effect on the church which now stands. In the same sense then in which we may say that the church of Augustine lasted till the days of Stigand, we may say that the church of Lanfranc has lasted till now.

It is a real matter for national thankfulness that this memorable building has escaped, without serious damage, from a kind of danger from which it has suffered so often; and there is one feature at least in the story of the last fire at Canterbury which deserves to be marked to the special honour of those concerned. It is something to be able to say that the fire of 1872 did not interrupt one of the ordinary services of the church. The reporters seem, some to admire, some to be half inclined to mock or to be a good deal amazed, that, notwithstanding the excitement which was still going on, notwithstanding the smoke with which the church was filled, the afternoon service of the day was gone on with as usual. The Chapter, or such members of it as may have been present, were, we are told, unwilling to break through a tradition of 300 years. We are half inclined charitably to suspect that a figure has been left out, and that we ought to read 1300. We do not remember that anything particular happened at Canterbury in 1572, and 572, though certainly somewhat too early, comes much nearer to the beginning of Christ Church as a place of worship for Christian Englishmen. It can hardly be meant as a literal assertion that divine worship according to the formularies of the Church of England for the time being has never ceased for 300 years within the walls of Christ Church. There is at all events the long vacancy of the metropolitan see between Laud and Juxon to be accounted for. But, however this may be, the metropolitan church has in this matter set a good example to her daughters. That the services of Canterbury Cathedral should have gone on uninterruptedly through such a time, just as the services in Bristol Cathedral are said to have gone on uninterruptedly through the more frightful danger of the famous riots, is indeed a rebuke to those guardians of our minsters who seem to seize on every paltry excuse for stopping the services the maintenance of which is one of the chief ends for which both the buildings and their guardians exist. While at Canterbury and several other churches divine service is never stopped for a single day from one year's end to another, there are others where every trumpery excuse is greedily seized on for condemning the walls of the church to silence. While some churches never need any greater cleaning than can be done in the interval between the ordinary services, there are others whose walls and pillars are held, officially at least, to gather such a preternatural amount of dirt that it needs a week in every quarter, a thirteenth part of the whole year, to get rid of the perpetually recurring stain. The congregation is expected to be on some special occasion greater than can be jammed into the boxed-up choir, and the supposed need of making ready the nave for its rare use is eagerly clutched at as an excuse for stopping choir and organ, prayer and anthem, for a day or two on each side of the special gathering. It is doing of this kind which gladden the hearts of those who would destroy our ancient cathedral foundations, and sadden the hearts of those who would preserve and therefore reform them. But it is at least something to know that in this matter the best church of all has nothing to be said against it.

and one would think that such an example as this might for very shame put some zeal into the hearts of men who are sometimes more careful about receiving the revenues of their offices than about discharging their duties.

A SOCIAL DIFFICULTY.

THE mysterious disappearance of a Russian traveller lately brought out the fact that the German doctors have invented a new form of mental disturbance, which goes by the name of the Wandering Mania. This disorder would seem to be violently epidemic in our own country from the end of July till well on in October, while large numbers of people are sporadically affected by it during the whole year. The social influence of cheap and easy locomotion is a subject which will probably not be overlooked by a future Buckle. The passion for travelling keeps pace with the facilities for its indulgence, and is undoubtedly on the increase. All classes go about more than they used to do. There are men who may be almost said to live in railway carriages. They are in London to-day, in Edinburgh or Paris to-morrow, and the next time you meet them they have just returned from Madrid or Moscow. Even the modest family trip to the country or the sea-side is getting to be measured by months instead of weeks. There can be no doubt that we work harder than our fathers and grandfathers, but our work is more concentrated, and gets packed into shorter hours. There are few men of business who cannot snatch a week or two now and then for a run from home, and something like the Long Vacation has been established in the City as well as in the courts of law. Even as he flies, the traveller, by means of the telegraph and post-office, can hold the threads of his work in his hands, and direct operations, like Moltke, at a distance from the field. But every pleasure has its drawbacks, and travelling is no exception to the rule. A correspondent of the Daily News has drawn attention to one of the difficulties attending the nomadic habits of modern society. He appears to be a resident in one of the Southern suburbs, a region of snug villas and pleasant gardens, where domestic comfort is supposed to be preferred to a position in society, but where the laws of fashion are not absolutely defied. The highly respectable inhabitants of that quarter are not beyond the insidious influence of the wandering mania, and make a point of seeking at the prescribed period that change of air and scene which is supposed to be indispensable alike to health and social reputation. The correspondent had himself resisted the impulse, and was seated at an open window overlooking the deserted gardens of his absent neighbours. He was startled by a remarkable apparition on the other side of the hedge of jessamine and beech which separated his own house from the next. A lady in a low-bodied mauve satin dress, trimmed with lace, came out of his neighbour's house, and walked across the lawn. Another lady arrayed in rose-coloured silk immediately followed, and then a third clothed in blue satin, mystic, wonderful. He knew the inmates of the house were away on a foreign tour, and who could these be? The three ladies had fans; they swept the lawn with their sumptuous trains; and their laughter rang through the air. If in the dim twilight their splendour seemed of fairyland, their gait and voices were hardly fairy-like. They did not tread on air; they were robust in form, and their laughter had a jovial breadth about it suggestive of gay and not particularly refined humanity. While these resplendent creatures were pacing the lawn they were joined by male companions in quite another guise—an old gentleman and two younger ones, all in their shirt-sleeves, and smoking long clay pipes, and two of them armed with pewter pots which they handled freely round. The ladies in rose-coloured silk and blue velvet did not disdain to touch the pewter with their dainty lips. Then as the pots circulated and the dusk deepened the various figures began to move to and fro in an uncertain quadrille on the green sward, the old gentleman whistling gaily and one of the ladies singing. It may be admitted that this strange combination of blue velvet, mauve satin, and rose-coloured silk with corduroys, shirt-sleeves, pewter pots, and long clay pipes was somewhat startling, and that it was natural for the witness of so remarkable a sight to rub his eyes and wonder whether it was an imagination or a reality which he seemed to see before him. He afterwards learned that the servants left in charge of the house by his absent neighbour had invited a few friends to spend the evening with them, and had availed themselves of their mistress's wardrobe to do honour to the occasion. The moral of the story is, he suggests, that ladies who have pretty dresses may as well lock them up securely when they go out of town; but we cannot help thinking that the moral is of a somewhat wider scope, and that it indicates one of the social difficulties of the day.

It is quite clear that when a family goes on its travels it cannot take its house with it. The architecture of the period is not adapted to nomadic flights. Respectable householders cannot strike their tents like the Arabs and silently steal away. They may steal away themselves, but they must leave their houses behind. In some parts of America we hear of houses on wheels, but the invention has not yet reached this country. As a taste for travelling spreads the tyranny of houses becomes more oppressive. The traveller has no fear of not being able to find a home where he is going; the difficulty is to know what to do with the home he has left. Great people with a host of retainers who can at any time divide their households, taking as many servants as they want with them, and leaving behind a sufficient number to watch over the family mansion, of course find no difficulty in the matter. But we are not all great people. Some of us have only three or four servants; a great many only two. The old delusion of going into the country to economize is dying out, but still it is pleasant to get out of town for a few weeks or months, and enjoy the country in a quiet, leisurely way, and many people would allow themselves this indulgence more frequently if it were not for the recurring difficulty of disposing of their houses during their absence; and they would certainly be able to enjoy a holiday more thoroughly if uneasiness on this point could be banished from their minds. If any of the servants are left behind, they find it difficult to resist the temptation of taking a day out, as it is so dull at home, and for the same reason they like to surround themselves with a few old friends, or perhaps casual acquaintances. The absent householder little knows what sort of people he may be entertaining unawares, though it is possible he may discover unpleasant evidence of their character on his return. The pathetic history of Elias Davis conveys a solemn warning to young ladies engaged in domestic service of the danger of sudden intimacy with gentlemen whom they meet "promiscuously, walking in the public street"; but we are afraid the danger is hardly shunned as it ought to be. Servant relieved from the supervision of master and mistress, with nothing to do, and free from all restraints except such as are supplied by their own weak and shadowy moral sense, are apt to seek relaxation in a somewhat reckless manner. A day out without asking leave is so agreeable that it is pretty sure to be repeated, and probably there is a tolerably free interpretation of the limits of a day. It is an instinct of a generous nature to make some return at home for hospitalities received abroad, and when a house has been put under requisitions for festive purposes it is hardly likely that the cellar will be overlooked. Little obstacles in the shape of locks and bolts are only a challenge to a display of strength and skill, and offer a stimulating prospect of ingenious amusement. There is an old story of a gentleman returning from a summer holiday to find his house surrounded by scaffolding, and already picked to a skeleton by an enterprising builder who had taken a fancy to the materials. The anecdote may be regarded as apocryphal, but it is difficult to say why it might not be done to an empty house by a daring rogue who set to work in a practical, business-like manner, making no petty efforts at concealment, but working boldly in the face of the world. It is probable that furniture might be more easily and safely carried off in a heap with a van in the open daylight than piecemeal at night. We have heard of a case where a sale by auction was got up in the absence of a family who had gone off to spend a pleasant holiday, and who came back to find their goods and chattels dispersed under the hammer. In another instance the caretaker who was put in charge of a house, and whose practical mind, like nature, abhorred a vacuum, thought it a pity the dwelling should remain empty merely because the owners were abroad; so she let it out in lodgings on highly remunerative terms, and finished up by carrying off the beds and household linen. There is always a danger lest the caretaker or watchman should prove the Trojan horse that betrays the citadel. If you consult the police as to the best way of providing for the security of your house when you are away, they are sure to recommend you to engage a constable. If you do so, the chances are that you will get an Irishman with a large family, and Irishmen, it is known, are apt to have highly developed opinions on the subject of tenant-right and the intolerable tyranny of eviction. Policemen after all are only men, especially when out of uniform, and their wives do not presume to rise above the ordinary level of humanity. The protection of the house from external attack may possibly prove to be an indifferent compensation for internal riot and all-pervading dirt. On the whole we can hardly wonder if the distracted householder jumps to the conclusion that his house is safer under lock and key, and that he has more to fear from guardians within than from invaders without.

Co-operation is the favourite nostrum for all the difficulties of the day, and one form of co-operation which is obviously applicable to the difficulty we are speaking of would be an exchange of houses. When a family in town wants a change in the country, and a family in the country has longings for a taste of town, it is natural that they should supply each other's wants. As each would have the other's house in its hands, there would be an opportunity for reprisals which might be expected to operate as a wholesome check on any abuse of the privileges of a temporary tenant. The Insurance Companies might also perhaps find it worth while to consider whether they could not afford any assistance in this matter. Why should not one be able to insure a house against robbers as well as against fire? It is clear that people will not be able to indulge their passion for travelling to the full extent unless some means can be devised of putting their houses in safe keeping during their absence. We recollect a lady who had, with her husband, kindly undertaken to look after our modest dwelling, assuming as confidentially that their residence in it had had a most satisfactory effect upon her husband, a bricklayer by profession, who, when he had been there, had spent his Saturday nights comfortably in the drawing-room, and had never manifested the slightest desire to visit the public-house. We felt naturally flattered by the country bricklayer's appreciation of our taste in drawing-room furniture, though we could have wished that his admiration had been vent in tobacco of a somewhat milder and less seducing perfume. We could not help reflecting on the possibilities of philanthropic enterprise in this direction. There is no saying what might not be done to elevate and refine the ranks of honest labour, and to counteract the seductive influences of gross and noxious dissipation, by means of nicely furnished drawing-rooms. The United Kingdom's Alliance might find a profitable investment in this way for some of its 100,000. It is obviously much better to render the working-man proof against the temptations of the public-house than to keep him out of it merely by slamming the door in his face. If the Alliance led the way, private householders might be persuaded to follow their example. It is already the practice of great landowners to throw open their parks and pleasure-grounds for the enjoyment of the public; and some day we may perhaps find a movement set on foot for utilizing the drawing-rooms of the West End during the dead season for the moral culture of the labouring classes.

MOUNTAINEERING.

THE pleasures of Alpine climbing have been described and discussed, praised and vituperated, almost beyond measure; and yet perhaps something still remains to be understood about the precise character of the attraction it offers. Let us define the pursuit of which we speak. We mean, on the one hand, expeditions which involve real mountain work as distinguished from those which, though they may happen to end in attaining a point considerably above the level of the sea, differ only in length and variety from walks in any other hilly country, and are within the compass of the light of nature and a walking-stick. On the other hand, we mean to confine our view to expeditions undertaken with the usual and reasonable precautions. The attractions of mountaineering without guides are far above our comprehension. There is no doubt that any amateur climber who is so minded may very seriously increase the difficulties of any high Alpine excursion, and create wholly new dangers, by undertaking it without guides instead of with them. And so also, if ever he should find climbing without guides to have become commonplace, he might introduce another fresh element by pulling all the nails out of his boots, carrying a horn-tipped, darning-needle-pointed, Zermatt- or Chamouni-branded stick instead of an ice-axe, or by discarding the rope on crevassed snow-fields; and in our opinion with about the same justification. There is a certain amount of real danger about travelling in the higher regions of rock and ice, as indeed there is about all human undertakings. Who can say that the passage of the Strand at Charing Cross is a positively safe operation? But the danger may be either reduced to a minimum by certain precautions now well known—of which acting under the professional assistance and advice of competent guides is one—or raised to a maximum by omitting those precautions. It cannot be denied that a man who travels in the high Alps with guides may contrive to break his neck; but the most that can be asserted of a man who travels without them is that he may possibly be lucky enough not to break his neck. All this, of course, does not apply to that happy amateur whom a few months of a few years spent in the mountain districts by way of amusement have made the equal in skill and knowledge of the men who have been born and bred among the mountains, and the business of whose life it is to know them. If some wonderful combination of genius and circumstances has produced, or is ever to produce, that happy person, let him be his own guide if he likes; and if others choose to put their trust in him, let him be their guide also. In the meantime we shall not believe in his existence without ocular proof.

The pleasure of rational mountaineering clearly has something in it of the nature of intellectual refreshment, something peculiarly fitted to the tone of a mind which has long been compelled to close attention. Of the whole number of Englishmen who year by year resort to the Alps for serious climbing, the proportion whose main occupation is head-work is too large to be set down to accident. A few weeks ago there might have been found in two well-known mountain inns only a few hours apart half-a-dozen masters from our great public schools, and as many Fellows of one of our chief colleges. They must have come there under the influence of some powerful common attraction not to be found elsewhere. It is not the scenery alone, nor the exercise alone, nor even the two together. For it is possible to get both scenery and exercise in many other regions, and even in the lower and middle Alpine regions, with far less trouble and expense than fall to the lot of the real mountaineer. Indeed all the outward and visible circumstances of a mountain expedition are such as one would think designed to be thoroughly repugnant to all the habits of a respectable member of a learned profession. Let us take a tolerably familiar ascent as the type; say the ascent of the Finsteraarhorn from the Eggischhorn. Some fine afternoon, say, three respectable, it may be learned, it may be reverend, Englishmen set forth with the like number of Swiss parsons, not reverend certainly, nor remarkably learned, though more learned probably than the average British elector, but respectable, if respect is due to the true and faithful performance of difficult work. After working round two or three or more shoulders of a hot and monotonous hill on which everything always seems to be round the next corner but one, they arrive at a glacier several miles long and about a mile and a half broad. After walking up this for some hours they scramble up the bank, and find themselves at a rude stone hut furnished with a miniature stove, some more or less cracked pots and pans, and several tattered blankets. A nondescript evening meal follows, in which it is impossible to say whether the elements of dinner, supper, or tea most predominate. Perhaps a schoolboy's tea is the nearest English approach to the democratic repast in which soup, cheese, and chocolate have equal rights. And when the sun has set and the pipe of the just has been smoked out, our respectable travellers betake themselves to such sleep as they may find in a sort of box of hay within the hut; happy if some other party bent on a similar errand does not claim its share of the limited hay and blankets. In that case the "Horren" are packed like sardines, and no one can turn round without setting the whole company in motion. Premature wakings and guesses at the time and the weather interrupt these fitful slumbers. Once a Cambridge man, in such a semi-conscious interval, asked of his Oxford companion, "Is there any time, and if so, what is it?" The ruling passion is strong even in the Kastenstein (a mere cave this, and much less inhabitable than the Faulberg, which is the immediate object of our description). The Oxford man's dialectical nature was roused. He replied, without a moment's pause, "The first part of your question is metaphysical, and I am not now prepared to discuss it. As to the second, which is practical—" here one of the guides struck a light, and the discourse was cut short.

Let us pass on to the morning. In the first glimmer of daylight a caravan of devout pilgrims may be seen descending the stony path to the glacier, with their staves in their hands, or rather ice-axes if they are wise; their loins girded with the good Manila rope which is to be their bond of fellowship and assurance of safety through the day; and their lights burning—no picturesque torchlight, but a very commonplace candle stuck in the neck of an inverted bottle with the bottom knocked out. And so the representatives of English respectability are fairly embarked on their work. They feel their way along the glacier in the cold of dawn, climb hard slopes with hewing of steps and driving in of axe-heads in the light of the morning sun, and flounder down in soft snow in the blaze of afternoon. They climb up strange stairways and chimneys of rocks, they clutch the solid corners with eager hands, and circumvent loose blocks with delicate steps. They bless the ledges of the limestone when they lie the right way and do not bless them when they lie the wrong way, as if it was the Finsteraarhorn's business to adjust its angles to the convenience of human boot-nails. The wind bites them on the ridges and the sun scorches them in the hollows. They disguise themselves in snow-spectacles, and if they do not exactly escape the sun's power by the skin of their teeth, he exacts tribute of the skin of their noses. Nor is there much scope for conversation on the way beyond brief directions and interjections relating to the immediate business in hand. It is difficult at best for men proceeding in single file to keep up continuous talk, and still more difficult when they have no breath to spare and their eyes are occupied in looking for the next footstep. Now and then, indeed, the guides halt for a rapid conference in Swiss German, in which, amidst various verbal and adverbial forms unknown to the written language, Gletscher and Felsen may be caught, and the leader translates the net result for the benefit of the tourist into "Da geht gewiss kein Mensch," or some equally encouraging remark. However, the conclusion of the whole matter is that, after ten or twelve hours, if the snow is in a good temper, thirteen or fifteen if it is in an ill-conditioned mood, the tourists come down again to their head-quarters, dusty without but joyous within, eat, drink, and are merry, and straightway fall to devising how they shall procure another day of similar experiences.

It may seem a paradox to look for an element of moral repose in all this. But when we consider more narrowly what is really meant by repose, perhaps we shall find the thing sought. The strain which falls upon the mental faculties lies not so much in continued action as in the commencement of action. We tire ourselves much more with finding out what we have to do than with doing it. Personal choice and personal responsibility make up the real burden of our daily work. And what we are accustomed to call rest, meaning the rest which can be consciously enjoyed, is not a complete cessation from activity, but a modified activity, in which the strain of initiation is taken off. The mind which has been occupied in looking out for its objects and hunting them down delights in having objects brought before it without any exertion of its own, so that it can use its unexhausted powers in the contemplation of them. This is why entertainments in the nature of a spectacle afford so much more perfect a relaxation from head-work than any other kind of recreation. We may find a change of interest in a book; but we have to decide where to begin and when to leave off; nay, all the little circumstances of arranging our chair and our light bring their little fractions of troublesome self-consciousness. We may go through picture galleries; but we must choose for ourselves from one minute to another at which picture we will stop. But let us be established in view of a good play, or listening to good music, with all the little matters disposed of for us; our seat fixed and numbered, the times of beginning and ending arranged by an invisible providence whose ways we are not concerned to justify, no duties cast upon us, nothing required but the capacity to take and enjoy—and this is true repose. The oppressive sense of our individuality is lost, and, as we contemplate the action of others, a subdued internal current of indulged activity makes us pleasantly conscious of renewed force. Now between full individual activity and the complete repose of looking on a spectacle it is possible to conceive an infinite gradation of intermediate states. The same person may be at the same time an actor in one respect and a spectator in another. We often dream, as has been noticed by Dr. Quincey and others, of looking on at some action from which we stand aloof, but in which we are obscurely aware that our own fate is somehow involved. Something like this finds a place in our waking as well as in our sleeping moments. Whenever we follow with complete acquiescence a course determined for us by a superior external power, we are, in regard to that particular determination, in a position of repose, however much exertion in detail may be required to carry out the plan once laid down.

And now we may apprehend the true specific character of Alpine climbing. A mountain expedition is really a spectacle on a grand scale, in which the traveller is both spectator and actor, but in the first place spectator; and this is part, at all events, of the peculiar charm which draws intellectual labourers to the high Alps for refreshment. The traveller toils indeed with hands and feet; but what is the essence of his toil, the object for which all his muscular movements co-operate? In a general way the main object of the expedition has been chosen by himself, though very often the suggestion of the guide has more to do even with this than might be supposed; but in detail the thing to be accomplished at any given moment is not anything depending on the traveller's own devices, but on the intelligent following of the guide's example. He has nothing else to think of. He may indeed speculate on the way the leader is likely to take, or find a salutary exercise in discovering after the event why his guesses are wrong, as they not unfrequently will be. But command and decision practically rest with the guide; his are the power and the responsibility. The amateur is intensely interested in the result; but his part in the process is confined to observation and imitation; and the more experience he gains, the more fully he becomes aware that this is the case. The nearer he comes to acquiring a kind of sympathetic instinct, the better he learns to recognize the superiority of the native instinct displayed by the born mountaineer. In this respect, therefore, his mental condition is, according to the distinction we have already made, one of repose. At the same time there is everything to stimulate the powers of observation and the pleasures of admiration, while the bodily exertion makes such demands on consciousness as to give ample security against these being overwrought. Thus the mountain traveller combines the enjoyments of a spectator and an actor in a degree which it would be difficult to parallel in any other occupation, and obtains precisely the kind of repose and the kind of activity which are suited to a mind and limbs wearied by sedentary intellectual work. The marvellous fascination of the ice-world is indeed a complex thing, and to explain it fully would require far more physiology and psychology than we either could or would inflict on our readers. But the element we have just pointed out is a vera causa as far as it goes, and may be taken as a partial answer to the question, What is the specific charm of Alpine climbing? which is too often asked by jesting unbelievers who do not wait for an answer, and is perhaps too seldom taken into deliberate consideration by the faithful who are strong in their faith without having any definite answer. At any rate the charm is there, a fact positive and curious enough to demand some kind of explanation; and year by year the craft of those who make Manila rope and ice-axes increases and thrives, and the coffee of fresh pilgrims sends up incense to the Jungfrau and the Finsteraarhorn from the battered pots and pans of that "inn of strange meetings," the Faulberg.

SELFISH MISANTHROPY.

IT is not perhaps easy to draw the exact line between selfishness and what Butler would call an enlightened or reasonable self-love. But in practice we are all of us keen enough at detecting and condemning the vice in others, though there are very few indeed who have a right to cast the first stone. The "selfless gentleman," if not altogether a poetical ideal, is a rare exception in this evil world, but the ideal is universally admired, however seldom it may be attained. There are some faults to which we are inclined to be indulgent in our neighbours, and more than indulgent in our own case. But nobody would care to confess that he was selfish, still less to glory in it, and there is hardly any charge more fatal to a man's character in the eye of the world. But selfishness, like other faults, assumes a good many different shapes, and though it is always, and very naturally, disliked, some of its forms are more odious than others. It is selfish to refuse a kindness to others which you can grant at little cost to yourself, and it is selfish to feel gratification in their sufferings, as the old Romans gloated over a gladiatorial contest or the writhings of Christian martyrs in the lion's fangs. But the second kind of selfishness is considerably more shocking than the first. Nor is the reason far to seek. That we should care much for our own interest is inevitable, and that we should be disposed to cultivate it without due regard for the interest of our neighbours "understands itself," as the Germans say, though it is of course reprehensible. But that we should cherish deliberate malice towards those who have in any way injured us does not seem any necessary part of what theologians call "our corrupt nature," and is usually looked on as peculiarly satanic. And hence it follows that what may be termed the more self-regarding forms of selfishness are the most readily excused, while those which have the least direct bearing on self-interest excite the greatest hatred and contempt. To take an illustration. Both jealousy and envy are selfish feelings which have much in common, and both are sufficiently unattractive; but there is a difference between the two when we come to analyse them. The object in the one case is our own advantage, and in the other the injury of somebody else. The naughty boy in the Rejected Addresses who burnt off the waxen nose of his sister's new doll because he suspected it cost more than his own top, was no doubt an extremely disagreeable and ill-conducted child. But his procedure was perfectly intelligible.

Jack's in the pouts, and this it is,
He thinks mine came to more than his.

And accordingly he adopted what seemed to him the most emphatic method of asserting that his own birthday presents should be at least equal in value to his sister's, with some vague idea probably of providing against any future mistakes in the matter. And in the same way the opreta injuria forma of a young lady who is tormented by the fear of her intended lover being captivated by a rival's fairer face is a perfectly explicable, though not very amiable, sentiment. She is angry with the pretty face because she may herself suffer from its superior charms. For envy no such excuse can be pleaded. It has all the malice of jealousy, without the palliation of self-interest. Nothing can be more utterly despicable than irritation against "the other beavers," not for any injury, real or supposed, which they have done, or are likely to do to us, but simply for being "larger" than we are. Yet this grudge against others for being wiser, or richer, or better, or in some way superior to ourselves, just because of their superiority, is what is meant by envy. It is of course a selfish feeling in the worst sense of the word, but it is prompted by no intelligible motive of self-interest or self-love, for its only gratification would consist in the injuring of others, without any compensating advantage to ourselves. It is precisely the feeling of Milton's Satan towards the happier beings whom he wishes to decoy into a similar condemnation with himself. And yet Sophocles personifies envy as a deity, and the story of Polycrates' ring sufficiently illustrates its recognition among the Greeks as a divine attribute.

And this brings us to that particular form of selfishness, not indeed very common, but far from being wholly unknown in real life, which may be called selfish misanthropy. It is worse than envy, for it has even less colourable pretext of self-regard, and is more purely malicious. The great novelist of the day has familiarized us with a specimen which will be fresh at this moment in the memory of many of our readers. "Old Featherstone," whose funeral stands at the opening of the fourth book of Middlemarch, seems intended for a personified contradiction of the apostolic statement that no man liveth to himself or dieth to himself. He is careful in life and in death not only to consult his own wishes alone, to the exclusion of all other considerations, but to frame his wishes on a plan elaborately calculated to outrage the feelings and frustrate the natural expectations of every one who comes into contact with him. His habits are miserly, but that is not his ruling passion; he is less a miser than a misanthrope. And his misanthropy increases on a nicely graduated scale, according to the closer proximity of its objects, whether by blood relationship or otherwise, to himself. We will not stay now to discuss how far such characters are unmixedly evil. George Eliot leaves us free to think, if we please, that there are good points about them, but adds an unpleasantly suggestive remark that those who think so are more likely to have constructed their estimates a priori than to be judging from actual experience. Without entering on that controversy we may admit that such persons as old Featherstone do exist, and the question is how to account for them. Our readers will hardly require to be reminded of his leading characteristics. Suffice it to say here that he makes two wills, the earlier of which is only less iniquitous than the later, and keeps both by his bedside to the last. In both the bulk of his property is left away from his family, but in the former will legacies of 200*l.* apiece are bequeathed to his near relations, and 10,000*l.* left to a youth whom he had always encouraged to look upon himself as his heir; while in the second—which eventually comes to be acted on—this sum is bequeathed to a stranger, and the rest of his property is devoted to building almshouses, "because," as the document is worded, "I wish to please Almighty God." It must be added that his prolonged hesitation as to which of the two testaments shall be allowed to take effect arises apparently from a difficulty in deciding which will on the whole produce the least attachment and disgust; and that he leaves minute directions about the arrangements of his funeral, to which all those personages are presently ordered to be invited—in some cases from a considerable distance—whose anticipations will be most cruelly disappointed by the reading of the will. In short, he had evidently planned during his lingering illness, over the posthumous luxury of injuring in death those whom it had been through life his principal amusement to insult. He died, as he had lived, in isolation and discomfort, hating every one who approached him, and hated or despised by them, in turn, and knowing well that his enemies would regret his loss. Now what is to be said of this type of character, admitting it to exist? Are we simply to classify it with lycanthropy or wife-hating, as an incurable, though curable, mania? or shall we take refuge in the usual vent in human corruption, and content ourselves with perforce. We vision that such phenomena are natural products of the "wicked heart." It is no adequate solution to say that old Featherstone is a fictitious monster, because, as the novelist is careful to remind us, such monsters do occasionally turn up in the world of fact. The difficulty is how to explain their vagaries in accordance with any utilitarian hypothesis of motives.

It would be impossible to enter at all fully into the question here. But we may indicate generally in what direction an explanation of the seeming anomaly may be most reasonably sought. In the first place, then, it must be remembered that selfishness is of very various kinds, and that the mere selfish instinct is not only distinct from the systematic pursuit of self-interest, but is often quite incompatible with it. We are not now speaking of "self-love," in Butler's sense of the term, in which it is consistent with the purest benevolence, but of the deliberate and exclusive pursuit of selfish gratification, without any regard to the feelings or interests of others except in their bearing on our own. Now it is obvious that for carrying out this programme successfully considerable powers both of intellect and self-control are requisite. Goethe is sometimes quoted as a typical example of this exquisite selfishness, consistently pursued through life, and with eminent success. But Goethe had very exceptional endowments both of mind and character. With the general run of men an exclusive devotion to selfish enjoyment will almost inevitably defeat itself. They may start with the best possible intentions of living for their own pleasure alone, but from the mere conflict of different passions and interests they will fail of realising even their own somewhat sordid conception of happiness. And one of the passions most certain, when indulged, to interfere with its attainment, is the passion of hatred, whether to particular individuals or classes, or, as it sometimes exhibits itself, to mankind generally. There is a certain satisfaction of course in gratifying this passion, as there is a satisfaction in gratifying any other, say anger or lust; but in the long run the gratification is very dearly purchased. That the sentiment itself is not more immoral than irrational may be perfectly true; but it is not the less a fact. We are far indeed from meaning to imply that the Featherstone type of character is a common one; life would become intolerable if it were so. But still the unpleasant old gentleman whose ruling passion—in this instance very strong in death—was to inflict the largest practicable discomfort on the largest number of people in any way connected with him, is a photograph and not a caricature. Of that passion, as of any other, the poet's words are true—crevit indulgens sibi. And although such exhibitions of full-blown misanthropy are hardly less rare than revolting, at least in civilized society, the initial instincts out of which they grow are one fruit of the "struggle for existence"—whether material or social—in which all of us are more or less engaged. There is not much to choose, in a moral point of view, between old Featherstone and Becky Sharp, only Becky had her amiable propensities well in hand, whereas Featherstone was run away with by the strength of his feelings. On the whole, if the latter phase of selfishness is the more openly offensive, the former is more likely to injure its victims. A "good hater," in Dr. Johnson's sense of the word, is generally too much of a rascal to be able to seize his prey.

THE WALHALLA.

IF the English traveller ventured to speak without reserve, he would perhaps say that he sometimes felt slightly bored with modern art in Germany. You come from Nuremberg the old to Ratisbon the older, and hardly have you glanced at the cathedral when you are rushed at by half-a-dozen cabmen who contend for the privilege of driving you off to the Walhalla, which King Lewis of Bavaria, to his own entire satisfaction, built upon a hill six miles from Ratisbon. This edifice, which cost nearly 700,000*l.*, would be called in homely English "King Lewis's folly." It is about as suitable to the place and time where it finds itself as Baroness Burdett-Coutts's Market-hall to Bethnal Green. We commit many absurdities in England, but we could hardly have conceived the grotesque idea of constructing an imitation of a Greek temple in order to place in it the busts of deceased Englishmen who might be deemed to have done eminent service to their country. Something of the kind has indeed been done at the Crystal Palace, and is perhaps contemplated at the Albert Hall; but then we are not responsible as a nation for the proceedings of any company of private speculators. This German edifice, being stocked with mere bodiless heads, might perhaps deserve to be called Golgotha rather than Walhalla. It might be thought that King Lewis had been a professor of phrenology, but that roguery, except perhaps in its very highest forms, is unrepresented in his collection. There is indeed one merit in his design to which Englishmen must be sensible, since it frequently occurs to us to raise a subscription for a statue of some eminent person, and when we have got our statue we cannot tell where to put it. Perhaps the magnificent structure at Bethnal Green, which declines to become a fish-market, might succeed as a Walhalla; and if certain of our public monuments, including what remains of the statue in Leicester Square, were placed there, nobody need see them unless so disposed. Let it not be understood that we speak otherwise than with admiration of the Market-hall at Bethnal Green as a building, still less that we do not appreciate and honour the munificent generosity of which it is a monument; but there is nevertheless the dread—then arrive at determining what is to be done with it. Even

King Lewis's temple might be tolerated if it were likely to stand alone; but Germany has wealth, and believes that she has taste, and her tendency towards classic art, or what is called so, may impose on the English tourist who does the country methodically with his Guide-book an overwhelming burden during the next few years. Let us venture on the extravagant supposition that this country sent an army to the Continent which gained a victory, and that an enterprising artist designed a group representing Cornet Campbell of the Scots Greys returning to the embrace of his family in a busby, surrounded with a laurel wreath instead of the wide-awake which that gallant officer would have assumed at the first convenient opportunity. We should all ridicule the sort of picture which is now exhibited by a townsman of Albert Dürer for the gratification of patriotic Germany. We have heard that the desire for glory is the infirmity of noble minds, and certainly an Englishman would be thought to be as mad as a hatter who desired to add a model of his head to a collection of blocks in a Walhalla. According to the Guide-book this German edifice contains fourteen "warrior virgins of the ancient German Paradise," and six "Victories"; and if the stone and marble work is to be in proportion to the military exploits of Germany, it would seem desirable that the artists of the country should undertake a wholesale order without delay. The modern German soldier might perhaps think that a "warrior virgin" who would condescend to employ herself in perpetually drawing beer would be an agreeable, although unscriptural, element of Paradise. Three centuries ago, when a valiant German died, they carved his shield of arms and placed it in a Gothic church. Now they place a barber's block shaped in his likeness in a Grecian temple. The best of the joke is that King Lewis considered that his curious compound of Greek and barbaric paganism had a Christian character, as is shown by the fact that his sensitive orthodoxy would not concede to Luther a place in his Walhalla. If Luther himself could have been consulted, he might perhaps have declined the honour which was conferred upon him after the King's abdication. There is of course a bust of the inevitable Gutenberg, whose statue produces itself in Germany as frequently as the Marquis of Granby's picture occurs on English signboards; and there are also busts of the early Emperors, including Rudolph of Hapsburg, who has received from his grateful country a very unsteady pair of legs at Nuremberg, and no legs at all in this Walhalla near Ratisbon. The picture of this Emperor in the Town Hall of Nuremberg has the legs placed wide apart, as if their owner found a difficulty in steadying himself, and was holding on to the ball and cup in his right hand under a confused belief that it supported him instead of his supporting it; and if he were an Englishman, we should suppose him to be remarking that he is all right. If the portraits of emperors, like giants in caravans, have a tendency to become groggy in the legs, it may be wise to substitute busts; and doubtless the plan adopted by King Lewis relieves the artist from many difficulties of costume, while it enables Germans of aspiring mind to promise themselves places in the Walhalla more reasonably than an English barrister and his mother and aunts destine him for the Woolstack.

To walk six miles along a muddy road to the foot of the hill on which Walhalla stands would be rather irritating if there were not a certain decency in placing this heathen temple at a respectful distance from the Cathedral of Ratisbon. It happened that the Crown Prince lately visited this ancient and famous city, and of course he was taken to that modern wonder the Walhalla, which he carefully inspected as if he were choosing a nice place for his own bust to occupy hereafter. The reception of the Crown Prince by the Bavarian village on which Walhalla looks down was a much more interesting sight than the blue and gold ceiling and marble pillars of that edifice. These Bavarian villagers can enter Walhalla every day, if they do not prefer, as they probably do, to contemplate the interior of one of their beer-pots; and besides, they would rightly consider that a live Crown Prince was worth any quantity of busts of defunct Kaisers. The Prince and his party were allowed an undisturbed inspection of the interior, while curiosity urged and decency forbade villagers and strangers to peep through the imperfectly closed doors. It may perhaps never be known whether the Crown Prince put on a pair of the hideous slippers by which the feet of ordinary visitors are prevented from scratching the marble floor. But it may be safely said that even Louis le Grand could not have looked kinglier in those slippers. There are assembled outside the temple its custodians in the blue coat of the Bavarian service, some villagers in their best clothes, others as they have left the plough, and two or three tourists. The little army of observation hastily forms itself as the Crown Prince emerges. The village girls "carry" their bouquets. The head man makes ready with his speech. The tourists are at "eyes front." The Crown Prince receives the flowers kindly, while signifying by expressive pantomime his dread of an oration, whereupon the head man takes it out as well as he can in cheering, at which, however, Bavarians are very poor performers. Whatever may be thought of the temple, its position deserves unqualified commendation. It stands on a hill of the height of 313 feet, at the foot of which the Danube flows. Behind the spectator, as he looks south, are the dark hills of the Bavarian forest which here come close upon the river. Before him is the fertile plain of Straubing, through which the shining river winds, and across which on a clear day he may see the snow-capped Alps. On his right are the town of Ratisbon and the hills which shut from his view the upper course of the river and the towns of Ingolstadt and Donauwörth. On his left the same river flows on and on to Passau, Linz, Vienna, Belgrade, and the Black Sea. As the Crown Prince stands on that hill, the visible embodiment of the strength and unity of Germany in the present, the mental contrast is inevitable with the reverses which Germany suffered in the past, when she was weak because she was divided. In 1805, and again in 1809, this hill looked down upon the march of a French army which had defeated Austria as completely as the army of the Crown Prince lately defeated France. On the first occasion Prussia would not, and on the second she could not, help Austria. It seemed as much a law of nature that France should divide and conquer Germany as that the Danube should flow down from the Black Forest to the Black Sea. Once indeed the French were driven from the valley of the Danube, and forced to seek refuge beyond the Rhine, but that was when an English general and army gave cohesion and power to the German Empire. This same hill has seen the scarlet coats of English troopers employed after the manner of the time in ravaging Bavaria to punish the Elector for adhering to France against the Emperor. When we see Bavaria exulting in recent victories wherein her troops bore honourable part, we cannot but remember that when Austria, fighting the battle of Germany, was utterly defeated under the walls of Ratisbon, that city was given to the Elector as the reward of services to France. Three of the greatest generals that the world has seen have led armies over the district upon which now looks down the representative of one of the greatest of military Powers. First came Gustavus Adolphus, against whom Tilly, defending the passage of the Lech, received the wound of which he died at Ingolstadt. On the very next hill to that on which the Crown Prince stands there stood a fortress, which the Swedes, not without help of English and Scottish soldiers, captured and destroyed. After Gustavus Adolphus came Marlborough, whose first great battle with the French and their ally, the Elector of Bavaria, was fought a few miles above Donauwörth. After Marlborough came Napoleon, who twice opened the road to Vienna by victories gained in this same district. And now there stands looking over it a figure which might easily be mistaken for that of an English gentleman inspecting an estate with a view to introducing an improved drainage. The Crown Prince, if not a great general, has borne a prominent part in great military events, and peasants of the district may well boast that one of the foremost men of the age has been to visit them.

WHAT DOES IT ALL MEAN?

FOR some time past a series of mysterious announcements have been appearing in the newspapers with regard to what is called "the movement in the City" for the purchase of the Alexandra Park and Palace. One day we read that "The Governor and Court of the Bank of England, in informing the Lord Mayor that it is against their practice, in their corporate capacity, to join any public Committee, desire to record their fullest appreciation of the importance of the acquisition of the Alexandra Park of five hundred acres in its integrity." We were not aware that it was the practice of the Bank of England to furnish testimonials in favour either of public or private speculations, and we imagine it will soon have enough on its hands if it takes the amusement of the people under its benevolent protection. We suppose we shall next hear that the Governors of the Bank of England desire to record their cordial appreciation of the social value of the Surrey Gardens, and that they cannot too highly express their admiration for Mr. Boucicault's remarkable effort to restore our national theatre. A few days afterwards we were informed that "The Lord Mayor has received letters from Mr. Robert Applegarth (Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, London); Mr. John D. Prior (Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, Manchester); Mr. George Potter of the Dechive; and Mr. George Howell (Reform Association), proffering their heartiest assistance in the work which the Mansion House Committee has in hand for the purchase of the Alexandra Park of five hundred acres, and the dedication of the Palace, with the Park in its grand integrity, to purposes of wholesome recreation." Mr. Applegarth, knowing from his own experience, which appears to have been unfortunate, the "vicious temptations which surround nearly every form of recreation open to the people," effusively wishes "God-speed to so noble an undertaking." Another week elapses, and then it is the Prince of Wales who is brought upon the scene. His Royal Highness, writing to the Lord Mayor through his private secretary, "agrees most cordially with the sentiments expressed by your Lordship on the subject," and intimates cautiously that "he will be prepared, when the proper time shall arrive, to give his best consideration to any application that may be made to him to be present, together with the Princess, at the inaugural ceremony." As far as we can make out, it does not appear that this mysterious movement has got beyond the shadowy stage of "his Lordship's sentiments," or that there is anything whatever for the Prince to "inaugurate." But a letter to the Prince of Wales, with an answer from His Royal Highness, is a good way of keeping the subject before the public, and of coupling his name with the speculation. It is not quite fair to the Prince perhaps that he should be turned to account in this manner for advertising purposes, but it is natural that a letter from the Lord Mayor should receive a civil answer. Other paragraphs have appeared from time to time announcing that various public men and public bodies have expressed their approval of the project of acquiring this Park. There is no reason that we can see why any one should express disapproval of it. There can at least be no harm in buying up the Alexandra Palace, and trying to make it a respectable place of amusement. If a number of people choose to subscribe for the purchase of the property "in its grand integrity," they are perfectly entitled to do so, without asking anybody's approval. It is true the example of the Crystal Palace is not particularly encouraging. It cannot be said to have done very much to elevate the popular mind, and it has certainly not enriched the shareholders; but it is a pleasant enough lounge in its way, and if it were closed a certain amount of cheap and innocent amusement would be lost to the public. There is no reason why there should not be a Crystal Palace to the North as well as a Crystal Palace to the South of London; or, indeed, why there should not be one at every point of the compass, unless it be the sordid commercial reason that, as one Crystal Palace does not pay, it is not at all likely that more than one would be remunerative. Whether the Alexandra Palace did or did not pay, it would be an advantage to the public to have the use of it, and if the speculators lost their money they would have only themselves to blame. On the other hand, if it is proposed—for we must confess we find it difficult to understand exactly what is proposed—to buy up the Park and hand it over to the Metropolitan Board for the benefit of the public at large, that would be a still more laudable project; but then what is wanted to carry it out would seem to be, not expressions of approval, but subscriptions.

There is one thing quite clear, and it is that, whether or not there is anybody anxious to buy the Alexandra Palace, there is somebody extremely anxious to sell it. When the Exhibition of 1862 was closed, the building was removed by the contractors to Muswell Hill. It stands on an imposing site in the midst of extensive grounds, and repeated attempts have been made, hitherto fruitlessly, to turn it to commercial account. Last year there was a grand Tontine scheme, by which subscribers were promised "for themselves and their representatives benefits far exceeding in money value the sums which they had paid for them," while at the same time they were to have the satisfaction of erecting a floodgate that would stem "the torrent of folly, debauchery, and vice, which pours misery and infamy into myriads of England's homes." The combination of large profits, and a strong flavour of gambling, with the indulgence of the highest benevolence, imparted a peculiar character to the project; and some gushing verses were published which were supposed to express the emotions of a "dry City man" on reading the prospectus of this doubly attractive speculation. Statesmen were invited to support it because it would be "an efficient instrument in promoting the aims of sound statesmanship and honest legislation"; clergymen of all denominations on account of its moral influence; and women because "all the sentiments and objects which touch most closely the gentle and benignant heart of woman are consulted and cultivated by the plans of the establishment"; while those who were not sufficiently touched by these lofty considerations were assured that for every pound they invested they would have a good chance of obtaining at the end of fifteen years 10*l.*, with a further chance of carrying off 25,000*l.* in works of art. As a financial speculation the project appeared to be irresistibly tempting, assuming the calculations of the prospectus to be correct; and when the moral gratification of stemming the tide of vice, folly, and debauchery was added, it was almost too good to be true. Virtue in this world is not usually encouraged by heavy dividends, but is more commonly left to be its own reward. We felt bound at the time to suggest that so promising a financial operation might have been left to stand on its own merits, without an appeal to philanthropic sentiments; while, on the other hand, pure philanthropy would be apt to be put out of countenance by the process of gambling for prizes, and the prominence which was given to the pecuniary profits which were to be earned by "winning the masses from vice to virtue." Somehow or other the Tontine scheme does not seem to have answered. Perhaps it fell between two stools; perhaps the financial world was shy of philanthropy as an article of commerce, while the philanthropists resented the imputation that they had an eye to profits; perhaps the whole conception was too much for ordinary minds to grasp. What the reason may have been we do not know, we can only conjecture; but at any rate the fact seems to have been that, in vulgar phrase, the public did not bite. The fly may have been a little overdone, or the fish may have been hopelessly stupid; anyhow the fish did not take to the fly. We gather that the promoters have appreciated our advice and have dropped the financial part of the scheme more into the background. The purchase of the Park is now advocated exclusively on high moral grounds. The appeal is appropriately met by unlimited promises of moral support; but it is doubtful whether a bargain will be struck on these terms.

A pamphlet has been sent to us which at first sight promised to throw some light on the mysterious propaganda. It is entitled The Alexandra Park and the Movement in the City, and is further described on the title-page as "a tribute to the Chief Magistrate, and those who co-operate with him in a great work of good." We are vaguely informed that the object is "to secure the Alexandra Palace for the benefit of the people by means of the people themselves." For more precise particulars, we are referred to the resolutions passed at a meeting in the Mansion House on the 23rd July. We find that the meeting planned itself "morally as well as physically," to make "every legitimate effort to secure the prompt and complete success of the enterprise," and further recommended to "the active co-operation of churches of all denominations an enterprise which, by promoting the rational amusement and healthy recreation of the people, will greatly tend also to promote their moral and physical welfare." The meeting took care to commit itself to nothing more than abstract approval of "the plan of enabling the people to become themselves the purchasers of the Park," and it would appear that its notion of "legitimate and strenuous support" did not include anything so presumptuous as offering to provide part of the purchase-money. The meeting, which, we are told, was "composed of representative men of all classes, in the most comprehensive meaning of the term," simply undertook to exhort the clergy to beg the people to buy the Park for their own use. The Bank of England fully appreciates the noble enterprise. The Prince of Wales has been good enough to inform the Lord Mayor that he will not say he won't come to the opening until he hears whether there is anything to open. "The influence and efforts of such financial and mercantile towers of strength as Sir John Lubbock and Mr. Samuel Morley are pledged to the result." The "good and venerable Sir William Bodkin" approves the scheme, and so does "that able and indefatigable member of the magisterial bench, Colonel Jenkes, J.P." It is obvious that if expressions of approval would buy the Alexandra Palace, it would be bought to-morrow; the difficulty appears to be to obtain support of a less ethereal kind. We must confess that we are at a loss to understand the meaning of this elaborate agitation, this persistent canvassing of public men and ludicrous parade of high moral pretensions. If the Alexandra Palace is to be a show like the Crystal Palace, it will be taken up only on commercial grounds, and with a view to a dividend; if it is to be made over for the free and absolute use of the public, the Metropolitan Board would be the proper body to arrange for its acquisition. Of course it would be a very nice thing for the inhabitants of London to have five hundred acres of pleasant country open to them at a short distance from town; but those persons must be of a singularly sanguine temperament who imagine that it is in the least degree probable that an estate of this kind will be purchased on behalf of the public either out of the rates or by private subscription. It can hardly be supposed that South Kensington has broken out in a new place, but the tactics of the agitation have a curious resemblance to those by which Cole O.B. contrived the aggrandizement of his department. The public men who have lent their names to the enterprise would perhaps do well to make sure that they understand exactly what it means.

PORTUGAL AND CHINA.

OF all European nations, Portugal might be considered the least likely to come into collision with the remotest and most pacific of Asiatic Powers; and some reflection may probably be needful to recall the point of contact at which disagreement could be generated. Macao, the little rocky peninsula guarding the western entrance to the Canton river, is almost forgotten by all but the most diligent geographers as a port once the emporium of our own trade in those waters; but the blue and white ensign of the Braganças still flies over its imposing, even if obsolete, fortifications; and, with an unquestioning fidelity rare in these days of colonial sldgetiness, its "Loyal Senate" annually remits to Lisbon a round sum in aid of the revenues of the mother-country. The flag of Portugal has indeed waved over Macao for upwards of three centuries; but even this lapse of time has not proved sufficient to establish a solid title to the ownership of the peninsula. On the contrary, nothing can be more clearly shown, although the fact may have gained little notoriety, than that China has never yielded her sovereign rights over Macao to Portugal, and that the last-named Power exercises but a precarious authority over the tract which she professes to govern as a colonial possession. From 1557, when the first Portuguese adventurers in the China Sea were permitted to "erect storehouses" upon what was then an island, or barren rocky promontory jutting out from an unfrequented coast, until 1849, Macao was in fact an integral part of China, governed by a Chinese mandarin so far as its native population and its revenues were concerned, the Portuguese being allowed, in virtue of ancient conventions, to regulate their own affairs on a footing similar to that on which the consular and municipal government of ports such as Shanghai and Hankow is at present conducted. Advantage was subsequently taken of the break-down of the external power and authority of the Chinese Government which was effected by our war of 1841-2 to suppress the functions of the Chinese officials, and at last to drive them from their residence at Macao; but simultaneously with the establishment of undivided authority on the part of Portugal over the peninsula came the rise of a British colony on the opposite side of the estuary, when all legitimate commerce at once deserted the shallow and inconvenient roadstead of Macao for the magnificent harbour and abundant facilities offered by the port of Hong Kong.

For twenty years past the business carried on by Europeans and Americans at Macao has been confined almost entirely to a traffic in human merchandise—victims for the sugar plantations of Cuba and the guano diggings of Peru—which has revived on a vast scale the horrors of the African slave trade; whilst the Chinese, who have found under Portuguese rule a convenient footing for illicit traffic, have made the port a depot for smuggling transactions in salt and opium with the adjacent coast. Vessels under every flag but the British—for our own is honourably free from all connexion with this infamous traffic—have been employed in conveying thousands of kidnapped Chinese annually to Havana and the Chincheas; but it is only fair to add that the Portuguese Government have, as a rule, shown exemplary politeness in their acknowledgments of the receipt of remonstrances which from time to time the British envoy at Lisbon has been directed to address to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. These remonstrances, based upon the clearest evidence supplied both by our Consuls in China and by the Government of Hong Kong, have thus far remained practically unheeded, and the yellow slave trade is shown by the latest advices from China to be as flourishing as ever. Appeals are made from time to time by Europeans residing in China for a joint action on the part of the great Powers to terminate, by force if necessary, the scandal which the Portuguese Government is either unable or unwilling to suppress; but, apart from the difficulty of concerting harmonious measures in these days of strife and jealousy, there is weight in the assertion that to the Chinese Government alone belongs the duty of forbidding the further exportation of its subjects from Macao. There can be no doubt that a Chinese blockade of the peninsula would effectually prevent the introduction of the junk-loads of poor creatures who, after a sham process of official inspection, are transferred to the coolie ships and sent across the sea; but considerations of humanity have no weight with such a Government as that of Peking, and it is perhaps secretly not unwilling to see detestation of foreigners kept alive among the people at large by atrocities which at least result in the removal of large numbers of the most indigent and troublesome of its subjects. Although urged again and again to interpose for the prevention or regulation of the coolie traffic at Macao, the Chinese Government has hitherto refrained from interfering in any way with the doings of the Portuguese at that place, notwithstanding that it has firmly refused, when requested, to confirm their lawful possession of the settlement.

Recent intelligence now seems to foreshadow a different line of policy. Where humanity has been powerless to induce intervention, the potent leverage of fiscal necessities seems likely to stir up the sluggish energies of the mandarins; and Macao is threatened at last with the re-assertion of Chinese jurisdiction over its inhabitants. For some years past an efficient squadron of steam gunboats, commanded by European navigators, has been maintained by the provincial Government of Kwangtung, within whose limits Macao is situated; and these vessels, having almost entirely suppressed the once crying evil of piracy, have been employed by the Viceroy in guarding revenue stations established at different points along the coast. Greatly to the disgust of the foreign communities of Hong Kong and Macao, these stations have been so placed as to constitute virtually a cordon of custom-houses around the two settlements; and, although vigorously objected to, the right of the Chinese Government to collect in its own waters a revenue from purely Chinese junks and traders is too obvious to be easily impugned. The Hong Kong Chamber of Commerce has protested, and the Hong Kong authorities have complained, against what is termed a fiscal blockade; but it has been left for the newly appointed Governor of Macao, an official with the high-sounding title of Visconde de San Januario, to attempt forcible measures for breaking through the inconvenient restrictions. His Excellency is reported to have notified to the European commanders of the revenue gunboats that these vessels would be seized by Portuguese men-of-war if after a certain date they still continue watching the ingress and egress of Chinese junks at the approaches to the port of Macao; but the Governor appears to have counted too little upon the reviving energy of the Chinese Administration. If the Hong Kong newspapers may be trusted, this threat was speedily replied to by a notification from the Viceroy of Kwangtung to the effect that any such measure as that contemplated would be followed by an interdict forbidding the entry of all provisions from the Chinese mainland into Macao. As the settlement is wholly dependent upon the adjacent coast for its supplies, this would doubtless prove sufficiently inconvenient to the Chinese residents who constitute the bulk of the population to ensure their migration wholesale; but the interference, once begun, could scarcely stop short of more important results. If, for the mere purpose of protecting a chain of Customs stations, the Chinese Government were brought to take forcible measures against the Administration of Macao, it could scarcely refrain from raising the question of its absolute right to ownership of the peninsula; and other Powers would probably hail with satisfaction a return of Chinese jurisdiction in this quarter. The pecuniary resources of the Macanese officials are almost wholly derived from the coolie trade, supplemented by fees from the gambling-houses which form another notable feature of the settlement; and this being the case, it is idle to suppose that under Portuguese rule any effectual measures for the suppression of the traffic can be looked for. The new Governor, indeed, following the invariable practice of a long line of predecessors, has thought it advisable to appoint a Commission of inquiry into the conduct of emigration from Macao; but how little likely its members are to be unbiased in their deliberations may be judged from the fact, to which attention has been called in Hong Kong, that five out of the six Commissioners derive a substantial portion of their emoluments from the formalities attending the shipment of coolies. Under such circumstances it is not surprising that the main object of the Commission should be supposed to be a defence of the existing system, although its Report commences with the naive observation that the "national and humane efforts of the Government of Portugal"—for the protection of emigrants—"are not duly appreciated by certain classes of the most civilized nations of Europe!" These efforts have long been judged by the only effectual test—the test of results; and every year's experience only adds to the conviction that the authorities of a settlement whose profits are almost exclusively derived from a traffic in human merchandize are not to be trusted with its supervision. An agreement by which the Chinese should reoccupy Macao, indemnifying the Portuguese Government in view of its long de facto possession, would probably be the most feasible mode of solving the difficulty; and by constituting the place an open port on the same footing as the other ports established by treaty along the coast, all reasonable facilities for trade, including emigration, would be secured.

SALTBURN-BY-THE-SEA.

IT is the general rule that the popularity and populousness of a place bring the railway. The Yorkshire watering-place of Saltburn-by-the-Sea is an exception. There the railway has created the place; and because there was convenience of locomotion, houses were built that their future inhabitants might use the line to Redcar. Saltburn is young, being only eleven years old at most; if we except the few squalid cottages on the beach at the foot of Hindcliff, where live the descendants of a former race of smugglers, and some say wreckers. A Quaker-planned place, it is both handsome and respectable so far as it has yet gone; and as no houses are allowed to be built below a certain standard, one may reasonably suppose that it will continue to grow as it has begun. The architecture is noticeably of a more homogeneous and ambitious kind than usual; while a wholesome absence of those vile yards, wynds, closes, courts, which are the true fever-beds of towns and villages, help to make it as exceptionally healthy as the Registrar-General's Report proves it to be.

Saltburn is an airy place. The breeze which comes off the German Ocean is of that uncompromising kind which some think a sea-breeze should be. There is no dallying with Cyprian zephyrs here, as on the Cornwall and Devonshire coasts. It is ozone administered in heroic doses; a kind of hygienic besom that seems to sweep the body clear of any amount of physical fluff, and brace it up from the limp enervation induced by towns. When the North-west wind blows, as it does sometimes with a will, we can imagine no fitter inhabitants of Saltburn than Thor and the Titans to meet it. The immediate view from Saltburn gives little but the sea. Take the windows of the hotel occupying the best position on the Terrace, you see only Hindcliff, with the conical point of Cut Nab, before you, and the sea to the side. But a few steps bring you to one of the pretty spots with which the neighbourhood abounds—namely, the valley of the Saltburn river, where rock and wood and stream seem to carry you off into the heart of the mountains, or to some of the lovely gorges out by Glenthorne and Lynton. Part of the valley has been laid out in gardens, which are one of the features of the place; and as they are prettily planned and nicely kept, as well as grandly situated by natural circumstance, they are not to be despised. On the other side of the gorge, but too far for the smoke to reach, are the ironworks of Brotton. Ironstone is being found in large quantities in the neighbourhood of Saltburn, and works are rising everywhere. You come upon them in all sorts of unexpected places. You follow a pretty road, and suddenly, in a romantic dell, set among the trees which have been cleared just enough to allow of their erection, the black smoke eddying over the tops of ash and elm, and showers of soot falling on the brackens and wild flowers below, appears a group of works and cottages, with a tramway flung off like a thread from a reel. Everywhere indeed the strange union of industry and picturesque beauty, of machinery and nature, strikes one. A fine suspension bridge is thrown over one gorge; a noble viaduct makes another into a safe highway; railroads right and left, and north and south, score the face of the country like a gridiron; steam-ploughs turn the furrows in the fields; reaping-machines whirl through the golden corn, and destroy the partridge shooting if they fill the farmer's strawyard; tall chimneys and black iron furnaces justify the mines that are sunk in all directions, honeycombing the ground to such an extent that whole tracts have to be left untilld where the branching shafts and galleries have rendered the crust insecure; and all this in the midst of a country which only the other day was agricultural of the simplest type, or seafaring of a still ruder kind.

Some places, however, are still left untouched, and their people unaltered by modern ways. At Staithes, which we may call the Clevelly of the Cleveland coast, people live as their fathers lived by drying cod and ling, &c. which they set up on the tops of stakes all along the cliffs and fields like hedgerows. At a distance you might fancy they were hawthornes in full bloom; but before your eyes are instructed your nose informs you; and the lesson is not delicious. Staithes itself is a universal pigstye; and of the two sets of denizens, perhaps the brutes are a trifle cleaner than the human. It has its little claim to historic notoriety from the fact that Cook was apprenticed there to a haberdashier and grocer; but happening to take a fancy to a new shilling with the initials of the South Sea Company on it (S. S. C.), and exchanging it for one of his own, he was suspected of theft, which so disgusted him that he either broke his indentures or got them cancelled, and went off to Whitby, thence to sea, and in fulness of time to his famous discoveries. There are many Cook reminiscences to be found here and there. In the museum at Kirkleatham are shoes and other things belonging to the family; and it is quite a "great fact" at Marske, that James Cook the father, a day labourer of the period, is buried in the old churchyard. Kirkleatham again is an unchanged relic of former days. The hospital, or almshouse and school, for ten old men and ten old women, ten boys and ten girls, built by Sir William Turner in the time of Charles II., still exists in much the same state and on much the same conditions as of old. There is not a prettier, sleepier spot to be found in England than just that angle where the Hall gates and grounds face the old stone wall of the churchyard, and the leafy road leads away to Redcar. It is one of those little bits which remind one of nothing so much as a river pool, stagnant and unrippled, while the body of water is foaming and spluttering over the stones.

There are two or three fine fragments of ruins left standing within a walk of Saltburn. Kirtton Castle and Guisborough Priory, where the Bruce had his holding, are among the most beautiful. The latter has quite a respectable legend attached to it. The visitor is told that a subterranean way, now closed up, formerly led from the Priory to Plantation Field in Tocketts; and midway was a kist of gold guarded by a raven, who was of course the Evil One in disguise. One unfortunate who had got so far on his journey was set upon by this devil and nearly killed. But we imagine that the seeker would find neither kist nor gold, neither raven nor demon, now; and that the whole thing died out with smuggling. They were great smugglers in these parts in the days when a good trade was to be made out of contraband, and they used all sorts of queer hiding-places. The clerk at Staithes made the church-tower do duty for his vaults; and the formation of the country materially helped the bold Will Watches of the time. To be sure nature revenged insulted justice and the revenue, by eating out their names from their tombstones when they had been caught by death red-handed. A tombstone at Marske, sacred to the memory of a crew of smugglers drowned in their run, and which the wind and frost and rain have carved into the most graceful curves and arabesques, destroying all but the initial letter of the names, stands as a record of judgment to this day; and educated people (so called) teach their children the lesson of Divine wrath on men who cheat the Government, from the accidental set of a friable stone where the wind strikes it with fullest force.

Skinningrove is another beautiful gorge opening to the sea like Saltburn and Staithes. A short time ago it was almost uninhabited; now it is filled up with miners' houses set in thick uniform rows; the lines of grey pointed roofs, one exactly like another, looking more like large card houses than anything else, as one views them from the heights. It was at Skinningrove, or Skingrave, that the famous "sea-man" was caught in 1607. "Instead of voice he shrieked," says an old manuscript, "and showed himself courteous to such as flocked farre and near to visit him; sayre maidens were welcomest guests to his harbour, whome he woulde beholde with a very earnest countenance, as if his phlegmatic breast had been touched with the spark of love." When he stole away, which he did after "some days' subsistence on raw fish," "he reared up his shoulders from the water, and made signe of acknowledging his good entertainment." Which was very well for a phoca, and more than even our polite and affectionate friend at the Zoological Gardens would do. Paul Jones, too, paid Skinningrove a visit in 1779; but he was less courteous than the sea-man, and fired upon the smugglers' huts which then represented the hamlet.

There are many pretty excursions to be made from Saltburn, and many lovely walks within tolerably easy reach. The Cleveland Hills are fine in their way, if they are only molehills compared to the mountains of the Lake district, and still more when contrasted with the Highlands. Yet the view from Roseberry Topping is good. Like most highest points this hill has a local reputation for foretelling weather:—

When Roseberry Topping wears a cappe,
Let Cleveland then beware of a clappa.

And the weather-wise prognosticate fair or foul according to its mistiness or distinctness, and its apparent distance. There was said to be a hermitage on Roseberry Topping in the days when men thought to serve God by living like beasts in a lair. It was called Wilfrid's Needle; and some say that it had, and some that it had not, the property of that Wilfrid's Needle at Ripon through which the fattest virtuous woman could pass easily, but which held the slenderest frail fair one as if in a vice. Then there is Marske, with its old Hall built by Sir William Pennycuik in the time of Charles I., and its old cross in the village; Kirkleatham, where the Hall is of the same style and in exactly the same relative position as that of Marske; Kirtton Castle; Skelton Mill and Castle; Hindcliff Top, where the commoners used to be, while seals swarmed in the bay below—last taken, says Camden, by men in women's clothes; the broad stretch of firm white sands reaching from Saltburn to Redcar and beyond; and, further off, the strange fantastic dykes which rise beyond Cockfield Fell in Durham, cross the Tees at Preston Gates, and end between Staithes and Mablethorpe, having run sixty miles unerringly, and through all sorts of geological formations. To the geologist indeed the country round about is singularly interesting on many counts, besides being especially rich in fossils. At a jeweller's in Salisbury may be seen some unique specimens found in the carboniferous limestone at Leyburn, and a fine set of line fossils got nearer home. Then the botanist has his pleasures, for not so very far off the Gentiana verna is to be met with in the dale growing in large quantities. We forbear to indicate the exact spot, knowing by experience the greed of collectors. Tumuli and Roman remains offer their attractions to the archaeologist; so that, on the whole, this youngest specimen of the sea-bathing place is by no means the least interesting, take it how we will.

NEWSPAPER ERUDITION.

SUCH an event as the fire at Canterbury Cathedral, coming too in the month of September, when news is a little scarce, could hardly fail to put the writers in the daily papers on their mettle. Both the Standard and the Daily Telegraph are at their very grandest, both in their narratives and in their leading articles. But there is this distinction between them. The Standard has somehow or other got its head full of the fire of 1174, of which the Daily Telegraph, save in one passage supplied by its Own Correspondent, seems to take no notice. That one passage however is a remarkable one:—

Curiously enough, it is mentioned by Bede, a monk of Canterbury, of much later date than his venerable namesake, that at the burning of the old cathedral, about 1174, "fearsome evil" was done to the mosaic pavement, and in the course of excavations, about forty years ago, a portion of this very pavement was discovered bearing traces of the same kind of catastrophe as that which occurred again yesterday.

We have no doubt that it is our ignorance and the superior knowledge of the Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, but we really have not come across any person of the name of Bede between the ecclesiastical historian of the eighth century and the Adam and Outbert of our own times. Whether there is any confusion with any one bearing either of these two names, both of which are certainly to be found in the intermediate ages, we cannot pretend to say. But as the younger Bede would seem to have lived in the time of Henry the Second, and, to judge by the extract, to have written in English, we should really like to know something more about him. In the leading article, however, we hear nothing about Bede, nothing about the fire of 1174, any more than of the great fire of all in 1067. But the Daily Telegraph gives us instead two or three fires—while speaking of the Daily Telegraph we ought rather to say "conflagrations"—of which we can find no mention in any other authority:—

As a matter of fact, Canterbury Cathedral has been twice or thrice burned down. The Danes destroyed it in 1011 A.D.; again in 1101 it was almost totally consumed—and once more it was sorely damaged by a conflagration in 1180 A.D.

The Standard goes far deeper into these matters. It has really got up the facts about the rebuilding after the fire of 1174, and it has learned about William of Sens and William the Englishman. Only unluckily it confounds the distinction to be seen between the work of the two Williams with the much more marked distinction to be seen between the work of Ernulf and the first William:—

Now the very walls of Canterbury Cathedral exhibit most unmistakably at this day the line where the Englishman commenced his work; for the stones are larger, the masonry is better, instead of the capitals being chopped with a hatchet, as heretofore, as are the bases, we find them carved and sculptured. Dunkin (Alfred John) has given us, in his Report of the Transactions of the Archaeological Association, on their first congress, in 1844, at Canterbury, a translation of this eye-witness's account, to which Cressy, the great civil engineer and architect, appended notes.

To us it would have seemed more natural to go for Gervase's account either to Gervase himself in the "Decem Scriptores," or else to Professor Willis's translation and comment in the Architectural History of Canterbury Cathedral. Not to be behind the world, however, we have looked to see what "Dunkin (Alfred John)" and "Cressy, the great civil engineer and architect," have got to say about the matter, and between them we have learned that "In 1101 the church was burnt down by the Danes, but by the munificence of Canute again rebuilt, to be the prey of another conflagration in 1073." From the crab-like fashion in which the events recorded by "Dunkin (Alfred John)" seem to have happened, we can only conceive that Canute and the Danes, their munificence and their conflagrations, were all looked upon as belonging to the ages which are reckoned not A.D. but B.C. After this, it is a small matter to learn, as we are also taught by "Dunkin (Alfred John)," that "Lanfranc died in 1109, being nearly one hundred years old." The date would seem to have been borrowed from St. Anselm, and the age from the late President of Magdalen College.

But the Standard has greater things than these. We had always thought that the first Primate of Canterbury, with all his merits as a practical evangelist, filled no particular place in ecclesiastical literature. We had never heard of any writings of his, except some not particularly wise letters to which Pope Gregory sent back much wiser answers. The Standard, however, has discovered that the founder of the Church of England was also in truth one of the doctors of the Church Universal. According to this new authority, the Metropolitan Church is one of those architectural nucleus houses of the first English Primate, the great master of the "Gloucester Dei" himself, as its founder; whose walls have been incessantly repaired, and whose precincts enlarged, by Odo and by Anselm, by Lanfranc and by Langton.

We do not quite understand about the "architectural nucleus," or about the enlargement of the precincts by Langton. It is funny to put Anselm before Lanfranc, but perhaps chronology ought to yield to alliteration. But to roll St. Augustine of Hippo and St. Augustine of Canterbury into one really beats every confusion that we have before heard of. It even beats the belief which we have found existing in some minds that the Henry who stood in the snow at Canossa was the same Henry whose white plume waved at Ivry.

As we have reached one climax it might be as well to stop, for even the process by which the Daily Telegraph in the course of its leading article stops to explain that King Louis VII. of France is the same as "St. Louis" hardly equals the rolling together of the two Augustines. That the Daily Telegraph is at its very grandest in point of style might be taken for granted without reading a single line. There is only one very small point, a matter of mint and cummin, jota and tittles, on which we still wish to learn something. In the Daily Telegraph "the ambitious priest A' Beckett" appears with a double T. In the Standard "A' Hecket" without any epithet has one T only. It might be too much to ask either what the A is supposed to stand for, or what it is that the apostrophe marks as left out between the A and the B. But, as lovers of minute accuracy who like to be exact to a T on all points, we should really like to know the cause of the difference in the forms of spelling adopted severally by two such authorities.

THE COMMENCEMENT OF HOSTILITIES.

BEFORE these pages appear in print one battle between the Northern and Southern armies will probably have taken place, though too late for us to make any comments upon it. The first period of the autumn campaign has, however, been fruitful in valuable lessons of every description. The experience of the Northern army has disclosed our weak points as regards the movement of troops; while that of the Southern army has shown that, although some improvement has taken place since last year, we have yet much both to learn and unlearn in the matter of tactics. On Monday week the Northern army, commenced its march from Aldershot, and on the following Saturday finished it at Pewsey, the official strategical base. The movement was, with the exception of three wet days, conducted under most favourable circumstances; the arrangements for supplies at the differing halting-grounds having been made long previously, the roads being good, and the corps d'armée marching not only by divisions, but frequently by even smaller units. The result was on the whole satisfactory. The men, though rather young, and somewhat undersized in the majority of infantry regiments of the line, marched well. That many were on the last day footsore was obvious, but such was their spirit that scarcely a man availed himself of the ambulance waggon. The fact that any limping soldiers were observed would be, considering the comparative shortness of the marches, difficult to understand were it not for the statements of almost every newspaper Correspondent as to the men's boots. Even our infantry are, it seems, badly shod, while as to the mounted troops the new long boots recently served out to them are said to be simply crippling machines. In many cases they were not taken off during a whole week, for the excellent reason that when dried after having been wetted it is extremely difficult to get them on again. To mounted men the result has been great discomfort, but to the dismounted dragoon it has been positive agony. And here we may observe that the existence of dismounted men in a cavalry regiment is an anomaly which cannot too soon be swept away. A dragoon and his horse together make a perfect whole; but either alone is useless, nay, worse than useless, for he or it is a consumer without being a producer. It would be quite as reasonable to attach to every infantry battalion a certain proportion of men unprovided with rifles as to include in the establishment of a cavalry regiment men for whom there are no horses. In Prussia the term dragoon means an effective mounted man. But to return to our boots. A great outcry has been raised in the papers against long boots, and they are roundly condemned as failures. We cannot, however, believe that the long boot is necessarily a failure; there is too much experience to the contrary. If, therefore, our men do not like it, the reason must be that either pattern, fitting, or material, or all combined, are bad. As to the infantry soldier also, a change is evidently required, and suggestions have been made as to the form which such change should take. Here, again, we do not believe that the complaints which have been made have hit the real point. Shoes with gaiters covering the instep would be easy to get on and off, but they would involve much lacing or many buttons, and moreover would not support the ankles. The great fault and the real cause of the failure of the boots now issued is that sufficient money is not spent on obtaining pliable soft leather, and that sufficient trouble is not taken to fit each man according to the peculiar shape of his foot. That something must be done is certain, for a marching regiment which limps after six days' easy marching is not worthy of the name. The physique of the infantry regiments was, however, as we have already said, not quite as good as it should have been. It is true that the men, notwithstanding their boots, marched well and stood the discomforts and small hardships with good humour and without injury to health, only twelve men out of the 7,000 fighting men of the Northern army having during the first five days of the march been sent back to Aldershot as sick; but it must be remembered that the test was not severe, and we greatly fear that a large proportion of those 7,000 would be unable to stand the prolonged fatigue and exposure of a real campaign. A medical report on this subject at the close of the campaign would be an instructive document. In the final marches to the Wiley all, save certain Militia regiments, have done well.

Scarcely less important than the question of boots is that of equipment. We have repeatedly expressed a hope that the authorities would see the necessity of abolishing knapsacks altogether. If, however, these incumbrances are still to be retained, it is desirable that the burden, in these days of skirmishing on a large scale, should be made to ride as easily as possible. For some years past the yoke knapsack or valise has been under trial, indeed it has been served out wholesale to many corps. The soldiers like it much, and say that it is not only less distressing, but also easier to put on and off than the old pack. Yet a rumour is current that these knapsacks are not to be universally adopted by the Guards—only one battalion is provided with them at present—because they are not considered to be smart in appearance. Can the report be true? It seems incredible, but very great sacrifices are often made to appearance in our army. At all events, the fact that a knapsack which has been decidedly approved of by all who have tried it should not yet have been issued to the whole army is discreditable to the authorities somewhere. We say "somewhere," for it is now absolutely impossible in military matters to fix responsibility on any particular person. The question of water-bottles is not quite so important as that of knapsacks, but there must surely be some one pattern which is the best, and the authorities have had ample time to make up their minds which of the four sorts now to be seen with the army at the seat of manœuvres is the best. The old wooden barrel is clearly bad, while of the others, that which consists of a covered soda-water bottle has stood a long and trying test in India. The only improvement we can suggest is that the covering should be, not cloth as in this country, but leather as in India. Cloth may keep the bottle cooler, but leather protects it better against breakage. Much might be said about clothing, but the subject is too large for treatment on this occasion.

As regards the arrangements for the baggage train, there is great room for improvement. We hear of waggons waiting during three or four hours before it came to their turn to start, and of constant blocks and much consequent delay on the line of march. A very little system would set all this right. It would only be necessary to calculate the time at which each division of baggage would quit the camp, and not allow horses to be put to till the last moment. By this means wearisome waiting in camp would be avoided. As to stoppages on the road, they were caused last Saturday by the necessity of putting on the drag at every pitch of the road, and taking it off again as soon as level ground was reached. Allowing that the double operation occupied half a minute for each waggon, it is obvious that in a column of several hundred vehicles passing along an undulating road the checks must be numerous and prolonged. By the preservation of fixed distances between each division of transport these checks would be reduced to a minimum. By the adoption of the experimental Woolwich waggon, in which a brake can be applied from the box, they would be almost entirely abolished, even if no distances were kept. That the present general service waggon is too heavy even on good roads is almost universally admitted. The Control Department has ever since its creation been subjected to much adverse criticism, and we ourselves have not been backward to point out its shortcomings. It is our duty on this occasion to say that in all that concerns the personal arrangements of the Control officers with the force everything has, with a few trifling exceptions, worked smoothly. Not the less, however, have there been well-grounded complaints. The explanation of this apparent paradox is as follows:—All the preliminary arrangements were made by the War Office, and all those which have been made since have been controlled and altered by the chief military authorities. In fact, the Department has been, not administrative, but simply executive; yet it has had to bear all blame when anything went wrong. Again, when the Control was established many of the duties of the Quartermaster-General's department were transferred to it. Owing, however, to a mischievously tentative and uncertain policy, the line which separates the functions and responsibilities of the two departments has never been clearly defined. Neither department knows exactly where its duties begin and end. There is no little jealousy on the part of the Quartermaster-General's staff, and in the present instance there is some ignorance on the part of officers now to their work. Public business often falls to the ground between the two stools. The regimental officer, however, has been told that Control is a Pharaoh's rod which has swallowed up all rivals, and consequently when he wants, or is in doubt about, anything, he generally betakes himself in the first place to a member of the vilified department. We believe that the system in its original form is a good one, and that the officers of the Control Department are very capable men, but at present they have to do everybody's work, bear everybody's responsibility, and get nobody's thanks. Control is, in fact, a sort of military maid-of-all-work. What is wanted is that its duties should be clearly laid down, and that the War Office should be content to exercise only a general superintendence over it. If the War Office would only take a strong dose of chloral when anything is required to be done, and if the Horse Guards would place a little confidence in the department, we believe that matters would run smoothly enough.

Both armies have been sedulously practising tactics, and at Blandford several sham fights have taken place. That in the latest mistakes have occurred is only natural, and we have no wish to shelter from just criticism any general who may have given proof of incapacity. Still we think it right to protest against the way in which military reputations are nowadays made and destroyed. Do the public, we wonder, ever ask themselves the question, "Are these irresponsible and anonymous judges, the Special Correspondents, all qualified by training and experience to exercise such summary jurisdiction?" We have not a doubt of their honesty and good faith, and we admit that some of them are military men of talent and experience. On the other hand, however, many are utterly ignorant of the first principles of the art of war, and have been despatched to the scene of action only on account of their skill in what is termed descriptive writing. Yet by such incompetent critics are the public guided in forming an opinion as to the merits and demerits of different officers and corps. An officer of talent improved by study, temporarily commanding a distinguished cavalry regiment, put the case very fairly a few days ago substantially as follows:—"Whatever I do I am liable to be accused by some newspaper Correspondent of having committed a blunder; therefore I think the safest plan will be to do as little as possible." Nor is the invariable praise awarded to certain pet corps much less hurtful. For instance, there is an everlasting parrot cry of admiration for the 10th Hussars and the 4th battalion 60th Rifles. We have of course the very highest opinion of both these fine corps; but we confess that we are a little tired of hearing Baker's horsemen and Hawley's Riflemen spoken of as if they were exempt from the ordinary lot of humanity and could do no wrong. That they do sometimes find themselves in a scrape would appear from the record of the sham fight at Blandford. This eternal laudation excites no healthy rivalry, for soldiers have little respect for the source whence it comes; but it causes annoyance, and increases ill feeling to such an extent that it was found necessary to cease pitting the 1st against the 2nd division. Since we last wrote on the subject two new systems of tactics have been tried in the Northern army. At present, therefore, there are no less than four systems existing side by side. First comes what may be termed the Hyde Park system; secondly, that of which we gave an outline last week; thirdly, Sir Charles Staveley's; fourthly, Lord Mark Kerr's. Even in one and the same division one system has been applied in two different ways. Surely it would have been better had only one system in each army been tried; nor can we refrain from complaining that during the twelve months which have elapsed since last year's autumn manœuvres no decision should have been arrived at, and that scarcely any practice should have taken place. On Tuesday night the Northern army, leaving Powsey five minutes after the hour fixed for the commencement of hostilities, seized the fords of the Wiley by a forced march in a storm of rain and lightning. They met with no opposition, for the Southerners were completely taken by surprise. It appears to have been decided by the supreme authorities that this dashing act was a violation of the spirit of the instructions. Would it not be more correct to call it an upsetting of arrangements? Of course a movement of this kind interferes awkwardly with a cut and dried programme, and is too like the real work of war to be tolerated by the military stage-managers.

THE DUBLIN EXHIBITION.

THE Irish people have opened an Exhibition which does credit to their enterprise and resource. Over and above the common stock materials and the ordinary shop products which constitute the staple commodities of all such gatherings, there is a goodly percentage of works distinguished by exceptional excellence, together with some choice collections which have a specific bearing on the arts and industries, the social and political history of Ireland. As a matter of course we meet with some things which might as well have been left out, and yet perhaps the Irish are the best judges of what they stand in need of. And on this plea it might not be generous to exclude from the nave of the building the "Hair-dressing Room" and the "Toilet Room," where visitors enjoy the privilege of "hair-cutting for sixpence," and the additional luxury of "shampooing for sixpence" more. It will be seen that the Dublin Exhibition is in advance of the International bazaar; at Kensington the stranger can only have his photograph taken; hitherto he has not been able to get his hair cut on the premises. But the authorities in Dublin command respect; they have done their work well. By the generosity of two citizens, Sir Arthur Guinness and Mr. E. O. Guinness, the "Exhibition Palace," built some years ago, has been placed at the disposal of the three Committees entrusted with the conduct of the enterprise. One Committee took charge of "Section A—Natural Products," another of "Section B—Works of Art," a third of "Section C—Industries and Manufactures." These divisions are sufficiently comprehensive; thus the spacious galleries contain, under Section A, minerals, &c.; under Section B, paintings, old-and water-colour paintings, architectural and decorative designs, photographs, enamels, stained glass, and mosaics; while Section C completes the series with porcelain and pottery of all kinds, textile fabrics, lace, printing, leather-work, metal-work, scientific inventions, jewelry, &c. We will not attempt to describe this heterogeneous collection in its entirety, but such parts as bear specifically on Ireland, especially such works as serve to illustrate the condition of art and the standard of taste among the people, have a fair claim on our attention.

Strangers in Dublin are at once struck with the skilful, and more or less faithful, reproductions in gold and silver, or in black bog-oak, of old Celtic ornaments supposed to have been worn by the native princes of Ireland. Certainly one of the most attractive cases in the Exhibition is that which is set apart to reproductions of "Antique Irish Brooches," such as the famous "Royal Tara Brooch" and "the Dublin University Brooch"; also may be seen copies of ancient gold fibules, as well as of the harp of Brian Boru. It is interesting to pass from these modern replicas to the time-worn originals either in the "Loan Museum" of the Exhibition or in the Royal Irish Academy in Dawson Street. We are sorry to say that the latter collection is now in dire confusion, and the only catalogue of the contents is a wordy and speculative disquisition, price 17s., still incomplete, though it has reached a total of 988 pages, and was commenced as far back as 1857. We further have to regret a delay of three years in the publication of photographs taken from the gold and silver ornaments—a collection which for weight of metal and for excellence in design and workmanship is scarcely surpassed by the analogous Scandinavian remains in silver and gold in the Museums of Copenhagen and Stockholm. The Council of the Royal Irish Academy would confer a benefit on antiquaries as well as on art manufacturers could they see their way to follow the example of the authorities of the British Museum in the publication of photographs from their art treasures. Here are the materials whence may be evoked a national school of design and decoration; the Exhibition tells us that a Celtic revival is the mission of Ireland, just as a Gothic revival has been the work devolving on England. The one drawback is the degradation of the human figure in the ancient art of Ireland: for example, the "Book of Kells," a Latin MS. of the gospels of the sixth or seventh century, one of the most precious illuminations in Europe, reproductions from which are shown in the Exhibition, presents the contradiction of mature and highly-wrought ornamentation combined with human figures altogether debased. Ireland, if she ever succeeds in working out anew a national style on a Celtic basis, will have to meet the difficulty of the figure in the spirit of accommodation which has actuated and sustained our Gothic revivalists. We rejoice at all times in efforts to keep alive any one of the distinctive national arts, any one of those pictorial or plastic languages which like the Celtic or Scandinavian pertain to generic races or families of mankind. The Irish show exemplary zeal in this matter; in the precious metals they reiterate the ideas of their ancestors, in black oak dug from their bogs they reproduce the designs of stone crosses and of old harps such as that which "once through Tara's halls the soul of music shed." Unfortunately the most saleable goods rather than the directly archaeological models have found a place in the Exhibition. The stalls, in fact, are shops; visitors buy and carry away. Ireland has no scruple about commercial transactions which in England and France have, after hot dispute, been finally prohibited. In concluding our notice of the reproductions which form a most interesting department in the Exhibition, we may observe on the essential unity of what we have termed the national style of Ireland. Whether the decoration be found on a cross, within a book, or in bronze, silver, or gold, the system of ornamentation is essentially the same. We will not enter on the discussion as to whence this Irish art came, how far it is Scandinavian, and how far a home produce; in Copenhagen we have found the local antiquaries ready to deny the existence of Ireland and her art altogether, and in like manner Denmark is as much as possible ignored in Dublin. For the immediate purpose in hand it matters little what nation first entwined the Celtic knot. But in the interest of the present and of all future Exhibitions the material point is that designers and manufacturers should enter into the thought and labour in the spirit of the cunning workers of old. Designs in their way scarcely inferior to Grecian or Etruscan are the heritage of the Irish people; let this old style live, and Dublin may, at least in the arts, prove her right to home rule.

The Exhibition sustains the reputation of Ireland for lace and fancy work. Since the middle of last century, when lace-making was taught to the children in the workhouse at Dublin, the art, which seems eminently suited to idle hands or impoverished resources, has obtained entrance into industrial schools, asylums, and other educational establishments. Among the contributors are "Sparks Lake Reformatory School, Monaghan," "Ballinasloe Reformatory School," "St. Joseph's Industrial School, Cavan," "Sisters of Mercy Industrial School, Kinsale, County Cork," "Richmond Asylum," &c. The designs are not always in the best taste; indeed here and elsewhere it is urgent that the Government schools of art already established in Dublin and other large towns should diffuse among the industrial classes correct principles of design. As a rule, bad art costs as much as good art; but the chief objection to bad designs in lace or other fabrics is that the young workers in these industrial schools have their tastes perverted; in other words, they miss that mental training, that refining process which are among the chief benefits that accrue when the arts are brought within the sphere of the labouring classes. Among the specimens here displayed we may specially notice "Lace made at Lady Molyneux's Schools, Reproduced from Copies of the old Guipure at the Hôtel Cluny in Paris;" also a case effectively furnished by the "Newtownberrry Lace School for the Reproduction of the old Greek Lace." We do not observe any contributions from the "Irish Normal Lace School, Dublin," nor from the "Belfast Normal Lace School"; although these establishments are known to have done good work in the way of imitation of Venetian, Brussels, and Valenciennes lace. The Irish would appear to have more readiness in imitation than power of invention; thus an "imitation of fine Venetian Raised Point," shown in the Great Exhibitions of 1851 and 1862, is pronounced by Mrs. Bury Palliser "without exception the finest imitation of the raised Venetian point ever made." The lace and fancy work in the Exhibition seem to tell of better days in store for Ireland; they speak of sympathy and succour, and, what is better, of self-help; they give promise of art industries which will tend to humanise the people.

Among other Irish products we may name the Belleek pottery, or rather porcelain, the clay being Irish, the labour Irish, and the locality of the factory likewise Irish. At Belleek, in the Northern county of Fermanagh, was found some years since a clay which in the furnace yielded the hard translucent body that for long was a secret held fast in China. This ceramic substance has the advantages of lightness, translucence, and hardness. Then the glaze, which is equally fortunate and exceptional, is of the nature of an iridescent lustre shining on a surface of pearl or ivory. The colours reflected, while less golden, are more silvery than in the famed lustre of Gubbio. This translucent material with its silvery cuticle lends itself prettily to the reproduction of nautilus shells, dolphins, and other creatures of ocean, especially those which are coated or illumined with mother of pearl. Some of the radiata and molluscs imitated are found on the Irish coasts; in fact, this Irish clay when made crystalline in the furnace assumes the form and lustre of glittering shells washed on the shores of the Emerald Isle. It has been said that Ireland is a land of raw materials, which only need industry, capital, and the security of law and order to be transmuted into wealth. Yet art sometimes does little justice to the best materials, as when, in stalls contiguous to this Belleek lustre-ware, we come upon plates and other table services painted by lady pupils in the Queen's Institute. It may be kind, but it cannot be politic, to employ this unskilled labour; art talent the Irish of both sexes undoubtedly possess, but it is merely suicidal to trust to genius when it is thus denied the moiest rudiments of knowledge. We may say, speaking generally, that it is painful to observe how Ireland is still struggling through comparative ignorance and neglect towards art development. Zeal is not wanting, but it is often a zeal without knowledge; yet the time draws nigh when the youth of Ireland will bring efficient training to the aid of innate talent; the present Exhibition serves as a forecast of the higher attainments which future Exhibitions will no doubt chronicle.

The Loan Museum, which is chiefly enriched by Irish collections, confers historic value on the Exhibition; a retrospective view is here taken of Irish arts and manufactures. We will pass over certain magnificent displays, such as the "Marlborough Table Service," presented by Queen Anne to the Duke of Marlborough; the contributions from Her Majesty, including Flaxman's "Shield of Achilles"; and an interesting collection tracing the history of the Worcester porcelain manufacture from its rise in 1750 down to the present time. Again the stranger turns from works familiar in England to products essentially Irish. It is curious to find how Irish bogs and rivers, like the Tiber and the soil of old Rome, have held in safety treasures which otherwise had perished. Thus from a bog at Killarney was dug up a large "glass bottle" in quality not unlike agate; in another bog, also near Killarney, was found a "bronze Irish war trumpet"; in like manner in the bog of Allan turned up an "ancient pastoral staff" likewise an "antique French watch," while from the river Witham was rescued an "Anglo-Saxon silver-gilt bowl." Ireland may be compared in this respect to Etruria; each country was the seat of an ancient but now subverted civilization; each land is a treasure-house of works in stone, bronze, iron, gold, and silver; in the arts of both countries alike are written the history of a people who for learning and for luxury, for genius and for cunning craft, were in advance of neighbouring nations. Long pedigrees and memorable histories written in calamity give to the art relics that remain to Ireland the distinctive character and colour of race and of soil. In this Loan Museum is shown the "Ancient Crown of the Kings of Munster, silver-gilt, attributed to the thirteenth century"; also the "Bell of St. Columba, of Gartan County, Donegal," which the compiler of the Catalogue ventures to assign to the sixth century; and specially must be mentioned the "Shrine of St. Manchan," here pronounced as "Irish manufacture of the seventh century," or, in other words, coeval with the "Book of Kells." Unfortunately dates in Ireland are often conjectural; thus this shrine, when exhibited in 1862 at Kensington, and described truly as a "very remarkable monument of ancient Irish art" was assigned not to "the seventh century," but "in all probability" to "the beginning of the twelfth century." Such are the chronological discrepancies which meet the inquirer; certainly five centuries would seem a pretty wide margin even for Irish antiquaries.

The paintings, with the exception of the portraits, are a failure. It will not be necessary to dwell among the "Ancient Masters."

If Ireland does not boast of more trustworthy examples, it would have been wise not to make the show. The Catalogue, too, which generally is exemplary, here breaks down; as, for example, when a poor copy of Leonardo's "Mona Lisa" in the Louvre is assigned to Bellini. We must not however omit to mention five compositions by Morland, who here at his best is scarcely behind Hogarth in sketchy mastery of touch or in piquant dramatic incident. We may add that many of Hogarth's works turn up in Ireland; to Hogarth are due some capital heads in the "National Portrait Gallery." The "Modern Masters" are for the most part mediocre, and several of the best pictures, such as the portraits of "Tennyson" and the "Duke of Argyle," by Mr. Watts, R.A., are shamefully hung. The collection, however, serves to bring to a focus the acknowledged genius of Ireland. We may sometimes be in danger of forgetting that Mulready, MacLise, Barry, and Sir Martin Shee, were all Irishmen. Here, too, are works by Mr. Burton, R.H.A., since known in the Old Water-Colour Society; also by the late Mr. Brennan, an Irish painter of bright promise in the Royal Academy; likewise by the late Mr. Catterson Smith, former President of the Hibernian Academy, and more than a respectable portrait-painter; and by Mr. Jones, the present President, likewise a portrait-painter. Ireland evidently has had need of portrait-painters; it was right that her illustrious sons should be transmitted to posterity. In the "Loan Museum" we meet with miniatures by Dunn, Comerford, Mulvany, and Dawson, all Irish artists. Here also we were glad to encounter the sensitive and poetic face (by Romney) of Mrs. Tighe, the authoress of Psyche. To the list of illustrious Irish artists must be added Mr. Foley, R.A.; the portrait statues by this sculptor of Goldsmith and Burke stand before Trinity College. Neither must the name of John Hogan be forgotten. "A Goatherd" by this artist here exhibited scarcely suffers by comparison with Thorwaldson's "Young Shepherd." We may say generally of this "National Portrait Gallery" that finer heads in point of intellect we have never seen; these portraits redound to the honour of Ireland.

REVIEWS.

FRIEDLÄNDER'S ROMAN MANNERS UNDER THE EARLIER EMPERORS.—VOL. III.*

THE original design of Gibbon was, as is well known, to write a history of the decline and fall of the City of Rome; and it was only gradually that, during the quarter of a century which elapsed between the moment of inspiration among the ruins of the Capitol and the hour of consummation in the garden at Lausanne, his original conception developed into his yet more magnificent performance. The growth of the idea was legitimate and logical; for the vital force which held together the Roman Empire was neither nationality nor religion, but law; and the foundations of Roman law were municipal in their origin and character. It is this which gives to Roman history its continuity, as it gave to the Roman State its endurance; and, just as in one field of antiquities Mommsen has in his most recent work begun to show that there is no essential break to be assumed at the regifugium, so it is the task of those who specially devote themselves to the illustration of later periods of Roman history and archaeology to prove the consistency between the progress of the Empire and that of the Republic. Thanks to Dean Merivale and others, most of us have by this time unlearned the fatal habit of assuming the decay of Roman national life to have commenced punctually with the battle of Actium, and of tracing the downfall of the Empire to an inner disintegration commencing with its establishment. We have ceased to marvel why that Empire endured so long, because we have ceased to derive its fall from a more than dubious source. Happily, the vulgar teleology is out of date which dooms whole centuries as prefacing an unforeseen consummation; even the spoli of Tacitus is beginning to lose some of its magic; and students of history are awakened to the conviction that the Romans of the earlier Empire were not living as either conscious or blind victims of an inevitable destiny.

When, many years ago, Professor Friedländer began his series of essays on Roman manners during the first two centuries of the Christian era†, he also modestly as well as prudently took the City as his starting-point. His work, the earlier volumes of which we noticed with a commendation since more than justified by the general acceptance which they have obtained (though still untranslated into English, they have been translated into French, and have helped to supply some of the materials for Mr. Lecky's last book), has naturally and necessarily grown under his hands. The local influences of life in the city of Rome, the customs of the Court and of the three estates of the population, the conditions of social intercourse among the different classes and sexes, the diversions of the Romans in theatre and circus at home and in foreign travel, now give place to topics of even wider interest and more general significance. In his third volume he undertakes to discuss the whole question of Roman luxury—a term which, as we shall see, hardly receives at his hands the definition which it needs; and, after treating the subjects, in this instance cognate to the formæ, of the fine arts and literature, he proceeds in his concluding chapters to address himself to the religious condition of the population under the Empire, necessarily supplementing his remarks by a view of philosophy and of the belief in immortality in their relations to the moral condition and progress of the Roman world.

The defects of incompleteness and consequent unevenness are all but inseparable from such an attempt. Even where, as in so thorough a book as Burckhardt's Cultur der Renaissance in Italien, the task is limited in space as well as time, the execution must remain that of a suggestive essay rather than of a perfected work; and the infinitely vaster range of Professor Friedländer's subject has not interfered with the modestly tentative spirit in which, unlike some writers on kindred topics whom a little learning has sufficed to make wondrous bold, he has approached it. As his book has more and more developed out of a series of essays on Roman manners into a sketch of Roman morals, generalization has become increasingly dangerous; the materials for anything approaching to an exhaustive description of provincial life in the Roman Empire are still only in course of collection; nor will it be forgotten that the author's limits confine him to a period at the close of which a thorough reorganization of the provinces took place. Essentially, therefore, though by no means throughout, he adheres to the standpoint from which he began his work; and we constantly remember that, up to the time of Hadrian at all events, the real centre of the social as well as of the political life of the Empire was still the city of Rome.

Of the several sections of the present volume, those treating of the religious life of the Romans will naturally attract the most general attention. Of the chapter on Luxury—in our opinion the least successful in the volume—we shall have a word to say presently; the essays on Art and Literature contain less that is open to cavil, though much that invites comment. Professor Friedländer is decidedly of opinion that the Romans were devoid of any innate literary or artistic sense. Certain it is that no literature was ever so susceptible to the sway of fashion as theirs, and that no changes of literary taste have been less the legitimate result of corresponding changes in the general progress of national life. How, for instance, the history of ancient Athens and that of modern France mirror themselves, in spite of the originality or capriciousness of individual authors, in the main phases of their literatures! But to draw conclusions from Roman literature as to Roman tendencies of public opinion and feeling, or even Roman currents of morals and manners, is an infinitely hazardous attempt, and one which has undoubtedly been fruitful of error. Leaving aside for the present the all-important question whether the religious faith and the unbelief of Rome find an adequate expression in her literature, we may instance such a phenomenon as the sudden decline of Roman poetry in the second century. Gibbon, who adverts to the fact, connects it with the degeneracy concerning which he quotes the laments of Longinus "in somewhat a later period"; Dean Merivale has unfortunately not added to his contrast between the Claudian and the Flavian literature another between the Flavian literature and that of the Antonines; but we incline to Professor Friedländer's view, that the main cause is after all to be sought in the cultivation of a new and attractive school of prose literature among the Greeks, whom the Romans, devoid of any real literary originality, were once more fain to follow. Neither in literature nor in art were the Romans ever essentially aught but imitators; and, though in one period it became the fashion among them to insist upon the excellence of their ancient poetry, to teach Ennius and Plautus in the schools, and religiously to abstain, as Fronto did in his correspondence with his pupils, Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Varus, from quoting such moderns as Virgil and Livy, yet how small was the native literary element in the honoured ancients themselves! And, as to the fine arts, enormous and multifarious as was the patronage bestowed upon them by the Romans of the Empire, yet what was Roman art—except in architecture, where the grandeur of the conditions and means effected a difference which was perhaps more than one of degree—except reproduction? This is admirably shown by Professor Friedländer, in the section of his present volume entitled Der Kunstbetrieb (art-industry):—

This uniformity is only partially explained by the journeys of the artists and the spread of the works of art by trade. Its main cause is, first, that the development of Greek art had already come to a close when it entered into the service of Roman civilization. This development had been one of unexampled fertility. A measureless wealth of ideas and forms had been created by it; and the mode of representation and treatment had been most thoroughly perfected in every direction. With this heritage a period of epigonal, which lacked creative power of its own, could keep house for centuries farther, without betraying its poverty. This period then found a double advantage in faithfully holding fast to tradition—one of the main differences between all ancient and modern art. Far from striving after an originality which had become impossible, and from sacrificing the precious gain of former fortunate ages by fruitless experimentalizing, it rather for a long time with praiseworthy intelligence preserved it and turned it to account. Art continued to move in the accustomed sphere, and performed its new tasks according to anciently-proved laws. . . . If the adherence to tradition in connexion with the want of originality was the one main cause of the uniformity of the art of this period, the other lay in the levelling influence of Roman civilization. . . . Decorative and religious art were for the most part able to solve their tasks by unchanged reproduction from the existing stores; monumental art at all events drew its examples and models here for nearly all subjects; and where simple reproduction was inadmissible, it was generally possible "by transformation and development of the original motifs to express new turns of thought," and to convert the existing into something apparently new by means of variations, modifications, separation, and combination.

* Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms in der Zeit von August bis zum Ausgang der Antonine. Von Prof. Ludwig Friedländer. III. Theil. Leipzig: 1871.

† See Saturday Review, November 12, 1864.

These remarks, partly based upon Otto John, receive abundant illustration in the course of the second chapter of this volume; but we have no space to enlarge upon them. We may add that Professor Friedländer gives many details as to the social status and professional emoluments of artists and literary men at Rome; and he has much to say about the precarious position of the poets, their dealings with private and public patrons, with booksellers and critics—for what is the essential difference between the "early copy" system of our own day and the recitation system of Rome, except that in the latter the author was twice blessed, inasmuch as he could force the critic to become acquainted with the whole of the tragedy or epic under review? We may be certain that the Roman poets would not have dilated so persistently upon the grievance of having to listen to recitations, had it not been their fate to have their good word constantly claimed by members of their own fraternity as well as by dilettanti patrons. The spread of dilettantism in Rome defies comparison. All the Julian Emperors wrote in prose or verse, with the exception of Caligula, who devoted himself to the study of oratory; Titus wrote a beautiful poem about a comet; and Domitian is saluted by Martial as "the lord of the nine sisters," and one of his poems is compared by that abandoned flatterer Martial to the Æneid itself—

Ad Capitolini cœlestis carmina belli
Grande coturnati pone Maronis opus—

where, as Professor Friedländer points out, the epithet cœlestis has an official character, and should be translated allerkhöchste, for which transcendent term the English language unhappily lacks an equivalent. Of dilettantism in the fine arts he gives many examples, with Hadrian and Marcus Aurelius at the head of the list; and in music it is sufficient to remember Nero, though the consuming ambition of that Emperor's life—to our mind no wholly contemptible trait in his character—was to be accounted, not a dilettante, but a real artifex.

The argument of the most important chapters of this volume, those on the religious life of the Romans, hardly admits of condensation into a few words. This part of the book deserves, and will doubtless receive, attentive study. Professor Friedländer is not armed with so vast an array of familiar quotations as Mr. Lecky; but the readers of the History of European Morals will find few of the points noted in that work omitted in the German essays. Herr Friedländer's starting-point is the great difference between the literary and monumental sources of our knowledge concerning the religious life of Rome; and his endeavour is to show that the former have misled many, or at all events have led them to form an exaggerated and one-sided opinion. But he shows how, even of the Romans possessing a literary education, it was only the minority whose position was irreconcilable with an acceptance of the ancient popular beliefs. And he dwells with emphasis on the religious reaction of the second century, to which Mr. Lecky has indeed adverted, but of which he has not traced the causes with similar fulness. On the part of the people at large, Professor Friedländer contends that in the masses the popular faith lived on in unchanged strength—a proposition which he proves in a way which may at first sight seem paradoxical. For in the power of assimilation (adoption of elements from Eastern religions), as well as in that of productivity (establishment of new divinities, the Emperors among the rest), he sees two proofs of the vigour retained by the ancient faith. But the best proof he finds in the fact that

For centuries the popular faith was able to maintain itself against Christianity, and not only this, but even in a certain sense to force the Christians to accord a recognition to its truths. For to deny the actual existence (die reale Existenz) of the heathen gods in general never entered into the thoughts of the Christians, neither did these dispute their superhuman character, or the miracles performed by them; only in their eyes the heathen gods were of course powers of darkness, demons, fallen or seduced angels and souls, to whom God had left the power of harming and tempting men.

In connexion with this argument it is shown how the struggle between the two religions intensified the belief in miracles, how in one case (which can hardly be exceptional) we find the same miracle claimed by both sides, and how it is in other causes than a decay of Pagan faith that we have to seek for the explanation of the ultimate triumph of Christianity. Among these Gibbon's second cause, the doctrine of a future life, is that to which Professor Friedländer unhesitatingly assigns the first place. The "vague belief in the immortality of the soul," of which Mr. Lecky speaks in passing (his remarks on the indifference of the Stoics to the subject do not of course affect the general question), is assuredly a very inadequate term by which to describe the prevalence of the belief in question among many belonging to the educated classes, and its general acceptance among the masses. The sneers of Juvenal at Charon's boat, in which only little children believed, prove nothing; and the sneers of Lucian at the credulity of the vulgar herd are a direct testimony to the contradiction in which the witty sceptic found himself with popular belief. On the other hand, there is the secondary evidence of the belief in ghosts. What Christianity did was to give firmness and security to a trembling, but conscious, popular belief; and to make the prospect of immortal life what it had not hitherto been, the highest and the one indispensable possession of man. For though it may be too much to assert, in Mr. Lecky's words, that Roman religion had never been an independent source of moral enthusiasm, yet it is most true that religion was with the Romans no more than with the Greeks the basis of morality; while Christianity, by revealing the divine will as ordaining the pursuit of virtue, and promising to those who followed its paths the reward bestowed by the divine grace, established its religion in a place whence it had to oust no rival.

Such is the position assumed by Herr Friedländer, whom it is impossible for us to follow through the whole of the argument of his concluding chapters. They fitly conclude a deeply interesting volume, of which we are only obliged to take exception to the earlier portion. And this, not because the classical learning there displayed is less abundant, but because the author, being, as he candidly avows, unfamiliar with political economy, has indulged in a looseness of terminology which it needs no political economist to discover. For inasmuch as the author undertakes not only to describe Roman luxury under the earlier Emperors, but to compare it with that of modern peoples, and to show that erroneous notions prevail on the subject of their relative extent, he should have let us clearly understand what in his view the term luxury implies. We do not think that even the German word Luxus could be defined to mean nothing more than expenditure upon things which are not among the necessities of life. In any case Professor Friedländer's remarks concerning the relatively excessive expenditure of Romans and moderns are not decisive, inasmuch as he confesses (and with undisputable truth) that no satisfactory data at present exist for a comparison of prices in Imperial Rome and in the countries of modern Europe. But, apart from this perhaps inevitable defect in his argument, Professor Friedländer will surely allow that the degree to which a man's or a nation's life is open to the charge of luxury depends upon the proportion borne by its useless to its useful expenditure. There is no difficulty in capping a story about Agrippina's golden robe with a reference to Charles the Bold's hundred gold-embroidered coats, or in comparing with the menu of a Pontifical dinner in which Julius Cæsar took part (it seems to have been thoroughly Roman—i.e., overloaded with shellfish, game, and pork) that of an at least equally magnificent repast partaken of by twenty-four persons and friends at Leipzig in the year of grace 1721. Such stories can doubtless be indefinitely multiplied on either side; but the main questions to be solved must remain these:—How far was Roman luxury, as compared with modern—le luxe Anglais, e.g.—exceptional among the Romans themselves; and in what proportion was private expenditure among them, again considering it from a comparative point of view, directed to luxurious rather than useful objects? Professor Friedländer has adverted to the former of these questions; but to neither of them has he, in our opinion, furnished a very satisfactory reply.

FORSYTH ON ANCIENT MANUSCRIPTS.*

THIS lecture, delivered in the Hall of an Inn of Court by its Treasurer, and "printed at the request of the Masters of the Bench," is of course a lecture and not a book, and it is to be judged by the standard not of books but of lectures. That is to say, we do not expect anything very new or profound, but we are satisfied if sound and useful matter is put into an agreeable shape, especially if it is a shape which will stir up the hearers to further inquiry. Mr. Forsyth's lecture reminds us of several things of which it is well ever and anon to be reminded. We have a dim remembrance of having years ago noticed a book, by the late Mr. Isaac Taylor we think, on nearly the same argument as Mr. Forsyth's. That our remembrance is so dim is a sign that the reminder in the shape of Mr. Forsyth's lecture has not come amiss. It is quite a subject for a lawyer, being essentially a part of the history of evidence. And we suspect that no people stand more in need than lawyers of an occasional reminder on a subject which comes so nearly home to their own calling. (Granted that the elephant is once safe on the tortoise's back, the lawyer will tell you with unflinching accuracy all the consequences which flow from that position of the elephant; but how the elephant got there, or how he manages to stay there, are questions which he commonly contrives to shirk. In other words, lawyers commonly start from some arbitrarily chosen authority, from some point of time of their own choosing, from some dictum of their own making or their own accepting, and then argue soundly and acutely from the premises of their own setting up, while refusing all inquiry into the value of the premises itself. The French lawyers who ruled that the Courtenays could not be allowed to rank as of royal blood because they were not descended from St. Louis but from an earlier King, the English lawyers who ruled that the time of legal memory should begin with the setting out of Richard the First on his Crusade, would doubtless have been able to trace out with perfect skill every inference which followed from their own arbitrary assumptions; but they would probably be wise enough to decline any research into the worth of the assumptions themselves. Nay, we have known learned gentlemen, men of no small note in their own calling, who evidently thought that Blackstone's Commentaries had come down from heaven like another Koran, and thought it a kind of heresy to hint that some of the historical positions in the infallible text-book would not stand the test of minute inquiry. To people in this frame of mind such a line of thought as that opened by Mr. Forsyth's lecture ought to be highly useful. The facts are not at all out of the way; the line of thought is one which any one who thinks about the matter at all ought to be able to follow out for himself; but, as a matter of fact, it is a line of thought which does not suggest itself so often as it ought to do. To many people a book is a book, an opinion is an opinion; to enter on Mr. Forsyth's special ground, a manuscript is a manuscript. It was certainly not a lawyer whom we once heard say, "I thought everything must be true that was in print"; but many people seem practically to act on a principle not very different. Many people seem to have no notion whatever of the nature of evidence and authority. In matters of history it is common to hear people talk as if a book, perhaps a modern book, was in itself an authority, as if its writer had some special and mysterious means of finding out what happened in past times. Men have been known to write to ask the author of a history what kind of weather it was on the day of a great battle, and what kind of looking people the chief actors in his story were. They clearly thought that the writer of a book had some kind of special revelation. It did not come into their heads that he had no means of knowing except such as were equally open to themselves, if they chose to take the same pains; nor does it seem to have struck them that, if he had known about the weather and the other points, he would not have failed to put it in his book. We see the same sort of thing when people sometimes say, in that most provoking way, that A. has a right to his opinion and B. has a right to his, when the point at issue is no matter of opinion at all, but something about which A. has proved himself to be right and proved B. to be wrong. So again, when people get further than this, when they begin to look to the sources of history, they constantly fail to see the difference between one authority and another. One book written before the invention of printing is as good as another. It is so tempting to judge merely numero and not ponderis; it is so hard to take in that the statement of one really original writer may be worth more than the statements of a dozen writers, if the one speaks from his own knowledge and the dozen have simply copied the one from the other. The first thing that a lawyer or a magistrate has to learn is that hearsay evidence goes for nothing; yet we constantly see books with their foot-notes crowded with references to long strings of writers quoted as if they were of exactly equal authority, while it may happen that one was a contemporary or even an eye-witness, and that the rest were compilers writing ages after. It is the first principle of all criticism that the mere repetition of an earlier statement by a later writer adds absolutely nothing to its authority, except when the later writer chooses between two earlier statements, one of which therefore has in its favour the value of the later writer's judgment, whatever that may be.

Now when we come to Mr. Forsyth's immediate subject of ancient manuscripts, all this is brought home to us with tenfold force. Students in any branch cannot fail to be a good deal at the mercy of the writers whose books they read; but they, and very often the writers too whom they trust, are yet more at the mercy of the editors of the original authorities. Classical and Biblical students above all constantly need reminding how far away they stand from the original writers of the books which they study. Mediæval students are better off; for them the autograph of the original writer is not so very rare a thing. But to the mass of readers, even of scholarly and critical readers, the manuscripts are as though they had never been. Many people who have read ancient writings in their printed form to no small profit never saw an ancient manuscript in their lives. And few except professed editors ever thought of reading a manuscript through; if they do look at a manuscript, it is simply now and then as a curiosity; it is on the modern printed book that they are really dependent for their knowledge. The printed text is almost unavoidably taken for granted, even by many who would certainly never take the matter of a book for granted in the same way. And after all, when we come to think of it, when we do get to the manuscripts, to the oldest existing manuscripts of classical or Scriptural writers, there is something frightful in the distance at which we still stand from the writer himself. Take Homer for instance. The received modern texts of the Iliad and Odyssey were printed from late mediæval manuscripts. Manuscripts have since been found of far earlier date; fragments indeed have been found earlier than the Christian era. But they are only a century or so earlier. We not only have nothing belonging to any age to which anybody ever attributed a personal Homer; we have nothing of the age of Pseistratus; we have nothing even of the age between the tragedians and Plato, when Mr. Paley conceives that the Iliad and Odyssey in their present shape were put together. It is plain that, to the writers of those manuscripts, the Homeric question, if it was already raised, was a question of exactly the same nature as it is to us. They knew no more from their own knowledge than we do; they did but copy such a text as existed in their time; they are no more original authorities, in the sense of being eyewitnesses or contemporaries, than a modern editor is. At the same time it is something to know that the text which was put together from very late manuscripts is essentially the same as that which has been recovered from the early ones. If the text has not been seriously corrupted since the days of the Alexandrian scholars, during a long series of ages in which it has been liable to all kinds of dangers, we may fairly suppose that it lived safely through the few centuries which divide the oldest existing fragments from the time assigned by Mr. Paley to the putting together of the poems. On the whole, the examination of the subject makes us pretty well satisfied, in the case of most ancient authors, with the texts that we have. We have lost a vast deal, but we have no reason to suspect that what we have has been seriously corrupted.

Mr. Forsyth goes, in lecture fashion, but in very good lecture fashion, through most of the points likely to be started in a popular view of the history of ancient manuscripts. He gives a sketch of the most remarkable manuscripts, classical and Biblical, which are known to exist, and he enlarges especially on the palimpsests, and the wonderful processes by which scholars have recovered the original texts of manuscripts which had been actually rubbed out to make room for a fresh writing on the same parchment. He naturally quotes largely from other writers, bringing in a good deal of curious matter from the writings of the shrewd and experienced Dr. Maitland, which we are afraid people have now pretty well forgotten. He quotes also the most interesting account which Tischendorf gives of his discoveries among the libraries of Mount Sinai. Mr. Forsyth has got together from one quarter and another a good deal of matter as to the customs and ways of doing business usual among the monastic copyists. Most of his sources are obvious enough, but it is well to have them brought together in an agreeable lecture form. Mr. Forsyth however should have been above a half contemptuous, half patronizing, way of talking about "those old monks" and such like, a condescending style which always shows that those who use it have never really lived among those of whom they are talking. In speaking of manuscripts too and translations of the Bible, Mr. Forsyth naturally gets on the subject of Ulfilas. It may be a whim of our own, but Ulfilas is just one of the two or three things in the world about which we expect every man, at least every Englishman, to warm up a little, to go through a mental process of doing poojah or taking off the hat. But Mr. Forsyth speaks of the Gothic Bishop—whom, by the way, he oddly calls Bishop of Gothland—as if he were just anybody else. Nor should we have thought it needful, in addressing an audience in the hall of the Inner Temple, to speak of "Catherine de Medici, famous, or rather infamous, for the massacre of St. Bartholomew."

We will end with a thing to think of. It appears very doubtful whether we have any copies of the Hebrew Scriptures older than the sixth century after Christ. The gap between that time and the latest of the Biblical Hebrew writers is enormous. Yet here again we have abundance of evidence, specially from the versions into different languages, Ulfilas among them, that no important corruptions of the text had taken place, at least for many centuries before the time when the series of existing manuscripts begins.

THE STILWINCHES OF COMBE MAVIS.*

THERE are times when a novelist shows himself conspicuously conscious of not doing his best, when contempt for his readers rises to the dignity of an inspiration, and when "anything will do" might serve for the motto of every chapter. We discern this state of mind in full force in the three volumes before us. Mr. Adolphus Trollope must know the literary worth of The Stilwinches as well as we do; he must be quite aware that what stands for plot is at once meagre and absurd, that the actors are conventional, the motives such as never actuate men, the interests mean, the diction vulgar, the general tone low, the picture of society an insult to modern manners. In this judgment we feel so confident that we carry him along with us that it is the book and not its author which we take for the subject of our criticism, regarding it as a representative novel of a certain type, and as exhibiting the art of filling three volumes without composing anything that can be called a story. Ordinary novel-readers are a confiding generation. If a character is introduced to them with a very elaborate portraiture, if his height, his bulk, his eyes, features, expression, complexion, and phrenological developments are all enlarged upon, they assume at once that he has an important part to play, and forget afterwards if they see no more of him. If his house is described with minute particularity, they expect a mystery, and perhaps attach one to it of their own contriving. If a discussion arises as to where he is to sleep, their fancy is on the qui vive; the last thing they suspect is that the purpose of the episode is fulfilled in the filling of the page. The mere recapitulation of several names, masculine and feminine, in conjunction, suggests to a girlish imagination ideas of dress, bustle, company, excitement. Gatherings of people, reckonings of money, journeys, walks, drives, meetings, partings, are all supposed to have a general dependence, and to be parts of a whole tending to a dénouement; and it is by no means every reader who finds out that there has been no story, if all these things are put upon paper as though there were really a story in the recesses of the writer's mind.

The author of The Stilwinches shows his invention mainly in this art of irrelevant amplification, descending to the smallest trifles; for if two men go for a walk, it is always noted that they take their sticks with them. His first volume, which trenches on the woman's privilege of pure triviality, opens in a perfect maze of figures, suggesting an example out of Colenso's arithmetic or a puzzle demanding pencil and paper. Mr. Stilwinche, the hapless father of eight daughters, stands alone on the hearthrug, and breathes a patient sigh because six minutes have elapsed since the breakfast-bell rang. He stands in a room furnished with two arm-chairs, and twice four chairs on either side the table, against the wall nine chairs with nine hassocks before them, and five chairs for the servants. Then follow family prayers; and then we have the ages of eight girls ranging from twenty-eight to eighteen. On the table are ten eggs, ten pats of butter, ten rolls, ten tea-cups, and one teapot containing six spoonfuls of tea. Mr. Stilwinche is the owner of two farms and a park of sixty acres; his income is a thousand a year. Two of his daughters are provided for the one by a bequest of a sum bringing in 200*l.* a year, while the other (it is especially explained) receives 220*l.* from a precisely similar sum—a difference which has no bearing whatever upon the story. But Mr. Trollope likes to be exact; as also in the case of Mr. Ironside, the holder of the family living, worth 150*l.*, whose income is supplemented by 100*l.* from his fellowship and 150*l.* of his own, his sister also possessing 100*l.* a year; and all this detail is supposed to interest the reader simply on its own merits. Mr. Stilwinche lets the park to a farmer for 3*l.* an acre, which brings in an accession to his income of 180*l.*, so that the family starts in the story with a joint income of 1,650*l.*, which one would think might have supplied them with larger rolls and larger pats of butter, even in these dear times. But the moral of the story is the calamity, and, we may add, the demoralizing effect, of having eight daughters, and the depressing poverty in which they involve all concerned. Mr. Stilwinche maintains his amiability and moral sense at a higher level than the rest by forgetting the number of his children and calling them seven; but the girls themselves live in a terrible consciousness of their number, and press the fact and the misery of it upon all their male friends. It is their first confidence to boys of eighteen and nineteen, which is the prevailing age of the lovers in this story, and seems to justify the best of these young ladies in an antipathy to most of their sisters, and in throwing themselves at the head of any man whom they can cajole into having them; the fact of most of them being very pretty, and all being sure of a modest provision, being insufficient to allow of any repose of mind or trust in circumstances on the subject of settling in life. Being what they are, the author introduces us to their habits and amusements. We are told how many chambers they occupy, with hints as to the furniture; in one room there is a glass cracked from top to bottom. In the morning they sit together and criticize each other's flirtations; in the afternoon they play croquet; of the evenings in general we may judge from one in particular, when "there was no further talk that evening of anything except the making up of the sides of the game on the morrow."

As the Hall supplies the ladies of the story, the farm with its visitors supplies the necessary complement of men. None of these young ladies would have looked at a farmer's son if there had not been eight of them, so that they were not privileged to match in their own degree. Not that the farmer is altogether a common farmer, in spite of his smoking his pipe in the porch every day after dinner. Some circumstances about him are very uncommon indeed. He had married the daughter of an agricultural implement-maker, who, seized with the notion of founding a family, had left all his money—10,000*l.*—to his daughter's eldest son. The lady dies at the birth of a second son, and the farmer and his sister, seeing the now-born babe to be a much finer child than his brother, change the elder for the younger, and put Charles in the place of Peter, a parish clerk in the Isle of Man being found to connive at the villany and mutilate the register. The farmer has twinges of conscience, for the transaction is utterly at variance with both his character and figure; but these do not diminish his bulk or interfere with the frank jollity of his manner. But the sister, without any twinges of remorse, represents this passion to the eye, being described as a paragon of grim, forbidding angularity. Certainly never was committed a more disinterested felony as far as either actor is concerned; and nothing comes of it. Of course Charles is preferred to Peter by the young ladies, till one of them is let into the secret, and she then makes the dearest set at the wronged first-born; but simultaneously with the public discovery there turns up a remedy for it—a godsend of twenty thousand pounds from the Antipodes—which makes all straight and pleasant.

Perhaps the easiest recipe for making a series of chapters look like a story is to put into them a great deal about money. Money has its romantic, its vivacious, its mysterious side. It is so associated with all the reader's pains and pleasures that the mere sight on the page of a large sum conveys a sense of excitement. Money figured largely in these pages, whether in lumps like 40,000*l.*, or a "good bit of money," or "a little bit of fortune," or in financial statements of pounds, shillings, and pence, or in proverbial sayings—money will make the mare to go, money breeds money, money draws money—or in pantomime by holding out fingers and thumb for the inquirer's interpretation—or in innuendo, "If ten thou. is a good horse, may be twenty thou. is a better."

And these words bring us to our villain, Ikey Batt, the son of the parish clerk, who comes to visit at the farm, nourishing an intense, but not very intelligible, hatred of the so-called eldest son, and with the leaf out of the register in his pocket. He is an attorney, and has gone through the education necessary for that calling, which, however, has left his grammar in a primitive condition. We do not know whether we should say that all Mr. Adolphus Trollope's men talk like cockneys or like the conventional sailor in a melodrama, but they all talk pretty much one dialect, such as was never spoken among men, and they all enforce their meaning with winks. The elderly respectable London lawyer who exclaims "That's the ticket, I'm very glad to hear it, Ben, my boy!" supplements his salutations with a wink. The good genius of the scene enforces his meaning by winking "slyly" or "sneakily," or by "winking hard," as the occasion demands. Ikey, the villain, winks "slowly and emphatically," and conveys the impression of preternatural cunning by whole "volleys of winks," lavished on men and women, intimates and strangers alike. And the eight daughters, daughters of an English squire of ancient lineage, who, we are assured, have lived among ladies and gentlemen all their lives, take very kindly both to the diction and the winks. Farnel allows Ikey Batt to call her "my dear Miss" at a first interview, and when, hearing of so many sisters, he politely inquires that from the specimen before him it must be "the more the merrier," she confides to him the family grievance—"I am afraid you would hardly find that we were all of us of that opinion, Mr. Batt; eight girls in a family is a serious thing." Barbara, the beauty of the family in her own estimation, as well as in that of some others, who is never mentioned without some notice of delicate feet and hands, fine figure, exquisite complexion, and fair ringlets, flirts desperately and resolutely with all the men, and might be said to be refused by everybody, but that she ends by eloping with the villain out of sheer desperation; lest with these advantages and her two hundred a year she should get nobody to marry her. This young lady grows by degrees into a monster, from being a victim to the author's habit of making raids among his characters, shaking them, and setting them at one another, in the evident necessity of spurring his own flagging efforts. She begins by sneers, which grow to concentrated sneers; but soon her hatred of her sisters "rages fiercely," and towards the rival beauty she feels "a hatred which absolutely excluded pity," and which finally extended itself to the whole bevy. "To say that she would have revelled in strangling them all (and their respective lovers) signifies little." And yet, having drawn a fiend in delicate slippers and faultless ringlets, the author makes the climax of her misdoings the shirking of an act of superfluous heroism. The "rhubarb-and-magnesia-coloured twins" are attacked with virulent small-pox. An aunt devotes herself to them (an aunt who shows herself in the eccentric interjection "Blatherum Scate," and the more familiar "Why the dickens"); two nurses are hired; two sisters volunteer; but Barbara takes herself off, and in so doing is treated to an insulting reproof from the author's favourite hero. Authors have such matters in their own hands and can reward the heroism they extol. There are two Ikeys, one an ex-gold-digger, who sets all things to rights, and his son, who, it is constantly observed, has more education than his father, an advantage we should hardly have discovered for ourselves. But whatever trammels of gentility hold the son in check, the father is certainly free from them. He calls a face a mug, and he does not like the cut of his navy's jib (with a wink at his son), and says, "Blessed if I don't think," and "leastways" and "noways," and introduces himself to ladies with "Servant, ma'am," and "You'll never go for to say." We are thus particular in proving our point because this Mr. Batt is the reward of the eldest Miss Stilwinche for nursing her sisters, and is her abundant compensation for catching the disease and being marked by it. She has seen very little of him, but when he modestly calls his proposal a presumption, she inwardly thinks it none at all; they come to a tacit understanding at once. The conclusion is succinctly and not badly told; we extract it for the curious in proposals:—

"Now, look here! young ladies are sometimes very shy of saying 'yes,' and as you are still an invalid, you know, we'll manage it this way. If you don't say 'no' in two minutes," said Mr. Batt, pulling out his great chronometer as he spoke, "I shall understand that it is to be 'yes.'"

Ben put the watch down on the table before him; Pen shook her head and laughed, but fixed her eyes on the watch; and they sat shoulder to shoulder, he holding her hand in his, with their heads very near together, as they both kept their eyes on the watch.

"That is the minute hand, is it not?" said Pen almost in a whisper.

"Yes, and it must go round to there a second time. Hold hard! hold hard! For the love of heaven don't say a word!"

The second hand sped on, and Ben followed its course with his finger. When it came to the last quarter of the second minute, Pen shook a little, and turned her face a little more away from Mr. Batt's. Another second or two, and Ben, crying, "Time's up! Hurrah!" caught her in his arms, and—that was the manner of the wooing and winning of Miss Penelope.

The author reckons no doubt on very young readers, who are expected to see a natural fitness in mutual disqualifications between a lady of twenty-eight and an ex-gold-digger whose manners as little conform to the usages of polite society as his diction. Let us hope they will not infer the further moral that refinement is but skin deep, an accomplishment to be left off with music, drawing, and the use of the globes.

MARKHAM'S REPORTS ON THE DISCOVERY OF PERU.*

THE materials of Mr. Clements Markham's volume of Reports on the Discovery of Peru, though by no means unknown in their original tongue, have never yet appeared in an English translation. This circumstance, coupled with their intrinsic value as contributions to history, both entitles them to a place among the Hakluyt Society's publications and should ensure them a welcome from that section of the British public who take an interest in the early settlement of the great Western continent. Mr. Markham's exceptional knowledge of the countries of which he writes, of the native languages of Southern America, and of the European tongues which have in part superseded, in part crossed or intermingled with them, fortified by his full and diligent cultivation of the literature to which they have given rise, invests his introductory remarks, brief as they are, with a degree of authority and interest which is still further enhanced by the careful and scholarlike notes which clear up points of difficulty in the translation or in the text. The first of the four Reports which make up the present volume, the itinerary of Pizarro, written by his secretary, Francisco de Xeres, a Sevillian of noble birth, is entitled a "A True Account of the Province of Cuzco, called New Castilla, conquered by Francisco Pizarro, captain to His Majesty the Emperor, our Master." It was first printed at Seville in 1534, the year of the writer's return with the first instalment of gold, after having for four years and a half attended his master in his voyage from San Lucar in January 1530, in his march along the Peruvian coast and across the Andes, and in the perils and toils of his romantic expedition unto the murder of the Ynca Atahualpa. The second edition, now rare like the first, was issued at Salamanca in 1547. The third and best known edition was that of Barcia, in his Historiadores Primitivos de las Indias Occidentales, published at Madrid in 1749. An Italian version by Domingo de Gastella of Tudela, secretary to Lope de Suria, ambassador from Charles V. to Venice, appeared at Venice in 1535, and was published there anew in the collection of Ramusio in 1556. Purchas gives a very brief notice of it. It is mentioned by Picknor in his History of Spanish Literature, and it was of much use to Robertson, Prescott, and Helps in their works upon the conquest of Peru. Mr. Markham speaks of a careful French version published at Paris in 1837, by M. Ternaux Compans, in his series of works on Spanish America.

Though much of Xeres' story has been told more in detail by Herrera and other compilers, there is in his simple and graphic narrative of stirring deeds the charm which only an eyewitness and participator could impart. The secretary modestly keeps himself in the background, nowhere writing in the first person. We are thus in doubt as to his having shared in his master's first abortive enterprise with which his chronicle begins; when Pizarro and his crew of 112 Spaniards, having sailed from Panama, November 14, 1524, were reduced at Port Famine to subsist upon a tanned cowhide which had been used to cover the pump, and he was left for dead after an attack of the Indians. Relieved by Almagro, Pizarro again made his way South. It was at Gallo, on the modern boundary line between New Granada and Ecuador, already discovered by Bartolomé Ruiz the pilot, that the famous scene occurred, told at greater length by Herrera and Garcilasso de la Vega, but simply and in brief by Xeres, when Pizarro drew with his sword a line upon the sand, and bade those cross it who had the daring to stay with him. Xeres differs from the other authorities in putting the number of these brave men as sixteen, which we agree with his editor in accepting as correct, since Xeres, if not present, had access to the best information. The period of his charter, however, running out, Pizarro was compelled half a year later to return to Panama, to set forth once more under more favourable auspices upon the voyage of which his secretary gives the ample details. With him went Hernando, the eldest and only legitimate son of his father, Gonzalo and Juan, illegitimate sons like Francisco himself, and Francisco de Alcantara, his mother's son by a different father. He had now, in three ships, 180 men and 37 horses. Landing in the Bay of San Mateo, he sent back his ships for more men and horses, with a goodly store of gold and silver; besides many emeralds, which were not then known as precious stones. Receiving reliefs and supports from time to time, the Spaniards rapidly over-ran and reduced the island of Puna, which they named Santiago, in the Bay of Guayaquil, recrossing thence to the conquest of Tumbes on the mainland, the transit both to and fro being partly effected by means of wooden rafts of native make called balsas. Upon a large raft made by himself Pizarro crossed a broad river, and, avenging the death of three of his men whom he sent as messengers of peace, routed the Indians of the place, and received the submission of the cacique. Xeres speaks with admiration of the roads which the Spaniards found on their advance, "all made by hand, broad and well built, and in bad places paved." On either side were abundant flocks of "sheep," as he calls the llamas and alpacas. Hernando, who had been sent forward to explore and to summon caciques and people to submission, reported mines of fine gold twenty leagues beyond Pucchio, on the river Ohira. Having done "justice" by burning the cacique of Almotaxe and his head men, with all the principal men of Lachira, who had got up a conspiracy to oppose the Christians, the first settlement was built at Tangarara, six leagues up the river, the town receiving the name of San Miguel. The site has since been abandoned on the score of unhealthiness for one in the valley of Piura.

The secretary's zeal for his master, and his pride in the astounding success of the Spanish arms, lead him to omit or gloss over the hideous cruelties and breaches of honour which marked the steps of the conquerors. Thus the seizure and judicial murder of the hapless Atahualpa, or as he is called by Xeres, Atabaliba, only paralleled by the fate of the unfortunate Montezuma, are set down in the calmest official tone. After an enormous ransom had been wrung from the miserable cacique, the usual charge of conspiracy was trumped up against him, which Xeres, as his editor shows, well knew to be false, though he makes much of his master's mercy in commutating the sentence from burning into being strangled in the public square. He is silent as to the protest of Hernando de Soto, who had been sent out of the way on a sham errand, in which protest he was joined by eleven other men of honour. The mock trial was conducted by Pizarro and Almagro as judges, having as assessor friar Valverde, the ruffian who had goaded the unfortunate prince into casting the Bible to the ground, and had thereupon given the signal for his being dragged from his litter and his retinue slaughtered. The dignified bearing and sagacity in defence displayed by their victim were the theme of admiration among the Spaniards, who were astounded, writes Xeres, to find so much wisdom in a barbarian. We are surprised to find the obsequious secretary pass over in silence the tears which Pedro Pizarro says it cost his brother not to be able to spare the captive's life, as well as the mourning, in the shape of a great felt hat, which Soto found him wearing when he came back to report that there was no Indian army near, nor any sign of the insurrection which he had been sent off to discover and quell. "Sir," said Soto, as we learn from less partial Spanish sources, "you have done ill! It would have been right to have waited for our return; for the accusation against Atabaliba is false; no armed men have been assembled." Pizarro threw the blame upon Father Valverde and Riquelme, the Royal Treasurer, who, he said, had urged him to the execution; and there were recriminations on both sides. Xeres sees in the murder the just punishment of the cruelties and crimes of the Indian prince, who for a single trivial fault would destroy a whole village, and had killed ten thousand persons, being thereupon detected by all his subjects. On the other hand, his own narrative testifies to the love and devotion paid to Atahualpa, the sympathy with him in his captivity and sufferings, and the mourning at his death. He is careful to preserve the memory of Pizarro's leniency in resisting the truculent desire of his followers to have all the prince's Indian soldiers put to death, or at least to have their hands cut off. "They should not desire to be like those Indians in their cruelties and their sacrifices which they perpetrate on those they capture in war." We meet, however, with casual and unconcerned mention of the Spanish habit of torturing Indians by fire in order to draw from them the whereabouts of concealed treasure; generally, we are not sorry to learn, being put on a wrong track by the pertinacity of their victims. Hernando Pizarro, the report of whose expedition to Pachacamac and Xauxa, written by Miguel Astete, or Estete, is incorporated into Xeres' narrative, seems to have been more ruthless in this practice than his brother the Governor. Allowance being made for the barbarous habits of the time, it is impossible, after all, not to feel wonder and admiration for the brute courage, to say no more, of Hernando and his handful of adventurers. Piercing to the heart of an unknown and hostile country, they reach the centre of idol worship, Pachacamac, and demand in the name of the Spanish Governor all the gold of the "mosque," as Xeres throughout styles the temples of the Yncas. The captain would go in to see the idol. In a very dark chamber, with a close fetid smell, yet in a good house, well painted, he found a very dirty idol made of wood, at the feet of which were offerings of gold. Having ascertained, says Xeres, that the devil frequented this idol, and spoke diabolical things to his servants which were spread all over the land, he had it broken before all the people, and ordered the vault in which it stood to be pulled down, teaching the people the sign of the cross, whereby they might be able to defend themselves against the devil.

These exploits are yet more fully recapitulated in the letter of Hernando himself to the Royal Audience of Santo Domingo, which forms the third document in the collection before us. In a learned dissertation upon the temple of Pachacamac Mr. Markham, who himself explored the ruins of the place in the year 1853, and again in the following year, traces the true story of Pachacamac. The dirty idol destroyed by Hernando Pizarro was no Ynca deity, but a fish-god, worshipped and enshrined by the early people of the coast whom the Yncas invaded and conquered, suffering the idol to retain its shrine, where it was visited by pilgrims of the earlier race and worship. Upon a lofty hill adjoining the "mosque" containing the idol, which had no name, or at least is not named by the narrator, a large temple is described by Astete, built by the Yncas to the Sun. This was the great temple of Pachacamac, the Creator of the World, from two Quicha words, pacha "the world," and camac, the participle of camani, "I create." The worship of the Supreme Being under the names of Pachacamac and Pachayachachic, "teacher of the world" (from yachachic, participle of yachachini, "I teach"), formed a prominent feature in the religion of the Yncas. The names have the first place in the Ynca ritual. On conquering the city of the fish-god the Yncas bestowed upon the place the name of Pachacamac, which had nothing to do with the religion of the coast people. The name is a purely Quicha name, like Nasca, Pisco, Runahuanac, Rimac, Huaman, &c., bestowed upon the coast valleys by the conquering Yncas on disposing the aboriginal race, whom they called Yncas, a race totally distinct in blood and language from the people of the Andes. Of this Ynca race little has been learnt, save that they had brought the art of irrigation to a high state of perfection, and adorned the walls of their buildings with richly coloured paintings. No dictionary of their language exists, but Mr. Markham speaks of a grammar and vocabulary by Carrera, as well as a few specimens of one of its dialects by Bishop Oré, in MS. in the National Library at Madrid. Avila and Arriaga, who speak of the race being addicted to sorcery and fortune-telling, frequenting the shrines of Rimac, or the "Spanish" as well as that of Pachacamac, are to some extent in harmony with Astete, though they are in making Pachacamac the creator of the god. The idol, it may be inferred, was settled after the manner lition by Hernando Pizarro. The popular confusion of ideas between Pachacamac and the Ynca Sun-god is made more confounded by the Ynca Garcilasso, who would make it out that the coast lord Cuismancu adopted the worship of Pachacamac from the Yncas, and erected to him a temple in which he placed the fish and the gods of the Yncas. The still more strange mistake of Mr. Prescott and Mr. Helps in dating the erection of a temple to Pachacamac prior to the away of the Yncas is corrected by Mr. Markham. The only temple to Pachacamac was that overhanging the town of that name, on the lofty hill of Cuzco. This was the famed Temple of the Sun, approached by three wide terraces, and having five surrounding walls, as described by Astota. At the foot of the hill were the storerooms of gold and the convents of women, carefully guarded. On the terrace above, Hernando Pizarro writes, were the buildings occupied by the chief priest, and by the fish-god or devil, as he calls it. On the summit of all was the Temple of the Sun. It is noted by Mr. Markham that Xeres seems never to have heard the name Ynca. He calls the Ynca Huayna Capac, the father of Atahualpa and Huascar, by the name of "Old Cuzco" throughout, mistaking the name of the capital city for that of the sovereign.

The last of Mr. Markham's four reports is that by the notary Pedro Sancho, upon the distribution of the ransom of Atahualpa. The well known offer of this unfortunate captive, fabulous as it might be thought in our day, to fill the room in which he was immured, thirty feet long by seventeen or eighteen wide, up to a line the height of a man and a half from the floor with gold, is literally borne out by this official statement. This quantity included 10,000 teguels or plates of gold, with which the chief temples and houses in Cuzco were covered, besides silver and jewels. It was the sight of this immense treasure, which the myriads of Indian bearers had set down in rows on a mountain side while they rested, that caused Hernando Pizarro and his band to bring in the report of their having seen a golden line miles long, on the hill over against their line of march, glittering like the sun. By a deed of the Governor, June 18, 1533, the mass was ordered to be melted down and distributed, according to a fixed scale, among the Spanish force; whose names, about one hundred and twenty in number, with their respective shares, are given at length by Sancho, the gold in pesos, the silver in marcos. For the Church were set aside 2,220 pesos of gold and 90 marcos of silver. To the share of Pizarro himself, as Lord Governor, "for his persons, his interpreters, and his horses," fell no less than 57,220 pesos of gold and 2,350 marcos of silver, not much more than a quarter, however, of what he is assigned by Garcilasso. The lowest in the list, Cristobal de Sora, who, as fate would have it, was one of the thirteen assassins who put Pizarro to death at Lima, June 26, 1541, had 3,330 pesos of gold and 135 marcos of silver. Mr. Markham, who sets down the total value of the ransom at 3,500,000*l.* sterling, has been at the pains to trace, wherever it was practicable, the after history of this band of bold but ruthless adventurers. The way in which Nemesis on the whole overtook his persecutors and murderers seems to have been such as might bring comfort to the manes of Atahualpa. The whole episode is one which Mr. Markham has done service to the truth of Hispano-American history in thoroughly bringing to light.

PREMIUMS PAID TO EXPERIENCE.*

THE title of this book will, we doubt not, go far to recommend it. Though, for all that we can see, it is altogether unmeaning, yet there is a good commercial ring about it which will give it currency. All business men know the value of experience, and most business men have at times to pay premiums. What more natural than to print them in capital letters, and to join them together by any preposition taken at random? Mr. Garrett, no doubt, while writing "the Incidents in My Business Life," was greatly embarrassed by the choice of the titles which lay open to him. He at once and wisely rejected as commonplace The Price Paid for Experience; but we can imagine that he may have pondered over such titles as Discounts Returned by Experience, My Allotment of Scrip in Experience, or Bonuses Received from Experience. Mr. Garrett says that he has been a business man, and that he has got experience. Should his book ever reach a second edition, we should be glad to learn how it was that he acquired experience by paying premiums to it, and of what nature were the premiums that he paid. It may be that he considers premiums a fine-sounding word for price, and that he retains just enough recollection of any Latin he may have acquired in his youth to confuse it with pretium. However much his title, with its smack of the Stock Exchange or of the Insurance Society, may pass with commercial men, he will find that there are those who are sufficiently accustomed to consider the meaning of words to refuse to rely on the experience of a man who shows that he is not even experienced enough to know when he is writing nonsense.

If the name of Mr. Garrett's book is silly, it is so far consistent as that it is the name of a very silly book. In his "Prologue" he tells us that he is "growing very old and feeble," and that he is "sitting with the last page of life's book turned down, and so little to add, that it does not much matter whether Death adds his 'finis' to-day or to-morrow." We might remark, by the way, that Mr. Garrett's metaphor is somewhat confusing, for the last page of a book is never turned down, nor is it only when the reader reaches the end that the "finis" is added. Be this as it may, sitting in this peculiar fashion, and in his old age and his feebleness, a novel thought came to him:—

It strikes me that when it is so interesting to read the adventures of men who have travelled to far countries, it may not be uninteresting to hear of the adventures of one who has travelled the long journey of seventy years. It cannot practically matter to most of us what stores we should lay in, or what route we should take for the Great Sahara, since few of us will go there. But Life is a road some of whose milestones we must all pass.

It strikes us that we have heard this kind of comparison before, and that Mr. Garrett is scarcely the first to discover the resemblance between life and a journey. The Great Sahara no doubt is original; but then unfortunately, like the title of the book, it is quite beyond our understanding. As for the milestones we must all pass, so untrustworthy a guide is Mr. Garrett that he apparently does not know how many he himself has passed. We infer from the passage we have just quoted that he has passed seventy of these; but three pages earlier he writes, "I am sure I was harder and more worldly at sixteen than I am at sixty." It may be the case that as one city took ten years to take, so the one paragraph which fills the next three pages took ten years to write, and that therefore both passages when written were strictly correct. In that case we can only wish that the rest of the work had had to be composed at the same rate. We should not perhaps be far wrong if we were to infer that the Prologue and the various stories which it introduces—the so-called incidents in Mr. Garrett's business life—are all equally the products of Mr. Garrett's imagination. In fact, so little does the author tell us of himself, so entirely the opposite of circumstantial is the story of his own life, that, after hesitating for some while, we have come to the conclusion that we are reviewing, not a portion of a biography, but a collection of moral tales. If we are wrong in this, the fault lies with Mr. Garrett. For surely when an author within three pages makes a difference of ten years in his own age, critics may well begin to doubt whether he is not drawing on his imagination rather than on his memory. In point of garrulity we must admit that there is nothing inconsistent in the notion of Premiums Paid to Experience being the work of a most advanced old age. And yet when we look at the style, it strikes us that it is a sort of garrulity that will only have ripened when the next century has fairly begun, and when men have had time to grow old and talkative who have fed on the English which it has been the glory of these latter years to invent. There are no doubt at the present time, as indeed there always have been, many silly old men and some silly old authors. But we doubt very much if any man who had passed seventy of Mr. Garrett's milestones could be found able to frame his particular nonsense in such words as the following:—

In the hurry of a life rocked in a leaky mortality, it is hard to wait for the leisurely processes of Infinite Immortality. God works slowly. Man flutters among his devoirs like a poor moth in a garden. Does it fancy the hard green buds will never blossom? Can it believe that the early flower already blowing was like them only a day or two ago? And presently the poor thing tumbles on its wings, and drops, and dies. But the roses come out one by one in their season, and Christmas brings red berries even to the holly. If the moth had only believed!

We doubt if a man of seventy, however silly he might otherwise be, would write of a landlady as "using a quite supererogatory duster," or would say that "a splendid 'place' at Surbiton was quite supererogatory to Thomas Knight's own position or income." We doubt if he would have described an organ as "sighing forth a rather sleepy voluntary," or the Sunday as a "punctual, ideal holy-day," or would have known much about "a plain, grave, incidental way of 'saying' a hymn," or would have risen to such a height of modern poetry as to sing of the "loathly sea that soothed round a vessel becalmed." We doubt if a man of seventy could, when writing of the time when he was a lad, represent a woman as talking of the "p'lice station" and "the bobbies," or would bring in "a railway contractor well known for enterprise and wealth." Literary Institutes with scholarships, art exhibitions, "a Tauchnitz edition of one of Auerbach's tales," or the works of Strauss, even though, to give this author a certain antiquity, he sticks him between Neander and Kant, with Hobbins-broke and Chesterfield to complete the company. We should doubt, in however leaky a mortality his life or his memory may have been rocked, whether he would at that early date have brought in Ragged Schools or women as "illustrating insignificant periodicals," or would have made cake and "cabbies" so common, or would have placed the Christian Year by a sick man's couch. Nor would he forty years ago have made a woman complain that she "had to spend so much in omnibus fares, going here, there, and everywhere," or a young man talk of taking "a turn at the diggings." Some of Mr. Garrett's errors certainly might as well be committed by a man of seventy as of any other age. We can excuse him when he talks of "a young divinity student from Oxford," and tells how his partner's "eldest son was Senior Wrangler at Oxford fifteen years ago, and is a Queen's Counsel now." We can excuse him when he confounds all our notions of geography and common sense by making a man's "landmarks of personal history lie far apart and dim as the latitude on the map of the earth," and adds that "they centred and intensified at the two poles, as it were, of his life." A man of seventy might perhaps be more likely than a younger man to represent the game of "cut" as being played at "the grand old endowed schools," but he would scarcely have known how to describe it in our author's language:—

For he was not a specially pretty child, and I dare say he had once yelled and hallooed, and played at "cat," and all other pranks which are thought just beautiful, touching animal spirits in the fine boys of the grand old endowed schools, but only sheer impudence and bad behaviour on the part of smutty factory brats who ought to be kept in order by the police!

It is something new to learn that pranks are thought animal spirits in the case of any boys. The next time we are startled in the street by any one who has yelled or hallooed or played at "cat," we shall try to remember before we call for the police that these pranks are not to be thought sheer impudence and bad behaviour, but just beautiful, touching animal spirits. Mr. Garrett would seem to be as ignorant of children's amusements as he is of English. He may have played at "cat," but he certainly knows nothing of kites. He is writing of a girl who worshipped at a Dissenting chapel, and read at home Jeremy Taylor's Holy Living and Dying. He says:—

They each had something good for her. What in both was catholic and everlasting she took to her own heart—what in either was merely local and temporary fluttered harmlessly away, like a paper kite from its entanglement among the sturdy branches of a good old oak.

There must be few people, we should imagine, however leaky their mortality may be, foolish enough to make so absurd a comparison. Certainly no one who had ever in his boyhood suffered by seeing his kite entangled in a tree would write of its fluttering away, even were he inclined to compare a girl's heart to "a good old oak."

Hard as we find it to believe that Mr. Garrett is an old man, harder still do we find it to believe that he is a business man. What man who knew as much of business as could be learned by merely reading the City article in the Times could give such a ridiculous account as the following of the going down of the "book-binding business," and the ruin of the "Israelite indeed" who gives this name to one of the stories:—

A cabinet minister wrote a notable book, and an upstart firm contracted to bind it on cheaper terms than James Heriot, with his old-fashioned notions of justice towards his workmen, could dream of offering. I am quite sure that the old granite Scotchman made no complaint to anybody, though he knew well enough this was but the beginning of the end.

"Neighbours used to drop in," we are told, "with clamorous denunciation of" new-fangled "ideas of competition," and the old bookbinder quoted Ihabakkuk, but what with the Cabinet Minister's notable book, and the upstart firm, the bookbinding business went very far down indeed. Mr. Garrett does not anywhere tell us what the particular business was in which he was engaged, and the incidents of which he records. If he really was in business, and if we might hazard a guess, we should imagine that he might once have been at the head of an establishment where tracts were printed. There he would have seen that any one can turn author who has a sufficient knowledge of his Bible to quote texts, and a sufficient knowledge of language to put words together. Like Benjamin Franklin he would have been inspired with a desire to pass from printer to author, and unlike Benjamin Franklin, being singularly devoid of intelligence, "what his common sense came short," he would have eked it out with words. "Moral engines," as he tells us, "like physical ones, are too valuable to be left useless long. Somebody will take possession of them, and drive them—some whither." Whether what Mr. Garrett calls "physical ones," and what most people would have called "railway engines," are liable when "lying idle" to be wrongfully taken possession of and driven somewhere, we do not pretend to say. There is no doubt, however, that "moral engines"—and the more moral and full of morals they are the greater the danger—are very liable to get driven into print. If we might push the simile a little further, we would say that they have always ready a copious supply of water, and need only a certain amount of heat to be applied to swell it out into a bulk many hundred times as big. Mr. Garrett's two volumes, for instance, with their five or six hundred pages, might once, without undue pressure, have filled some five or six pages of a tract. Unfortunately the comparison here fails, as there is no condenser invented by which so much vapoury matter can be turned back into water. Our readers however will be content, we imagine, to keep altogether clear of this "moral engine," and, if premiums can be paid to experience, to allow us in the present case to have paid one for them.

RECOLLECTIONS OF HORACE GREELEY.*

THE personal recollections of a man of distinguished talent and of marked individuality of character must always possess a certain moral and intellectual interest. The experiences of a life spent in hard and constant work, beginning with the lowest mechanical functions and ending in the highest intellectual offices of a profession which connects its leading members so closely with the most important political movements of their day as does American journalism, can hardly fail to contain much that will gratify the curious and instruct the thoughtful. And when Mr. Greeley's "Recollections of a Busy Life" were first published, they naturally commanded considerable attention in a country which had long recognised him as one of her most conspicuous politicians; and one, moreover, of far greater independence of mind and more vigorous and decided temper than are commonly to be found among the courtiers of the Sovereign People. Now that Mr. Greeley is a candidate for the chief magistracy of the Union—the standard-bearer of a great party, chosen under very exceptional conditions to represent them in a political contest, whose result must determine for years, and very critical years, the policy of the Government towards an important section of the Union, and the relations of the two races there brought face to face under new and difficult circumstances—autobiographical revelations that throw light on the nature, the capacity, and the convictions of the man have acquired a national significance, and command the attention of all who watch the struggle with interest even from this side the Atlantic. And we have not often met with a book which more thoroughly and frankly displays the character of the writer. Accustomed from his youth to public life, and to the public life of America, where no privacy is allowed to public men; identified from the first with the journal he created, as very few men are identified with any organ under the anonymous system of journalism, and used to being discussed and canvassed, praised and abused, not as an editor but personally and by name; of a temper naturally unreserved and outspoken to an unusual degree; too courageous to be reticent from fear, and too rough to be silent from delicacy; regretting little or nothing in the past, and not ashamed to avow regret if he felt it—Mr. Greeley speaks out about himself, his past experiences, his early poverty, privations, and struggles, his subsequent successes, his relation to political leaders and parties, his home life and personal tastes, as no Englishman not inordinately vain and egotistical would dream of speaking, and as few Americans would care to speak. The manner of his speaking is well calculated to interest the reader, and keep his attention alive. These are no continuous memoirs; the task of writing his life Mr. Greeley was content to leave to another and a far inferior hand. He has given the public only a series of papers, half narrative, half disquisition; upon those portions of his life, those features of his experience, which are most interesting to himself or most likely to instruct or entertain others. There is but a general sequence in order of time to connect the different topics, and this is broken without hesitation in order to preserve the unity of subject. Thus we have his own account of the general tenor of his life; of each of the principal political and social movements in which he was engaged; of some of the most important scenes in which he was an actor, written in each case with a fulness which would be impossible in a consecutive autobiography, but which sets before us the real history of his mind, his personal character, and his peculiar opinions much more distinctly and forcibly than such an autobiography would have done; at the same time that we learn every fact in his life which is in the least worth knowing.

It is said that party managers in the United States set a watch around the Presidential candidate to guard him from importunate interviewers, and keep him strictly from pen and paper, lest he should say something to damage his chances and theirs; on the same principle which leads them to select candidates whose past career is not sufficiently marked or well remembered to have given offence to any section or interest. The latter rule has been most signally violated in the case of Horace Greeley; few men could have been chosen in whose "record" opponents would find it easier to pick holes, or who has done and said more imprudent and offensive things. And to keep Mr. Greeley silent would, we fancy, be beyond the power even of American party discipline. If, despite the volume before us, and all that it recalls, he can be considered an available candidate, either that discipline must be far stronger than those who wield it used to suppose, or a striking personality and certain popular peculiarities must suffice to outweigh all the ordinary objections to a too notorious public character. For no man was ever more careless of offending or alarming friends and foes than the Editor of the Tribune. Even in these papers he avows himself a Socialist, though not a Communist, a Teetotaler with a strong leaning to vegetarianism, and a half-believer in Spiritualism; at the same time that he throws out a number of home truths which, if we are to judge American Spiritualists by their English congeners, will mortally offend nine-tenths of them. His paper on Margaret Fuller, for some time an inmate of his household, displays at once a leaning towards woman's rights which is not calculated to conciliate those who stand on the old ways, and a faith in the wholesome influence of "a husband and a couple of bouncing babies" which will simply infuriate the shrieking sisterhood. Those who think more of character than of opinions, believing that the general policy of a President is regulated by the programme of his party, but that the prudence and success of his administration depend in a great degree on his personal qualities—especially in the case of a strong-willed man of self-confident spirit and passionate convictions—will not be attracted towards Mr. Greeley by the evidence which these papers afford of a narrow education and vigorous but limited understanding, a common sense so uninformed by culture as to be no security against the wildest delusions in regard to matters falling outside the sphere of its own experience, and a tenacity of opinions once formed only equalled by the facility with which they are accepted on inadequate or irrelevant premises. In short, Mr. Greeley is about the last man whom statesmen would select for a position invested with no small amount of direct power and with a very large share of indirect influence, all of which the incumbent may, if he will, exercise at his own discretion, uncontrolled by responsible advisers, and very imperfectly checked by Congress.

* Autobiography of Horace Greeley: or, Recollections of a Busy Life. To which are added Miscellaneous Essays and Papers. Illustrated. New York: J. B. Ford. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

To a considerable proportion of his Northern supporters, however, the antecedents which have unfitted Mr. Greeley for rule, and the peculiarities which illustrate his unfitness, constitute his chief attraction. He is to them at once a man of personal eminence and one of themselves; he has over their imagination all the influence which belongs to marked personality in a country where there are no personages by right of rank, and all that belongs to homeliness and simplicity in high places. How great this influence is we may understand if we remember how deep is the interest of Englishmen in the only personages whose greatness is thoroughly realized by the multitude—the Royal Family; and how George III.'s "leg of mutton" and simple manners made him in the later half of his reign a popular idol. Mr. Greeley began life as the son of a very small farmer in New Hampshire, who speedily sank to the condition of a labourer; he started in the world, while still a boy, as a printer's apprentice in the office of a country newspaper, and after years of hard labour at the case, and of labour equally hard and scarcely better paid as the editor of party journals and "campaign papers" (the analogues of the papers often published in our large towns during a contested election), at last established the Tribune, and slowly worked it up into a powerful organ and a valuable property. He is a man of much reading, but little culture; of "plain" manners, eccentric dress and ways, and simple tastes; in short, in appearance and habits and ideas, in prejudices and character, as like a farmer of Vermont or Ohio as the editor of a successful New York journal well could be. He possesses much, and affects still more, of the tone and taste of farmers, their dry humour, straightforwardness of speech, and aversion to subtleties of reasoning and refinement of expression. His love of farming and of country life—a love which he shares with no small proportion of the most refined and dignified of our own aristocracy—is regarded by his rustic countrymen as an additional proof of his plainness and his likeness to themselves. In short, because he is not, and affects to be even less than he is, a man of cultivation, extensive knowledge, and political learning, he is thought more likely than a gentleman, scholar, and statesman like Mr. Adams to be chosen by his countrymen to direct the policy and administer the Government of one of the foremost nations of the world.

At the same time, if his memoirs do not raise our opinion of Mr. Greeley's fitness to fill the highest place among American statesmen, they do exhibit his personal character in a favourable and pleasing light. Strict morality, without a taint of hypocrisy or harshness, vehement and almost passionate earnestness, with perfect freedom from spite and malice, a steadfast adhesion to his own practices and principles, coupled with generous kindness for and a desire to do justice to those who most widely differ from him, are qualities that do not go far to make a statesman, but they do make an honest man, a good neighbour, and a valuable citizen. Mr. Greeley is put forward as the champion of Civil Service Reform; and his unlucky letter on the subject, coupled with his silence in face of the Tammany malpractices, has produced an impression that he is not earnest in that cause. But those who recollect his short career in Congress, and his indignant and effective struggle against the abuses of "mileage" or travelling allowances and the supply of books which formed the most valuable perquisites of Federal legislators—briefly and truthfully related in these pages—will hardly suspect Mr. Greeley of a disposition to tolerate malpractices which it would be his official duty to correct. His Socialist experiments do not inspire confidence in his judgment; but his frank recognition of their failure and its causes, and his repudiation of Communism, show capacity and willingness to profit by the lessons of practical experience. His conduct towards the South did not please his countrymen, and was about the only part of his political career of which he writes in an apologetic tone, as if standing on his defence. But most Englishmen will think that the man who had repeatedly advocated secession on the part of the North was bound to admit the right of the South to secede; and will consider that Mr. Greeley's moderate and courteous tone in speaking of the conquered people, his vindication of the now unpopular doctrine that when a rebellion has attained the dimensions of civil war its adherents cannot afterwards be dealt with as criminals, and his interposition to facilitate the release of Mr. Davis, do him more honour than the fiercest declamation against slavery or treason. Probably the portions of this volume which will do most to lower Mr. Greeley's reputation for political wisdom in this country are those which relate to Protection. It is not only that he is a vehement Protectionist, but that he shows himself incapable of appreciating the value of either facts or arguments upon the subject. He can, indeed, repeat with fluency and accuracy the accepted reasonings of his party; but he allows it to be understood that his animosity to Free-trade originated in the suffering which he witnessed and shared when the sudden influx of British goods after the war of 1812 drove the domestic manufactures of New Hampshire out of the market; as if, to avert that temporary suffering, it would have been just to impose a permanent tax on every American family for the benefit of the distaff-spinners and handloom-weavers. And he is so unreasonably, so blind to the most obvious considerations, as to maintain that at one time, and for a considerable period, British goods were sold in the States under cost price, not from necessity and a glut in the market, but in order to destroy the rising manufactures of America; as if merchants and manufacturers would incur a heavy, immediate, and personal loss for the chance of a future advantage which might be snatched from them by their competitors at home. If Mr. Greeley had himself been a merchant or manufacturer, his practical knowledge would have saved him from such an absurdity; but he has not the general culture which would enable him, without that practical experience, to detect the impossibility of such a thing on grounds of universal application. His theoretical arguments, his general reasonings, are vitiated by this utter want of that width of view, that grasp of principles, which only education can give; but when he writes of what he has seen and felt, when he speaks from experience, his common sense enables him to clear away the rubbish of preconception and prejudice, and his evidence is on the whole trustworthy, and always useful and interesting. The reader finds in these reminiscences, not only a very distinct portrait of the man, but many graphic sketches of American life as it was and is; and altogether, after allowing for all drawbacks, is inclined to think better of both than more elaborate, but less simple and straightforward, accounts might have induced him to do.

KNOX'S AUTUMNS ON THE SPEY.*

BOOKS on the sports and natural history of the British Isles are always attractive, if they are simply written. Thanks to our old friend Gilbert White, Solborne and its hangers, Woolmer Forest, and the Sussex Downs, have pleasant memories for thousands who have never seen them; and who has ever gone out deer-stalking with Scrope without feeling himself at home in the forest of Athol? St. John is another delightful companion. He became a successful author without suspecting it, merely by noting the incidents of a not very eventful life in the fulness of his own hearty enjoyment of them. His Highland Wild Sports, his Sport in Moray, his Tour in Sutherlandshire, are all to our mind model books in their way. They breathe the fresh air from loch, moor, and mountain; they reflect the scenery in bold, vigorous, unlaboured outline; they dash off the natives and their manners with rough but realistic fidelity; and they describe the habits of beasts, birds, fishes, and reptiles with minute yet most captivating accuracy. We do not say that Mr. Knox rivals Mr. St. John; it would be extraordinary, if not extravagant, praise to say as much. But we do say that the one reminds us of the other, and not merely because they write of very much the same neighbourhood. One and the other are sportsmen and naturalists by instinct, and the better sportsmen because they prefer nature to sport. They do not shoot or fish primarily for the bag or the basket. They can take the finger from the trigger when disarmed by the gambols of the unsuspecting game, or can altogether forget the business of the day in the absorbing interest of some pretty little episode—vide frontispiece of Autumns on the Spey, where the hero is admiring the antics of some crossbills, while the roe he should be looking out for cauters across the ride unobserved. Mr. St. John's lines fell on the banks of the Findhorn, Mr. Knox's on those of the magnificent Spey. As Mr. Scrope was fortunate enough to be the guest of the Duke of Athol, so the lucky Mr. Knox seems to find annual sporting quarters with his Grace of Richmond. And those Northern domains of the Gordons, which have passed to the Lennoxes, show as magnificent a range of sport as is to be found anywhere in the North. Highlands run into lowlands; there are the wild-deer forest of Glenfiddich, and the broad grouse moors of the Blackwater; there is lowland game in abundance in the fertile strath of the Lower Spey; there are dense pine-woods stretching away from the castle, while wild fowl swarm in the season in creek and estuary, and in many a secluded loch and pool. Chief of all to the enthusiastic salmon-fisher, the swift Spey comes rushing through the territory, a revolutionary torrent like the Loire, tearing its banks and shifting its bed when the snow melts in the spring or the floods descend in the mountains. Spey and salmon go naturally together; from all we have heard we are inclined to agree with Mr. Knox when he asserts that there is no such river in Scotland for the rod-fisher. The broad streams of Tay and Tweed must be fished from boat—tame work at best. The Spey is so rapid, and the navigation among its currents and intricate shallows so difficult, that as a rule it must be fished from the bank or not at all. Yet to talk of fishing it from the bank is a delusive figure of speech. Unless you are prepared to wade, or to dive and swim, if need be, you may as well leave your rod at home. Good salmon-fishing is the height of excitement in any case. There are few such sensations in life as the moment when a strong clean-run fish swallows a slight fly on a single gut, and rushes away with your line as he makes his start straight for the ocean. But when you cast your line, balancing yourself on the loose boulders of a treacherous bottom, standing immersed to your waist, while your next step may possibly sink you to the armpits, looking out for the trees that overhang the pool from behind, or the ripples that tell of submerged snags and branches, then the excitement culminates. Mr. Knox's fashion of attiring himself for the diversion of the day may give an idea of the adventures and vicissitudes he expected. Waterproof trousers and jerkin all of a piece are carefully secured over the shirt and beneath the armpits by a hempen cord. He found that the hempen armband where a leathern strap would have stretched, so that in the course of a long immersion only a wine-glassful of water filtered into the nother compartments of his costume. Then, if he quitted his feet, or was carried off them, he could swim after his fish in comparative comfort and safety. His heavy boots were a positive advantage, as counterbalancing the buoyancy of his inflated waterproof, and keeping his feet in amicable relations with his head. There are fishermen and fishermen, and very different is a day's sport on the Spey from one in a punt on the placid bosom of the Thames. To show that Mr. Knox's elaborate preparations were not superfluous, we may refer to the salmon-fishing episode illustrated by the sensational vignette. One day he had been out after a protracted drought, when the river had long been clear and low, and when not a fish had been stirring in the most famous pools. Of course he was fishing with the lightest of gut and the very smallest of salmon-flies. He had the great luck to raise and hook a monster made conspicuous, or "kenspeckle," as the Scotch say, by the round mark of an otter-bite beneath the dorsal fin. But the fish was strong and crafty, and the stream swift and strong, and, to cut a long tale short, after some highly exciting play he broke the line and left the angler lamenting. Shortly afterwards Mr. Knox was again fishing the same water, and hooked the identical fish in the identical spot. There was no mistaking the otter-bite. Nothing can be better told than the incidents of the long and animated struggle, with all its hopes and fears. Now the betting was on the fish, now on the man. The line was slight; any strain on it was dangerous, yet the salmon was bent on taking his way down into deep water where there was no following him. A friend of Mr. Knox had rushed to the spot with the clip, and was eagerly watching for a chance of using it. At last the strike is made, when, "to my horror I see the gaff break off short in the hand of my friend. Our fate hangs on a hair. The next moment I lose sight of all except his head, but in an instant afterwards he reappears, clasping with his arms a goodly salmon—twenty-two pounds weight—in its struggles vainly to escape from his fond but firm embrace."

Those North-country rivers are very apt to come down in flood, and the people who have settled on the rich farms by their banks suffer occasionally from terrible calamities. We recollect how St. John talks of having more than once to gather up his rod and tackle and run for his life, while quietly pursuing his sport on the Findhorn. The Findhorn often runs between precipitous banks which are not to be scrambled up in all places, and the first intimation you have of your imminent danger is a murmur growing fast into a roar and rush, and then the vision of a wall of brown water surging down upon you. With the Spey it is different, at least in the lower part of its course by Fochabers and Gordon Castle. There the valley widens, and when the river overflows its embankments at all, it spreads itself over a stretch of country. But being pent up between the embankments, the water is continually changing its course; you may go full of agreeable anticipations to the famous pool where you did such execution in former years, to find it filled up or utterly worthless. To protect the banks too against the encroachments of the torrents, the natives have recourse to a formidable kind of works which seem to answer their purpose well, but which are extremely injurious to the angling. Huge crates very strongly constructed are filled with heavy boulders, and securely bound together. Worse still is the alternative plan, where young trees, branches and all, are laid in the stream when the river is at its lowest. The uppermost boughs, all pointing outwards, form a regular chevaux de frise, and on that layers of great boulders are deposited, and then again come more trees, and so until the defence is pronounced sufficiently solid. Even if a pool forms there, and the salmon take to it, it is of course impossible to fish in the immediate neighbourhood with the certainty of catching your flies in these subaqueous snags. They immeasurably increase the odds against the capture too, even if you hook your fish elsewhere. For if you see him heading in their direction, you must hold him hard at all hazards, and when it is pull fish, pull man, with a clean-run twenty-pound salmon at the other end of your line, the stoutest of tackle is likely to snap. But so long as the water is in order and sport plenty, all these perils only make the keen angler love the river the more. Mr. Knox's affection for the Spey is a passion, and he embodies it in the rollicking lines which conclude the volume, and which are plainly inspired by a Hibernian muse.

But he loves sport by land as well as by water, although he much prefers the latter. A lost salmon is pain and grief to him; but he can contemplate a blank day in the forest, or look back on the escape of a stag of the finest head, with tolerable complacency. In fact, an enthusiastic naturalist is seldom a very bloody-minded sportsman. Monotonous woods and barren moors have a thousand pleasures for him to which men less happily gifted are unresponsive; and the pleasure of his day lies rather in pursuit than achievement. We may refer again as a case in point to an incident which we have already noticed casually. There was a roe-hunt in the great fir woods near the castle; there were numerous beaters, drilled and marshalled by various keepers, and a scratch pack of dogs trained to the business. Sport in the ducal forests seems arranged in the most complete and methodical fashion. Along some of the beats, over rides, openings, and passes familiar to the game, ambushes were constructed up among the fir foliage. A ladder of fir poles led up to a nest of boughs, concealing the red platform it was built upon. In one of these Mr. Knox was stationed, and his beat had commenced. But the beaters had to fetch a great compass and cover a great extent of ground, and he was giving anxious orders with waiting, for the waiting had lasted for hours, and he had seen few living creatures except a few and the beaters followed on its scent, and swarms of hungry gnats and midges. Above all, there was a singular absence of all small birds; when of a sudden he heard a shrill and unfamiliar chirping, as coming from several of them. Gradually it drew nearer, and at last the birds from which it proceeded came in a flight and actually settled in the boughs above his head. He was in the middle of a family circle of crossbills, busy splitting up the fir cones and swallowing the seed. Probably no one ever saw such a sight before under circumstances so favourable. He could observe the exact method of their operation; how they always gathered the cone before going to work upon it, tying with it to the central part of the bough, holding it parrot-fashion with the foot, for the most part swinging themselves under it, and then splitting it open by driving the bill home between the scales. He revelled in the curious spectacle until the near approach of the beaters scared the birds; so absorbed in it indeed, that, as he tells us, his interest cost him a shot at a roe-deer. Thus the little volume is brightened by natural episodes by wood as well as flood. There is a good deal of pleasant and instructive natural history in it, and a little not unpleasant science. Indeed we only wish it had been longer, and we do not care how soon Mr. Knox gives us another by way of sequel.

A NOVEL WITH TWO HEROES.*

WE are no rigorous sticklers for the unities, but we object on artistic grounds to two heroes in one novel. In the first place, few writers possess the requisite talent for piloting even a single hero through a series of incidents in a way that shall be at once probable and amusing. Fewer still are competent to conduct two heroes each along a separate labyrinth of his own. Then, too, doubling the heroes involves a departure from a well-established and very sound tradition. It is true that in some of the masterpieces of fiction two characters rivalling each other in the interest which they inspire have been introduced. There are many novel-readers who will sympathize much more keenly with the chivalrous Lord Evandale than with the worthy but sententious Henry Morton. But it does not follow that there are two heroes in Old Mortality. Technically regarded, the hero in a novel is the central pivot on which the action of the story turns, and all the other characters, however attractive or contrasted, group themselves around him in a subordinate or assisting attitude. In this sense the hero is one and indivisible. To tamper with his indisputable supremacy is to weaken the effect which it should be the novelist's aim to produce. A novel with two characters in it of equal prominence is like a watch with two mainsprings. It is pretty sure to go badly.

In the novel before us the two heroes are obviously the result not so much of design as of an attempt on the author's part to pack into one work materials which more properly might have been expanded into two. There is a group of German characters to be trotted out, and there is a group of English characters to be brought upon the scene; and each must be supplied with an appropriate background and surroundings. But in order to combine a set of transactions in and about a German University town with another set of transactions in or about an English rectory, a connecting link must be found. In this case a link between the British and Teutonic elements in the story is obtained by the disclosure at the proper moment of a latent relationship between the German hero and the English hero. The evidence on which Arnold Muller is identified by Sir Robert Chesney as his German cousin would seem to have been somewhat slender, but this is a point to which two young men who had felt from the first a mysterious attraction towards each other would attach little importance. From the elder people on the Chesney side a little more caution might have been expected before recognizing a young foreign musician as heir-presumptive to the honours of a family of such portentous antiquity as the Chesneys, to whom "the Norman Conquest was a comparatively modern episode." But Arnold Muller had in every way proved himself so worthy of his historic lineage that even people who were descended from Saxon Thanes, and whose ancestors had been mixed up with every great event in English history from the Crusades to Culloden, might well be pleased to own him. A family solicitor, however, ought to be above merely sentimental intuitions, and inexorable in the matter of proof. We are surprised at the facility in jumping to a conclusion exhibited by Mr. Took, the Chesney man of business, familiarly referred to by the author as "the Man in Spectacles," by way of emphasizing the acuteness with which he surveyed the world through the medium of those instruments. A lawyer ought at least to be accurate, which Mr. Took is not when he introduces to the Rev. Stephen Chesney as his new-found nephew a young gentleman who is shown by the context to be his deceased sister's daughter's son. However, it is quite in keeping with Mr. Took's gushing temperament—a temperament unhappily rare in men of his profession—to slip a generation in tracing Arnold's connexion with the astounding Chesney pedigree. But when, in answer to the rector's natural hesitation, he testily asks whether he, Mr. Took, is given to make statements which he cannot prove, we must frankly say that he is not altogether to be acquitted of the charge, as well as of a tendency to entertain loose and unprofessional notions of the nature of evidence.

Of the twin heroes of this novel we much prefer the German to the English. So poor a figure indeed does the young baronet cut by the side of the young musician that we suspect our author of sharing Mr. Arnold's well-known views about his countrymen, and of pointing a sly contrast between Teutonic Geist and British materialism. The inheritor from his mother of a "musico-aesthetic" temperament, Arnold had been from his earliest years enthusiastically devoted to the study of the divine art. As a child he would sit like another Mozart or Mendelssohn at the piano, absorbed in "the tone pictures of the old masters," or endeavouring "to assimilate his own crude harmonies to the full swell of theirs." To a musical genius the prospect of a seat in a Berlin country house was intolerable. So he joyfully accepts the offer of his father's old friend Herr Bergmann, Director of the Conservatorium at Städtlein, to further his musical studies in return for his services as secretary. The story opens with his introduction to the family circle of the kind old director, with whose pretty daughter—pretty in all but her ill-omened name of Mala—he rapidly falls in love. The interior of the director's household is pleasantly described: No more hospitable hostess could be found than simple-minded Fräulein Martha, her domestic and culinary anxieties notwithstanding. Then there is Herr Wallraf, Professor in the Conservatorium, hiding a warm heart under a caustic and cynical tongue. Even the inoffensive Arnold becomes for a season the target of his sarcasm, and it is not until the director relates Wallraf's story—a story of blighted love and ambition—that the first misunderstanding is removed, and they become fast friends. The Conservatorium and its staff are depicted with a minuteness and individuality which make us think that they must be drawn from life. There is Herr Schenk, good-natured and impeccable; Herr von Heintz, an accomplished amateur, devoted to his art; old Herr Braun, teacher of harmony, and nicknamed Sagittarius from his love of archery; and last, not least, there is Signora Eschino, professor of singing, a loud-voiced, black-ringed lady, who kept a meek little husband in complete subjection, as well as some fifty pupils who trembled and wept at her strange Italian expletives. With Mala Arnold is on the best of terms, and he begins to indulge in hopes of winning her love, when he is suddenly overwhelmed by a crushing discovery. Ominous allusions had been made from time to time by the Bergmanns to a certain absent Lucien, but they had failed to open Arnold's eyes to the real state of affairs. At last the fatal moment arrives. It is the director's annual vintage festival, and Arnold has been flirting with Mala over the grape-gathering. Suddenly the sound of an approaching footstep is heard, Mala springs forward, and is clasped in the arms of a stranger:—

A stranger! one look at the two was enough. An unutterable sense of desolation stole over Arnold. The sky lost its brightness, the earth rocked beneath his feet. Mechanically he staggered back to the white vine, unheeded by the lovers, and sheltered by the overhanging leaves knelt down as if to cut the grapes, in reality to gain a moment's time. "That cry—that upturned sparkling face! What a secret had these revealed! Mala, Mala, could never be his. What need of words to tell that which his eyes had seen? Fool, madman that he had been, so to deceive himself! How long he remained thus, stunned and motionless, he never knew; it might have been seconds, it might have been hours. The first thing that roused him to consciousness was his own name gaily, eagerly pronounced in Mala's voice. He rose hurriedly; the long shadows lay across the path, two others were approaching; by a great effort he recovered his self-control, and advanced to meet them; Mala and Lucien stood before him. In her impetuous way she seized his hand. "Come, Arnold, let me present you to Lucien, my cousin Lucien. Is it not delightful that he should have arrived just at the right time, on my fête day? Lucien, our Arnold. You know him, I am sure, already."

The rivals looked at each other, and bowed silently; each felt instinctively that friendship could not exist between them. But in that first glance Arnold read something more. As he encountered the half-averting, half-triumphant expression of Lucien's eye, and the cruel curve of the refined nostril, the life-forces came bounding back to his heart, misery gave place to indignation. The rays of the setting sun fell full on his face, disclosing only too plainly the mental conflict. "My God," cried Mala, falling back in horror, "Arnold, you are ill!" The insolent eyes were still upon him; pride came to his aid, and Arnold murmured a few words about the heat; but his voice sounded hoarse and unnatural. Mala looked wistfully at him, but she said nothing, and they began the descent to the village.

Arnold is generous enough to resign his own pretensions to succeed to Wallraf's chair in favour of his worthless rival, who is base enough after all to repudiate his engagement to Mala.

It is time to turn to the English hero in this novel—Sir Robert Chesney. He may be described as emphatically a poor creature. Except a tendency to talk slang and to get into mischief, there is nothing distinctively masculine about him; and certainly nothing can be more un-English than his egotistical prattle, his maudlin complaints of his uncle's harshness, and his readiness to swear eternal friendship at first sight. Imagine a young Englishman saying, like a gushing schoolgirl, to a friend of one afternoon, "Call me Robert!" The blood of the pre-Norman Chesneys must have sadly degenerated to flow in the veins of so very mawkish and feeble a representative. At Städtlein, whether Sir Robert is sent to study, the orbits of the two heroes cross. Looking about a German University strikes us as a singular scheme of education for a young baronet of great expectations, who enjoyed the care of a scrupulously severe and active guardian. It is another proof, if proof were needed, of the inability of a descent from Saxon Thanes to ensure a corresponding transmission of common sense. The Rev. Stephen Chesney is a specially irritating personage, however, while he is depicted as a solemn self-opinionated and even rigorous family martinet, his actions are fituous in the extreme. In one of his rambles round Städtlein the young baronet meets and falls in love with a pretty gipsy girl, with whom he proposes to slope to New Zealand. The project is secretly encouraged by his unscrupulous and spendthrift cousin, Captain Hawthornthwaite, who believes himself to be the next heir to the Chesney estates. In concert with a villainous associate, Bully Clayton, this pleasant cousin has taken measures to make Sir Robert's return from the colonies in the highest degree improbable. Happily the conspiracy, concocted under the nose of the imbecile Mr. Chesney, is discovered in time, and by an opportune breaking of his leg the simple young baronet is prevented from fulfilling his share in the programme. The injury to his leg must have been serious, for two years afterwards, having been put in possession of his inheritance, he is still described as "limping."

The chief fault of this book is the redundancy of matter in it, and the absence of anything like chemical combination between the two elements in the story. The musical idyl of Städtlein never becomes properly fused with the more sensational chapter of adventures of which Ilmington Rectory and neighbourhood is the scene, although a link between them has been provided as wanted. The author, or, as we think we should rather say, the authoress, has crammed the substance of two novels into one. Not content with this feat, she has gratuitously loaded her work with episodes. With two heroes, and two heroines, and two sets of supernumeraries, and double scenic surroundings, one would think that her hands were sufficiently full. Not a bit of it. She can still find a place for the melancholy history of Lady Charleswood, a mere phantom so far as the main action of the story is concerned. This lady lay under the suspicion of having conspired at her first husband's murder. Parenthetically she is cleared of the charge by the dying confession of Bully Clayton, the same villain who had planned the kidnapping of Sir Robert Chesney. The intending murderer of the baronet had been the actual murderer of the late Mr. Penton. Killing two birds at one shot in this sweeping fashion is not perhaps very artistic; but one is grateful for any economy in handling materials in the present work. The villains of fiction, however, may fairly complain if, in addition to the central crimes which constitute their raison d'être, they have also to answer for all the subsidiary ones which it may please the novelist to introduce. Murderers are generally credited with the virtue of unobtrusiveness. But Mr. Clayton is an exception to the rule, for he insists on going to a race luncheon to meet the widow of his victim, who faints away at the sight of "the terrible man." The incident is further illustrative of the imbecility into which the last actions of the pre-Norman house of Chesney had lapsed. On no other evidence than Lady Charleswood's fainting fit and exclamation Mr. Chesney sends for a constable, and "in his capacity as a justice of the peace" charges Mr. Clayton with being one Jubes Hill, formerly of Wales, and concerned "in a certain murder." This was at all events a decided, if a slightly illegal, step for a justice of the peace to take. But what are we to think of the rector's capacity for administering nineteenth-century justice when we learn that, without any further inquiry, "on receiving from the accused a succinct account of his whole career, and references to certain well-known bankers and merchants," he then and there releases him, with apologies for the wrongful detention to which he had been subjected. Any one of the rude Saxon Thanes, his ancestors, would have made a better justice of the peace. As if one episode were not enough, we are treated to another concerning the hopeless attachment of Mr. Took, junior, an enthusiastic young curate, to Alice Chesney. In spite of his virtues and the surprisingly active part he takes in the Chesney affairs, such a mésalliance was not to be, and he is destined to extinguish his "only earthly hope" by reading the marriage service over Alice and Arnold Muller. It is singular that of the young ladies in this novel no one marries the object of her first affection, or the man one expects her to marry. Mala, in love with Lucien, and beloved by Arnold, marries nobody. Alice, with whom Sir Robert is in love, marries Arnold. Mariechen, Arnold's sister, in love with Lucien, is left, when the story closes, verging towards matrimony with the young baronet. We do not object to this odd solution of all the love problems, but in fiction it is rather unorthodox.

It is only fair to say, in conclusion, that in spite of faulty construction, superabundance of matter, and not a few incidental absurdities, this work has sterling merits. It is well written; it is readable; it is thoroughly inoffensive. Reviewers' advice is seldom of much avail, but we counsel the author in her next novel to eschew episodes, to cut down her characters by one-half, and to confine herself to one hero. A novel can hardly be satisfactory as a work of art if, like Mr. Arnold's Titan, it has to stagger along under the too vast orb of its contents.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE efforts which have been made in France within the last twenty years to bring about administrative decentralization are still apparently fruitless, and it seems difficult to eradicate completely a system the origin of which can be traced even further back than the Ministry of Cardinal Richelieu. But political thinkers who are little inclined to abolish altogether what appears to them an essentially French mode of government—one, therefore, suited to the national character—would gladly welcome certain modifications borrowed from ourselves, and we are glad to see the attention of students directed towards the organization and working of our local government. Hence the importance of M. Paul Leroy-Beaulieu's volume;* it was composed in pursuance of a programme published three years ago by the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques, and it contains a very careful examination of the whole subject. The author has arranged in a most lucid and systematic manner the information gathered by him from official documents, and he has produced a readable as well as a learned book.

The organization of the French army is a topic which has been discussed almost ad nauseam by the authors of innumerable works already noticed in our columns. M. Ch. Beussière has had many predecessors, but his remarks† deserve more consideration than those of the great majority of the writers who have previously dealt with the subject. Military reform must, he observes, be applied to two very distinct things—first, the recruiting, and, secondly, the training of the army. M. Beussière develops these topics with considerable talent, showing a thorough knowledge of the subject which he has undertaken to elucidate. The distribution of military forces, the best way of employing soldiers in a useful manner, and the problem of education are the three principal points which he examines. He would transform the camp into a school, and would substitute for the idle life of garrison towns a system of training which would be profitable to the nation at large by raising the standard of intellect in the army.

Antoine Court‡ is one of the personages of the eighteenth century about whom readers know least, although he played a very distinguished part in the history of his own country and in that of religion. Beyond an interesting account in Messrs. Haag's France protestante, a few fragments published by the Bulletin du Protestantisme français, and other notices of less value, nothing as yet had been written about a man who, in the face of the greatest difficulties and of the severest political enactments, applied himself a hundred years ago to the task of reconstituting French Protestantism. The fact is that the philosophical movement, as it is called, had absorbed the attention of the majority of readers, and no one cared to inquire into the efforts made for the purpose of infusing new life into a merely religious community. Fortunately, however, a healthier direction has lately been given to the study of ecclesiastical history, and the excellent work now before us supplies a most important desideratum in the annals of French Protestantism. It contains a large number of documents hitherto unpublished, by the help of which we are enabled to reconstruct the biography of Antoine Court, and also to see what that distinguished and truly patriotic man did to raise the position of the descendants of the fugitives of the Cévennes.

The French Government has for many years, under the various régimes which have existed since 1830, steadily carried on the idea of publishing historical collections referring to modern as well as to mediæval times. The collection of Henry IV.'s correspondence is undoubtedly one of the most valuable instalments of the Documents inédits started by M. Guizot, and in its present form it can be profitably consulted by historical students. A good many despatches, however, emanating from the great Bourbon King had escaped the researches of M. Berger de Xivrey, the editor, and they have at different periods been issued by other scholars. The latest volume of this description has quite recently been given to the public through the intelligent care of M. Halphen.§ It contains no less than one hundred and eighty-nine letters addressed by Henry IV. to Chancellor de Bellièvre, who, as most readers are aware, held an important rank amongst the French diplomatists of the sixteenth century. He was successively ambassador in Switzerland under Charles IX. (1572), in Poland and in England under Henry III. (1573 and 1584), in England again under Henry IV. (1589), and finally in Spain (1596). The MS. collection of his negotiations has never yet been published, and it is from this important series of State papers that M. Halphen now extracts the materials of his work. We need scarcely point out the great value of this fresh contribution to the history of France, which has been prepared with all the care that M. Halphen's previous labours might have led us to expect. He had already done much towards throwing new light upon the life and times of Henry IV. His edition of Pierre de Lestolle's journal, and his volume of letters written by the King to M. de Sillery, published respectively in 1862 and in 1866, had shown his intimate knowledge of the sixteenth century and his editorial qualifications. The present publication cannot but add considerably to M. Halphen's reputation. M. A. Aubry deserves the thanks of all students of history for the spirit with which he has undertaken the issuing of these various supplements to the series of Henry IV.'s despatches.

Several important contributions to philological science have recently reached us. We have, first of all, M. d'Arbois de Jubainville's essay on the forms of the Latin declension in France during the Merovingian epoch.|| The various literary remains belonging to that period show us three systems of declining nouns, adjectives, and participles. First, we have the classical forms as they existed in the regular Latin grammar, justified by the examples of the best authors. Secondly, the same forms still subsisting, a phœnic modification was introduced, consisting in a change affecting the pronunciation of vowels, and sometimes, but more rarely, the consonants. This fact marks what M. de Jubainville designates the vulgar declension of the first degree. Thirdly, an altogether new syntax gradually got into use. The cases were employed differently from what had previously been the rule; some of them being used promiscuously, and others consequently becoming superfluous. This system formed a kind of transition between the Latin language and archaic French; it is called by M. de Jubainville the vulgar declension of the second degree. In order to illustrate these three successive forms, our author has collected a great number of examples from (1) the original Merovingian diplomas published by M. Tardif; (2) the formulas of Marculphus, and other texts of the same kind; (3) the oldest texts of the Salic law; (4) M. Le Blant's series of Christian inscriptions; (5) the fragments of St. Avitus which M. Léopold Delisle printed about six years ago; (6) the Merovingian coins; and (7) the Romance Glossary of M. Diez.

M. L. Benloew's new volume* is not, nor does it pretend to be, an original work. It explains with much clearness the present state of comparative philology, and gives a tolerably complete résumé of the works of Bopp, Humboldt, Max Müller, and E. Burnouf. M. Benloew's remarks on the formation of the Celtic languages are particularly valuable; they are both new and sound, and would alone suffice to secure attention to his book.

In approaching the substantial works of M. François Lenormant we feel quite overpowered by the embarras des richesses. The commentary on the fragments of Herodotus which we noticed on a previous occasion was a good specimen of the author's industry and of the immense variety of his erudition. Whilst attempting to describe the propagation of the Phœnician alphabet†, he has really given us a history of the formation of writing, and the great interest which characterizes this first instalment of his work makes us hope that the publication of the rest will not be long delayed. M. Lenormant's introduction, extending over nearly 130 pages, discusses the following proposition:—"The transmission of writing has never taken place without a more or less considerable transmission of ideas, of which writing is the exterior and tangible sign." Two principles, applied either simultaneously or separately, lead as an ultimate result to the use of writing; viz. ideographism, or the representation of ideas, and phonetism, or the representation of sounds. The former of these, we are told, consists either, first, in the figuration of the objects themselves which are to be designated—which is what Clement of Alexandria calls proceeding κατά μιμήσιν; or, secondly, in the figuration of a material object or image agreed upon as representing an abstract idea—which is what is meant by symbolism. In the same manner there are two degrees of phonetism—first, syllabism, which treats each syllable as an indivisible whole, composed of a consonant mute by itself and of a vowel or vocal sound by means of which the consonant is pronounced; secondly, alphabetism, a system which decomposes the syllable, and represents the consonant and the vowel separately. M. Lenormant's object is to show that logically, and in accordance with the very organization of the human mind, all systems of writing have begun by ideographism and gradually arrived at phonetism. In the application of the former principle, the purely figurative method has been the starting point and the symbolic method the goal. If the representation of sound has been the principle adopted, syllabism must have existed before phonetism. In elucidating this curious question M. Lenormant has been led to examine the hieroglyphics of the Egyptians, Mexicans, and Chinese, the cuneiform inscriptions, and the scanty monuments we have of Phœnician civilization. By way of appendix to the introductory essay we find an interesting memoir of Phœnician palæography, illustrated by specimens of alphabets taken from various sources; and, finally, M. Lenormant gives a chapter on the writing belonging to the Hebrew-Samaritan family of languages.

We are also indebted to M. Lenormant for a series of letters on different topics of religion and philosophy bearing upon the history of the Asiatic nations.‡ These letters, commenced during the horrors of the late German invasion and the civil war which followed it, are extremely interesting from more than one point of view. In the first place, they show what the love of science can do under the most trying circumstances; just as M. Silvestre de Sacy composed during the Reign of Terror in 1793 his celebrated Mémoires sur quelques antiquités de la Perse, so the present Under-Librarian of the Institute has written a work of profound erudition amidst the rattling of mitrailleurs and the tramp of soldiers. But the chief value of the Lettres assyriologiques is of course to be found in the variety and importance of the materials they embody. The contents of the two volumes now before us are as follows:—Letter I, on the Monarchy of the Medes, its Origin and its Kings; II, on the Ethnography and History of Armenia before the Ashshurians; III, Essay towards determining the Kings of Babylonia and Assyria; IV, on the Hittite Inscription of the Temple of Yata at Abian; V., on the Heathen Worship of the Kabba during pre-Islamite times. This last occupies nearly the whole of the second volume.

The edition of Nonius Marcellus lately published by M. Quicherat is a work which could not fail to be noticed by classical scholars. As a monument of grammatical literature it occupies a conspicuous place on the roll of ancient learning, and the numerous extracts which it gives from productions now unknown except by name render it doubly valuable. But it would be very unfair to judge the accuracy and erudition of the Latin grammarian by merely referring to the MSS. of his treatise De compendiosa doctrina, and M. Quicherat has bravely taken up the cudgels on his behalf against certain German critics who express themselves slightly about him. The learned French editor shows conclusively—first, that trustworthy authorities concur in speaking very highly of Nonius Marcellus's scholarship; as, for instance, Pomponius Laetus, who, about the year 1460 or 1470, published the earliest edition of the De compendiosa doctrina, and who describes him as ille peritissimus; secondly, that even the merest tiro could not have allowed the enormous blunders to pass which disfigure the text of Nonius. The natural inference, therefore, is that copyists must be made responsible for these blunders, and M. Quicherat, in correcting them in a few cases, shows what an interesting commentary could be written on the work which he has edited. He concludes by suggesting some new readings of his own, thus giving us a useful pamphlet which all readers must examine if they would study impartially the volume itself.

Under the title Les jeunes années de C.-A. Sainte-Beuve, M. François Morand, the fellow-townsmen of the illustrious critic, has published a pamphlet which will be an indispensable source of materials to future biographers. Readers familiar with Sainte-Beuve's poetry recollect no doubt a certain Abbé Eustache Barbe, to whom is inscribed the beautiful epistle in the Pensées d'Aout beginning with the words Il est trois fois béat celui qui dans sa ville . . .

M. Barbe was at a very early age the intimate friend of Sainte-Beuve, and the acquaintance begun at school lasted through life. M. Morand's volume comprises a set of letters written to the Abbé by the critic. The first is dated—1818, and the last was despatched on the 1st of March, 1863. We therefore can follow the whole of Sainte-Beuve's career from the period of his first religious belief to that when he discarded positive religion of every kind. It is pleasant to see M. Morand endeavouring to hope, almost against hope, for the conversion in extremis of the causeur du lundi, and we admire the Abbé Barbe, who to the last remained the faithful friend of him whom he had long ceased to influence by his moral teaching. This volume brings back to our mind M. Forquas's edition of the correspondence of Lamennais with those truly noble-minded ladies Mesdames de Trémilhuc and de Lucinières, whose attachment to the author of the Essai sur l'Indifférence was not shaken even after the publication of the Paroles d'un Croyant. M. Morand has added to his work a few supplemental letters from himself, and some detached thoughts of M. Sainte-Beuve père on the Reign of Terror.

M. Amédée Thierry continues his excellent and suggestive monographs on the history of the Roman Empire during the fifth century. The three volumes devoted to the life of St. Jerom had given him an opportunity of describing the state of society in the West; he could naturally group around the illustrious priest both the most influential members of the patriciate and the matrons whose social position or intellectual superiority had placed them in the front rank of society in those days. The present octavo, treating of St. John Chrysostom, is the counterpart of the previous monograph; but the proportions of the picture are much wider, and we are brought into contact with political history to a far greater extent than when the hero was St. Jerom. The Court of Byzantium and the whole society of the Eastern world stand before us in strong relief, and, as M. Amédée Thierry observes, we see all the passions of the human heart brought into play. The early part of St. John Chrysostom's life had formed the topic of a previous work; we have here an account of that struggle with the Empress Eudoxia which subjected the intrepid bishop to numberless persecutions, exile, and death. This fresh series of the Récits de l'Histoire romaine is in every respect worthy of the three preceding ones.

The old town of Ferrette was in days of yore the capital both of a lordship (Herrschaft) and of an earldom (Grafenschaft), which during the middle ages played a conspicuous part in the history of Alsace. M. Bonvalot has given us the history of the place in an introduction to one of the most valuable works on custom law which we have seen for a long time. We need not follow him through his minute description of the various political vicissitudes of the county of Ferrette; but we may say a few words about the code of laws which that description introduces. The province of Alsace was formerly split up into a number of independent communities having each its own legislative customs; the various codes in which these customs were embodied differed from each other in their date, their spirit, and their provisions; all of these were remarkable, especially that of the county of Ferrette, whose deeply Teutonic character and great antiquity placed it quite apart from the rest. The definitive form assumed by the Ferretan coutumes was given to it during the sixteenth century; at that time it was a collection of laws or decrees of various dates, referring to traditional usages never committed to writing. The part bearing upon the rights of succession was particularly characteristic; it had given its celebrity to the entire collection, and the Ferretan coutumier gradually came to be adopted by the whole of Alsace, besides influencing the legislation of Germany and of Switzerland. Hence the importance which it obtained, and the necessity of its being studied by all readers who would have an accurate knowledge of mediæval legislation. Whilst we wonder that it should never have been published before, we feel the more indebted to M. Bonvalot for the excellent edition he has given of a valuable specimen of feudal law, and for the notes which accompany it. The coutumier, divided into thirty-one chapters, is printed here in the original German text with a French translation; each chapter is illustrated by copious notes, and at the end of the volume M. Bonvalot has added an appendix of documents taken from the Red-book of Ferrette, and from the Record Office of the department of the Upper Rhine.

M. Henry Bordier has "paid off" the Germans in a curious manner. Unfortunately for our friends on the other side of the Rhine, after the revolution of the 4th of September M. Bordier was appointed a member of the Commission named to examine the papers preserved at the Tuileries, and he succeeded in getting hold of two thousand petitions presented by Germans who were anxious to obtain from the Emperor, under various pretences, money, distinctions of every kind, pensions, &c. &c. The list given by M. Bordier, and printed in alphabetical order, is a monument of ingenuity; one wonders at the innumerable recipes devised by suffering humanity for the perfect cure of rheumatism, piles, and other diseases, by which the Emperor Napoleon III. either was or might be afflicted. It is some comfort to think that the Englishmen who petitioned His Majesty had no anxiety whatever for pecuniary relief. Their great ambition was to obtain an autograph letter, or even a signature, if they could get nothing else.

Amongst the works of fiction we have lately received are two novels by M. Hector Malot, which betray a close imitation of Balzac's style. The idea of making the same dramatis personæ appear in a succession of tales, and of telling us their whole history from the cradle to the grave, is both a mistake and an impertinence, except in the case of masters of their art, for it supposes that the extreme interest we take in these puppets obliges us to remember the various books in which their adventures are related. The author of Eugénie Grandet might be allowed such liberties, but M. Hector Malot has not yet obtained the same privilege, and his recent productions are not likely to win it for him. Un Curé de Province and Un Miracle are not only stupid, but they have the serious fault of making religion responsible for the faults of some of its ministers. Balzac's mantle is evidently not yet appropriated.
